Mental and moral desire is self-moving and therefore voluntary and responsible, but physical and sensuous desire is the operation of physical law, not of self-determination. The desire for fame or wealth is wholly disconnected from the physical nature, so that it might be experienced by a disembodied spirit But the desire for food or alcohol or the sexual desire requires a physical nature. These latter are appetites in distinction from desires; although the older divines sometimes denominated the desires of the mind, in distinction from those of the body, rational appetites, the others being animal appetites. St. Paul mentions both in Eph. 2:3: “lusts of the flesh and wills or desires of the mind.” Rational or mental desire seeks [appetit) an end, but the end is wholly mental. An animal or physical desire seeks an end, but the end is wholly sensuous. The motion or action in the former instance is that of mind or spirit and is self-motion, which makes it voluntary and responsible. The motion or action in the latter instance is that of organized vital matter, which moves necessarily by reason of physical properties and in accordance with a physical law to which it is subject. When the body desires food, this is a necessary craving or appetency which never changes. It is not voluntary self-determi-nation which might become the contrary by a revolutionary act of the physical nature No such revolutionary change is possible within this physical sphere. Man s sensuous and material nature always hungers and always thirsts But when the rational mind or spirit desires fame, this is a self-moving craving or appetency, which may be changed by grace into its contrary The ambitious and proud spirit may become a meek and lowly one and vice versa. This species of desire is not sensuous and physical, occurring by reason of the law of animal and material life, but rational and mental, occurring by the pure self-motion and self-determination of spirit. Mental desires may be lost and restored, and this proves that they are modes of the will. The desire after God and holiness with which man was created was lost in the fall and is restored in regeneration. It is not so with the involuntary physical desires. The appetites for food, etc.. existed after the fall in the same manner as before. The degree of the appetite for food, etc., is increased by the apostasy of the will and becomes gluttony, but the kind remains the same. There is no revolutionary change into an aversion to food, drink, etc. But in the instance of a rational and moral appetite, or mental desire proper, the change is one of kind and not merely of degree The desire after God and goodness becomes hatred of them. These facts show that the desires of the mind or spirit are voluntary, and those of the body and the material part of man are involuntary. The former are modes of the will; the latter are modes of instinct and sense. Sensuous desires are merely the operation of physical properties and laws in an individual man or animal and are no more self-moving and voluntary than the operation of the properties of matter and the law of gravitation when a stone falls to the earth. The molecules of inorganic matter in the stone when it falls and the molecules of organic matter in the man when he craves food are moved by a physical law that forces their movement. But when the immaterial and spiritual will inclines or determines to an immaterial and moral end. there is no movement of molecules of matter, either inorganic or organic, in accordance with a physical law. but the self-motion of spirit as the contrary of matter in all its modes. The doctrine of Plato and of the Greek theism generally—that mind and matter are diverse in kind and that the motion of the former is self-motion but that of the latter is not, being instinctive and necessitated by physical properties and laws—is the key to the true doctrine of the will. The self-motion of spirit is free and responsible motion, because it is the product of spirit; and yet. though it be self-motion it may be bondage in reference to the power to reverse itself. Evil self-motion left to itself is endless self-motion for the reasons given on pp. 591-93.

4.3.3 (see p. 519). He who confines his attention to volitions or choices will not discover the secret of the will any more than he will discover the secret of anything by confining his attention to the effect and overlooking the cause. The defect in many modern treatises on the will arises from regarding the power to choose between two contraries as a complete definition of the voluntary faculty. A choice between two contraries is an effect of an existing bias or inclination of the will as a cause. This bias constitutes the motive to the choice. A comprehensive view of the whole subject of voluntary action requires, therefore, the consideration of both of these modes of the will's action. To study the numerous and constantly changing volitions and choices of the will while neglecting the one single and permanent inclination that prompts and explains them is to omit the most important part of the problem. It also leads to an erroneous conception of the nature of freedom, because a choice or resolution is indifferent toward its object and may take or reject it with equal facility because of its indifference. There is no inclination or desire for the object in a mere volition The drunkard does not desire the alcohol by his volition, but only desires to take it as a means of gratifying his inclination or desire for sensual pleasure. If water were as good a means as alcohol for this end, he would choose water. The real will of the man is in the central inclination or self-determination to sensual pleasure and not in the superficial choice ot the means of attaining it. But this inclination is not. like the volition, indifferent to the end aimed at by it. namely, sensual pleasure. It is the self-motion ot the entire will to this one end. in which it is absorbed with an intense energy and interest that opposes and precludes a contrary self-motion. The person in inclining cannot incline or disincline to the end with the same facility that he can choose or refuse the means. The distinction between inclination and volition is continually being made in common parlance. "I will do it though not inclined." is often said. This means that the speaker wills by a volition or a choice of means in a particular instance to do an act that is contrary to his abiding disposition. By a volition he can decide to have a limb amputated contrary to his desire not to suffer pain. "I am inclined to do it, but will not," is often said. This means that the speaker is in his heart disposed in a certain way but lacks energy or resolution to execute his inclination by a volition. An example of this is St Paul's. "The good that I would (thelo).[81] I do not. but the evil which I would not (outhelo).[82] that I do (prasso)[83]" (Rom. 7:19). By reason of his regeneration and the implanting ol the new life he is centrally and steadily inclined to holiness and disinclined to sin, but in a particular instance, under the stress of a temptation addressed to the remainders of his sinful inclination derived from his fall in Adam, he commits by a volition or choice, a single sin. His inclination is right, but his volition is wrong And. be it observed, the volition in this instance gets its sinful quality from the remainders of sinful inclination, of which it is the executive, and not from the holy incli-nation, of which it is not the executive and with which it conflicts

The distinction between inclination and volition explains moral ability A holy angel can tell a lie if he so desires or inclines to lie: otherwise, not. Yet as holy and without the inclination to lie, he could still speak the words of a lie with his vocal organs by the exertion of a volition that does not agree with his truth-loving disposition. He could formally tell a lie, but not really, because real lying consists in the desire and inclination to deceive. The question is not whether a holy being can control the muscles and organs of his body, but whether he can desire and incline to sin. It is possible for a holy person to fall from God and become a sinful per-son, and then he can desire to lie; but so long as he remains unfallen he cannot so desire: "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit." Before it can do this it must undergo a radical change and become an evil tree The same is true of a sinful person So long as he is sinful in his disposition and inclination he cannot incline to holiness. Hence in the creeds inclination and ability are convertible terms: "The Lord promises to give unto all those that are ordained unto life his Holy Spirit, to make them willing and able to believe" (Westminster Confession 7.3); "when God converts a sinner he enables him freely to will and to do that which is spiritually good" (9.4); "the elect are enabled to believe" (14.1); "redemption is effectually communicated to those who are by the Holy Spirit enabled to believe" (Westminster Larger Catechism 59); "the elect are made willing and able freely to answer the call" (67); "effectual calling, by renewing the will, persuades and enables us to embrace Jesus Christ" (Westminster Shorter Catechism Q. 31).

Suppose the following propositions to be made by the advocate of "natural ability " (1) I am able to lift a hundred pounds weight, but I am not doing it (2) I am able to love God supremely, but I am not loving him. In the former instance I must move my muscles by my will. In the latter. I must move my will by my will. In the former instance a volition will move the body and convert the asserted ability into actual lifting In the latter instance a volition will not move the will and conve rt the asse rted ability into actual loving . In the first instance I do not need to start an inclination to lift in order to lift ; a mere volit ion is sufficient to move the muscles that move the limbs. In the latter instance I need to start an inclination to love in order to love . because love is inclination. In the former instance I lift by resolving , not by incli ning; in the latter I love by inclin ing , not by resolving. There is noth ing in lifting , more than in not lifting, that requires feeli ng or affec tion . I do not love lifting and hate not -lifting. I am indifferent to both and would choose one as soon as the other if it would be as good a means to attain my end . But in inclining I am not indiff erent but interested. I love the inclining to good or evil and hate the contrary.

Inclination and volition may be illustrated by the deep Gulf Stream current and the surface waves of the ocean. Both ot the former are the movement of the will, as both of the latter are the movement of the ocean. But as the surface undulations have no control over the central current, so the superficial volitions have no control over the inclination.

Augustine marks the difference between inclination and volition as follows: “There are two things: will (velle)[84] and ability (posse)[85] ‘. Not everyone who has will (vult) has ability (potest), nor everyone that has ability has will. For as we sometimes will (volu-mus)[86] what we are unable to execute (non-possumus). so also we sometimes execute what we do not will (volumus)[87]. Will (vetle) is derived from willingness (voluntas), and ability (posse) from ableness (potestas) As the man who inclines (vult)[88]” has will (voluntas), so the man who can (potest) has ability (potestatem). But in order that a thing may be done by ability (potestatem). there must be volition (voluntas). [Augustine here uses voluntas to denote volition, though arbitrium would be better. In the previous sentences he has employed it to denote inclination. It is like the indiscriminate use of “will” in Edwards, for example, to denote either inclination or volition] For no man is said to do a thing with ability, if he did it without any act of will whatever (invitus)[89]. Although, if we observe more precisely, even what a man is moved to do against his inclination he nevertheless does by his volition; only he is said to act unwillingly in this instance because he prefers or desires something else. By some unfortunate influence (malo aliquo) he is made to do what he does by a volition, though inclined to avoid the doing of it. But if his inclination is so strong that it overrides such influence, then he resists and does not exert the volition. If. however, contrary to his inclination, he does perform the act by a volition, while it is not performed with a full, free-will (voluntas)[90] yet it is not performed without will [volition]” (Spirit and Letter53). Augustine also describes inclination as desire and affection: “Our will or love or pleasure (dilectionem). which is a stronger will [i.e.. its deeper movement], is variously affected according as various objects [i.e., ultimate ends] are presented to it. by which we are attracted or repelled” (On the Trinity “\5M).

4.3.4 (see p 524) The inclination of the will must originate in self-motion and continue to be self-moving in order to human freedom, and man’s liberty and responsibility must be found in his inclination or nowhere. It cannot be found in the volitions that execute it, because these cannot change the inclination and have no control over it. Hence that definition of freedom which makes it to be merely the acting out of the inclination by volitions is inadequate. Edwards *(Remarks on Principles of Morality m Works 2.*182) defines liberty as follows: “Liberty is the power that anyone has to do as hepleases, or of conducting in any respect according to his pleasure; without considering how his pleasure comes to be as it is.” That is to say. liberty is the mere power of exerting a volition in accordance with the inclination or “pleasure” of the will, whether the inclination be self -moved or necessitated ab extra.[91] Edwards correctly maintains that the moral connection between a choice or volition and the inclination behind it is as necessary as the physical connection between cause and effect in the physical world. Liberty or freedom, therefore, cannot be found in this fixed nexus between the inclination and the volition. It must, therefore, be found at a prior point, namely, in the inclination or "pleasure" itself, and this requires raising the question how pleasure comes to be as it is. For if the inclination or "pleasure" of the will is not voluntary in the sense of self-originated and self-moving, then the volition which follows the inclination and has not the least control over it has nothing of freedom in it.

It is for this reason that the free origin of man's sinful inclination in Adam is a doctrine of the utmost importance If the fall of human nature in Adam was involuntary and man's sinful inclination was not and is not self-motion, then the mere volitionary power to act in accordance with this inclination or "pleasure" of the will is no more liberty than is the power of gunpowder to explode if a spark is applied to it.

The allegation is common among opponents of Augustino-Calvinism that original sin and corruption of nature, ascribed to man by this theology, are something not originated by the human will but created and necessitated by God. Watson, who is one of the most candid of Arminians and has more in common with Calvinism than many of this school, so represents the subject. His argument against unconditional election and preterition depends chiefly upon the assumption that men are arbitrarily predestinated to life or death from a state of inherited depravity which is wholly involuntary and forced upon them by the action of God. The following extracts from his Theological Institutes show this: "In whatever light the subject of reprobation be viewed, no fault, in any right construction, can be chargeable upon the persons so punished or, as we may rather say, destroyed, since punishment supposes a judicial proceeding which this act shuts out. For either the reprobates are destroyed for a pure reason of sovereignty without reference to their sinfulness and thus all criminality is left out of the consideration or they are destroyed for the sin of Adam to which they were not consenting or for personal faults resulting from a corruption of nature which they brought into the world with them and which God wills not to correct and they have no power to correct themselves" (Theological Institutes 2.342 [ed. McClintock]). "The doctrine of predestination comes to this, that men are considered in the divine decree as justly liable to eternal death because they have been placed by some previous decree, or higher branch of the same decree, in circumstances which necessitate them to sin. This is not the view which God gives us of his own justice; and it is contradicted by every notion of justice which has ever obtained among men. Nor is it at all relieved by the subtlety of Zanchi and others, who distinguish between being necessitated to sin and being forced to sin and argue that because in sinning the reprobates follow the motions of their own will they are justly punishable, though in this they fulfill the predestination of God. They sin willingly, it is said. This is granted: but could they ever will otherwise? [Augustine answers. Yes. in Adam ') According to this scheme they will from necessity, as well as act from necessity" (Theological Institutes 2.396-97). "Upon a close examination of the sublapsarian scheme, it will be found to involve all the leading difficulties of the Calvinistic theory as it is broadly exhibited by Calvin himself. In both cases reprobation is grounded on an act of mere will, resting on no reason It respects not in either, as its primary cause, the demerit of the creature. Both unite in making sin a necessary result of the circumstances in which God has placed a great part of mankind which by no effort of theirs can be avoided. How either of these schemes can escape the charge of making God the author of sin, which the Synod of Dort acknowledges to be blasphemy,' is inconceivable. For how does it alter the case of the reprobate whether the fall of Adam himself was necessitated or whether he acted freely? They, at least, are necessitated to sin; they come into the world under a necessitating constitution which is the result of an act to which they gave no consent: and their case differs in nothing except in circumstances which do not alter its essential character from that of beings immediately created by God with a nature necessarily producing sinful acts" *(Theological Institutes*2.401). "It is manifestly in vain for the Dort synodists to attempt in article 15 to gloss over the doctrine of reprobation by saying that men cast themselves into the common misery by their own fault,' when they only mean that they were cast into it by Adam and by his fault" (Theological Institutes2.405). "It is most egregiously to trifle with the common sense of mankind to call it a righteous procedure in God to punish capitally, as for a personal offense, those who never could will or act otherwise, being impelled by an invincible and incurable natural impulse over which they never had any control. Nor is the case at all amended by the quibble that they act willingly, that is. with the consent of the will; for since the [sinful] will is under a natural and irresistible power to incline only one way. obedience is full as much out of their power by this state of the will, which they did not bring upon themselves, as if they were restrained from all obedience to the law of God by an external and irresistible impulse always acting upon them. President Edwards, in his well-known work on the will, applied the doctrine of philosophical necessity (namely, that the will is swayed by motives: that motives arise from circumstances: that circumstances are ordered by a power above us and beyond our control; and that therefore our volitions necessarily follow an order and chain of events appointed and decreed by infinite wis-dom) in aid of Calvinism. But who does not see that this attempt to find a refuge in the doctrine ot philosophical necessity affords no shelter to Calvinism. For what matters it whether the will is obliged to one class of volitions by the immediate influence of God or by the refusal of his remedial influence, which is the doctrine of the elder Calvinists; or whether it is obliged to a certain class of volitions by motives that are irresistible in their operation, which result from an arrangement of circumstances ordered by God and which we cannot control?" (Theological Institutes 2.439).

We believe that the explanation of original sin and inherited depravity adopted by those Calvinistic schools which deny the natural and substantial union of Adam and his posterity and which justify the imputation of the first sin to the posterity by vicarious representation and vicarious sinning gives ground for this assertion of Watson that Calvinism teaches that original sin and inherited depravity are involuntary in the posterity; that "they did not bring it upon themselves" and "gave no consent to it": and that "their case differs in no essential particular from that of beings immediately created by God with a nature necessarily producing sinful acts." It was this type of Calvinism which Watson had in view when making the charge of fatalism against Calvinism. But the doctrine of Augustine and the elder Calvinists. of the natural and substantial unity of Adam and his posterity and the voluntary fall of this entire unity from holiness to sin and their consequent respon-sibility for this one act of apostasy, is not liable to this charge. According to this theory the responsible and guilty origin of sin and all the retributive suffering that follows it is to be sought for at the beginning of human history, as Moses in Genesis and Paul in Romans teach, and not later down in the individual choices of individual men. It is possible for the opponent to deny that there was any such natural and specific unity between Adam and his posterity; in which case he is bound to establish the truth of his denial. But upon the supposition of the truth of the Augustino-Calvinistic theory it is impossible for the opponent to deny that the charge ot a created and involuntary depravity in the posterity of Adam is unfounded

4.3.5 (see p. 525). According to Kant the categories of the understanding when applied by the understanding to a rational and spiritual faculty like the human will yield only subjective and relative truth, not objective and absolute For illustration, bring the will under the category ol causality. Affirm that it is a true and real cause in the sense that it originates motion and action and produces effects by free self-determination When the category of causality is empirically applied by the understanding to the will as phenomenon, that is, as choosing means to ends and producing an observable series of volitions, no true first cause and real freedom is found. There is only a succession of antecedents and consequents. In this connected chain of phenomena there is no real beginning of motion One volition is caused by a preceding one and so backward forever There is no causation of the kind required, namely, selt-causation or self-motion. This volitionary movement is ab extra,[92] ' according to the same law of physical cause and effect which prevails in the physical world But when the category of causality is applied intuitively by the practical reason to the will as noumenon, that is, as inclining or self-moving, the action of the will is not seen as a numerous series of movements, but as one single and steady self-movement: not as a multitude ot volitions following each other and dependent upon each other and upon outward circumstances and motives, but as a single and abiding inclination which constitutes the character or disposition of the person himself. This real and true self-motion is instantaneous, not sequacious: un certain Elan libre[93] ‘ (Foullee, Freedom, 217). As such it is one and indivisible. As such it is timeless, that is. free from successions in time. This does not mean that the person who is thus inclining is not a creature of time and in time, but that his will in this act of inclining or self-motion does not act seriatim[94] according to the common law of physical cause and physical effect, but immediately and instantaneously. According to the law of cause and effect in the physical world, the cause and the effect are two distinct things. The motive is the cause, and the volition is the effect. But in the instance of inclining, the cause and the effect are one and the same thing in two aspects. The self-motion is the cause, and the self-motion is also the effect. The self-motion or inclining is not preceded by something that produces it, such as a motive that is presented by a previous inclination or by a volition that causes it, but is itself the very first thing from which all motives and volitions issue There is no character behind the character; no disposition back of the disposition. In this way freedom for the method of the understanding is impossible; but for the method of the practical reason is certain The understanding proceeds from the phenomena of volitions viewed under the categories of cause and effect, antecedent and consequent, time and place; the practical reason proceeds from the direct intuition of the inclination as the underlying noumenon of freedom or the thing in itself, apart from all these categories.

Kant regards the “speculative” reason as reason cognizing by means of the categories of the understanding, which are adapted only to the physical world, not to the moral and spiritual, and as being hampered and limited by them, but the “practical” or “moral” reason as cognizing directly and intuitively without them. The latter is reason in its highest form Hence Kant maintains that the will and the practical reason are the same thing. This, it is true, was the original and normal relation of the will to the reason as they were created at first, but it is not the actual and present relation. By the fall the human will was thrown into antagonism with the will not move the will and conve rt the asse rted ability into actual loving . In the first instance I do not need to start an inclination to lift in order to lift ; a mere volit ion is sufficient to move the muscles that move the limbs. In the latter instance I need to start an inclination to love in order to love . because love is inclination. In the former instance I lift by resolving , not by incli ning; in the latter I love by inclin ing , not by resolving. There is noth ing in lifting , more than in not lifting, that requires feeli ng or affec tion . I do not love lifting and hate not - lifting. I am indifferent to both and would choose one as soon as the other if it would be as good a means to attain my end . But in inclining I am not indiff erent but interested. I love the inclining to good or evil and hate the contrary.

It is noteworthy that Milton also identifies will and reason. God asks respecting the worth of Adam’s obedience, in case he had not been lefl to decide for himself whether he would stand or fall:

> What pleasure I from such obedience paid.
> When will and reason (reason also is choice)
> Useless and vain, of freedom both despoiled.
> Made passive both, had served necessity.
> Not Me?

—Paradise Lost 3.107-11

The following extract from Kant's Practical Reason. 269-73 (trans. Abbott) contains his own account of his distinction between will as noumenon and phenomenon or between will in its inward and real nature and will as it appears in its manifestations. The former, as we have said, is will as a single abiding inclination, which because it is a unity having no sequences in it is timeless or out of relation to time, which always implies a series The latter is will as a series of choices or volitions, which is in time because it has sequences. Will as phenomenon is a series of antecedents and consequents. Will as noumenon is not a series of antecedents and consequents, but is one steady unbroken volume of self-motion. Respecting a choice or volition, the question "what caused it?" is proper, because as one of a series of antecedents and consequents it has a cause other than itself, namely, preceding volitions and ultimately the inclination of the will. Respecting the inclination of the will, the question "what caused it?" is improper, because it has no cause other than itself. It is self-caused, that is. is self-moving. It is not caused either by an antecedent volition or an antecedent inclination It cannot be explained, as volitions can be, by the method of antecedents and consequents or of cause and effect. The reasoning of Kant is close and requires strenuous attention

"The notion of causality," says Kant, "as physical necessity, in opposition to the same notion of causality as freedom, concerns only the existence of things so far as they are determinable in time, and consequently as phenomena, in opposition to their causality as things in themselves Now if we take the attributes of things in time [i.e.. as a series of antecedents and consequents] for attributes of things in themselves [i.e., as single and without sequences], which is the common error, then it is impossible to reconcile the necessity of the causal relation with freedom; they are contradictory. For from the former it follows that every event and consequently every action that takes place at a certain point of time is a necessary effect ol what existed in time preceding. Now as time past is no longer in my power, it follows that every action of this kind that I perform must be the necessary result of certain antecedents which are not in my power, that is, at the moment in which I am acting in this manner I am not free. Nay, even if I assume that my whole existence is independent of any foreign cause (for instance, God), so that the determining principles of my causality and even of my whole existence were not outside of myself but within me, yet this would not in the least transform that physical necessity into freedom. For at every moment of time I am still under the necessity of being determined to action by that which is not in my power; and the series of antecedents and consequents, infinite a parte priori,[95] ' which I only continue according to a predetermined order and could never actually begin of myself, would be a continuous physical chain, and therefore my causality of this kind could never be free causality.

"If, then, we would attribute freedom to a being whose existence is determined in time [i.e., by a series of antecedent and consequents instead of by pure and simple self-motion], we cannot except him from the law of necessity, as to all events in his existence and consequently as to his actions also; for that would be to hand him over to blind chance. Now as this law of necessary sequence inevitably applies to all the causality of things, so far as their existence is determinable in time [i.e., as a series], it follows that if this were the mode in which we had also to conceive of the existence of these things in themselves [i.e., as a unity without series], freedom [in the sense of self-motion] must be rejected as a vain and impossible conception. Consequently, if we would still save it, no other way remains but to regard the action of the will so far as it is determinable in time [i.e.. is one of a series of antecedents and consequents, like the volitions of the will], and therefore its causality, according to the law of physical necessity, as belonging to appearance only [i.e., as merely the phenomenal manifestation] and to attribute freedom to the will as the thing in itself [i.e., as the noumenon or underlying bias or inclination]. This is certainly inevitable if we would retain both of these contrary concepts [of free inclination and necessary volitions] together: but in application, when we try to explain their combination in one and the same action, great difficulties present themselves which seem to render such a combination impracticable.

"When I say of a man who commits a theft that by the physical law of causality or of antecedent and consequent this deed is a necessary result of the determining causes in preceding time, I say that it was impossible that it could not have happened. How then can the judgment, according to the moral law, make any change and imply that it could have been omitted because the law says that it ought to have been omitted; that is, how can a man be called entirely free at the same moment and with respect to the same action in which he is subject to an inevitable physical neces-sity? Some try to evade this by saying that the causes that determine his causality are of such a kind as to agree with a comparative notion of freedom. According to this explanation, that is sometimes called a free effect, the determining physical cause of which lies within, in the acting thing itself; e.g.. that effect which a projectile produces when it is in free motion, in which case we use the term freedom, because while it is in flight it is not urged by anything external; or as we call the motion of a clock a free motion because it moves its hands itself and therefore does not require to be pushed by external force; so although the volitionary actions of man are necessarily determined by causes which precede them in time, we yet call them free because these causes are ideas produced by our own faculties whereby desires are evoked on occasion of circumstances, and hence actions are wrought according to our own pleasure. This is a wretched subterfuge with which some persons still let themselves be put off and so think they have solved with a petty word-jugglery that difficult problem at the solution of which centuries have labored in vain and which can there-fore scarcely be found so completely on the surface. In fact , in regard to the question about the freedom which must be the foun dation of all moral laws and of moral responsibility, it does not matter whether the principles which necessarily determine causality by the physical law of antecedents and consequents reside within the subject or without him; or in the former case , whether these principles are sensuous and instinctive or are conceived by reason, if, as is admitted by these men thems elves , these determining ideas have the ground of their existence in time and in an antecedent state, and this again in an antecedent , etc. Then, again, it matters not that these are internal ; it matters not that they have a psycholog ical and not a mechanical causality, that is, produce actions by means of ideas and not by bodily movements; they are still determining principles of the causali ty of a being whose will is determinable in time and therefore under the necessitation of antecedents in past time, which therefore , when the person has to act, are no longer in his power. This may imply psychological freedom (if we choose to apply this term to a merely internal chain of ideas in the mind), but it involves physical necessi ty and therefore leaves no room for transcendental, i.e., spiritual freedom, which must be conceived as independence of everything empirical and cons equently of nature generally, whether it be an object of the internal sense considered in time only or of the external sense in time and space. Without this freedom in the latter and true sense, which alone is practical a priori, no moral law and no moral responsibility are possible. Just for this reason the necessity of events in time, according to the physical law of causality, may be called the mechanism of nature , although we do not mean by this that things which are subject to it must be really material machines. We look here only to the necessity of the connection of events in a time series of antecedents and consequents , as it is developed accord ing to the physical law of cause and eHect, whether the subject inwhich this development takes place is called automaton Imateriale[96] when the mechanical being is moved by matter or with Leibnitz is called automaton spirituale[97] when it is impelled by ideas ; and if the freedom of our will were no other than the latter (say the psycho logical and comparative , not also transcendental, that is, metaphysical and absolute), then it would at bottom be nothing bett er than the freedom of a turnspit , which when once it is wound up accomp lishes its motions of itself.

"Now in order to remove in the supposed case the apparent contradiction between freedom and the mechanism of nature in one and the same action, we must remember what was said in the Critique of the Pure Reason or in what follows therefrom, namely, that the necessity of nature which cannot coexist with the freedom of the subject or will appertains only to the attributes of the thing, that is, subject to time conditions, consequently only to those of the subject acting as phenomenon [i.e., as exerting volitions and choices]; that therefore in this respect the determining principles of every action of the same subject reside in what belongs to past time and is no longer in his power (in which must be included his own past actions, and the character which these may determine for him in his own eyes as a phenomenon). But the very same subject being, on the other hand, conscious of himself as a thing in himself [in distinction from the manifestation of himself] contemplates his existence also, insofar as it is not subject to time conditions and as determinable only by laws which he gives himself through reason; and in this his [noumenonal] existence nothing is antecedent to the self-determination [inclination] of his will, but every [volitionary] act and in general every modification of his being varying according to his internal sense, even the whole series of his existence and experience as a sensible being, is in the consciousness of his supersensible [spiritual] existence nothing but the result, and never the determinant, of his causality as a noumenon. In this view [of the absolute self-motion of the will as inclining] the rational being can justly say ol every unlawful [volitionary] action which he performs that he could have left it undone; although as a phenomenon it is fully determined in the past and in this respect is infallibly necessary; for it, with all the past which determines it. belongs to the one single phenomenon of his character which he makes for himself and in consequence of which he imputes the causality ot these phenomenal manifestations of the will to himself as a cause independent of sense -Kant speaks of a "combination in one and the same action (Handlung) of the freedom of the noumenon with the necessity of the phenomenon By the "same action" he must mean the action or agency of the same subject or agent. One and the same action, strictly taken, could not have both of these contrary qualities; but one and the same actor might The whole aim of Kant's abstruse discussion is to show that one and the same man is free when contemplated in one aspect and necessitated when viewed in another; that the action ot the will when it inclines or self-determines to an ultimate end is absolutely free because depending upon no antecedents, and when it exerts a volition is not free because depending upon something foregoing It is evident that both of these modes ot action cannot be combined in a single act of the will.

Schelling, in his Philosophical Inquiries into the Nature of Human Freedom, adopts and defends Kant's doctrine of the will as not being within the sphere of physical cause and effect and with him marks the difference between will as inclination (Wille) and as arbitrary volition (Willkuhr). The ideal philosophy." he says, "was the first to lift the doctrine of freedom into that sphere where alone it is comprehensible According to this philosophy the intelligible [spiritual] nature of everything, and especially of man, is out of all causal connection, as well as out of or above all the sequences of time. Hence it [i.e., the inclination of the will] can never be determined by any antecedent, since itself as an absolute unity which must be whole and complete in order that the separate and numerous volitions that manifest it may be possible is antecedent to everything that is or will be in itself, not only as to time but to nature and conception We here express the Kantian conception of freedom, not in his exact words but as we believe he must have expressed himself in order to be understood." Schelling then proceeds to combat the doctrine of the indifference of the will.

Respecting this tract of Schelling. Miiller (Sin 2.95 [trans. Urwick]) says that "Schelling was the first to take up the thread of the investigation where Kant had left it. in a work which is unquestionably the most important contribution to modern speculation respecting freedom and evil and which in profundity and wealth of thought, in nobleness and power of exposition, has seldom been equaled in philosophical literature." It is, however, vitiated by a dualistic view of the nature of the Supreme Being and his relation to good and evil. Schelling maintains that "there are two equally eternal principles, darkness and light, the real and the ideal, the particularizing self and the universalizing intellect, both of which are in God and the union of which is the condition of all life."

Aristotle's distinction between the voluntary and the involuntary is this: "Those things that are done by compulsion or through ignorance are involuntary; and that is done by compulsion, of which the principle is external, and of such a character that the agent or patient does not at all contribute toward it That is voluntary, on the contrary, ot which the principle is in the agent; and the doing or not doing of the action is in himself also" (Ethics 3.1). Similarly. Cicero (Dream of Sctpio) defines the physical as that which is moved by external impulse and the spiritual as that which is moved by its own interior self-motion: "An inanimate (inanimatum. i.e., soulless) thing is everything that is acted upon by external impulse. On the other hand, the soul is that which is moved by an interior motion and of itself."'[98] The "inanimate" here does not mean the lifeless, but that which is destitute of the rational spirit (anima); the anima denoting the rational spirit, which is the same thing as the will

It is important to remember that the fall of the will, while destroying its power to good, does not destroy its self-motion. The will, be it holy or sinful, is immutably a self-moving faculty. Satan is as self-determining in disobeying as Gabriel is in obeying. Respecting this point Coleridge (Works 1.276.281,285) describes the corruption of nature by the fall as "the admission of a nature into a spiritual essence by its own act" and asserts that "a nature in a will is inconsistent with freedom" because there is "no free power in a nature to fulfill a law above nature" and because a will which has received a nature into itself "comes under the mechanism of cause and effect." This abolishes the guiltiness of sin by transmuting spirit into nature or, as Coleridge uses terms, a voluntary self-moving essence into an involuntary necessitated substance or mind into matter. But the apostasy of the will still leaves the finite spirit unchanged as spirit. Original sin in the will is self-motion still and not mechanical motion according to the law of cause and effect. The inability of overcoming it by the will itself arises from the fact that a volition cannot change an inclination and not from the fact that, as Coleridge states it, "spirit" has been transmuted into "nature." The philosophical use of "nature" as the contrary of "spirit" is wholly different from its theological use as denoting the natural inherited disposition of the will.

Drummond in his Natural Law in the Spiritual World adopts the same error and destroys the distinction between the natural and the supernatural, the involuntary and the voluntary. To assert, as he does, that the spirit or will of man operates like a law of nature is the same as asserting that the human mind operates like gravity. The present popularity of this writer has greatly promoted the antisupernaturalism of the day.

4.3.6 (see p. 526) Carpenter (Physiology 666) discriminates between the voluntary and the volitionary: "The term volitionalwas some years since suggested by Dr Symonds in an excellent essay on the Connection between Mind and Muscle as expressing more emphatically than voluntary the characteristics of an action proceeding from a distinct choice of the object and from a determined effort to attain it. The word voluntary may perhaps be applied to that wider class of actions in which there is no very distinct choice or conscious effort, but in which the movement flows as it were spontaneously from the antecedent mental state."

4.3.7 (see p. 527). The neglect of many modern Calvinists to mark the distinction, as the elder did. between inclination and volition and the adoption of the modern psychology respecting the will leads to the positions (1) that self-determination means volitionary action only and (2) that the state of the will as seen in the disposition or character of the man. in distinction from single acts of the will, is not voluntary agency. The following from Hodge (Theology 3.52) is an example: "If we take the word voluntary in the sense which implies volition or self-determination, it is evident that faith cannot be defined as voluntary assent. It is not true that in faith as faith there is always, as Aquinas savs, an election 'voluntarily shunning one way more than another.[99]' To tell a man he can believe if he will is to contradict his consciousness. He tries to believe. He earnestly prays for faith; but he cannot exercise it. It is true, as concerns the sinner in relation to the gospel, that this inability to believe arises from the state of his mind. But this state of his mind lies below the will. It cannot be determined or changed by the exercise of any voluntary power. On these grounds the definition of faith, whether as generic or religious, as a voluntary assent to truth must be considered unsatisfactory." Here what is affirmed is true, but what is denied is erroneous. It is true that "the state of the [sin-ner's] mind cannot be changed by the exercise of any voluntary power" which he has; but not true that the state of the sinner's mind "lies below the will" and is therefore involuntary. For "the state of the sinner's mind" is the same thing as the state of his will. Mind is often put for will in English usage. The “carnal mind” (phronema tes sarkos;” “[100] Rom. 8:6-7) is the carnal will, that is, the carnal inclination or disposition or character of the will; the same that Turretin means by “the inclination fighting with God’s law”:[101] the same that Rivetus means when he defines concupiscentia[102] as incli-nalio voluntaria;[103] ‘ the same that Charnock means by “the sin which is voluntary not by an immediate act of the will [a volition], but by a general or natural inclination”; the same that Owen means when he declares that “original sin as peccatum originans[104] was voluntary in Adam and, as it is originatum[105] ‘ in us, is in our wills habitually [as a habitus or inclination] and not against them”; and the same that Baxter (Dying Thoughts) means when he says: “As the will is the sinner, so it is the obstinate continuance of a will to sin which is the bondage and the cause of continued sin; and a continued hell is continued sin, as to the first part at least. There-fore they that continue in hell do continue in a sinning will and so continue in a love and willingness of so much of hell. So far as God makes us willing to be delivered from sin, so far we are delivered; and our initial, imperfect deliverance is the way to more.” According to these extracts the “character” is the same thing as the permanent state or disposition of the will. When the character or state of the will is sinful, the origin of it must be sought for in the self-determined fall of Adam and his posterity. But when the character or state of the will is holy, the origin of it must be referred to the Holy Spirit in regeneration, who in this case as he does not in the other “works in the human will to will.” But in both instances the human character is the abiding state and inclination of the human will and in this use of terms and this psychology is voluntary It is the free activity of a rational spirit, not the instinctive and necessitated activity of an animal soul.

Again, it is true that “to tell a man that he can believe if he will is to contradict his consciousness,” but not true “that faith cannot be defined as voluntary.” That it is more than a “voluntary assent to truth” is certain. It is a voluntary, that is, willing and affectionate reliance and rest upon Christ’s person and work, to which the sinner is “made willing and able” in effectual calling (Westminster Larger Catechism 67). But after the Holy Spirit has thus made the sinner “willing in the day of his power,” it is self-contradictory to say that the faith that results is not voluntary. Whatever is “willing” is certainly voluntary. It is the central and spontaneous movement of the will to Christ as the object of faith. It is true freedom: “If the Son shall make you free, you shall be free indeed.”

Owen (Justification, chap. 2) defines saving faith as voluntary. Speaking of the spurious faith of Agrippa (Acts 26:27) he declares that “as it included no act of the will or heart, it was not that faith whereby we are justified.” Defining justifying faith he says: “(1) It includes in it a sincere renunciation of all other ways and means for the attaining of righteousness, life, and salvation. (2) There is in it the will’s consent, whereby the soul betakes itself cordially and sincerely as to all its expectation of pardon of sin and righteousness before God unto the way of salvation proposed in the gospel This is that which is called coming unto Christ’ and receiving of him.’ (3) There is an acquiescency of the heart in God. as the author and cause of the way of salvation prepared and as acting in a way of sovereign grace and mercy toward sinners:

those who adopt the view of the will and of freedom expressed in the above extract from Hodge lay the foundation for the charge often made that Augustino-Calvinism is fatalism. The volitionary acts of a man unquestionably proceed from the disposition and character of his will and have the same moral quality with it. But if that disposition and character itself is not voluntary in the sense of self-moving, in distinction from moved ab extra[106] and compelled, the volitions that issue from it are not: and the disposition or character is certainly not voluntary if it “lies below the will” and outside of it. This kind of fatalistic “determinism” is not chargeable upon the anthropology which is founded upon the elder psychology. According to this, while the sintul volitions necessarily agree with the sinful “state of the will” or the sinful “character,” this state of the will or character itself is the will’s self-motion and self-determination: a self-motion that began in the fall of Adam and his posterity and continues by propagated transmission in each and every individual of them. If the whole unindividualized human nature in Adam self-determined or inclined to sin, this self-determination or inclination might be propagated along with the individual soul, which is a propagated fractional part of it. and still remain self-determination and inclination. In this way original sin in the individual, though derived and inherited, is voluntary and responsible agency.

In an article on regeneration commonly ascribed to Hodge (Princeton Essays), there is a better statement of the extent of the will and of the voluntariness of its disposition and state. “There is a continual play,” it is said, “upon the double sense of the word voluntary. When the faculties of the soul are reduced to understanding and will, it is evident that the latter includes all the affections. In this sense all liking or disliking, desiring or being averse to, etc.. are voluntary or acts of the will. But when we speak of the understanding, will, and affections, the word will includes much less. It is the power of the soul to come to a determination [decision] to fix its choice on some object of desire. In the latter sense will and desire are not always coincident. A man may desire money and not will [choose] to make it an object of pursuit. When we speak of a volition, of a choice, of a decision or self-determination of the will, the word w///is used in the restricted sense. There are a thousand things capable of ministering to our happiness: riches, honor, sensual pleasure, the service of God; the selection which the soul makes is made by the will in the narrower sense [i.e., by a separate volition]. This is a voluntary act in one sense of the term. But in another the desire itself which the soul has for these objects, and not merely its particular decision or choice, is a voluntary act. For, according to Edwards, all choosing, refusing, approving, disapproving, liking, disliking, directing, commanding, inclining, or being averse, a being pleased, or displeased with,” are acts of the will. In this sense all the affections and all the desires are voluntary exercises, whether constitutional or not. and not merely the decisions [choices or volitions] to which they lead Hence self-love, the love of children, the love of society, the desire of esteem are all voluntary, although springing from native tendencies of the mind.” In this use of “voluntary” the writer of this would grant that “faith is voluntary.”

In saying, however, that the “constitutional” desires are voluntary, the writer abolishes the distinction commonly made between the two. The “love of children” and the “love of society” are not voluntary, but natural and instinctive. They belong to the fixed constitution of man and not to his changeable will. Hence they were not reversed by the fall of man. They are not moral and responsible. They do not deserve praise or blame. They exist in the unregenerate as well as the regenerate (see pp 511 and 578-79).

Man's Probation and Apostaphy 4

Adam and Eve as Mutably Holy by Creation

"Our first parents, being left to the freedom of their own will, through the temptation of Satan transgressed the commandment of God in eating the forbidden fruit and thereby fell from the estate wherein they were created (Gen. 3:6-8, 13; Eccles. 7:29; 2 Cor. 11:3)" (Westminster Larger Catechism 21). In this statement, it is not meant that the external act of eating the forbidden fruit was the whole of the first transgression and constituted the whole of human apostasy. A part is put for the whole. The full statement would be that "our first parents transgressed the commandment of God by lusting after and eating the forbidden fruit." This is evident from the prooftext cited by the Westminster divines: "When the woman saw that the tree was a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof and did eat" (Gen. 3:6). According to the inspired account, the first sin began with a lustful desiring of the heart, which is the same thing as a sinful inclining of the will.

The possibility of such a lustful desiring or wrong inclining in Adam's will supposes its mutability: "God created man male and female, with righteousness and true holiness, having the law of God written in their hearts, and power to fulfill it: and yet under a possibility of transgressing, being left to the liberty of their own will, which was subject unto change" (Westminster Confession 4.2; Westminster Larger Catechism 17).

Adam was holy by creation, but not indefectibly and immutably so. The inclination of his will, though conformed to the moral law, was mutable, because his will was not omnipotent. When voluntary self-determination is an infinite and self-subsistent power, as it is in God, the fall of the will is impossible. But when voluntary self-determination is a finite and dependent power, as it is in man or angel, the fall of the will is possible. A will determined to good with an omnipotent energy is not "subject to change"; but a will determined to good with a finite and limited force is so subject. By reason of the restricted power of his created will, Adam might lose the righteousness with which he was created, though he was under no necessity of losing it. His will had sufficient power to continue in holiness, but not so much additional power as to make a lapse into sin impossible. By the terms of the covenant of works, perseverance and indefectibility in holiness were made to depend upon Adam's own decision. In this respect they differed from the believer's perseverance and indefectibility under the covenant of grace, which are infallibly secured by the operation of the Holy Spirit. The regenerate man is "kept from falling" (Jude 24; Eph. 1:10; John 10:28-29; 1 Thess. 4:17; Rev. 21:4). God imparted such a measure of grace to holy Adam as enabled him to continue inclined to the Creator if he would; but not such a measure of grace as to preclude inclining to the creature if he would. The power to the contrary, the possibilitas peccandi[1] or power to originate sin, belonged to Adam's will because of its finiteness. The use of this power was left wholly to him. He might continue to believe and trust in God, in which case he would persevere in holiness and obtain indefectibility as his reward; or he might believe and trust in Satan, in which case he would apostatize and lose holiness. The already existing power to incline rightly and to persevere in this inclination was real and true freedom and did not need this additional power to incline wrongly in order to be such. The power to originate sin was not requisite in order to make Adam a free agent, but to make him a probationary agent. (See supplement 4.4.1.)

Consequently, the paradisaical state, though a holy and happy state, was not equal to the heavenly state. It had not the safety and security of the latter. Eden differed from heaven as holiness differs from indefectibility of holiness, as a mutable perfection differs from an immutable. The perfection of holy Adam was relative, not absolute. It differed from that of God, who by reason of his omnipotence and infinity cannot fall from holiness (James 1:13); from that of the elect angels, who were kept from falling by a special measure of grace that was not granted to the fallen angels, whose perseverance like that of Adam was left to themselves; and from that of redeemed men, who like the elect angels are preserved by special grace (Howe, Man Created Mutable, 6).

God created man with relative perfection, or the possibility of sinning, for the purpose of placing him in probation. Had the Creator given Adam indefectibility in the outset by bestowing upon him that extraordinary measure of grace which infallibly secures perseverance in holiness, Adam's own strength of will would not have been tested. In this case, God would have prevented the use of the power to the contrary by intensifying the existing self-determination to holiness. Adam would have been kept from falling by God and would not have kept himself.[2]

The object of this probation was that Adam, by resisting Satan's temptation and persevering in holiness, might secure by his own work indefectibility or immutable perfection. This was to be an infinite reward for standing the trial of his faith and obedience. God did not place Adam in a state of probation from mere curiosity to see if he would fall or from malevolence to cause him to fall, but from the benevolent desire that Adam, in the exercise of the ample power with which he was endowed, might merit and obtain as the recompense of his fidelity a final and everlasting deliverance from the possibility of sinning. The possibility of sinning is in itself an evil. It is one of the perils of finite freedom. To be delivered from it is an infinite and eternal good. The cry in Wesley's hymn, "Take away the power of sinning," is the cry of the Christian heart. A will that is so strongly determined to holiness, by its union with the divine will, that it is beyond the hazard of apostasy is a greater good than a will which though holy is exposed to this hazard. Everlasting holiness is better than temporary; immutable perfection is more desirable than mutable; heaven is more blessed than paradise. (See supplement 4.4.2.)

The righteousness which Adam had by creation did not merit indefectibility. God owed nothing at the instant of creation to a creature whom he had just originated from nonentity, to whom he had given holiness and whom he was upholding by his power. He had a right to terminate Adam's existence and reduce him to nonentity again if he so pleased. A creature, from the very definition of a creature, cannot bring the Creator under an obligation, except so far as the latter by covenant and promise permits him to do so. Witsius (Covenants 1.4.12) cites

> Durandus's reasoning, which Bellarmine was unable to refute: "What we are and what we have, whether good acts, habits, or practices, are all of them from the bounty of God, who both gives > freely and preserves them. And because no one after having given freely is obliged to give more, but rather the receiver is the more obliged to the giver; therefore from good habits, acts, or practices given us by God, God is not bound by any debt of justice to give anything more."

Says Calvin (1.15.8):

> Adam could have stood if he would, since he fell merely by his own will, because his will was flexible to either side and he was not endued with constancy to persevere. If any object that he was placed in a dangerous situation on account of the imbecility of his will, I reply that the station in which he was placed was sufficient to deprive him of all excuse. For it would have been unreasonable that God should be confined to this condition, to make man so as to be altogether incapable either of choosing or of committing any sin. It is true that such a nature would have been more excellent; but to expostulate with God as though he had been under any obligation to bestow this upon man were unreasonable. Why he did not sustain him with the power of perseverance remains concealed in his own mind. Yet there is no excuse for man; he received so much that he was the voluntary procurer of his own destruction; but God was under no necessity to give him any other than a mutable will, midway between sin and indefectibility (medium et caducam).

Covenant of Works

God graciously entered into a covenant with holy Adam and with his posterity in him to the effect that if he obeyed the command not to eat of the forbidden fruit he should receive as his reward indefectibility of holiness and blessedness. This is proved by Gen. 2:17: "In the day you eat thereof you shall surely die"; which implies the converse: "If you do not eat thereof, you shall surely live." The "life" here implied and promised is a good additional to what Adam already had; otherwise it would not be a reward. Adam already had spiritual life, namely, holiness and happiness;

but it was mutable. The additional good, therefore, must have been immutable holiness and happiness. He was to have had spiritual life as indefectible. He was to have passed beyond all possibility of apostasy and misery.

This covenantis denominated “the covenant of works”: “These women are [represent] the two covenants” (Gal. 4:24); one of works and the other of grace(Rom. 9:4); “but they like man (margin: Adam) have trans gressed the covenant” (Hos. 6:7).

The consent implied in the covenant of works was by acquiescence on the part of man, like that between child and parent and between the citizen and the state. Assent cannot be righteously or wisely refused to that which is both equitable and advantageous. Adam, being holy, would not refuse to enter into a righteous engagement with his maker; and being intelligent he would not decline an improvement in his condition (see Howe, Man Created Mutable).

The merit to be acquired under the covenant of works was pactional. Adam could claim the reward, in case he stood, only by virtue of the promise of God, not by virtue of the original relation of a creature to the Creator. Upon the latter basis, he could claim nothing, as Christ teaches in Luke 17:10.

The probationary statute was a positive precept. It was not sinful per se to eat of the tree of knowledge, but only because God had forbidden it. The Eden statute was, thus, a better test of implicit faith and obedience than a moral statute would have been, because it required obedience for no reason but the sovereign will of God. At the same time, disobedience of this positive statute involved disobedience of the moral law. It was contempt of authority, disbelief of God and belief of Satan, discontent with the existing state, impatient curiosity to know, pride and ambition (Anselm, Why the God-Man? 1.21).

The “tree of knowledge” was an actual tree bearing fruit in the garden. It might have been a date tree or any other kind of tree and still have been the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Because, when once God had selected a particular tree in the garden and by a positive statute had forbidden our first parents to eat of it, the instant they did eat of it they transgressed a divine command and then knew consciously and bitterly what evil is and how it differs from good. The tree thus became “the tree of the knowledge of good and evil,” not because it was a particular species of tree but because it had been selected as the tree whereby to test the implicit obedience of Adam. (See supplement 4.4.3.)

Nature of the First Sin

The first sin was unique in respect to the statute broken by it. The Eden commandment was confined to Eden. It was never given before or since. Hence the first Adamic transgression cannot be repeated. It remains a single solitary transgression, the "one" sin spoken of in Rom. 5:12, 15-19.

The first sin was willful and wanton in a high degree, because committed under circumstances that made it easy not to commit it (Charnock, Holiness of God, 477 [ed. Bohn]). Adam was holy and had full power to remain so. And, still more, the temptation that assailed him was much weaker than that which now assails his posterity. Fallen man is now tempted by solicitation addressed both to innocent desire and susceptibility and to sinful desire and susceptibility; but unfallen man was tempted by a solicitation addressed only to innocent desire and susceptibility. Holy Adam had no rebellious inward lust to which Satan could appeal; none of that selfish and sinful desire which St. James speaks of when he says that a man "is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed" (James 1:14). The only subjective susceptibility in Adam which Satan could address was the natural and innocent desire for the fruit of the tree of knowledge considered as "good for food and pleasant to the eyes" (Gen. 3:6). This was a desire and susceptibility founded in the created relation between the nature of man and that of the tree. The other desire for the fruit as "making wise like the gods" (3:6) was forbidden desire, and forbidden desire is sin (20:17; Matt. 5:28; Rom. 7:7). Forbidden and sinful desire was not provided for in the creative act, and the established relation between man's nature and the outward object as permitted and innocent desire was. Adam was not created with a desire for that knowledge of good and evil which would make him like the "gods," that is, like Satan and his angels. Such a kind of knowledge as this is falsehood, not truth, and to desire it is wrong and sinful. "You shall not covet" is a command that prohibits such a species of desire. On the contrary, Adam was created with a desire for true knowledge, and this desire was satisfied by the knowledge of God which he possessed as made in his maker's image. He was created "in [true] knowledge and true holiness." If Adam was already lusting after the spurious knowledge of good and evil and was already proudly desiring to be like the "gods" when Satan suggested the temptation to eat of the fruit, this would have proved that he was already fallen and would have very greatly increased the force of the temptation and made it far more difficult for him to refrain from eating of it. But he was not lusting after and desiring this kind of knowledge when Satan proposed that he should eat of the fruit. This kind of rebellious, disobedient desire required to be originated by Adam himself, as something not previously existing in his submissive heart and obedient will. God had not implanted any such wrong desire as this. This proud and selfish lust for a false and forbidden knowledge had to be started by Adam himself, as something entirely new and aboriginal. It was not a primary God-created desire of the finite will, but a secondary self-originated one. It was not the product of the creative act, but of voluntary self-determination.

Such being the facts in the case, it is evident that inward lust or sinful desire did not contribute to the force of temptation in the instance of unfallen Adam as it does in that of his fallen posterity, nor can it be postulated as helping to explain his fall. Sinful desire was begun by an act of pure self-determination and therefore could not have been the cause of this act. Unfallen Adam was not "drawn away of his own lust and enticed," as his fallen posterity now are. He willfully and wantonly yielded to an external suggestion of Satan which had by no means the violent strength of an internal desire. To disobey the command of God under the stress of no greater temptation than this was willfulness and wickedness in a high degree. That a holy and happy being, not dragged down in the least by inward lust, with full power to remain holy and happy, should by an act of sheer sell-determination convert himself into a sinful and miserable being, under a moderate temptation like that in Eden, was strange and not to be expected. The fall of Adam was intrinsically improbable. A spectator would have prophesied that the holy and happy man would continue in holiness and happiness and not plunge into sin and misery.

Hence, the origin of sin has somewhat of the characteristic of caprice. It was not a natural or a rational act, but unnatural and irrational. Sin is "the mystery of iniquity." The fall of man cannot be rationalized, that is, explained on natural and rational grounds. This would require that it be accounted for not by pure self-determination but by the operationof the law of cause and effect. In the physical world, a fact can be explained and made to look rational by pointing to a foregoing cause for it that is different from the fact itself. But the fact of sin cannot be so explained and rationalized. There was no prior sinful act or sinful inclination of Adam by which to account for the fact of his apostasy. The sinful self-determination of Adam's will was both the cause of the first sin and the first sin itself. Sin is self-caused and therefore cannot be an effect proper of a cause proper, because an effect is different from its cause. "Let no one," says Augustine (City of God 12.7), "look for an efficient cause of the evil will; for it is not efficient, but deficient, since the evil will itself is not an effecting of something, but a defect. To seek for an efficient cause of sin [out of the will and other than the will] is like attempting to see darkness or hear silence." Again he says (City of God 14.2), "God made man upright and consequently with a good inclination. The good inclination, then, is the work of God. But the first evil inclination, which preceded all of man's evil acts, was rather a kind of falling away from the good work of God to its own work, than any positive work; the will now not having God, but the will itself, for its end" (see also Concerning Free Will 2.20).

And this action of Adam's will in apostatizing was not only self-determination, but self-determination with no good and sufficient reason. The good reasons were all against it. Self-determination to evil is contrary to pure reason. Sin is the divorce of will from reason. Says Miiller (Sin 2.173-75):

> We must acknowledge that evil is in its nature inconceivable and incomprehensible; that is to say, is the product of arbitrariness (Willkiihr), and arbitrariness is a violation of right reason and true sequence. The inex-plicableness of evil is contained in the very conception of evil. The incom-prehensibleness of its origin arises not so much from the limitedness of our knowledge as from the nature of evil itself. Hence its inexplicableness does not dwindle and disappear with the increase of our knowledge; and at no future stage of development and growth in wisdom do we pass from this incomprehensibleness to an insight into a higher necessity of evil. On the other hand, the purer and more perfect our moral and religious knowledge becomes, the more attentively we listen to the solemn voice of our inmost consciousness and to the word of divine revelation, the more thoroughly do we perceive evil to be contrary to nature and to reason and thoroughly unaccountable and groundless.

Death as the Consequence of the First Sin

The death threatened in Gen. 2:17 was physical, spiritual, and eternal. That it was physical is proved by the following: “Unto dust you shall return” (3:19); “death reigned from Adam to Moses” (Rom. 5:14); “Adam died” (Gen. 5:5). Physical death as a mortal principle befell Adam immediately, though he did not actually die on the day he sinned. When a man is smitten with mortal disease he is a dead man, though he may live some months. Adam’s body immediately became a mortal body. Symmachus translates the Hebrew by thne’tos ese (you shall become mortal) (cf. Edwards, Original Sin in Works 2.403).

That the body of Adam was not mortal by creation is proved by the threatening of death in Gen. 2:17, which implies that as things then werethere was no liability to death. No sin, then no death. Also by 3:22: God “drove out the man from the garden lest he take of the tree of life and live forever.” This implies that in the original plan provision was made for the immortality of the body. After the transgression, it was neces-sary to prevent the immortality of the body by a special act of God. “In my opinion,” says Augustine (Concerning the Guilt and Remission of Sins 1.3), “Adam was supplied with sustenance against decay from the fruit of the various trees and with security against old age from the tree of life.” In Rev. 2:7 the Holy Spirit promises to him “that overcomes” the privilege of “eating of the tree of life which is in the center of the paradise of God.” Complete redemption places man beyond the possibility of death, either physical or spiritual. See also Rom. 8:11, 23, where the glorified body is connected with the sinless perfection of the soul. The perfection of unfallen Adam’s body, also, excluded an inherent mortality. (See supplement 4.4.4.)

The difference between the immortal body of holy Adam and the mortal body of fallen Adam is that prior to the fall the human body was not liable to death from internal causes, but only from external. It had no latent diseases and no seeds of death in it. Neither had it inordinate and vicious physical appetites, such as craving for stimulants, gluttonous appetite for food, licentious sexual appetite, etc., all of which tend to destroy the body. It could, however, be put to death. If it were deprived of food or air, it would die. It was not a celestial body like that of the glorified saints, but a body of flesh and blood. The question was raised in the patristic church whether Christ's body previous to his resurrection was like that of unfallen Adam or of fallen (Smith, Hagenbach §103; Schaff, History §143). Christ was weary and hungry and thirsty; but it is never said that he was sick with any bodily disease. And he certainly had no inordinate physical appetites. That he might have had a diseased and dying body is compatible with his sinless perfection. For although a sinless soul like that of our Lord deserves an undying and immortal body, yet he might have voluntarily submitted to that part of the "curse" of sin which consists in a diseased and dying body, without thereby becoming a partaker of sin itself (Gal. 3! 13).

This original immortality of the body, like Adam's moral perfection, was mutable and relative only. It might be lost. In case he fell from holiness, his body would be affected by his sin. The seeds of mortality would be implanted, the organism would begin to die from the moment of its birth, and the temperate physical appetite would become intemperate and inordinate. On the contrary, if Adam stood probation, that possi-bility of being put to death (posse mori)[3] which was associated with Adam's relative perfection would become an impossibility (posse non mori),[4] like that connected with the glorified body of Christ and the resurrection body of believers. These latter not only have no seeds of death in them, but they cannot be put to death by external agency. Says Augustine (Concerning the Guilt and Remission of Sins 1.2), "If Adam had not sinned, he would not have been divested of his body, but would have been clothed upon with immortality and incorruption, that 'immortal-ity might have been swallowed up of life'; that is, that he might have passed from the natural body into the spiritual body."

The mere possibility of death is not the same as a tendency to death. Unfallen Adam might have the former, but not the latter. A tendency implies the germinal base or seed of the thing. There is a possibility that every man may have all the physical diseases; but there is no tendency to all of them in every man.

That the death threatened was spiritual is proved by Rom. 5:18, where it is opposed to "spiritual life" (so also in Rom. 5:21; 6:23; 2 Tim. 1:10). The description of the consequences of apostasy discloses mental characteristics that belong to spiritual death, namely, terror and shame before God (Gen. 3:8, 10, 24).[5]

That the death was endless is proved by the texts that represent it as the contrary of life, because the life is unquestionably endless (Rom. 5:18,21; 6:23). Also by the texts that prove endless punishment (pp. 889-90).

Cause of the First Sin

Adam and Eve fell from the state of holiness by an act of self-determination, as the efficient cause: “Being left to the freedom of their own will, our first parents transgressed and thereby fell” (Westminster Larger Catechism 21). They also fell by the external temptation of Satan addressed to their innocent susceptibility, as the occasional cause: “Through the temptation of Satan, they transgressed” (Westminster Larger Catechism 21). On the freeness of the first sin, see Charnock, Holiness of God, 476-77 (ed. Bohn).

Adam and Eve were already holy and did not need to originate holiness. In being holy, that is, enlightened in their understanding and rightly inclined in their will, they had plenary power to continue and persevere in holiness. The temptation by Satan had no power to force their decision. To fall under these circumstances was as free and unnecessitated an act of self-determination as can be conceived of. As previously remarked, it was a species of voluntary caprice which cannot be made to look rational or natural. All sin after the first sin is explicable by selfish inclination and strong evil propensities concurring with outward temptation. But the first sin had not these antecedents. There was nothing but an external temptation addressed to an innocent susceptibility:

> This sin was aggravated in being committed when man had full light in his understanding; a clear copy of the law in his heart; when he had no vicious bias in his will, but enjoying perfect liberty; and when he had a sufficient stock of grace in his hand to withstand the tempting enemy; in being committed after God had made a covenant > of life with him and given him express warning of the danger of eating the forbidden fruit. (Fisher, Catechism Q. 15)[6]

If the will of Adam and Eve had been in a state of indifference, the probability of the fall would have been far greater, because the resistance ofan undetermined will is less than that of a determined holy will. Under the circumstances, the fall of the holy pair was unlikely. That it occurred proves that it was a very willful act: wanton and gratuitous. It was also an extremely guilty act, because of being committed against great light and under no great stress of temptation. (See supplement 4.4.5.)

The trial of man upon the Pelagian and Semipelagian theories was very disadvantageous compared with his trial upon the Augustinian and Calvinistic. An indifferent and undecided will is extremely liable to succumb to temptation. A will positively inclined to holiness can very readily resist temptation. It is, therefore, a defect in Miiller's theory (Sin 2.70) and also in Howe's that the human will at the instant of its creation is regarded as "created without any determination to good; it was made in that state of liberty as to be in a certain sort of equipoise, according as things should be truly or falsely represented to it by the mind or understanding" (Howe, Oracles 2.22). If this was the original condition of Adam when subjected to temptation and probation, he was unfavorably placed by his Creator.

"Sin is any want of conformity unto or transgression of the law of God" (Westminster Larger Catechism 14). "All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). "All have deviated (exeklinan)"[7] (3:12). "Sin is lawlessness (anomia)"[8] (1 John 3:4). Sin is "the work of the flesh" (Gal. 5:19-21). Sin is "the carnal mind and enmity toward God" (Rom. 8:7).

The intrinsic and inmost characteristic of sin is its culpability or guilt. Guilt is desert of punishment. Sin is damnable and punishable before the moral law. Consequently, sin must be the product of free agency. Necessitated sin is a contradiction. The primary source and seat of sin, therefore, is the will, because this is the causative and originating faculty of the soul: "Our first parents being left to the freedom of their will fell." From this inmost center of the soul, it passes into the understanding and through the entire man. The inclination and affections having become contrary to what they were by creation, the understanding is darkened and the conscience benumbed.

Some theologians explain the origin of sin by the understanding, rather than the will. Eve was deceived (1 Tim. 2:14). Deception is cognitive. The human mind by creation was enlightened so that it knew God and divine things spiritually. But it was not omniscient. It was capable therefore of being deceived by an apparent good, namely, the knowledge of good and evil. The tempter addresses his temptation to the under-standing: “You shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.” This was a plausible temptation to a creature already knowing much and capable of knowing more. But this does not account for the first sin. For this temptation through an apparent good ought to have been repelled and might have been by an act of the will. Eve ought to have remained content with the knowledge she already possessed by creation. By self-determination, she should and could have continued to be satisfied with her maker’s arrangement and refused this promised increase of knowledge. Had she done so, she would have remained unfallen and sinless. In this way, it appears that the proximate and efficient cause of the first sin was the will rather than the understanding. It was not necessary that unfallen Eve should incline or self-determine in accordance with an apparent good. Even though her understanding did perceive a species of good in the forbidden knowledge of good and evil, yet her still holy will could have rejected it. Her understanding had no power to compel her will by means of an apparent or seeming good. This is expressed in the lines of Dante:

> Then through the glowing air was sweetly sent
> A strain so ravishing to mortal sense,
> It made me Eve’s audacity lament:
> That when both heaven and earth obedient were,
> Woman alone, and she but just created,
> Refused the veil of ignorance to bear;
> which had she submitted patiently,
> O how extended, how much antedated
> Had been these joys ineffable.
>
> —Purgatory 29.22

The deception of the understanding is a misjudgment of the understanding that does not of necessity carry the will with it. Free will can reject a seeming good as well as a real good, can decide against a false judgment as well as against a true one. Furthermore, a deceived understanding is rather an effect of an evil will than its cause. A false judgment results from a sinful inclination rather than from the converse. Error in the head comes from error in the heart. When the will has once substituted self and the creature for God and the Creator as its ultimate end, then false judgments respecting what is good and what is happiness and what is true knowledge immediately arise. Then finite objects take on a false appearance and are deemed to be the summum bonum?[9] "When once man surrenders himself to the sway of that perverted principle which makes his own satisfaction the aim of all his endeavors, there will necessarily spring from this foul root a multitude of erroneous notions as to what this satisfaction consists in" (Miiller, Sin 1.165). But if the will continues true in its primary created determination to God as the chief end, the understanding is not thus hoodwinked, but sees through all the deceptions of temptation and rejects them. (See supplement 4.4.6.)

Still less is the origin of sin to be sought for in the sensuous nature of man—a theory at one time considerably current in Germany and which has received a thorough examination by Miiller (Sin 1.295-34). The great objection to it is that it finds the source of sin outside of the voluntary faculty. Man's sensuous nature is not his will; sarx[10] is not pneuma.[11] Sense is not causative and originative in its working. Consequently, sin does not begin in the lower physical nature and ascend to the will and reason but vice versa. The will and reason fall first in the order. The soul sins and then the body becomes vitiated.

In respect to its having no sinful antecedent out of which it is made, sin is origination ex nihilo. Sin is the beginning of something from nothing, and there is this resemblance between it and creation proper. In holy Adam, there was no sinful inclination or corruption that prompted the first transgression. Adam started the wicked inclination itself ex nihilo, by a causative act of self-determination. The first sin was an act of origination, not of selection or choice. If the first sinful act were one of choice between good and evil, this would require an existing indifference toward both and the absence of inclination. But if it was a self-determining and causative act, this would be compatible with an existing holy inclination. The will, in this case, passed or “lapsed” from one inclination to another by the inherent energy of self-motion that originated something new. As in regeneration, a new holy inclination origi-nated by the Holy Spirit expels the existing sinful inclination, so in apostasy a new sinful inclination originated by the human will expels the existing holy inclination (p. 521).

But sin differs from creation proper, in that it is not a substance. Creation originates beings and things; but sin is neither a being nor a thing. Yet it is not “nothing” in every sense of the term nothing. Anselm denominated it essentia and denied that it is substantia. But essentia is too strong a term for sin. Habit and accident are better terms. These are the terms employed by the Reformed theologians. Inasmuch as sin is a habitus inhering in the will and infecting the understanding, it is not a strict nonentity. To commit sin is not to do nothing. To do evil is to do something (cf. Turretin 9.1). Neither is sin a “property” of a substance, because properties necessarily belong to a substance. Sin is an “accident,” that is, a characteristic that may or may not belong to a spiritual substance:

> When we say that God is the cause of all things, we mean of all such things as have a real existence [i.e., substances]; which is no reason why those things themselves should not be the cause of some accidents, such as actions are. God created man and some other intelligences superior to man with a liberty of acting; which liberty of acting is not itself evil, but may be the cause of something that is evil. (Grotius, Christian Religion 1.8)

“Sin is not something substantial, as Flacius Illyricus, scarcely different from Manicheism, ultimately was establishing concerning the original fall. The proximate material of sin is the very practice (hexis) or bad action itself”[12] (Maresius, System 6.6, 8). The term hexis[13] is used by Plato and Aristotle to denote the habitual disposition of a faculty of the mind in distinction from the substance of the faculty itself. “Sin,” says Calvin (2.1.11), “is rather an adventitious quality or accident than a substantial property originally innate.” (See supplement 4.4.7.)

The first sin of man, though proximately and formally the violation of the Eden statute, was ultimately and implicitly the violation of the whole moral law. The contempt of divine authority in transgressing the commandment not to eat of the tree of knowledge was the contempt of divine authority generally: “He who offends in one point is guilty of all” (James 2:10). Hence sin is defined as “the transgression of law” or lawlessness (1 John 3:4).

The moral law violated by the free will of man is both written and unwritten: the law of nature and the Decalogue (Rom. 2:14-16). The points of difference between them have been specified under the head of revelation (pp. 85-86). The two laws are originally and essentially the same.The ethics of man’s rational nature as he came from the Cre ator’s hand and of the Decalogue are identical. The now existing differe nce between th e two is due to a postasy. Says Urs inus iChristian Religion Q. 92):

> The natural law does not differ from the moral in nature not corrupted; but in nature corrupted, a good part of the natural law is darkened by sins, and but a little part only concerning the obedience due to God was left remaining in man’s mind after the fall: for which cause, also, God has in his church repeated again and declared the whole sentence and doctrine of his law in the Decalogue. Therefore the Decalogue is a restoring and reentering or reinforcing of the law of nature; and the law of nature is a part only of the Decalogue.

Such being the connection between the unwritten and written law, it follows that sin in the heathen is the same in kind with sin in Christendom. Free and responsible human will, in both instances, transgresses a common law and ethics. The difference between the violation of the unwritten law and the written is one of degree only: “As many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law; and as many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law” (Rom. 2:12). (See supplement 4.4.8.)

S U P P L E M E N T S

4.4.1 (see p. 536) Respecting the freedom of Adam and the possibility of his remaining holy as created, Stillingfleet (Origines 3.3) remarks as follows: “Adam had a power to stand, in that there was no principle of corruption at all in his faculties; but he had a pure and undefiled soul which could not be polluted without its own consent. God cannot be said to be the author of sin, though he did not prevent the fall of man; because he did not withdraw before his tall any grace or assistance which was necessary for his standing. Had there been, indeed, a necessity of supernatural grace to be communicated to man at every moment in order to continue him in his inno-cency; and had God before man's fall withdrawn such assistance from him without which it were impossible for him to have stood it would be very difficult to free God from being the cause of the fall of man. But we are not put to such difficulties for acquitting God from being the author of sin. For if God made man upright, he certainly gave him such a power as might be brought into act without the necessity of any supervenient act of grace to elicit that habitual power into particular actions. God would not, certainly, require anything from the creature in his integrity but what he had a power to obey; and if there were necessary further grace to bring the power into act, then the subtracting of this grace must be by way of punishment to man; which it is hard to conceive for what it should be before man had sinned; or else God must subtract this grace on purpose that man might fall, which would follow on this supposition, in which case man would be necessitated to fall. But if God did not withdraw any effectual grace from man whereby he must necessarily fall, then though God permitted man to use his liberty, yet he cannot be said to be in any way the author of sin, because man still had a power of standing if he had made a right use of his liberty." Similarly Augustine (Rebuke and Grace 28) declares that "God made man with free will, and if he had willed by his own free will to continue in the state of uprightness and freedom from sin in which he was created, assuredly without any experience of death and of unhappiness he would have received by the merit of that continuance the fullness of blessing with which the holy angels also are blessed, that is, the impossibility of falling any more and the knowledge of this with absolute certainty." This indefectibility, which would have been the reward of Adam's rejecting the temptation of Satan and continuing in the holiness in which he was created, Augustine describes in Rebuke and Grace 33: "We must consider with attention in what respect these pairs differ from one another, namely, to be able not to sin and not to be able to sin; to be able not to die and not to be able to die; to be able not to forsake good and not to be able to forsake good. For the first man was able not to sin, was able not to die, was able not to forsake good. Are we to say that he who had such a will could not sin? Or that he to whom it was said, If you shall sin you shall die by death,' could not die? Or that he could not forsake good, when by sinning he would forsake this and so die? Therefore the first liberty of the will was to be able not to sin, the last will be much greater: not to be able to sin; the first immortality was to be able not to die, the last will be much greater: not to be able to die; the first will the power of perseverance, to be able not to forsake good, the last will be the felicity of perseverance [i.e., indefectibility], not to be able to forsake good. But because the last blessings will be preferable and better, were those first ones, therefore, either no blessings at all or mere trifling ones?"

4.4.2 (see p. 536). Anselm {Concerning Free Will 1) argues as follows respecting the undesirableness of the power to sin:

> Master: To sin is to do something that is injurious and dishonoring, is it not? Disciple: Certainly.
> Master: Consequently, that will which is unable to deviate from the rectitude of not sinning is freer than that will which is able?
> Disciple: Nothing seems more rational.
> Master: Do you think that which if added diminishes liberty. and subtracted increases it. should be regarded as a necessary element in liberty?
> Disciple: I cannot so think.
> Master: The power to sin. therefore, which if added to the will diminishes liberty, and if taken away from the will increases liberty, is no part of liberty.
> Disciple: Nothing is clearer

According to the Pelagian idea of freedom, as indifference and indetermination involving the power to the contrary, the power to sin is as necessary to liberty as the power to act holily; and writers of this school commonly represent it as one of the excellences and prerogatives of a free moral agent. But if freedom be defined, with Augustine and Anselm, as self-motion pure and simple, it is evident that freedom would not be increased by the addition of a power to sin, because this would be no increase of the self-motion which already exists in self-motion to good And neither would the self-motion of sin be augmented in the least by the addition to it of the power to be holy To add a contrary motion to an existing motion is certainly no increase of the existing motion, and if the existing motion is free self-motion such addition is no addition of freedom

4.4.3 (see p. 538) Augustine's explanation of the tree of knowledge is as follows: "Adam and Eve were forbidden to partake of one tree only, which God called the tree of knowledge of good and evil, to signify by this name the consequence of their discovering what good they would experience if they obeyed the prohibition or what evil if they transgressed it. They are no doubt rightly supposed to have abstained from the forbidden tree previous to the malignant persuasion of the devil and to have used all which had been allowed them and therefore among all the others and before all the others the tree of life. For what could be more absurd than to suppose that they partook of the fruit of other trees, but not of that which had been equally with others granted to them and which by its special virtue prevented their animal bodies from undergo-ing change through the decay of age and from aging unto death? But they were forbidden, as the test of absolute obedience, the use of a tree which, if it had not been for the prohibition, they might have used without suffering any evil effect whatever; and from this circumstance it may be clearly understood that whatever evil they brought upon themselves, because they made use of it contrary to the prohibition, did not proceed from any noxious or pernicious quality in the fruit of the tree, but wholly from their violated obedience" (Forgiveness and Remission 2.35).

Matthew Henry (on Gen 2:8-9) explains as follows: "The tree of the knowledge of good and evil was so called not because it had any virtue in it to father or increase useful knowledge, for surely then it would not have been forbidden; but (1) because there was an express positive revelation of the will of God concerning this tree, so that by it Adam might know moral good and evil What is good? "Tis good not to eat of this tree.' What is evil? "Tis evil to eat of this tree.' The distinction between all other moral good and evil was written in the heart of man by nature, but this which results from a positive law was written upon this tree. (2) Because in the event it proved to give Adam an experimental knowledge of good by the loss of it and of evil by the sense of it. As the covenant of grace has in it not only believe and so be saved' but also believe not and be damned' (Mark 16:16), so the covenant of innocency had in it not only do this and live.' which was sealed and confirmed by the tree of life, but fail and die,' which Adam was assured of by this other tree; so that in these two trees God set before Adam good and evil,' the blessing and the curse' (Deut. 30:19). These two trees were as two sacraments or symbols."

4.4.4 (see p. 541). Augustine (Forgiveness and Baptism 1.21) thus explains the text "in the day you eat thereof you shall surely die": "When Adam sinned then his body lost the grace whereby it used in every part of it to be obedient to the soul Then there arose in men appetites common to the brutes, which are productive of shame and which made man ashamed of his own nakedness. Then, also, by a certain disease which was conceived in men from a suddenly infected and pestilential corruption, it was brought about that they lost that stability of life in which they were created, and by reason of the mutations which they experienced in the stages of life the disease issued at last in death. However many were the years they lived in their subsequent life, yet they began to die on the day when they received the law of death, because they kept verging toward old age." Similarly Charnock (God's Patience) remarks: "So it is to be understood, not of an actual death of the body, but the desert of death and the necessity of death: ‘You will be obnoxious to death, which will be avoided if you do forbear to eat of the forbidden fruit; you shall be a guilty person and so come under a sentence of death, that I may when I please inflict it upon you.’ Death did not come upon Adam that day because his nature was vitiated; he was then also under an expectation of death, he was obnoxious to it. though that day it was not poured out upon him in the full bitterness and gall of it; as when the apostle says, The body is dead because of sin,’ he speaks of the living, and yet tells them the body was dead because of sin; he means that it was under a sentence and so a necessity of dying, though not actually dead.”

4.4.5 (see p. 543). Charnock (Holiness of God, 476) describes the ease with which the first sin might have been avoided: “God cannot necessitate sin. Indeed sin cannot be committed by force; there is no sin but is in some sort voluntary; voluntary in the root or voluntary in the branch; voluntary by an immediate act [volition] of the will or voluntary by a general or natural inclination of the will. The plain story of man s apostasy from God discharges God from any part in the crime as an encouragement and excuses him from any appearance of connivance, when he showed him the tree he had reserved as a mark of his sovereignty and forbade him to eat of the fruit of it; he backed the prohibition with the threatening of the greatest evil, namely, death; and in that couched an assurance of the perpetuity of his felicity if he did not rebelliously reach forth his hand to take and eat of the fruit’ Though the goodness of the fruit for food and its pleasantness to the eye’ (Gen. 3:6) might allure him, yet the force of his reason might have quelled the liquorishness of his sense, and the perpetual thinking of and sounding out of the command of God had silenced both Satan and his own appetite What inward inclination in him to disobey can we suppose there could be from the Creator, when upon the very first offer of the temptation Eve opposes to the tempter the prohibition and threatening of God and strains it to a higher peg than we find God had delivered it in? For in 2:17 it is you shall not eat of it’; but she adds (3:3) neither shall you touch it.’ which was a remark that might have had more influence to restrain her. Had our first parents kept this fixed upon their understandings and thoughts, that God had forbidden any such act as the eating of the fruit and that he was true to execute the threatening he had uttered, of which veracity of God they could not but have a natural notion, with what ease might they have withstood the devil’s attack and defeated his design! There is no ground for any suspicion of any encouragements, inward impulses, or necessity from God in this affair. A discharge of God from complicity in this first sin will easily imply a freedom of him from all other sins which follow from it. God does not encourage or excite or incline to sin. How can he excite to that which when it is done he will be sure to condemn? How can he be a righteous judge to sentence a sinner to misery for a crime actuated by a secret inspiration from himself? Iniquity would deserve no reproof from him. if he were in any way positively [and efficiently] the author of it. Were God the author of it in us. what is the reason that our own conscience accuses us for it and convinces us of it? Conscience, being God’s deputy, would not accuse us of it if the sovereign power by which it acts did incline or force us to it The Apostle Paul execrates such a thought (Rom. 9:14).”

4.4.6(see p. 544) The questi on whether the will or the understanding is the most central and whether the will follows the understanding or the converse is important in determining which is the true ego. Locke (Conduct of the Understanding, introduction) teaches that the will follows the understanding: “The agent determines himself to this or that voluntary action upon some precedent knowledge or appearance of knowledge in the understanding. No man ever sets himself about anything but upon some view or other which serves him for a reason for what he does The will itself, how absolute and uncontrollable soever it may be thought, never fails in its obedience to the dictates of the understanding.” This remark is true of the action of the will as choosing the means to an end in volitions, but not as inclining to the ultimate end itself. When a person chooses to steal money he erroneously judges with the understanding that money is the chief good. This erroneous judgment of the understanding precedes and moves him to the volition by which he steals the money. But money appears to be the chief good to the understanding only because the inclination of the will tends to self and the creature as its ultimate end. Did the inclination of the will tend to God and infinite good as its ultimate end, holiness, not money, would be desired as the chief good, and the judgment of the understanding that it is such would follow accordingly. The understanding always judges according to the person's abiding desire or inclination. If this latter is unselfish and right, the judgment is always correct. If it is selfish and wrong, the judgment is always erroneous. A reference to Adam as unfallen and fallen will illustrate this. Unfallen Adam discerned correctly between the greater and the inferior good. He was not deceived into judging the lesser good to be the greater. But fallen Adam was so deceived. How came he to be so? Not by an act of judgment that was prior to the change of his inclination and desire. So long as he was unfallen and inclined in his will to God as the chief good and desired him as such, he did not pass such a false judgment. He judged in accordance with his holy inclination and desire, and his judgment that God is the chief good was true. But when the inclination of his will underwent a revolution and he came to desire the creature, namely, his wife Eve, instead of the Creator as the chief good, then his judgment followed his inclination and he esteemed what he desired to be the summum bonum"[14] This demonstrates that the last dictate or judgment of the understanding is according to the will or inclination and not the will or inclination according to the last judgment of the understanding. Objects appear to the understanding as they agree or disagree with the dominant desire of the heart or inclination of the will.

The following extract from Charnock (Goodness of God) is a clear statement of the fact that the will must have a good of some kind, real or seeming, true or false, as its end: "Nothing but a good can be the object of a rational appetite [i.e., the appetency of a rational self-moving soul in distinction from an instinctive necessitated animal soul]. The will cannot direct its motion to anything under the notion of evil, evil in itself, or evil to it; whatsoever courts it must present itself in the quality of a good in its own nature or in its present circumstances, to the present state and condition of the desire; it will not else touch or affect the will. This is the language of that faculty. Who will show me any good?' (Ps. 4:6). and good is as inseparably the object of the will's motion as truth is of the understanding's inquiry. Whatsoever a man would allure another to comply with, he must propose to the person under the notion of some beneficialness in point of honor, profit, or pleasure."

But whether a true or a false good shall be the end aimed at by the will depends upon the state and condition of the will and not upon the intrinsic quality of the true or the false good. If the will is holy in its inclination or appetency, the good aimed at by it will be the true good, and the good refused and rejected will be the false good. If the will is sinful in its inclination and desire, the good aimed at will be the false good, and the true will be rejected. The judgment of the understanding respecting the desirableness of the good, in each instance, is not a prior and independent one. It depends upon the existing bias of the will and follows it. Instead therefore of the maxim "the will follows the last dictate of the understanding," the truth is that the last dictate of the understanding follows the will. The understanding will judge that wealth, honor, and pleasure are the good to be sought after, instead of "glory, honor, and immortality," in case the inclination of the will is selfish and carnal and lusts after these. This judgment is a false one, but an actual and real one. It is the judgment of the natural man universally. On the contrary, the understanding will juda.e that "glory, honor, and immortality" are the summum bonum, '[15] if the will is spiritually inclined to them, and this judgment is the true one. It is the judgment of the renewed man.

In this way it appears that the will, not the understanding, is the most central and profound of the human faculties. It is the ego in its ultimate essence: "For the will is not merely the surface faculty of single volitions, over which the person has arbitrary control, but also that central and inmost active principle into which all the powers of cognition and feeling are grafted, as into the very core and substance of the personality itself" (Shedd, Literary Essays, 326; Theological Essays. 233-35).

This was also Aristotle's view, according to Neander ("Grecian and Christian Ethics," Bibliotheca sacra. Oct. 1853: 806): "It is Aristotle's great service to ethics that he has urged the principle that the free determination of the will is the lever of all moral development; that knowledge is not the first or original element, but the direction [inclination] of the will; that the judgment does not, as the primal power of the mind, determine the will, but the abiding decision of the will determines the judgment; that the man by his permanent determination of will forms his character, and this character having become what it is freely reacts upon the views and judgment of the man."

Jeremy Taylor (sermon to the University of Dublin) quotes Aristotle's view and endorses it as follows: "Said Aristotle, Wickedness corrupts a man's reasoning'; it gives him false principles and evil measure of things; the sweet wine that Ulysses gave to the Cyclops put his eye out; and a man that has contracted evil affections and made a league with sin sees only by those measures. A covetous man understands nothing to be good that is not profitable; and a voluptuous man likes vour reasoning well enough if you discourse of bonum jucundum.[16] the pleasures of the sense; but if you talk to him of the melancholy lectures of the cross, the peace of meekness, and of rest in God. after your long discourse, and his great silence, he cries out. What is the matter?' He knows not what you mean. Either you must fit his humor or change your discourse. Every man understands by his affections more than by his reason. A man's mind [inclination] must be like your proposition before it can be entertained; it is a man's mind that gives the emphasis and makes your argument to prevail.

"Do we not see this by daily experience? Even those things which a good man and an evil man know, they do not know them both alike. A wicked man knows that good is lovely and sin is of an evil and destructive nature; and when he is reproved he is convinced; and when he is observed he is ashamed; and when he is done he is unsatisfied; and when he pursues his sin he does it in the dark: tell him he shall die and he sighs deeply, but he knows it as well as you: proceed and say that after death comes judgment, and the poor man believes and trembles; he knows that God is angry with him; and if you tell him that for aught he knows he may be in hell tomorrow, he knows that it is an intolerable truth, but it is also undeniable; and yet. after all this, he runs to commit his sin with as certain an event and resolution as if he knew no argument against it: these notices of things terrible and true pass through his understanding as an eagle through the air; as long as her flight lasted the air was shaken, but there remains no path behind her.

"Now at the same time we see other persons, not so learned it may be, not so much versed in Scripture, yet they say a thing is good and lay hold of it; they believe glorious things of heaven, and they live accordingly as men that believe themselves; half a word is enough to make them understand; a nod is a sufficient reproof; the crowing of a cock, the singing of a lark, the dawning of the day, and the washing their hands are to them competent memorials of religion and warnings of their duty. What is the reason of this difference? They both read the same Scriptures, they read and hear the same sermons, they have capable understandings, they both believe what they hear and what they read, and yet the event is vastly different. The reason is that which I am now speaking of; the one understands by one principle, the other by another; the one understands by nature, and the other by grace; the one by human learning, and the other by divine; the one reads the Scriptures without, the other within; the one understands as a son of man, the other as a son of God; the one perceives by the proportions of the world, and the other by the measures of the Spirit; the one understands by reason, and the other by love "

The fact mentioned by St. Paul (1 Tim. 2:14) that "Adam was not deceived by Satan" as Eve was and yet apostatized from God proves that the first cause of sin is the self-determination of the will, not the misjudgment of the understanding. Says Augustine {City ol God 14.11): "For as Aaron was not induced to agree in judgment with the people when they blindly wished him to make an idol and yet yielded to their constraint; and as it is not credible that Solomon was so blind as to suppose that idols should be worshiped but was drawn over to such sacrilege by the blandishments of women; so we cannot believe that Adam was deceived and supposed the devil's word to be truth and therefore transgressed God's law, but that he. by the drawings of kindred, yielded to the woman, the husband to the wife, the one human to the only other human being. The woman accepted as true what the serpent told her, but the man could not bear to be severed from his only companion, even though this involved a partnership in sin. He was not on this account less culpable, but sinned with his eyes open. And so the apostle does not say he did not sin' but he was not deceived.' For he shows that he sinned when he says, By one man sin entered into the world,' and immediately after, more distinctly, In the likeness of Adam's transgression "

Kant (Practical Reason, 212 (trans. Abbott]) directs attention to the ambiguity of the expression sub ratione boni: "[17]It may mean: We represent something to ourselves as good, when and because we desire it; or we desire something because we represent it to ourselves as good, so that either the desire determines the notion of the object as a good, or the notion of the good determines the desire; so that in the first case sub ratione boni would mean that we will something under the idea of the good; in the second, in consequence of this idea, which, as determining the will, must precede it."

4.4.7 (see p. 545). The Formula of Concord 1 rejects the doctrine that sin is the substance of the soul: "We condemn as a Manichean error the teaching that original sin is properly and without any distinction the very substance, nature, and essence of corrupt man, so that between his corrupt nature after the fall, considered in itself, and original sin, there is no difference at all, and that no distinction can be conceived between them by which original sin can be distinguished from man's nature, even in thought Dr. Luther, it is true, calls this original evil a sin of nature, personal, essential; but not as if the nature, person, or essence of man. without any distinction, is itself original sin; but he speaks after this manner in order that by phrases of this kind the distinction between original sin, which is infixed in human nature, and other sins, which are called actual, may be better understood."

Augustine denies that sin is the substance of the soul and asserts that it is its agency: "That which we have to say on this subject our author [Pelagius] mentions when concluding this topic he says: 'As we remarked, the passage in which occur the words, The flesh lusts against the Spirit, must needs have reference not to the substance [of the flesh) but to the works of the flesh ' We, too, allege that this is spoken not of the substance of the flesh but of its works, which proceed from carnal concupiscence—in a word, from sin, concerning which we have this precept: Not to let it reign in our mortal body, that we should obey it in the lusts thereof" (Nature and Grace 66). "From the body of this death nothing but God's grace alone delivers us. Not, of course, from the substance of the body, which is good; but from its carnal offenses. It was this that the apostle meant when he said. I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members'" (Nature and Grace 62). "There is nothing of what we call evil if there be nothing good But a good which is wholly without evil is a perfect good. A good, on the other hand, which contains evil is a faulty or imperfect good; and there can be no evil where there is no good. From all this we arrive at the curious result: that since every being, so far as it is a being, is good, when we say that a faulty being is an evil being we seem to say that what is good is evil, and that nothing but what is good can be evil. Yet there is no escape from this conclusion. When we accurately distinguish we find that it is not because a man is a man that he is an evil, or because he is wicked that he is a good; but that he is a good because he is a man, and an evil because he is wicked. Whoever, then, says. To be a man is an evil' or To be wicked is a good,' falls under the prophetic denunciation: Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil!' For he condemns the work of God, which is the man. and praises the defect of man, which is the wickedness Therefore every being, even if it be a defective one. insofar as it is a being is good, and insofar as it is defective is evil" (Enchiridion 13). This means that man as a substance is created by God and as such is good; man as an agent is sinfully self-moving and as such is evil.

Athanasius, also arguing against the Manichean hypothesis that sin is a substance and not the misuse or abuse of a creature's will, compares this opinion to that of a person "who were to shut his eyes at noonday, and finding it dark should fancy that darkness is something as real as the light or that the substance of the light is changed into another substance of a quite contrary nature" (Oration against the Gentiles 7). There is a science of light, namely, optics, but no science of darkness, which evinces the nonsub-stantiality of the latter. Darkness has no properties or qualities that can be examined by instruments and whose nature can be expressed in the terms of mathematics. It has no theory like that of emission or of undulation by which it can be explained. Nothing can be predicated of it of a positive nature. It can be defined only negatively as the absence of light. So, likewise, sin is not a substance, and neither is holiness. But while sin may be defined as the absence of holiness and darkness as the absence of light, holiness may not be defined as the absence of sin. nor light the absence of darkness. Holiness and light are positive conceptions; sin and darkness are negative.

4.4.8 (see p. 546). Leighton (Exposition ot the Ten Commandments) thus states the relation of the written law to the unwritten: "At first the commandments were written in the heart of man by God's own hand, but as the first tables of stone fell and were broken, so was it with man's heart: by his fall his heart was broken and scattered among earthly perishing things that was before whole and entire to his maker; and so the characters of that law written in it were so shivered and scattered that they could not be perfectly and distinctly read in it; therefore it pleased God to renew that law after this manner by a most solemn delivery with audible voice and then by writing it on tables of stone. And this is not all, but this same law he does write anew in the hearts of his children."

5 Orgin Sin

Preliminary Consideration

"The sinfulness of that estate (status or condition) whereinto man fell consists in the guilt of Adam's first sin, the want of original righteousness, and the corruption of the whole nature: which is commonly called original sin; together with all actual transgressions which proceed from it" (Westminster Shorter Catechism Q. 18).

According to this doctrinal statement, there are three particulars under the general head of sin: (1) the guilt of the first sin, (2) the corruption of nature resulting from the first sin, and (3) actual transgres-sions or sins of act which result from corruption of nature.

The first part of the sinfulness of man's estate or condition is the guilt of the first sin. The first sin of Adam, strictly and formally considered, was the transgression of the particular command not to eat of the tree of knowledge. This was a positive statute and not the moral law. It tested obedience more severely than the moral law does because the latter carries its own reason with it, while the former containing no intrinsic morality appealed to no reason except the mere good pleasure of God. To disobey it was to disregard the authority of God and involved disobedience of all law. The guilt of Adam's first sin is the guilt of trans-gressing the law of Eden explicitly and the moral law implicitly: "The rule of obedience revealed to Adam, besides a special command not to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, was the moral law" (Westmin-ster Larger Catechism 92).

Adam's Sin as Twofold: Internal and External

The first sin of Adam was twofold: (a) internal and (b) external. The internal part of it was the originating and starting of a wrong inclination. The external part of it was the exertion of a wrong volition prompted by the wrong inclination. Adam first inclined to self instead of God as the ultimate end. He became an idolater and "worshiped and served the creature more than the Creator" (Rom. 1:25). Then, in order to gratify this new inclination, he reached forth his hand and ate of the forbidden fruit:

> Our first parents fell into open disobedience, because already they were secretly corrupted; for the evil act had never been done had not an evil inclination (voluntas) preceded it. And what is the origin of our evil inclination but pride? And what is pride but the craving for undue exaltation? And this is undue exaltation, when the soul abandons him to whom it ought to cleave as its end and becomes an end to itself. The wicked desire to please himself secretly existed in Adam, and the open sin was but its consequence. (Augustine, City of God 14.13)

Edwards (Original Sin in Works 2.385) directs attention to the internal part of Adam's first sin in the following manner. His opponent Taylor had said that "Adam could not sin [externally] without a sinful inclination." Edwards replies that "this is doubtless true; for although there was no natural sinful inclination in [holy] Adam, yet an inclination to that sin of eating the forbidden fruit was begotten in him by the delusion and error he was led into, and this inclination to eat the forbidden fruit must precede his actual eating." Edwards considers the rising of this sinful desire and inclination to be the first sin itself. There was not a first sin prior to it of which the sinful inclination was the effect; but the very inclining away from God to the creature was Adam's fall itself and that of his posterity in him:

> I am humbly of the opinion that if any have supposed the children of Adam to come into the world with a double guilt, one the guilt of Adam's sin, another the guilt arising from their having a corrupt heart, they have not so well conceived of the matter. The guilt a man has upon his soul at his first [individual] existence is one and simple, namely, the guilt of the original apostasy, the guilt of the sin by > which the species first rebelled against God. This and the guilt arising from the first corruption or depraved disposition of the heart are not to be looked upon as two things, distinctly imputed and charged upon men in the sight of God. It is true that the guilt that arises from the corruption of the heart as it remains a confirmed principle and appears in its subsequent operations is a distinct and additional guilt; but the guilt arising from the first existing [the start or origination) of a depraved disposition in Adam's posterity, I apprehend is not distinct from their guilt of Adam's first sin. For so it was not in Adam himself The first evil disposition or inclination of the heart of Adam to sin was not properly distinct from his first sin, but was included in it. The external act he committed was no otherwise his, than as his heart was in it, or as that action proceeded from the wicked inclination of his heart. Nor was the guilt he had double, as for two distinct sins: one, the wickedness of his heart and will in that affair; another, the wickedness of the external act caused by his heart. His guilt was all truly from the act of his inward man; exclusive of which the motions of his body were no more than the motions of any lifeless instrument. His sin consisted in wickedness of heart, fully sufficient for and entirely amounting to all that appeared in the act he committed.'[1] (Original Sin in Works 2.481) (See supplement 4.5.1.)

The internal part of Adam's first sin was the principal part of it. It was the real commencement of sin in man. It was the origination from nothing of a sinful disposition in the human will. There was no previous sinful disposition to prompt it or to produce it. When Adam inclined away from God to the creature, he exercised an act of pure self-determination. He began sinning by a real beginning, analogous to that by which matter begins to be from nothing. In endowing Adam with a mutable holiness, God made it possible, but not necessary, for Adam to originate a sinful inclination and thereby expel a holy one. The finite will can fall from holiness to sin if it is not "kept from falling" (Jude 24) by God's special grace, because it is finite. The finite is the mutable by the very definition.

Since this first inclining of the human will had no sinful antecedent, it is denominated "original" sin. There is no sin before it by which to explain it. Says Lombard (2.22.12):

> If it be asked whether inclination {voluntas) preceded that first sin, we answer, in the first place, that inasmuch as that first sin consisted both of inclination (voluntas) and of outward act (actus), inclination preceded outward act, but another evil inclination did not precede the evil inclination itself; and, second, that through the persuasion of Satan and by the arbitrary decision (arbitrio) of Adam that evil inclination was produced by which he deserted righteousness and began iniquity. And this inclination (voluntas) itself was iniquity.

The following dialogue in Anselm's On the Fall of the Devil 27 is to the same effect:

> Disciple: Why did the wicked angel will what he ought not to have willed?
> Master: No cause preceded this wrong act, except it were that the angel could so will.
> Disciple: Did he then will wickedly because he was able to?
> Master: No, because the good angel had the same power, but did not will wrongly. No one wills wrongly merely because he can so will.
> Disciple: Why then does he will wrongly?
> Master: Only because he will. The wicked will has no other cause but this, why it determines to sin. It is both an efficient and an effect in one. (See supplement 4.5.2.)

The internal part of Adam's first sin was "voluntary" not "volitionary." It was will as desire, not will as volition; will as inclining, not will as choosing. The fall was the transition from one form of self-motion to another form of self-motion, and not the beginning of self-motion for the first time. The fall was a self-determining to evil expelling an existing self-determination to good. It was inclining away from one ultimate end to another, not choosing between two ultimate ends to neither of which was there any existing inclination. Adam before he fell was self-determined to God and goodness. Consequently, in the garden of Eden, he had not to choose either good or evil as two contraries to both of which his will was indifferent. By creation, he was positively inclined to good. The question put before him in the probation and temptation was whether he would remain holy as he was or begin a new inclination to evil; not whether, having no inclination at all, he would choose either good or evil. His act of apostasy, if it occurred, was to be an act of new and wrong desire in place of the existing holy desire, of new and wrong self-determination in place of the existing and right self-determination. The fall was a change of inclination, not the exertion of a volition.

The internal part of Adam's first sin is described in Gen. 3:1-6. According to this narrative, Eve first listened to the crafty query of Satan whether God could have given such a command; then she entered into a discussion with him; then she believed him. All this internal agency of the soul occurred prior to plucking and eating the forbidden fruit. But this listening, discussing, and believing on the part of Eve occurredbecause she was secretly desiring the forbidden knowledge by which she would "be as the gods" (3:5). Lust for that false knowledge which Satan had promised explains these mental processes. Dalliance with temptation always implies a desire for the tempting object. Had Eve continued to desire and to be content with that true knowledge which she had by creation, she would have abhorred the false knowledge proposed by the tempter, and this abhorrence would have precluded all parleying with him and all trust in him.

A comparison of the manner in which our Lord dealt with the same tempter is instructive. Christ, in the wilderness, entered into no parley and debate with Satan, as Eve did in paradise. He did not dally with temptation, because no desire for what God had forbidden arose within him. The second Adam did not lust, like the first Adam, after the false good presented by the tempter. The first two of Satan's suggestions he instantaneously rejects, giving reasons therefor in the decisive language of Scripture. And the third and more blasphemous suggestion he thrusts away with the avaunt of abhorrence. There was not the slightest swerving from God, the faintest hankering after prohibited good, in the most secret soul of our Lord. His will from center to circumference, both as inclination and volition, both in desire and act, remained steadfast in holiness. Christ met Satan's temptation with aversion and loathing. Eve met it with inclination and liking.

The history of the rise of evil desire or lust is given by divine inspiration. Along with the listening, the debating, and the believing on the part of Eve, there was, according to the narrative in Genesis, a yet more important activity that occurred in the soul of Eve prior to the eating of the forbidden fruit: “The woman saw that the tree was good for food and that it was pleasant to the eyes and a tree to be desired to make one wise” (3:6). Eve looked upon the tree of knowledge not only with innocent, but with sinful desire. She not only had the natural created desire for it as producing nourishing food and as a beautiful object to the eye, but she came to have, besides this, the unnatural and self-originated desire for it as yielding a kind of knowledge which God forbade man to have. She “lusted” after that “knowledge of good and evil” which eating of the fruit would impart. This knowledge was not the true wisdom and spiritual knowledge which Adam and Eve already had by creation and which is the intellectual side of holiness, but it was the false knowledge which “the gods,” that is, Satan and his angels, had acquired by apos-tasy.[2] This lusting of Eve for a knowledge that God had prohibited was her apostasy. This was the self-determining and inclining of her will away from God as the chief end and chief good to self and the creature as the chief end. To desire what God has forbidden is to prefer self to God, and this is to sin. This concupiscence was the beginning of sin in her will. It was the same thing, in kind, with the concupiscence which God forbids in the tenth commandment. The command not to covet or lust is a command not to desire anything that God has forbidden. God has forbidden theft. To inwardly desire another man’s property is theft. God has forbidden murder. To be inwardly angry at a fellowman is murder. God has forbidden adultery. To inwardly desire another man’s wife is adultery. In like manner, God had forbidden to Adam satanic knowledge of good and evil. To inwardly desire it was the first sin. Achan’s sin began with inward desire or lust: “When I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonian garment and two hundred shekels of silver and a wedge of gold, then I coveted them and took them” (Josh. 7:21).

All this internal action of the soul of Eve, then, occurred prior to the outward act of plucking and eating. Says Fisher (Catechism Q. 3), “Were not our first parents guilty of sin before eating the forbidden fruit? Yes: they were guilty in hearkening to the devil and believing him before they actually ate it. Why, then, is their eating of it called their first sin? Because it was the first sin finished (James 1:15).” “The first sin,” says Pictet

(Theology 4.2), "commenced when Eve began to doubt whether she had rightly understood the intention of God in forbidding the fruit of the tree. Afterward, when she ought to have consulted God upon this subject, she believed the devil, who said that they should not die; in the next place, she was flattered with the hope held out to her by Satan of knowing all things and being equal to God; and at last, she reached forth her hand to the fruit." "From the account in Genesis," says Hodge (Theology 2.128), "it appears that doubt, unbelief, and pride were the principles which led to this fatal act of disobedience. Eve doubted God's goodness, she disbelieved his threatening, she aspired after forbidden knowledge.'"[3]

The account given in Gen. 3:1-6 favors the supposition that Eve had the colloquy with Satan by herself, as Milton represents it in his poem. The woman alone entered into the discussion with Satan of a subject that ought not to have been discussed at all. "And when," continues the narrative, "the woman saw that the tree was good for food and that it was pleasant (ta'dwdY[4] to the eyes and a tree to be desired (nehmadf[5] to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof and did eat; and gave also unto her husband and he did eat" (Gen. 3:6). St. Paul (1 Tim. 2:14) affirms that "Adam was not deceived [by Satan], but the woman being deceived by him fell into the transgression (en parabasei gegone)."[6] This implies that Adam did not believe the tempter's assertion that a good would follow the eating of the forbidden fruit and that death would not be the consequence. According to St. Paul, Adam was seduced by his affection for Eve rather than deceived by the lie of Satan. He fell with his eyes wide open to the fact that if he ate he would die. But in loving his wife more than God, he "worshiped and served the creature instead of the Creator" and like Eve set up a different final end from the true one.

The account in Gen. 3:6 describes (a) the innocent physical desire of man's unfallen nature for the fruit of the tree of knowledge and (b) the rising of sinful moral desire for it: "The woman saw that the tree was good for food and that it was pleasant (ta'dwdY[7] to the eyes." This denotes merely the correlation between the created qualities of man's physical constitution and this particular product of God's creation. It was not wrong, but perfectly innocent, to perceive that the tree was good for food and to desire it as such and to be pleasantly affected by the beauty of it. This divinely established relation between man's physical nature and that of the tree of knowledge constituted the subjective basis for the temptation. Had the tree been repulsive to the sight and taste, its fruit would not have been employed by Satan as a means of solicitation. Up to this point in the description, the phraseology is the same as that in 2:9 respecting all the trees in the garden: “Out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant {nehmadƒ[8] to the sight and good for food.” All the physical products of God, the tree of knowledge included, were agreeable and pleasant objects for the newly created and sinless man. (See supplement 4.5.3.)

But the account in Gen. 3:6 further adds that the tree of knowledge came to be for Eve a tree “to be desired (nehtnad),”[9] to make one wise.” The sinful moral desire here mentioned is different from the innocent physical desire spoken of in the preceding part of the verse. It was a mental hankering al ter the fruit as imparting to the eater a kind of knowledge which God had forbidden to man. This is something new and different from the innocent craving belonging to man’s sensuous nature. To desire the fruit simply as food and as a beautiful object was innocent. But to desire a knowledge of good and evil such as the “gods” had, which the eating of it would communicate, was rebellious and wicked, because this kind of knowledge had been prohibited. The word nehmad,”[10] descriptive of Eve’s longing after the prohibited knowledge, is the same employed in the tenth commandment (Exod. 20:17), which the Septu-agint renders by ouk epithymeseis.”[11] Eve’s evil desire was also the same in kind with the epithymia[12] of St. Paul, which he declares to be hamar-tia”[13] (Rom. 7:7). It was also the same in kind with the epithymia”[14] mentioned in James 1:14: “Every man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lust and enticed.”

The self-willed origination and rising of this desire for a knowledge that God had forbidden was the fall of Eve. It was a new inclination of her will to self, directly contrary to that inclination to God with which she had been created. As regeneration is denominated a “birth” of the soul because of the totality of the moral change, so apostasy may be called a “birth” of the soul for the same reason. By the fall, the children of God became the children of Satan (John 8:44; Matt. 13:38). Each “birth” alike is an entire revolution in human character: one upward the other downward. As regeneration is the origination by the Holy Spirit of holy desire and inclination, so apostasy was the origination by Adam of sinful desire and inclination. God had not forbidden the existence of the desire for the fruit as “good for food and pleasant to the eye," and had this continued to be the only desire in Eve in regard to the tree, she would have remained sinless as she was created. But God had forbidden the desire for the fruit as fitted "to make one wise" with the knowledge of good and evil. The instant the desire "to be as gods" arose in Eve's heart, she sinned. God's command, in its full form, was "you shall not lust after but abhor the knowledge of good and evil; you shall not choose but refuse it." The pro- hibition in the instance of the Eden statute, as in that of the tenth com-mandment, included both the inward desire and the outward act, both inclination and volition. If a man hates his brother, he violates the sixth commandment, even if he does not actually kill him (Matt. 5:22). So, too, if when Eve had desired the forbidden knowledge, she had been prevented from reaching out the hand and plucking the fruit, she would still have transgressed the Eden statute. Obedience to God required that she abhor and reject the knowledge proffered by Satan. But to lust after it was to prefer and love it. Even, therefore, if she had been forcibly stopped from completing, or as St. James (1:15) phrases it "finishing" the sin of desiring, by the outward act of eating, she would still have been guilty of disobeying God, for the divine command is to choose the good and refuse the evil (Deut. 30:19). The holiness of Immanuel, which is true holiness, is described as "refusing the evil and choosing the good" (Isa. 7:16). But whoever desires the evil that is prohibited "chooses" it and thereby refuses the good that is commanded. Had Eve continued to desire and love the true knowledge which she already had by her creation in the divine image, this desire and love would have been the rejection and abhorrence of the false knowledge offered in the temptation. But when she began to desire and love the false knowledge, this was the rejection and hatred of the true knowledge. And this was apostasy. Neutrality or indifference was impossible in the will of Eve or any will whatever. For her to incline to self was to disincline to God, to desire false knowledge was to dislike true knowledge, to choose the evil was to refuse the good, to love the creature was to hate the Creator. The rising of her evil desire, consequently, was the expulsion of her holy desire; the starting of her new sinful self-determination was the ousting of her existing holy self-determination. She could not have two contrary desires or inclinations simultaneously. Hence the universal command, "You shall not covet"; that is, "You shall not desire anything that God has forbidden"; because this is the same thing as to dislike and hate what God has commanded. (See supplement 4.5.4.)

This evil inclining and desiring is denominated “concupiscence” in the theological nomenclature. In the Augustinian and Calvinistic anthropology, it includes mental as well as sensual desire; in the Pelagian anthropology, it is confined to sensual appetite. Says Calvin (2.1.9):

> Man has not only been ensnared by the inferior appetites, but abominable impiety has seized the very citadel of his mind, and pride has penetrated into the inmost recesses of his heart; so that it is weak and foolish to restrict the corruption which has proceeded thence to what are called the sensual appetites. In this the grossest ignorance has been discovered by Peter Lombard, who when investigating the seat of it says it is in the flesh according to the testimony of Paul in Rom. 7:18, not indeed exclusively, but because it principally appears in the flesh; as though Paul designated only a part of the soul and not the whole of our nature which is opposed to supernatural grace. Now Paul removes every doubt by informing us that the corruption resides not in one part only, but that there is nothing pure and uncontaminated by its mortal infection. For, when arguing respecting corrupt nature, he not only condemns the inordinate motions of the appetites, but principally insists on the blindness of the mind and the depravity of the heart (Eph. 4:17-18).

Says Luther on Gal. 5:17: “When Paul says that the flesh lusts against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh, he admonishes us that we must feel the concupiscence of the flesh, that is to say, not only carnal lustbut also pride, wrath, slothfulness, impatience, unbelief, and such like” (see Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics, locus 15, for definitions from the elder Calvinists).

Concupiscence is different from natural created appetency or desire. Hunger and thirst are not evil concupiscence. They are instinctive, constitutional, and involuntary. Gluttony on the contrary is voluntary, not constitutional. It is not pure instinctive craving for food. There is will in it. It is the inclining and desire of the will for a more intense pleasure from eating food than the natural healthy appetite provides for. Inno-cent hunger makes use of the appointed food, and when satisfied it rests. If a man simply quiets his hunger with bread convenient for it, he does not have or exhibit concupiscence. But if he craves sensual pleasure from eating and gratifies the craving by tickling the palate, he has and exhibits concupiscence or evil desire.

Concupiscence is not natural and innocent appetite intensified. It is not a difference in degree, but in kind. A starving man is not concupiscent, though his desire for food is intense to the very highest degree. His famine-struck craving for food is not a gluttonous craving for sensual pleasure. It is purely physical. But gluttony is the mental in the physical. Gluttony is the will's selfish inclination manifested in a bodily appetite. It is the will in the senses.

These remarks apply to thirst and the sexual appetite. As created and constitutional, neither of these is evil concupiscence. But as mixed with will and moral inclination—the form in which they appear in drunkards who "shall not inherit the kingdom of God" and "whoremongers and adulterers whom God will judge"—they are sinful concupiscence."[15] Concupiscence is not confined to the sensuous nature. There is concupiscence or lust of the reason as well as of the sense. Pride and ambition is a lust of the mind: "We had our conversation in times past, in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires (thele'mata)"'[16] of the flesh and of the mind (ton dianoion)""[17] (Eph. 2:3). According to 2 Cor. 7:1 there is a "filthiness of the flesh and the spirit (pneumatos)."[18]

The external part of Adam's first sin was the act of eating the fruit of the tree of knowledge. After the sinful inclination had arisen, a sinful volition followed: "When the woman saw that the tree was to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof and did eat" (Gen. 3:6).

Imputation of Adamic Guilt

This first sin in both of its parts, internal and external, is imputed to Adam and his posterity as sin and guilt because they committed it. The evil desire and the evil act were the desiring and acting of the human nature in the first human pair. The biblical proof of this fundamental and much disputed position is found in the following: "Death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned" (Rom. 5:12); "through the offense of one (man) many be dead (apethanon)"[19] (5:15); "the judgment was by one (offense) unto condemnation" (5:16); "by one man's offense (or by one offense) death reigned by one" (5:17); "by the offense of one (Lach-mann and Tischendorf have 'one offense), judgment came upon all men to condemnation" (5:18); "by one man's disobedience many were made sinners" (5:19); "in Adam (to adamf[20] all die" (1 Cor. 15:22).

The very important discussion of St. Paul in Rom. 5:12-19 teaches (1) that the death which came upon all men as a punishment came because of one sin and only one and (2) that this sin was the one committed by Adam and his posterity as a unity. Three explanations have been given of hemarton"[21] in this passage: (1) It is active in its meaning and denotes the first sin of Adam and his posterity as a unity: his posterity being one with him by natural union or else by representation or by both together; (2) it is active in its meaning and denotes the first sin of each individual after he is born (in this case, hemarton[22] does not denote Adam's first sin); and (3) it is passive in its meaning, signifying, either "to be sinful" or "to be reckoned as having sinned" (Shedd on Rom. 5:12-19).

That hemarton"[23] is active in its signification is proved (a) by the fact that eph' ho pantes hemarton"[24] means the same as dia te's hamartias"[25] in the preceding context and hamartias[26] is active in signification; (b) by the invariable use of the word hemarton"[27] elsewhere (Matt. 27:4; Luke 15:18; John 9:2; Acts 25:8; Rom. 2:12; 3:23; 5:14, 16; 6:15; 1 Cor. 7:28; Eph. 4:26; 1 Tim. 5:20; 1 Pet. 2:20); (c) by the invariable signification of the substantive hamartia[28] (a verb has the same meaning as its noun); and (d) by the interchange of hamartia"[29] with paraptoma,[30]" which is active in meaning (Rom. 5:16-21). (See supplement 4.5.5.)

Turretin (9.9.16) denies that he'marton"[31] signifies "to be sinful": "The word hemarton cannot properly refer to the disposition of sin or to habitual or inhering corruption. Rather, it properly denotes some actual sin, and that past, which can be no other than the very sin of Adam. Indeed, it is one thing to be or to be born a sinner, but another thing actually to sin'"[32] (so also Witsius, Covenants 1.8.31). Edwards (Original Sin in Works 2.448) denies that he'marton"[33] signifies "to be regarded as sinners":

> There is no instance wherein the verb sin, which is used by the apostle when he says "all have sinned," is anywhere used in our author's [Taylor's] sense, for being brought into a state of suffering, and that not as a punishment for sin or as anything arising from > God's displeasure. St. Paul is far from using such a phrase to signify a being condemned without guilt or any imputation or supposition of guilt. Vastly more, still, is it remote from his language, so to use the verb sin and to say man "sins" or "has sinned," hereby meaning nothing more nor less than that he by a judicial act is condemned.

Unless, therefore, St. Paul departed from the invariable Scripture use of the word hemarton"[34] when he asserts that death as a just punishment, passed upon all men "because all sinned," he employs the word sinned actively. And if he does depart here from the invariable Scripture meaning of hemarton,"[35] he is the only inspired writer that does so; and this is the only instance in his own writings in which he does so—his use of the verb hamartanein[36] in scores of other instances being the ordinary use.

But while he'marton"[37] in Rom. 5:12 is active in signification, it does not denote the transgressions of each individual subsequent to birth, and when no longer in Adam, but the transgression of Adam and Eve inclusive of their posterity. This is proved by the following considerations: One and but one sin is specified as the ground of the penalty of death. This is asserted five times over in succession in 5:15-19. In 5:12 hemarton"[38] unquestionably refers to the same sin that is spoken of in 5:15-19.

In Rom. 5:14 some who die, namely, infants, "did not sin after the similitude of Adam's first transgression." That is, they did not repeat the first sin. They must, therefore, have sinned in some other manner because they are a part of the "all" (pantesY"[39] who sinned and because they experience the death which is the wages of sin. The only other conceivable manner of sinning is that of participation in the first sin itself. But participation in Adam's first sin is not the repetition of it by the individual.

From these considerations, it is evident that the word sinned in Rom. 5:12 is active in its signification; but the action is specific, not individual—the action of the common nature in Adam prior to any conception and birth and not the action of the individuals one by one after conception and birth.

The passive signification given to he'marton"[40] is twofold: (a) to be sinful (Calvin) and (b) to be reckoned as having sinned (Chrysostom). The first has never had much currency. The last has been extensively adopted by Semipelagian and Arminian theologians and also by many later Calvinists. The objections to this explanation are the following:

1. It is contrary to invariable usage. This would be the only instance in the New Testament in which the verb hamartand"[41] would have such a meaning.
2. Had St. Paul intended to bring in the notion of regarding or treating as sinners, this would require the combination of hamar-tanein"[42] with einai,"[43] and he would have used the compound form pontes he'marte'kotes he'san"[44] as does the Septuagint in Gen. 43:9; 44:32 (he 'marte'kos esomai)[45] 1 Kings 1:21 (esomaiego kai Salomon hamartoloi).[46]
3. The passive signification excludes Adam and Eve from the pantes"[47] who sinned. They, certainly, were not "reckoned" to have sinned.
4. According to the passive signification, hemarton"[48] would denote God's action, not man's; God's act of imputing sin, not man's act of committing it. But it is the sinner's act, not that of the judge, which is the reason for punishment.
5. It destroys the logic. All die because all are reckoned to deserve death. This is one reason for death, but not the particular one required here. The argument demands a reason founded upon the act of the criminal, not of the judge. To say that all die because all are condemned to die is to give no sufficient reason for death. For the question immediately arises why they are condemned to die.
6. It tends to empty thanatos"[49] of its plenary' biblical meaning as including hell punishment. A qualified meaning is given to it in order to make it agree with the qualified meaning given to hemarton^[50] The withdrawment of grace is said by some later Calvinists to be the only penalty inflicted upon original sin, the positive pains of hell being due only to actual transgression. Historically, this passive signification was forced upon hamartand"[51] by those (Chrysostom and the Greek fathers) who asserted that the first sin was not imputed as culpable. Arminian writers like Whitby and John Taylor follow Chrysostom.

The total guilt of the first sin, thus committed by the entire race in Adam, is imputed to each individual of the race because of the indivisibility of guilt. If two individual men together commit a murder, each is chargeable with the whole guilt of the act. One-half of the guilt of the murder cannot be imputed to one and one-half to the other. Supposing that the one human nature which committed the “one offense” (Rom. 5:17-18) became a family of exactly a million individuals by propagation, it would not follow that each individual would be responsible for only a millionth part of the offense. The whole undivided guilt of the first sin of apostasy from God would be chargeable upon each and every one of the million individuals of the species alike. For though the one common nature that committed the “one offense” is divisible by prop-agation, the offense itself is not divisible nor is the guilt of it. Consequently, one man is as guilty as another of the whole first sin, of the original act of falling from God. The individual Adam and Eve were no more guilty of this first act and of the whole of it than their descendants are; and their descendants are as guilty as they.

The same principle applies also to the indivisibility of merit. The merit of Christ’s obedience is indivisible, and the whole of it is imputed to every individual believer alike. A million believers do not each obtain by imputation a millionth part of their Redeemer’s merit. One believer is as completely justified by gratuitous imputation as another, because all alike receive by faith the total worthiness and desert of their Lord’s obedience, not a fractional part of it. As the unmerited imputation of Christ’s obedience conveys the total undivided merit of this obedience to each and every believer, so the merited imputation of Adam’s dis-obedience conveys the total undivided guilt of this disobedience to each and every individual of the posterity.

The first sin of Adam, being a common, not an individual sin, is deservedly and justly imputed to the posterity of Adam upon the same principle upon which all sin is deservedly and justly imputed, namely, that it was committed by those to whom it is imputed. “All men die, because all men sinned,” says St. Paul. Free agency is supposed as the reason for the penalty of death, namely, the free agency of all mankind in Adam. This agency, though differing in the manner, is yet as real as the subsequent free agency of each individual.

The imputation either of Adam’s sin or of Christ’s righteousness must rest upon a union of some kind. It is just to impute the first sin of Adam to his posterity, while it would be unjust to impute it to the fallen angels because Adam and his posterity were a unity when the first sin was committed, but Adam and the fallen angels were not: “It hardly would have been just for the crime of one angel to be imputed to another, or the sin of one man to be accounted to another, on the supposition that they were each created separately just as angels. But there is a unity of nature, on which the covenantal unity was supported”[52] (Leydecker, “Synopsis,” 164 in Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics, locus 15). The fact that the fallen angels have committed individual transgressions of their own would not justify imputing a common race-transgression to them. Again, it is just to impute Christ’s righteousness to a believer, but not just to impute it to an unbeliever, because the former has been united to him by faith and the latter has not.

The popular explanation of the imputation of Adam’s sin—that under divine government children inherit the poverty and disease of their vicious parents—is inadequate. Divine government does not punish the children of vicious parents for their inherited poverty and disease. If Adam’s posterity merely inherited moral corruption, but were not punished for it, this explanation would be pertinent. But inherited corruption is visited with divine retribution according to Eph. 2:3. And this requires participation in the origin of it. Men must sin in Adam in order to be justly punished for Adam’s sin. And participation requires union with Adam.

There is a similar fallacy in citing the biblical instances in which innocent individuals suffer for the sins of guilty individuals in proof that Adam’s posterity though innocent of his sin are punishable for it. To suffer in consequence of the sin of another is not the same as to be punished for it. The sufferings that came upon the descendants of Ham because of his individual sin were not retributive, like those which come upon the whole human race because of the one specific sin of Adam or like those which come upon an individual for his own transgressions. Ham’s descendants have suffered for centuries on account of their ancestor’s sin, but have not been under eternal condemnation on account of it. They are exposed to eternal death in common with the rest of mankind because of the sin in Adam and of their own individual sins, but not because of the individual sin of Ham. The same is true of the sin of Korah in relation to his family. In reference to all individual transgressions, Ezek. 18:20 asserts that “the son shall not bear the iniquity of his father”; that is, he shall not be punished for it, though he may suffer for it. Suffering and affliction are sovereign acts of God and may or may not be connected with the individual sin of a secondary ancestor, according to his good pleasure; but punishment is a judicial act that is necessary and necessarily connected with the specific sin of the first ancestor and the individual sins of the person himself. (See supplement 4.5.6.)

The imputation of Adam's sin rests upon a different kind of union from that upon which the imputation of Christ's righteousness rests. The former is founded upon natural union: a union of constitutional nature and substance. The possibility of an existence, a probation, and a free fall in Adam has been considered under the head of traducian-ism. The entire human species as an invisible but substantial nature acts in and with the first human pair. Traducianism is true only in anthropology and with reference to apostasy. It has no application at all to soteriology and redemption. There is no race-unity in redemption. All men were in Adam when he disobeyed; but all men were not in Christ when he obeyed. All men are propagated from Adam and inherit his sin. No man is propagated from Christ or inherits his righteousness. Apostasy starts with the race. Redemption starts with the individual. All men fall. Some men are redeemed. Union in Adam is substantial and physical, in Christ is spiritual and mystical (Westminster Larger Catechism 66); in Adam is natural, in Christ is representative; in Adam is by creation, in Christ is by regeneration; in Adam is with man as a species, in Christ is with man as an individual; in Adam is universal, in Christ is particular and by election (Shedd on Rom. 5:19).

The theory of Schleiermacher, Rothe (Steinmeyer, History of Christ's Passion, 15), and Nevin as criticized by Hodge supposes that Christ united himself with the entire human nature. This is an error. In the incarnation, the Logos assumed into union with himself only a fractional part of human nature, namely, that flesh and blood which was derived from the virgin. There was no union in the incarnation with the human race as a whole. This would have required the Logos to have united with the human nature as it was in Adam, prior to any division and individualization of it. Furthermore, in regeneration, Christ is united with only a particular individual who has been elected and separated (Gal. 1:15) from all other individuals.

The principal objection to the tenet of the participation of the posterity in the first sin is that the individual has no self-conscious recollection of such an event and that he cannot be held responsible for an act of which he is not self-conscious and cannot remember.

The reply to this is that upon any theory, no individual man is self-conscious of and remembers the first act of sin. Neither Pelagianism nor Semipelagianism, neither Socinianism nor Arminianism, has any advantage in this respect over Augustinianism and Calvinism. Neither does creationism have any advantage over traducianism. Upon any theory that recognizes the fact of sin in man, the first act of sin is not observed by self-consciousness at the time of its occurrence. No man remembers the time when he was innocent and the particular first act by which he became guilty before God.

Guilt is caused by self-determination, not by self-consciousness. Self-consciousness is not action, but vision; and it is action, not the sight of an action that constitutes crime. A man is wrongly inclining all the time to self and the creature, but he is not self-conscious all the time that he is wrongly inclining. If it be said that he might become self-conscious that he is so inclining, this does not prove that such a self-consciousness is necessary in order to responsibility for the wrong inclining. Even if he does not become self-conscious of his wrong inclining (as he may not for days and weeks), this does not destroy the fact that he is so inclining. It is the inclining, not the self-consciousness of inclining, which constitutes the free action of his will; and it is this free action which constitutes the sin and guilt. This is true also of the momentary volition, as well as of the abiding inclination. If a man commits a murder, it is not necessary that at the time when he stabs his victim he should have that clear apprehension of the enormity of the act which he subsequently has in order to be chargeable with murder. Sins of thoughtlessness are as truly sinful as deliberate sins (Lev. 5:17-18; Luke 12:48). Men generally are not self-conscious of the “secret sins” (Ps. 19:12; 90:8) of feeling and desire which they are committing inwardly all the time. The purpose of preaching the law is to produce the self-consciousness of sin. The “darkness” in which, according to St. Paul (Eph. 4:18), men “walk” is the thoughtless unconsciousness in which they live and act. It is a proverb that man sins more the less that God and sin are in his thoughts. The clearness of the self-consciousness is not the measure of the intensity of the self-determination. The two may be in inverse proportion. The will may be vehemently resolute and determined to a particular end, and yet the understanding be very blind to the will’s activity. It is frequently the case that great strength and energy in voluntariness are accompanied with great obtuseness and stupidity in moral perception. The most wicked and devilish men are oftentimes the most apathetic and hardened of men. The will is awake and full of force, but the conscience is asleep. When the sinner is convicted by the truth and Spirit of God, he does not excuse or extenuate his guilt on the ground of his past unconsciousness in sin. Even the heathen, when convinced of the abominations of idolatry and of selfish lust in its varied forms, do not plead "the ignorance that was in them because of the blindness of their hearts" in excuse for having "given themselves over to work all uncleanness with greediness" (Eph. 4:17).

It is on this ground that Samuel Hopkins contends that infants are moral agents:

> Many have supposed that none of mankind are capable of sin or moral agency before they can distinguish between right and wrong. But this wants proof which has never yet been produced. And it appears to be contrary to divine revelation. Persons may be moral agents and sin without knowing what the law of God is or of what nature their exercises are and while they have no consciousness. (Works 1.233)

Hamilton (ed. Bowen, 13-14) contends that there are agencies of the soul deeper than self-consciousness. Pascal, in the fourth of his Provincial Letters, shows the consequences of the position of the Jesuit that "nothing is voluntary but what is accompanied with deliberation and clear consciousness of the nature of the act."[53]

There was, comparatively, more self-consciousness attending the first sin for the posterity, if it was committed by them in Adam, than can be found upon any other theory. The first sin of every man must have been committed either (a) in Adam, (b) in the womb, or (c) in infancy. We cannot conceive of any relation to or connection with self-consciousness in the last two cases. We can in the first, for the individuals Adam and Eve were self-conscious. So far as they were concerned, the first sin was a very deliberate and intensely willful act. The human species existing in them at that time acted in their act and sinned in their sin, similarly as the hand or eye acts and sins in the murderous or lustful act of the individual soul. The hand or the eye has no separate self-consciousness of its own, parallel with the soul's self-consciousness. Taken by itself, it has no consciousness at all. But its union and oneness with the self-conscious soul in the personal union of soul and body affords all the self-consciousness that is possible in the case. The hand is co-agent with the soul and hence is particeps criminis[54] and has a common guilt with the soul.

In like manner, the psychico-physical human nature existing in Adam and Eve had no separate self-consciousness parallel with that of Adam and Eve. Unlike the visible hand or eye, it was an invisible substance or nature capable of being transformed into myriads of self-conscious individuals; but while in Adam and not yet distributed and individualized, it had no distinct self-consciousness of its own, any more than the hand or eye in the supposed case. But existing, and acting in and with these self-conscious individuals, it participated in their self-determination and is chargeable with their sin, as the hand, and eye, and whole body is chargeable with the sin of the individual man. As in the instance of the individual unity, everything that constitutes it, body as well as soul, is active and responsible for all that is done by this unity, so in the instance of the specific unity: everything that constitutes it, namely, Adam and the human nature in him, is active and responsible for all that is done by this unity.

Original Sin as a Corruption of Nature

The second part of "the sinfulness of that estate whereinto man fell" consists in "the want of original righteousness and the corruption of the whole nature." This part of human sinfulness stands to the first in the relation of effect to cause. Human nature in Adam and Eve inclined from holiness to sin, and as a consequence that nature became destitute of its original righteousness and morally corrupt.

It is easy to see how this negative destitution of righteousness and positive inclination to evil, with all the moral corruption attending it, should be imputed as guilt, provided it be conceded that the first sin is really committed and righteously imputed. If it is just to impute the cause, it is certainly just to impute the effect. But, on the contrary, it is impossible to see why the corruption of nature should be imputed as sin if the first sin is not. It is improper to impute the effect when the cause cannot be imputed.[55]

It is here that the illogical character of the theory of mediate imputation is apparent. This was first advanced by Placaeus in 1640. To relieve, as he supposed, the Calvinistic doctrine of original sin of some of its difficulties, he maintained that the corruption of nature which is inherited from Adam is chargeable upon each individual as sin and guilt, but the act of transgressing the probationary statute given in Eden is not chargeable. This is to be imputed only to Adam and Eve as individuals. A man is guilty and punishable for his evil heart, but not for Adam's first sin. His own personal corruption is imputable, because it is personal; but the act of another person is not imputable, because it is another's act. Placaeus would impute Adam's sin as a state, but not as an act; the "corruption of nature," but not the "guilt of the first sin" in the Westminster formula.

This theory made a greater difficulty than it relieved. The corruption of nature, according to Placaeus himself, is the effect of Adam's first sin. Why should the effect be imputed and not the cause? Such a kind of imputation looked unreasonable and, as the Helvetic Consen sus Formula says, "imperiled the whole doctrine of original sin." It would be difficult to retain the imputation of the corruption of nature by this method; and both the first sin and corruption would cease to be imputed.

The Synod of Charenton in 1644 condemned the view of Placaeus and also charged him with denying the imputation of Adam's sin. He objected to this, saying that he did not deny the imputation of Adam's sin altogether, but only when stated in a certain manner:

> For in these words [in the decree of the synod] either the view expounded was not Placaeus's or it was badly stated. For he never simply denied the imputation ol Adam's first sin and never wished to deny it. Since he would affirm a certain kind of imputation of the first sin and deny another kind, his view is not represented if he is said to deny—simply and without offering any distinction—the imputation of Adam's first sin.[56] (Placaeus, Concerning Imputation 1.3)

> The criticism of Turretin (9.9.5) upon this is as follows:

> To break the force of the statement of the Synod of Charenton, Placaeus distinguished between immediate or antecedent imputation and between mediate or consequent imputation. The former he calls > that imputation [of Adam's sin] by which the first act of Adam was imputed immediately to all his posterity, Christ only excepted, and antecedently to any inherent corruption. The latter, he calls that imputation [of Adam's sin] which follows upon seeing in the posterity that hereditary corruption derived to them from Adam and which is brought about by it [hereditary corruption] as the means or medium [of the imputation].

The first "immediate" imputation Placaeus rejects, the second "mediate" imputation he accepts; and upon this ground contends that he does not reject the imputation of Adam's sin absolutely and without qualification. But, as Turretin proceeds to say:

> This distinction does in fact do away with the imputation of Adam's [first] sin altogether. For if the sin of Adam is imputed to us only in this mediate manner, according to which we are constituted guilty before God and made liable to penalty, on account of a hereditary corruption which we derive from Adam, there is no real and proper imputation of Adam's [first] sin, but only of inherent corruption. This the synod intended to prevent and proscribe by distinguishing original sin into two parts, namely, inherent corruption and imputation proper [i.e., the imputation of the first sin itself]—a thing that could not be done, if imputation cannot be except upon the ground of a foregoing corruption of nature. For it is one thing to be exposed to the wrath of God on account of inherent and hereditary corruption and quite another thing to be exposed to this wrath on account of Adam's first act of sin.

The phrase original sin in Westminster Shorter Catechism Q. 18 comprises both the first sin and the corruption of nature: Adam's sin both as an act and a resulting state of the will. Edwards (Original Sin, introduction) remarks that original sin "is vulgarly understood in that lati-tude as to include not only the depravity of nature, but the imputation of Adam's first sin." The whole truth of the doctrine of original sin includes the imputation of both the first sin and the ensuing corruption. The first sin of Adam and his posterity is immediately imputed to them as sin, antecedently, in the order of nature, to inherent corruption, because it was their voluntary act. And then the resulting inherent corruption is imputed as sin; not, however, as in Placaeus's theory, through itself as the medium of the imputation, but through the medium of the first sin, because this was the cause of it. Both the cause and the effect, both the first sin and the corruption caused by it, are imputed to Adam and his posterity.

The phrase original sin is sometimes employed to denote only the corruption of nature in distinction from the sins of act that proceed from it. In this use of the term, original sin is equivalent to the scriptural phrases "evil treasure of the heart" (Mark 12:35), "corrupt tree" (12:33), "heart from which proceed evil thoughts" (7:21), "stony heart" (Ezek. 11:19), "carnal mind" (Rom. 8:7), "flesh" (8:4), among others.

It is also equivalent to the theological phrases corrupt nature, sinful inclination, evil disposition, and apostate will. When the term nature is applied to sin, it does not denote nature in the primary but the secondary sense. In the primary sense, nature denotes a substance and one that is created by God. In this sense, Augustine denies that sin is nature and asserts that it is intentio (Shedd, History of Doctrine 2.82; Theological Essays, 220). Howe (Oracles 2.24) remarks that "that evil heart, that nature, not as it is nature but as it is depraved nature, is now transmitted." When "nature" signifies created substance, it is improper to call sin a nature. Aristotle (Politics 1.2) says: "What every being is in its perfect state, that certainly is the nature of that being, whether it be a man, a horse, or a house." Sin is imperfection and therefore not "nature" in this sense. But there is a secondary meaning of the word. In this use of it, "nature" denotes "natural inclination" or "innate disposition." In this sense, sin is a "nature," and the adjective natural is applicable to the corruption of sin. In the same sense, holiness is called a "nature" in 2 Pet. 1:4. Believers are "partakers of a divine nature" by being regenerated and coming to possess a holy disposition or inclination: "It is true that sin is a nature, but then it is a second nature, a state of degeneration" (Nitzsch, Christian Doctrine §107). Calvin (on Eph. 2:3) says: "Since Godis the author of nature, how comes it that no blame attaches to God if we are lost by nature? I answer, there is a twofold nature: The one produced by God and the other is corruption of it. We are not born such as Adam was at first created" (see Formula of Concord 1.12; Calvin 2.2.12).

Viewed as natural corruption, original sin may be considered with respect to the understanding. It is blindness: “a light to open blind eyes” (Isa. 42:7); “recovering of sight to the blind” (Luke 4:18); “know not that you are blind” (Rev. 3:17); “the god of this world has blinded their minds” (2 Cor. 4:4). Many texts speak of regeneration as “enlightening” (2 Cor. 4:6; Eph. 5:14; 1 Thess. 5:5; Ps. 97:11). And many texts call sin “darkness” (Prov. 4:19; Isa. 60:2; Eph. 5:11; Col. 1:13; 1 John 2:11; 1 Thess. 5:4; Eph. 4:18 [“having the understanding (dianoia)”[57] darkened”]; Rom. 1:28 [“reprobate mind (noun)]”).[58]

Sin blinds and darkens the understanding by destroying the consciousness of divine things. For example, the soul destitute of love to God is no longer conscious of love, of reverence is no longer conscious of reverence, etc. Its knowledge of such affections, therefore, is from hearsay, like that which a blind man has of colors or a deaf man of sound. God, the object of these affections, is of course unknown for the same reason. The spiritual discernment spoken of in 1 Cor. 2:6 is the immediate consciousness of a renewed man. It is experimental knowledge. Sin is described in Scripture as voluntary ignorance: “This they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old” (2 Pet. 3:5). Christ says to the Jews: “If I had not come and spoken unto them they had not had sin”—the sin of “not knowing him that sent me” (John 15:21-22). But the ignorance in this case was a willing ignorance. They desired to be ignorant.

Another effect of original sin upon the understanding as including the conscience is insensibility. It does not render conscience extinct, but it stupefies it: “having cauterized their own conscience” (1 Tim. 4:2). A third effect is pollution: “even their reason (nous[[59] and conscience (syneidesis)”[60] are polluted” or stained (memiantai)”[61] (Titus 1:15); “they became vain in their reasonings” or speculations (dialogismous)”[62] (Rom. 1:21). The pollution of reason is seen in the foolish speculations of mythology. The myths of polytheism are not pure reason. The pollution of conscience is seen in remorse. The testifying faculty is spotted with guilt. It is no longer a “good conscience” (Heb. 13:18 [kale’n syneidesin\,[63] 1 Pet. 3:16, 21; 1 Tim. 1:5, 19; Acts 23:1 [syneidesin agathen])”[64] or a “pure conscience” (1 Tim. 3:9: syneide’sis kathara).”‘[65] It is an “evil conscience” (ponera syneidesis)-![66] a conscience needing cleansing by atoning blood

“from dead works” (Heb. 9:14). Dead works, being no fulfillment of the law, leave the conscience perturbed and unpacified.

Considered with respect to the will, original sin is (a) enmity (Rom. 8:6; James 4:4 [“the friendship of the world is enmity toward God”]; Deut. 1:26 [“they rebelled against God”]; Job 34:37; Isa. 1:1; 30:9; 45:2; Ezek. 12:2); (b) hatred (Rom. 1:29; Ps. 89:23; 139:21; Exod. 20:5; Prov. 1:25; 5:12; John 7:7; 15:18, 23-24); (c) hardness of heart or insensibility (Exod. 7:14,22; 2 Kings 17:14; Job 9:4; Isa. 63:17; Dan. 5:20; John 12:20; Acts 19:9; Heb. 3:8, 15; 4:7); (d) aversion (John 5:40 [“you will not (ou thelete),”“[67] you are disinclined]; Rev. 2:21); (e) obstinacy (Deut. 31:27 [“stiff-necked”]; Exod. 32:9; Ps. 75:5; Isa. 26:10; 43:4; Acts 7:51; Rom. 10:21); (f) bondage (Jer. 13:23; Mark 3:23; John 6:43^4; 8:34; Rom. 5:6; 6:20; 7:9, 14, 18, 23; 8:7-8; 9:16; 2 Pet. 2:14).

Corruption of Nature as Guilt

Original sin, considered as corruption of nature, is sin in the sense of guilt: “They [the Lutherans] condemn the Pelagians and others who deny that the flaw (vitium) of our origin is sin”[68] (Augsburg Confession 2); “every sin, both original and actual, being a transgression of the righteous law of God does in its own nature bring guilt upon the sinner, whereby he is bound over to the wrath of God and made subject to death, temporal and eternal” (Westminster Confession 6.6); “corruption of nature does remain in those that are regenerated, and although it be through Christ pardoned and mortified, yet both itself and all the motions thereof are truly and properly sin” (Westminster Confession 6.5). Semipelagian, papal, and Arminian anthropologies differ from the Augustinian and Reformed by denying that corruption of nature is guilt. It is a physical and mental disorder leading to sin, but is not sin itself.”[69]

Corruption of nature is guilt because . . .

1. The Scriptures do not distinguish between sin proper and improper. Hamartia[70] as denoting the principle of sin is exchanged with paraptdma"[71] denoting the act of sin and vice versa (Rom. 5:13, 15-17, 19, 21).

2. Hamartia[72] is the equivalent of epithymid"[73] and sarxC[74] "I had not known sin, except the law had said, You shall not lust" (7:7; cf. 8:3, 5).
3. The remainders of corruption in the regenerate are hated as sin by the regenerate himself (7:15) and by God, who slays them by his Spirit (8:13).
4. Evil desire is forbidden in the tenth commandment (Exod. 20:17; cf. 1 John 2:16). The tenth commandment, which the Septuagint renders ouk epithymeseis[75] prohibits that internal lusting which is the chief characteristic of the corrupt nature. It is also forbidden by Christ in his exposition of the seventh commandment (Matt. 5:28): "Whosoever hates his brother is a murderer" (1 John 3:15).
5. Corruption of nature is guilt because it is the inclination of the will. It is "voluntary" though not "volitionary." It is conceded that the inclination to murder is as truly culpable as the act of murder: "The thought (zimnUiy[76] of foolishness is sin" (Prov. 24:9).
6. Corruption of nature is guilt, upon the principle that the cause must have the same predicates as its effects. If actual transgressions are truly and properly sin, then the evil heart or inclination which prompts them must be so likewise. If the stream is bitter water, the fountain must be also. If the murderer's act is guilt, then the murderer's hate is.
7. If corruption of nature or sinful disposition is not guilt, then it is an extenuation and excuse for actual transgressions. These latter are less blameworthy, if the character which prompts them and renders their avoidance more difficult is not self-determined and culpable.
8. If corruption of nature is not culpable, it is impossible to assign a reason why the dying infant needs redemption by atoning blood. Christ came "by water and blood," that is, with both expiating and sanctifying power (1 John 5:6). But if there be no guilt in natural depravity, Christ comes to the infant "by water only" and not "by blood," by sanctification and not by justification. Infant redemption implies that the infant has guilt as well as pollution.

The infant has a rational soul; this soul has a will; this will is inclined; this inclination, like that of an adult, is centered on the creature instead of the Creator. This is culpable and needs pardon. It is also pollution and needs removal.

9. God forgives original sin as well as actual transgression when he bestows the "remission of sins." The "carnal mind" or the enmity of the heart is as great an offense against his excellence and honor as any particular act that issues from it. Indeed, if there be mutual goodwill between two parties, an occasional outward offense is less serious.

Says Thirlwall (Letters, 46):

> Suppose two friends really loving one another, but liable now and then to quarrel. They may easily forgive the occasional offense, because their habitual disposition is one of mutual goodwill; but should the case be the reverse—hatred stifled, but occasionally venting itself by unfriendly acts—how little would it matter though they should forget the particular offense, if the enmity should continue at the bottom of the heart.

This illustrates the guilt of sin as a state of the heart toward God, and the need of its forgiveness and removal. (See supplement 4.5.7.)

With the Scriptures, the theologians assert that corruption of nature is sin:

> We must not only abstain from evil deeds, but even from the desire to do them. Christ commanded not only to abstain from things forbidden by the law, but even from longing after them. Our Lord forbade concupiscence itself, as well as the act of adultery. (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 4.13)

> The command not to lust condemns the beginnings of sin, that is, unruly desires and wishes, no less than overt acts. (Tertullian, Concerning Modesty) [Augustine defines sin to be] something coveted, said, or done contrary to God's law.[77] (Turretin 9.1.3)

[Augustine] sometimes denominates concupiscence infirmity, teaching that it becomes sin in cases where action or consent is added to the conception of the mind; but sometimes he denominates it sin; as when he says, “Paul gives the appellation of sin to this from which all sins proceed, that is, to carnal concupiscence.” (Calvin 3.3.10)

If lust which wars against the soul (1 Pet. 2:11) be already sin (Exod. 20:17; Matt. 5:28), then must the act of sin be regarded as augmenting its degree. (Nitzsch, Christian Doctrine §111)

By the precept concerning the tree of knowledge, man was taught that God is Lord of all things and that it is unlawful even to desire, but with his leave. Man’s true happiness is placed in God alone, and nothing is to be desired but with submission to him. (Witsius, Covenants 1.3.21)

The irregular pleasure proceeding from the sensualized mind, inasmuch as it is corrupt, is sin; because it ought to have been subject to reason and moves in an undue manner contrary to reason. (Hales, quoted by Dav-enant, Justification 2.214)

To root out the pernicious error of self-righteousness, our Lord gives the spiritual intention of the law and declares that the law had regard to the regulation of the heart with all its first motions and actings. For he asserts that the first motions of concupiscence, though not consented to, much less actually accomplished, are directly forbidden in the law. This he does in his exposition of the seventh commandment. He also declares the penalty of the law upon the least sin to be hellfire, in his assertion of causeless anger to be forbidden in the sixth commandment. (Owen, Justification, 17)

Have we felt any evil desire in our heart? we are already guilty of concupiscence and are become at once transgressors of the law; because the Lord forbids us not only to plan and attempt anything that would prove detrimental to another, but even to be stimulated and agitated with concupiscence. The curse of God always rests on the transgression of the law. We have no reason, therefore, to exempt even the most trivial emotions of concupiscence from the sentence of death. (Calvin 2.8.58)

The law says, “Do not lust.” And so, even if you do not give assent to the lust which inflames you, this very impulse of your flesh is sin nevertheless.[78]” (Bullinger)

Original Sin as Voluntary Inclination

The position that original sin is voluntary inclination has been maintained in anthropology from the beginning of speculation upon the subject. Augustine argues as follows with Julian: "Says Julian, 'If sin is from will, then it is an evil will that produces sin; but if from nature, then an evil nature produces sin.' I quickly reply that sin is from will. Then he asks 'whether original sin is also from will.' I answer, certainly, original sin also, because this was transmitted from the will of the first man" (Concerning Marriages 2.28.2). Turretin defines sin as "an inclination, action, or omission opposing God's law"[79] (9.1.3). Ursinus, speaking of corruption of nature in infants, says that "infants want not the faculty of will, and though in act they do not will sin, yet they will it by inclination"[80] (Christian Religion, Original Sin Q. 7). Rivetus asserts that "concupiscence is a voluntary inclination"" (Explication of the Decalogue, v. 15). William of Auxerre, quoted by Davenant (Justification 2.214), asserts that "the movement of wrong desire in man is a voluntary act, and it is sin, even when it moves before the reason has had time to exercise its judgment." Says Charnock (Holiness of God, 476), "There is no sin but is in some soil voluntary; voluntary in the root or voluntary in the branch; voluntary by an immediate act of the will [volition] or voluntary by a general or natural inclination of the will [self-determination]. That is not a crime, to which a man is violenced without any concurrence of the faculties of the soul to that act." Says Owen (Vindication of the Gospel, 6): "Original sin, as peccatum originans,"[81] was voluntary in Adam; and as it is originatum[82] in us is in our wills habitually [as a habitus] and not against them, in any actings of it or them. The effects of it, in the coining of sin and in the thoughts of men's hearts, are all voluntary" (cf. Indwelling Sin 6.12). Says Howe (Oracles 2.24):

> We must understand that an evil inclination or a depraved nature is that which does first violate the law of God; and so that it is not infelicity only to be ill inclined, but it is sin: sin in the highest and > most eminent sense thereof. It is the habitual frame and bent of the soul which the law of God does in the first place direct. So that the empoisoned nature of man, the malignity of the heart and soul, is that which makes the first and principal breach upon the law of God.

It must be remembered that sin in its entire history is inclination and self-determination. While it is true that the first sin of Adam is the fall of the human race and decides its eternal destiny apart from redemption, yet it must not be supposed that after the first act of Adam, all self-determination ceases. Original sin as corruption of nature in each individual is only the continuation of the first inclining away from God. The self-determination of the human will from God to the creature, as an ultimate end, did not stop short with the act in Eden, but goes right onward in every individual of Adam's posterity, until regeneration reverses it. As progressive sanctification is the continuation of that holy self-determination of the human will which begins in its regeneration by the Holy Spirit, so the progressive depravation of the natural man is the continuation of that sinful self-determination of the human will which began in Adam's transgression.

In connection with the doctrine that the corruption of nature is the same as the free inclination of the will, a position of Edwards is sometimes misunderstood and misapplied. Edwards (Will 4.1) asserts that "the virtuousness or viciousness of a disposition consists not in the origin or cause of it, but in the nature of it." This position cannot be under- stood without taking into view the error which Edwards was combating. He was opposing the view of Arminian writers Taylor, Whitby, and others that a disposition or inclination cannot be chargeable as guilt unless it has been originated by a volitionary act preceding it. Their doctrine of the will implied that inclination can be produced by volition, and must be in order to responsibility for the inclination. This Edwards denies: "It is agreeable to the natural notions of mankind that moral evil, with its desert of dislike and abhorrence, and all its other ill deserv-ings, consists in a certain deformity in the nature of certain dispositions of the heart and acts of the will and not in the deformity of something else, diverse from the very thing itself which deserves abhorrence, supposed to be the cause of it." That is to say, the disposition of the heart or inclination of the will is in its own quality and nature an evil disposition and does not get its evil quality from "something else"—namely, a volition that went before it and caused it. If a man is inclined or disposed to sin, this inclination or disposition is itself sin. It is not necessary that he should, previously to the inclining, resolve to incline or choose to incline in order that the inclination should be sinful. The inclining itself is sin and guilt:

> Thus, for instance, ingratitude is hateful and worthy of dispraise, according to common sense, not because something as bad or worse than ingratitude was the cause that produced it; but because it is hateful in itself by its own inherent deformity. So the love of virtue is amiable and worthy of praise, not merely because something else went before this love of virtue in our minds which caused it to take place there (for instance our own choice [volition]—we chose to love virtue and by some method or other wrought ourselves into the love of it), but because of the amiableness and condecency of such a disposition and inclination of the heart.

In other words, Edwards here teaches that a man does not choose to incline, but he inclines; he does not choose to love, but he loves. The first thing in the order is not a volition and then after this a disposition or inclination; but the first thing is a disposition or inclination and then a volition.

Now it is only with reference to the relation of a volition to a disposition or inclination that Edwards lays down the position that “the vir-tuousness or viciousness of a disposition lies not in the origin of it, but in the nature of it.” He does not carry the position any further than this. When the volition is left out of the account and only the disposition or inclination is considered, Edwards teaches that this must have a free origin or else it is not sin. The whole purpose of his celebrated argument to prove that Adam and his posterity were one agent in the origin of sin is to show how the sinful disposition is the working of spontaneity or unforced inclination. When it comes to that act of will by which man inclines to sin, Edwards affirms that man is the self-moved and guilty actor and author of it. In his treatise on the will (4.1), he remarks as follows:

> If any shall still object and say: Why is it not necessary that the cause should be considered in order to determine whether anything > be worthy of blame or praise? Is it agreeable to reason and common sense that a man is to be praised or blamed for that which he is not the cause or author of and has no hand in? I answer, such phrases as "being the cause," "being the author," "having a hand in," and the like are ambiguous. They are most vulgarly understood for being the designing voluntary [volitionary] cause or cause by antecedent choice: and it is most certain that men are not in this sense the causes or authors of the first act of their wills [i.e., of their inclination or disposition], in any case; as certain as anything is or ever can be; for nothing can be more certain than that a thing is not before it is nor a thing of the same kind before the first thing of that kind; and so no choice before the first choice. As, however, the phrase being the author may be understood, not of being the producer by an antecedent act of will [i.e., a volition], but as a person may be said to be the author of the act of the will itself by his being the immediate agent or the being that is acting or in the exercise of that act; if the phrase being the author is used to signify this, then doubtless common sense requires men's being the authors of their own acts of will in order to their being esteemed worthv of praise or dispraise on account of them. And common sense teaches that they must be the authors of external actions in the former sense, namely, their being the causes of them by an act of will or choice [volition], in order to their being justly blamed or praised; but it teaches no such thing in respect to the internal acts of will themselves.'[83]

In this last remark, Edwards concedes that a volition precedes an outward act and is the cause of it. The Arminian position in respect to volitionary action is true up to this point. An external act is not sinful or holy unless preceded by a volition. But with reference to that internal action of the will which is denominated its inclination or disposition, he holds that the Arminian position is not true. There is no need of a volition to precede this in order to make it sinful or holy; but it is so in its own nature, because it is the spontaneity of the man, because it is the action of "the immediate agent or the being that is acting or in the exercise of the act.'""[84]

When the question "is man the responsible author of his sinful inclination not by an antecedent volition to incline but by a present actual inclining?" is asked, Edwards answers in the affirmative:

> As a person may be said to be the author of the act of the will itself, not by an antecedent act of will [i.e., by a foregoing volition], but by his being the immediate agent or the being that is acting or in the exercise of that act; if the phrase being the author is used to signify this, then, doubtless, common sense requires men's being the authors of their own acts of will in order to their being esteemed worthy of praise or dispraise on account of them.

Edwards's objection to the doctrine that the will chooses to choose or chooses its choices—namely, that it supposes "a choice before the first choice" and that this is as absurd as that "a thing is before it is" or that there is "a thing of the same kind before the first thing of the same kind"—implies that there is such a thing as a "first choice." But since he employed the term choice indiscriminately to include all the action of the will, the first choice with him meant an inclination or disposition of the will, not a volition (proper). There is no action of the will that precedes its inclination or disposition. Consequently, this is the primary action, the "first choice" of the will. The other action of the will in volitions (proper) is second choice. This "first choice" of the will in spontaneously inclining Edwards denominates a "leading act," an "original act," the "first determining act" (Will 3.4). The word act in this instance means activity or self-motion or self-determination, not in the Arminian sense of self-determination, which is a volition coupled with power to the contrary and is really indetermination not self-determination, but self-determination in the Calvinistic sense of spontaneously inclining or in the sense of "the immediate agent or the being that is acting or in the exercise of the act," as Edwards phrases it.

Again, that Edwards held the inclination or disposition of the will to be voluntary agency is proved by his position that the inclination or disposition is an object either of command or of prohibition. A man is commanded to have a holy inclination and forbidden to have a sinful one. He is so commanded when he is commanded to love God with all his heart. Love is inclination. He is prohibited from having a sinful inclination when he is prohibited from lust in any form. The tenth commandment prohibits a sinful inclination. But commands and prohibitions are addressed to the will and require or forbid something that is truly voluntary. The following is the phraseology of Edwards upon this point: "The will itself [i.e., the inclination of the will], and not only those actions which are the effects of the will [inclination], is the proper object of precept or command. That is, such or such a state or act of men's wills is in many cases properly required of them by command; and not merely those alterations in the state of their bodies or minds only that are consequences of volition." Again he remarks: "The will itself [i.e., the inclination] may be required, and the being of a goodwill is the most proper, direct, and immediate subject of command" (Will 3.4; 4.13).

It is important to notice by reference to the connection in what sense Edwards uses the term choice or volition. Sometimes the term denotes volition in distinction from inclination; sometimes it denotes inclination considered as voluntary agency. Had he appropriated the terms choice and volition to only one form of the will's activity, he would have been less liable to misapprehension. The charge of fatalism urged by some against Edwards arises from a failure to observe, that while Edwards taught that volitions necessarily agree with the inclination and have no power over it, he also taught that the inclination itself is free not necessitated agency. In the instance of a holy inclination, it was either created or recreated by God. In the instance of a sinful inclination, it was self-originated in the fall of Adam. The inclination of the will is free spontaneity in both instances. In the former, it results from God working in the will to will; in the latter, it is the will in its solitary self-motion.

The dictum of Edwards to which we have referred is misapplied, sometimes, by writers whose view of sin and the will is substantially that of Edwards. They agree that a man is responsible for his sinful volitions, because they issue from his sinful inclination; but when asked why a man is responsible for his sinful inclination, instead of answering that this had a free and self-determined origin in Adam, they take refuge in the dangerous position that the sinfulness of an inclination does not depend upon its origin but upon its nature and that it is of no consequence how it originated: "Malignity is evil, and love is good, whether concreated, innate, acquired, or infused. A malignant being is a sinful being, if endowed with reason, whether he was so made or so born" (Hodge, Theology 2.808). In this statement, holiness and sin are made to hold precisely the same relation to God and the human will, when in fact they hold totally different relations. All four of these adjectives will apply to "love," but only two of them to "malignity," namely, "innate" and "acquired." God creates a holy inclination or disposition whenever he creates a holy will in man or angel; and he recreates a holy inclination whenever he regenerates a sinner. Holiness is good and meritorious, “whether concreated, innate, acquired, or infused.” But then it is meritorious only in a relative sense. Since God is the ultimate author of holiness in both the creation and the regeneration of the will, to him belongs the glory of it. Man is not the originating agent, when holy inclination is the instance. God works in him to will. But the case is wholly different in the instance of an evil disposition or inclination. Man is the sole author, here. The demerit here is absolute, not relative. The doctrine of created holiness is true, but not of created sin; of infused holiness, but not of infused sin. To say that God can “create” and “infuse” a malignant inclination is to contradict the explicit teaching of Scripture, which asserts that God cannot sin and that he hates sin with an infinite hatred. God cannot create and infuse what he hates and punishes. And it shocks alike the moral sentiment of the natural man and the holy reverence of the renewed man. An evil inclination may be “innate” or “acquired.” But it cannot be “created” or “infused.” There may be a created merit, but not a created demerit. God can create and infuse holiness, but not sin.

The testimony of Scripture and of consciousness is to this effect. When David in Ps. 51 is brought to a sense of the wickedness of his heart or sinful disposition, he never dreams of referring this disposition to God as its Creator and Author. He imputes his inborn depravity to himself. He acknowledges that the demerit of it is absolute. It is the creature’s agency and the creature’s only. He describes it as “innate,” but not as “created” or “infused” by God. He derives it from his mother, but not from his maker. But when David rejoiced over his own holy disposition and that of the people to honor God in the erection of a temple, his utterance is very different: “Whom am I, and what is my people that we should be able to offer so willingly after this sort? For all things come of you, and of your own have we given you” (1 Chron. 29:14). (See supplement 4.5.8.)

Because holiness can be created and infused, it does not follow that sin can be, unless it can be shown, first, that the demerit of sin is only a relative demerit, as the merit of holiness is only a relative and gracious merit; and, second, that God’s creative agency can be exerted in the origination of sin in the same manner that it is in the origination of holiness, namely, by direct spiritual efficiency and operation.

When it is said that “malignity is evil,” it is meant of course that it is morally evil, that is, damnable and punishable. The punishableness of it is what constitutes it evil. It is not evil in the sense that poverty or sickness are evils. To say, therefore, that such a form of evil as sin can be understood without looking at the origin of it is self-contradictory. A malignant disposition is morally evil, that is, damnable and punishable, only in case it is guilt. If it is misfortune, it is not moral evil at all. If therefore it is not the product of the human will solely, but the product of God working in the human will, if it is “created” and “infused,” it is certainly neither damnable nor punishable. Auctormali non ultormali.”[85] It is no answer to say that a holy disposition is commendable and reward-able, and yet this is created and infused. The merit in this case, we repeat, is gracious and pactional and does not rest upon any absolute and primary obligation in God to reward. God in this case rewards his own grace and his own work in his creature. But the demerit of a sinful disposition is absolute, and its reward necessary, that is, resting upon an absolute and primary obligation in God as just to punish sin. God in this case does not punish his own cooperating agency in a creature’s will or visit with judicial infliction his own work.

Thus it appears that the “nature” of man’s sinful inclination or disposition cannot be determined except by knowing its “origin.” If it originates in one way, it is not sin; if in another, it is sin. Suppose that a judge should say to a jury: “You are not to look at the origin of this act of killing, but only at the nature of it; killing a man is killing a man, whatever may be the source from which the act originated.” The reply would be that it is impossible to determine the nature of the act in this instance without tracing it to its origin. Killing is of the nature of murder, only in case it originates in a murderous inclination and purpose. The nature depends upon the origin. In like manner, it is impossible to decide that a particular human disposition or inclination is of a culpable and damnable nature until it has been decided whether God or man is the author of it. The very epithet original applied to Adam’s first sin implies that its origin is a feature that is vital to the understanding of it, that its nature cannot be determined but by examining its first source. The term original when applied to sin implies that it originates in man. But the very same term when applied to righteousness implies that it originates in God: “In all agency, whether of good or evil, much is wont to be attributed to this: who was first in it? In point of good, the blessed God has no competitor; he is the undoubted first fountain of all good and is therefore acknowledged the supreme good. In point of evil (namely, moral) there is none prior to the devil, who is therefore eminently called the evil or wicked one" (Howe, Living Temple 2.8).

Original sin is to be distinguished from indwelling sin. The latter is the remainder of original sin in the regenerate. Its workings are described in Rom. 7:14-8:27 (Shedd, Commentary in loco). It is not, like original sin, a dominant and increasing principle in the believer, but a subjugated and diminishing one. Indwelling sin is the minuendo movement of sin. "It has a dying fall." Original sin is the crescendo movement:

> Original sin does not remain in the same manner after regeneration as it remained before; for there are two remarkable differences. In the unre-generate, it occupies all the faculties of the soul peaceably and rules in their mind, will, and affections; but in the regenerate, it neither dwells peaceably, because grace from above is infused into them, which daily opposes this disease, and more and more expels it from every faculty of the soul; nor does it rule over them, because grace prevailing and predominating restrains it and sends it as it were under the yoke. The other difference is that in the unregenerate it has the guilt of eternal death annexed to it; but in the regenerate it is absolved from this fruit, for the sake of Christ the mediator. (Davenant, Justification, 15)

> Says Luther (Table Talk: Of Sitis): "Original sin after regeneration is like a wound that begins to heal; though it be a wound, yet it is in course of healing, though it still runs and is sore. So, original sin remains in Christians until they die, yet itself is mortified and continually dying. Its head is crushed to pieces, so that it cannot condemn us." Indwelling sin is denominated "the law in {not of) the members" (Rom. 7:23); original sin is denominated "the law of sin and death" (8:2). (See supplement 4.5.9.)

Original Sin and Moral Inability

The bondage of sin is defined in Westminster Larger Catechism 25. It describes the corruption of nature, called original sin in distinction from actual transgression, as that corruption "whereby man is utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposite to all that is spiritually good." The Westminster Confession describes this corruption as that "whereby we are utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposite to all good, and wholly inclined to all evil." The creeds of the Lutheran and Calvinistic churches are equally explicit upon this point.[86] For the scriptural proof, see p. 502.

This introduces the subject of the inability to good of the apostate will, respecting which the following particulars are to be noted: (a) the inability relates to spiritual good and (b) the inability is self-caused and voluntary.

In the Westminster statement, the inability and opposition of the will relates to all that is "spiritually good." Spiritual good is holiness, and holiness is supreme love of God and equal love of man. The creed statement therefore is that apostate man, alone and of himself, is unable to love God with all his soul and his neighbor as himself. He cannot start such an affection as this in his heart. He cannot originate within his will an inclination or disposition that is "spiritually good." The inability relates to voluntary action in distinction from volitionary, to self-determination to an ultimate end in distinction from the choice of particular means.

The doctrine in question does not imply that fallen man is unable to be moral; but that he is unable to be spiritual, holy, and religious. St. Paul teaches (Rom. 2:14) that some unregenerate pagans practice morality; that they "do by nature the things contained in the law," that is, some things contained in the law (ta ton nomou),"[87] not all things.[88] Their obedience is fractional and imperfect. Under the natural stimulus of conscience, they refrain more or less from vice and live more or less virtuously, as compared with others around them. But this morality is not supreme love of God and perfect obedience of his law. St. Paul denies that these virtuous heathen are spiritually good and holy when he affirms that, if tested by the law that requires supreme love of God, "every mouth must be stopped and all the world become guilty before God" (3:19); that "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God" (3:23); and that "there is none righteous, no, not one" (3:10).

Again, this inability and opposition to all that is "spiritually" good does not imply that fallen man is destitute of certain natural and instinctive affections that are attractive and beneficent.[89] First in the list are family affections. The love of the parent for the child, of the children for the parents, of brothers and sisters for each other, is an amiable sentiment and oftentimes leads to great self-sacrifice. But the self-sacrifice is for the brother or sister, not for God. Family affection may and often does exist without any supreme love of God. It may and often does lead to disobedience of God. The workings of natural affection must be subordinated to the claims of Christ in order to become religious affection or "spiritually good": "He that loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me" (Matt. 11:37). When the two come in conflict, the instinctive human affection if allowed sway is positively idolatrous and irreligious.

Second are social affections. Man is instinctively interested in his fellowman and performs many acts of self-sacrifice and generosity toward him. The sailor will share his last crust with his fellow sailor; the fireman will risk his own life for a fellow creature whom he never saw before and will never see again. But both actions may be performed, and often have been, by one who takes the name of God in vain and breaks every other commandment of the Decalogue whenever he is tempted to it. The self-sacrifice in this instance, also, is for man, not for God. The act in this case is one of gallantry or courage, and the common sense of man never denominates it a spiritual and holy act. Men call it "noble" and reward it by some token of admiration: a silver cup or a purse of money. They would not think of so rewarding a spiritual or holy act, like that of the martyr who dies for his faith in Christ or of the missionary who lays his bones among the savages to whom he has preached the gospel.

Third are civil affections. Man is by his constitution a political animal, as Aristotle denominates him. He is interested in the nation and country to which he belongs by reason of his birth. This patriotic feeling, like social and family affections, rises up instinctively and uniformly in every man, the unregenerate as well as regenerate. This, too, like the others, is not spiritual and holy in its nature. The most intense patriotism may be accompanied with atheism and unbelief and immorality. Such patriotism is expressed in the sentiment: "My country—right or wrong."

Fourth, the esthetic feeling is not spiritual or religious. A love for the beautiful in art has nothing of holy virtue in it: "Who will affirm that a disposition to approve of the harmony of good music or the beauty of a square or equilateral triangle is the same with true holiness or a truly virtuous disposition of mind?" (Edwards, Nature of Virtue). Good taste is not piety and religion. A refined voluptuary is oftentimes a good judge in fine art; and even a coarse sensualist may be. Turner, one of the first painters that England has produced, was an example of the latter. Good taste may be spiritualized and elevated by being associated with and subordinated to a higher affection. But until this is done, it is of the earth earthly. It terminates only on that which is finite and temporal; and anything that terminates solely upon earth and time is unspiritual and unreligious. The same is true of the love of literature and science. Human discipline and culture is not holiness of heart and spirituality of mind.

In all these instances, we have to do with a portion of man's constitution that is outside of the voluntary nature. We are concerned with instinct, using the term in a wide sense, not with will. In its narrow and common signification, instinct signifies only the impulse of animal nature in brutes. But it may be used to denote all the constitutional impulses of human nature. Man did not lose esthetic impulse and feeling by the apostasy of his will; neither did he lose family, social, or civil affections. When he inclined away from God he did not incline away from art, science, the family-state, society, government, and country. His instinctive and constitutional interest in all these objects continued after the apostasy. His will was revolutionized, but not his instinctive nature. His love of God was gone, but not his love of family, country, beauty. Man continued to take pleasure in finite objects and relations, but lost delight in infinite and eternal objects and relations.

The foundation of all these affections is natural instinct, not will. They are constitutional, not voluntary; physical, not moral. Their source and basis is physical, using the term etymologically and broadly, to denote that which belongs to the physis[90] or created nature of man. The family affection is founded in blood and lineage. A father does not love and toil for another man's son. The patriotic affection springs from flesh and birth. An Englishman will not lay down his life for a Frenchman. Aristotle notices this. He founds the state upon the family, and the family he founds upon the sexual relation and affection, which manifests itself "not through voluntary choice, but by that natural impulse which acts both in plants and animals, namely, the desire of leaving behind them others like themselves" (Politics 1.2). The esthetic feeling, also, is founded in the created constitutional nature, but in the mental not the animal side of it. It does not depend, like family and patriotic affection, on affinity in blood and birth.

There is nothing voluntary in the love of a parent for his child, in the love of a citizen for his country, in the love of the artist for beauty. They are not the inclination of the will. This is proved by the fact that the apostasy of the will does not radically change them. If they belonged to the will, they would be converted into their contraries when the will is. When man began to be destitute of love to God, he would begin to be destitute of love for his family and his nation. In becoming an enemy of God and holiness, he would become an enemy of his family, society, culture, and art. In becoming disinclined and averse toward the Creator, he would become disinclined and averse toward these forms of the creature also.

In the Westminster statement, the disability or inability is connected with the disposition and inclination of the will. Man is "indisposed to all spiritual good and inclined to all [spiritual] evil." It follows from this that the cause and seat of the inability in question is in the action and state of the voluntary faculty. It is moral or willing inability: "For the will is a slave to sin, not unwillingly but willingly. For indeed, the 'will' (voluntas) is not called the 'unwill' (noluntas)'" "[91] (Second Helvetic Confession 9).

In denominating it "moral" inability, it is not meant that it arises merely from habit or that it is not "natural" in any sense of the word nature. A man is sometimes said to be morally unable to do a thing, when it is very difficult for him to do it by reason of an acquired habit, but not really impossible. This is not the sense of the word moral when applied to the sinner's inability to hoi iness. He is really and in the full sense of the word impotent. And the cause of this impotence is not a habit of doing evil which he has formed in his individual life, but a natural disposition which he has inherited from Adam. The term moral, therefore, when applied to human inability denotes that it is voluntary in distinction from created. Man's impotence to good does not arise from the agency of God in creation but from the agency of man in apostasy.

Whether, therefore, it can ever be called "natural" inability will depend upon the meaning given to the term nature, (a) If nature means that which is created by God, there is no natural inability to good in fallen man. But if nature means "natural disposition" or "natural inclination," there is a "natural" inability to good in fallen man. (b) Again, "natural" sometimes means something which is born with man in distinction from that which he acquires after birth, something in man at birth, yet not caused by birth. In this sense, man's inability to good is "natural." It is innate inability. The Scriptures sometimes employ the word in this sense: “The natural man receives not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them” (1 Cor. 2:14); “and were by nature (physeif[92] i.e., by birth) children of wrath” (Eph. 2:3); “conceived in sin and shaped in iniquity” (Ps. 51:5). In this last passage, “conceived” is not synonymous with “created” and must be carefully distinguished from it. So, also, in Rom. 9:11: “The children being not yet born” does not mean “the chil-dren being not yet created.” As opposed, therefore, to what is natural in the sense of created by God, man’s inability is moral, not natural; but as opposed to what is moral in the sense of acquired by habit, man’s inability is natural. When “natural” means “innate,” we assert that inability is “natural.” When “natural” means “created,” we assert that inability is “moral,” that is, voluntary. (See supplement 4.5.10.)

Owing to this ambiguity in the signification of the terms natural and moral, the elder Calvinistic theologians did not use either term exclusively to denote the sinner’s inability to good. Sometimes they employ one and sometimes the other and explain their meaning. The creeds of the Lutheran and Calvinistic churches frequently use the word natural and assert entire inability with great decision and unanimity: “When God converts a sinner, he frees him from his natural bondage under sin” (Westminster Confession 9.4).”[93] (See supplement 4.5.11.)

The elder Edwards differs from the old Calvinists in two particulars: (1) in refusing to denominate the bondage of the human will “natural inability” and (2) in denying that “moral inability,” by which term exclusively he designates the sinner’s bondage, is “inability proper.” As these positions bring Edwards into contradiction with himself and open the way for a different anthropology from that contained in his writings generally and particularly in his treatise Original Sin, we direct attention to them. His view is contained in the following statements: “Nat-ural inability alone is properly called inability” (Will in Works 2.104); “no inability which is merely moral is properly called by the name inability” (Will in Works 2.103).[94]

In his treatise Will (in Works 2.104), Edwards defines “natural inability” as the want of the requisite mental faculties. Consequently, “natu- ral ability” for him is the possession of the requisite mental faculties viewed apart from their moral state and condition. In so viewing them, he differs from the elder Calvinists, who regarded a mental faculty and its moral condition as inseparable. Edwards conceives of the will abstractly and separate from its inclination and, as so conceived, contends that it is "naturally able" to obey the law of God. The elder Calvinists denied that the will can be so conceived of.

"Natural inability," says Edwards, "arises from the want of natural capacity or from external hindrance." A man would be naturally unable to obey the divine law if he were destitute of any of the faculties of the human soul or if he were prevented from obeying the divine law by external force. Now, argues Edwards, inasmuch as man is not destitute of either understanding or will and is not compelled to sin by outward circumstances or by another being, it cannot be said that man is naturally unable to obey the divine law. This is true of the fallen man as well as of the unfallen.

Again, Edwards defines "natural inability" with reference to inclination or disposition. If a man is inclined to do a thing and is prevented, he is naturally unable. "We are said," he remarks (Will in Works 2.15), "to be naturally unable to do a thing when we cannot do it if we will [i.e., are inclined], because what is most commonly called nature does not allow it or because of some impeding defect or obstacle that is extrinsic to the will, either in the faculty of understanding, constitution of body, or external objects."

There are two criticisms to be made upon this statement. In the first place, if "the impeding defect or obstacle in the faculty of understanding" should amount to the total absence of reason, it would not be possible for a man to have an inclination to obey. An idiot or an insane person is not a moral agent and is incapable of moral inclination. If, however, Edwards means only a deficiency in intelligence that hinders the man in acting out his inclination—as when a man, though inclined to a right course, does not know what is the best means of accomplishing it—then, in this case, the will or inclination would be taken for the deed, and this would not be an instance of inability.

In the second place, if a man is inclined to obey God, but is prevented in a particular instance from performing the outward service by sickness or by imprisonment—by "constitution of body" or by "external objects"—he is regarded by God, who always looks upon the truth or reality of things, as an obedient servant: "If there be a willing mind (pro-thymia)[95] it is accepted according to what a man has and not according to what he has not" (2 Cor. 8:12). The inclination is the obedience; and Edwards supposes the inclination. This case, also, is not an instance of inability to obey the divine law. “The very willing is the doing,” says Edwards himself (Will in Works 2.17).

Edwards’s denial of “natural inability” is equivalent inferentially and indirectly to the assertion of “natural ability.” But he nowhere formally and directly asserts “natural ability” and in one instance directly and explicitly denies and combats it:

> It will follow on our author’s principles that redemption is needless and Christ is dead in vain. For God [according to him] has given a sufficient power and ability, in all mankind, to do all their duty and wholly to avoid sin. Yea, this author insists upon it that when men have not sufficient power to do their duty, they have no duty to do. These things fairly imply that men have in their own natural ability sufficient means to avoid sin and to be perfectly free from it, and so from all the bad consequences of it. And if the means are sufficient, then there is no need of more; and therefore there is no need of Christ’s dying, in order to it. (Original Sin in Works 2.464)

The explanation is this. Edwards was combating the doctrine of Whitby and Taylor that apostate man has plenary power to keep the divine law. Consequently, he had no motive to advocate the doctrine of ability in any form. His great object in the controversy was to establish the doctrine of inability. When, however, he is pushed by his opponents with the objection, that if there be no power in fallen man to keep the divine law there is no obligation to keep it, instead of recurring, as the elder Calvinists did, to the fall in Adam and the loss of ability by a free act of will,[96] Edwards meets the objection by asserting that fallen man is under no “natural inability” to keep the divine law and in this way implies that he has a “natural ability” to keep it. But when his definition of the “natural ability” thus indirectly attributed to fallen man is examined, it proves not to be efficient and real power, but only a quasi ability that is incapable of producing the effect required in the objection, namely, perfect obedience. In this way, he evades the objection of his opponent rather than answers it. “It is easy,” he says (Will in Works 2.17), “for a man to do the thing if he will [is inclined], but the very willing [inclining] is the doing. Therefore, in these things to ascribe a nonperformance to the want of power or ability is not just, because the thing wanting is not a being able, but a being willing. There are faculties of mind and capacity of nature and everything sufficient but a disposition; nothing is wanting but a will [inclination].” But this amounts only to the truism that the sinner is able to obey the law of God if he is inclined to obey it and avoids the point in dispute. For the real question is whether the sinner can originate the “thing that is wanting” in order to obedience, namely, “a being willing” or a disposition to obey. Edwards always and everywhere asserts that he cannot; but for the purpose of meeting the objection that if the sinner is unable to obey he is not obligated to obey, he contends that it is improper to call the inability to “be willing” or inclined an inability, because the mere existence of the faculty of will without the power to change its disposition constitutes ability. “To ascribe a nonperformance,” says Edwards, “in these things, to the want of power is not just; because the thing wanting is not a being able, but a being willing. There are faculties of mind and a capacity of nature and everything sufficient but a disposition.” But the absence of a disposition to obey is fatal. The presence of a disposition to obey is necessary in order to obedience. No man can obey the divine law without being willing or inclined to obey it; and Edwards asserts over and over again that the sinner is unable to incline himself to obedience. A man destitute of an inclination to obey the divine law cannot obey it merely because he has the abstract faculty of will. Volitionary acts can be performed, but since they do not proceed from a right inclination, they are not obedience. The sinner’s so-called natural ability, consisting of everything except a “disposition” to obey, consists of everything necessary to efficient power except efficiency itself. The ability to obey is an ability to incline, because it is the inclination of the will that constitutes true obedience. Consequently, if inclining to good is not within the compe-tence of the sinner, he is unable to obey.

In order, therefore, that a man destitute of an inclination to obey the divine law may be said without any equivocation to be “able” to obey, he must be able to originate such an inclination. The question that settles the question respecting “ability” and precludes all evasion is this: Has fallen man the ability to start and begin that right inclination of will which is the essence of obedience and without which it is impossible to obey the law of God? If so, he has without any ambiguity the “ability” to perfectly obey the divine law. But if not, he is unable to obey it, and this impotence is properly called inability. In answering this question, Edwards is explicit in the negative and stands upon the position of Augustine and Calvin in respect to the bondage and helplessness of the apostate will (see Edwards, Will in Works 2.101; Endless Punishment in Works 1.615-16). (See supplement 4.5.12.)

Pascal (Provincial Letters 2) illustrates this equivocation respecting "natural ability" (a distinction employed by the Jesuits) in the following manner:

> A man setting out on a journey is encountered by robbers who wound him and leave him half dead. He sends for aid from three neighboring surgeons. The first on examining his wounds pronounces them mortal and tells him that God alone can restore him. The second tells him that he has strength enough to carry him back to his dwelling and that he will recover by the force of his system. The patient, perplexed between the two, calls upon the third surgeon. This latter after examination sides with the second surgeon and ridicules the opinion of the first. The patient naturally supposes that the third surgeon agrees with the second; and in fact receives in reply to his inquiries an assurance that he has strength sufficient to prosecute his journey. The poor man, however, conscious of his weakness, asks on what his conclusions are founded? "Because," said he, "you still have your legs, and the legs are the natural organs for walking." "But," says the sick man, "have I strength to make use of them; for they seem to me useless, in my state of weakness?" "Certainly not," replied the doctor; "and in reality you never will walk, unless God shall send you supernatural aid to sustain and lead you." "What!" cries the patient, "have I not then in myself sufficient strength for walking?" "Very far from it," replied the surgeon. "Your opinion then is entirely opposed to the second surgeon respecting my state?" "I confess it is," he replied.

When "ability" is attributed to the human will, it is naturally understood to mean the power to use and control the energetic force of the faculty. Inclining to an ultimate end is the energy of the will, and its most important activity. But if the sinful will is unable to incline to God as the supreme end and good, it is improper to say that it has a "natural ability" to do this because "ability" properly denotes efficient power. The man in Pascal's illustration who “still had his legs” but had lost the power to use them could not properly be said to be able to walk; and the man who “still has a will” but is unable to incline it to good cannot properly be said to be able to obey. If when Edwards replied to his opponent that “it is easy for a man to do the thing if he will,” he had added that “it is easy for a man to will,” this would have been an unequivocal asser tion of ability. But Edwards not only denied that it is easy for the sinner to will rightly, but asserted that it is impossible.

Ability must not be confounded with capability or power with capacity. The sinner is capable of loving God supremely, but not able to love him supremely; and probably this is all that is intended by many who assert “natural ability.” Capacity implies possibility only, as when it is said that man has the capacity for all the diseases to which flesh is heir. But something more than capacity is requisite to warrant the assertion that he is able to have them all. The ability to have all the diseases of the human body would require the germ of them all. A man is not able to have smallpox unless he has the contagion or been inoculated with it. But he is capable of having smallpox without either contagion or inoculation. Adam before the fall had the capacity to sin rather than the ability, the possibility not the propensity. It is, therefore, more strictly proper to say that it was possible for holy Adam to sin than to say that he had the ability to sin. Accurately speaking, the ability to sin is inward sin itself; and the ability to be holy is inward holiness itself. Hence Augustine attributed to the unfallen Adam the posibilitas peccandt”[97] and denied the potestas.”[98] In moral things, the ability implies the inclination and tendency. (See supplement 4.5.13.)

Consequently, in ethics and religion, moral ability is the only kind of power that is properly designated by the term ability. In reference to obedience and disobedience, holiness and sin, if there is not moral or voluntary ability, there is no ability at all. And moral or voluntary ability cannot be separated from inclination. No inclination, no ability. If inclination, then ability. A man who is able to love God supremely is inclined to love him. A man who is able to steal is inclined in his heart to theft. In common parlance we say of a bad man: “He can do anything; he can lie, he can steal.” This is the same as saying: “He is a thief, he is a liar.” If we say that he is capable of lying, we do not say so much as when we say he is able to lie.

“Natural ability” is, properly, only physical force. It is the power of matter, not of mind. A man has the natural ability to lift one hundred pounds. This is the power of matter, of his body. But we can think of this kind of power as not exerted and as never exerted. The man may have this species of ability and yet never lift a hundred pounds weight. In the case of natural ability, we can abstract and separate the faculty from its exercise and use. The faculty, in the instance of natural ability, is the body of the man. We say that there is in this body the ability or power to lift one hundred pounds weight. Whether this ability shall be exerted depends not upon the body but upon the man's will. But the man's body and the man's will are distinct and separate substances and faculties. We can therefore conceive of this natural or physical ability as inactive and doing nothing until a volition employs it. We can conceive of natural power or ability without any effect produced by it.

But in the instance of moral or voluntary power or ability, we cannot thus abstract and separate the faculty from its use and exercise and conceive of it as inert and producing no effect. The faculty in this case is not the body, but the will itself. But the will cannot be inactive and inert, as matter may be. It is inclined and active by its very idea and definition. There is no conceivable separation, therefore, in this instance between the faculty and its use and exercise, as there is in the instance of the body and the volition that uses the body. Moral or voluntary power is necessarily in exercise. A man may be naturally able to lift a hundred pounds and yet not do it. But a man may not be morally able to love God and yet not do it. The ability to an act in this latter case is one with the act itself. Ability to incline is inclination itself. Ability to love is love itself. Ability to hate is hatred itself.

In the instance of natural ability or physical power, the ability is in one subject, and the use or exercise of it in another subject. The natural force is in the bodily limbs, and the moral force that exerts and uses it is in the will. But in the instance of moral ability or voluntary power, there is only one subject, namely, the human will. The will is the faculty, and the inclining of the will is the use and exercise of the faculty. We cannot, therefore, conceive of the will as being inert and inactive until another agent makes it active. Neither can we con-ceive of the will as inactive until some act of its own makes it active. Edwards was unquestionably correct in denying that the will can be started out of indifference and inaction by its own antecedent volition. But we can conceive of this in the instance of natural or physical power. We can conceive of the body as inert and inactive until another agent than itself, namely, the soul, makes it active by an antecedent volition. In the instance of moral ability, the faculty of will and its use and exercise are inseparable. If there be a will, it is necessarily in action; it is necessarily inclined. We cannot say that it is able to incline, not yet having inclined. It can pass from one inclina-tion to another; but it cannot exist an instant with no inclination at all. Consequently, if the will is able to do a thing, it is doing it. But in the instance of natural ability, the faculty and its exercise are separable. If there be a body, it is not necessarily exerting its physical force. In this case, we can say that it is able to do a thing and yet is not doing it.

It is ambiguous and misleading, therefore, to apply the term natural ability to a moral faculty like the will, as it confessedly would be to apply the term moral ability to a physical faculty like the human body. No one would attribute to the human body a moral ability to swim; and no one should attribute to the human will a natural ability to love or obey, because a natural ability may not be in use and exercise. Andrew Fuller (Memoir, 15 [ed. Bohn]) quotes from Gill the distinction between a thing "being in the power of our hand and in the power of our heart." Natural ability is the power of the hand; moral ability is the power of the heart. Referring to Descartes's distinction between the act of the will that terminates on the will itself and the act of the will that terminates on the body, natural ability would designate the latter and moral ability the former. Obedience of the divine command "you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart" is the product of moral, not of natural ability.

Edwards asserts "moral inability" and defines it to be either the absence of right inclination or the presence of wrong inclination:

> A man may be said to be morally unable to do a thing when he is under the influence or prevalence of a contrary inclination or has a want of inclination. Moral inability consists either in want of inclination or the strength of a contrary inclination. It may be said, in one word, that moral inability consists in the opposition or want of inclination. A man is truly morally unable to choose"[99] contrary to a present inclination. A child of great love to his parents may be unable to be willing to kill his father. (Will in Works 2.15-16, 101-2)

This is the inability meant in the Westminster statement that "man is utterly indisposed and disabled to all that is spiritually good." And this species of inability is real inability. It is not a figure of speech, but an impotence as helpless and insuperable by the subject of it, as natural inability. The substantive inability has its full and strict meaning. The adjective moral does not convert the notion of impotence into that of power, but only denotes the species of impotence. It is true that the "cannot" is a "will not," but it is equally true that the "will not" is a "cannot." The sinful will is literally unable to incline to good apart from grace.

Notwithstanding his assertion that moral inability is improperly called inability, Edwards strenuously maintains that moral inability is utter and helpless impotence. This is the self-contradiction in his theory: "By reason of the total depravity and corruption of man's nature, he is utterly unable, without divine grace, savingly to love God, believe in Christ, or do anything truly good" (Works 2.177). He also asserts the same thing in his doctrine of moral necessity: "Moral necessity may be as absolute as natural necessity—that is, the [moral] effect may be as perfectly connected with its moral cause, as a natural necessary effect is with its natural cause. When I use this distinction of moral and natural necessity, I would not be understood to suppose, that if anything comes to pass by the former kind of necessity, the nature of things is not concerned in it, as well as in the latter" (Will 1.4). Edwards means that the connection between the volition and the inclination is as necessary or as much founded in the nature of things as that between a physical effect and its physical cause. Given a wrong inclination, wrong volitions must follow. If the disposition of the will be vicious, the volitions of the will cannot be virtuous, any more than the fruit can be grapes if the root is that of the thistle.

Now in thus asserting that moral necessity is properly called necessity, Edwards is inconsistent in denying that moral inability is properly called inability. For the sinner's moral necessity of sinning is the very same thing as his moral inability to obedience. If, therefore, Edwards was willing to say that moral necessity is as real and absolute as natural necessity, he should have been willing to say that moral inability is as real and absolute as natural inability. If the term necessity is properly applicable to moral necessity, the term inability is properly applicable to moral inability. Necessity is a stronger term than inability, and it is singular that while Edwards was not afraid to employ the former in connection with voluntary action, he should have shrunk from the latter. The same general argument that proves that moral necessity, taken in its full unambiguous sense, is consistent with the freedom of the will would prove that moral inability, taken in its full unambiguous sense, is likewise consistent with it. The nature of Edwards's answer to the Arminian objection that if there is not ability in the sinful will there is no obligation resting upon it explains the inconsistency. Instead of denying, with the Calvinistic creeds generally, the Arminian premise that all inability however brought about is inconsistent with obligation, he concedes it and endeavors to show that there is ability. (See supplement 4.5.14.)

Moral necessity is asserted by Augustine and Calvin. It means that necessity in the moral character of the volitions which arises from a habitus of the will, from a bias or disposition of the voluntary faculty. A holy will has a holy habitus and is thereby under a moral necessity of exerting holy volitions: "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit." Hence St. Paul denominates the spiritual man "a servant (slave) of righteousness" (Rom. 6:18). St. John asserts that "whosoever is born of God cannot sin" (1 John 3:9). A sinful will has a sinful habitus and is thereby under a moral necessity of exerting sinful volitions: "You were servants (slaves) of sin" (Rom. 6:17); "whosoever commits sin is the servant (slave) of sin" (John 8:34). A holy will is unable to disobey; and a sinful will is unable to obey.

Fatalism has been charged upon this doctrine of moral necessity, but erroneously. Were the sinful disposition of the will itself necessitated, the charge would be well founded. Were the sinful inclination the necessary effect of some antecedent act or arrangement of God, as the volition is the necessary effect of the antecedent inclination, man would not be responsible for sin. But it is not. The sinful inclination is the abiding self-determination of the human will. Its origin is due to an act of freedom in Adam; and its continuance is due to the unceasing self-determination of every individual of the posterity. Each individual man prolongs and perpetuates in himself the evil inclination of will that was started in Adam. Sinful inclination began freely in the one sin of the whole race and is continued freely in the millions of individual inclinations in the millions of individuals of the race. Had sinful inclination been created and infused by God, then as the sinful volitions are referred to the inclination as their cause, the sinful inclination must have been referred to God as its cause. The doctrine of moral necessity means only that the volitions must necessarily be like the inclination. It does not mean that the inclination itself is originated and necessitated by God.

Ahabitus or disposition in the will intensifies and confirms free voluntary action, instead of weakening or destroying it. For a habitus is a vehement and total self-determination. But that which promotes determination by the self of course precludes compulsion by that which is not self. Hence the bondage of the will to sinful inclination does not destroy either the voluntariness or the responsibility of the will. The enslaved will is still a self-determining faculty; the bondage of sin is a responsible and guilty bondage, because proceeding from the ego, not from God. Calvin (2.2.5) maintains this in the following manner:

> Bernard subscribing to what is said by Augustine, thus expresses himself: “Among all the animals, man alone is free; and yet by the intervention of sin, he also suffers a species of violence; but from the will, not from nature, so that he is not thereby deprived of his innate liberty.” For what is voluntary is also free. And a little after, Bernard says, “The will being, by I know not what Corrupt and surprising means, changed for the worse is itself the author of the necessity to which it is subject; so that neither necessity, being voluntary, can excuse the will, nor the will, being fascinated (illecta), can exclude necessity.” For this necessity is in some measure voluntary. Afterward he says that we are oppressed with a yoke, but no other than that of a voluntary servitude; that therefore our servitude renders us miserable and our will renders us inexcusable; because the will, when it was free, made itself the slave of sin. At length he concludes, “Thus the soul, in a certain strange and evil manner, under this kind of voluntary and free yet pernicious necessity, is both enslaved and free; enslaved by necessity, free by its will [inclination]; and, what is more wonderful and more miserable, it is guilty because free; and enslaved wherein it is guilty; and so therein enslaved wherein it is free.” From these passages, the reader clearly perceives that I am teaching no novel doctrine, but what was long ago advanced by Augustine, with the universal consent of pious men and which for nearly a thousand years after was confined to the cloisters of monks. But Lombard, for want of knowing how to distinguish necessity from coercion, gave rise to a pernicious error.

The moral inability of the sinner, then, is the inability to incline rightly from a wrong state of the will, to convert sinful into holy inclination. He is already sinfully inclined. This sinful inclination is moral spontaneity or self-determination to an ultimate end. From the standpoint and starting point of evil, it is impossible to incline or self-determine to God. The sinner may exert volitions and make resolutions in hope of producing another inclination, but they are failures. A holy inclination cannot be originated by this method. This is moral inability. What are the grounds of it?

The finiteness and limitation of the created will is a ground. Holy inclination, we have seen (see pp. 496-97), must be given in creation. Neither man's nor angel's will can be first created without character and from this involuntary state originate holy inclination. The beginning, therefore, of holiness must always proceed from God. It can no more be originated by the creature than the spiritual substance itself of the will can be. But if this is true of man as finite and of angel as finite, it is still more so of man as sinful. When he is already preoccupied by a sinful inclination, it would be still more impossible for him to originate a holy inclination.

The mutability of the finite will is the possibility of falling from holiness to sin, not the possibility of rising from sin to holiness. If the will of man or angel becomes evil, it is evil immutably, apart from regenerating grace. When holy, it can change its inclination by its own energy without the coagency of God. But when sinful, it cannot do this. The finite will is mutably holy, but immutably sinful, so far as its own force is concerned.

The derivative nature of finite holiness is a second ground of moral inability. Holiness is a concreated quality of man like intelligence or rationality. But concreated qualities are incapable of self-origination. We perceive immediately that man cannot be the author of his own intellectuality. He cannot be created without the ideas of space and time, of God and self, in brief, without innate ideas, and then originate them by his own power. He cannot come from the creative hand an idiot without reason and then rationalize himself. Rationality and intelligence are derived characteristics, and therefore they are beyond man's power to produce. In like manner, holiness is a derived characteristic and therefore cannot be man's product. The creature cannot do the Creator's work. It would be absurd to say that matter can be created lacking one of the necessary properties of matter, say, impenetrability, and can then originate for itself the lacking property. But it would be a like absurdity to affirm that man or angel can be created lacking one of the necessary characteristics of moral perfection, namely, holiness, and can then originate it.

This reasoning does not hold good in regard to sin. Man can be created without sin and afterward originate it himself for three reasons:

1. Because sin is not a derivative quality. Sin starts in the finite will, not in the infinite. If it were derived from God, it would not be damnable and therefore not sin.
2. Because sin is not an element in moral perfection. Everything that comes from the Creator's hand must be perfect after its kind. A created moral being must have created moral perfection. This implies holiness and excludes sin.
3. Because sin is not a primary and normal characteristic of human nature. It does not enter into the idea and ideal of man. Sin, unlike holiness, does not belong to man as man. The human will can originate sin because it is a secondary and abnormal quality. God is the author of the normal, but the creature is the originator of the abnormal. All that belongs to man as ideal and perfect must come from God; but all that belongs to man as fallen and imperfect must come from man himself. Hence man can originate sin but not holiness.

The adorableness of a self-originated holiness is a third proof of moral inability. If man or angel were the sole and ultimate author of holiness in himself, his holiness would be underived and self-subsistent, and he would deserve the glory due to such holiness. Strictly self-originated holiness is worthy of worship. But the testimony of the Christian experience is against this: "By the grace of God I am what I am" (1 Cor. 15:10). The testimony of the angelic consciousness is also against this. The seraphim cried, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts" (Isa. 6:3). The trisagion attributes absolute and original holiness only to God. The testimony of Christ is against this: "None is good but one" (Luke 18:19). If man or angel should begin a holy inclination, his merit before God and law would be absolute and not relative. This contradicts 17:10: "When you shall have done all those things that are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants." God in this case would be under an original and primary obligation to the creature.

The reflex action of sin upon the will itself is a fourth ground of moral inability. Self-determination to evil destroys self-determination to good. The voluntary faculty, like every other faculty of the soul, cannot escape the consequences of its own action. Self-determination to sin reacts upon the will and renders it unable to holiness. The slavery of the will is an effect of the will upon its self. Whosoever commits sin in and by this very voluntary act becomes the slave of sin (John 8:24). Says Augustine (Confessions 8.5):

> My will the enemy held and thence had made a chain for me and bound me. For of a perverse will comes lust; and a lust yielded to becomes custom; and custom not resisted becomes necessity. By which links, as it were, joined together as in a chain, a hard bondage held me enthralled. And that new will, to serve you freely and to enjoy you, O God, which had begun to be in me, was not able to overcome my former long-established willfulness. In these spiritual things, ability is one with will, and to will is to do; and yet the thing is not done. Whence is this strange anomaly (monstrum)? The mind commands the body, and it obeys instantly; the mind commands itself and is resisted. The mind commands the hand to be moved, and such readiness is there that command is scarce distinct from obedience. The mind commands the mind, its own self, to will; and yet it does not will. It commands itself, I say, to will and would not command unless it willed; and yet what it commands is not done. But it will not entirely; therefore does it not command entirely. For it commands only so far forth as it wills. The will commands that there be a will [inclination]; not another's will, but its own will. But it does not command entirely; therefore, what it commands does not take place.

Says Samuel Hopkins (Works 1.233-35):

> It is certain that every degree of inclination contrary to duty, which is and must be sinful, implies and involves an equal degree of difficulty and inability to obey. For indeed, such inclination of the heart to disobey and the difficulty or inability to obey are precisely one and the same. The kind of difficulty or inability, therefore, always is > great according to the strength and fixedness of the inclination to disobey; and it becomes total and absolute [inability], when the heart is totally corrupt and wholly opposed to obedience. Nothing but the opposition of the heart or will of man to coming to Christ is or can be in the way of his coming. So long as this continues and his heart is wholly opposed to Christ, he cannot come to him; it is impossible and will continue so, until his unwillingness, his opposition to coming to Christ, be removed by a change and renovation of his heart, by divine grace, and he be willing in the day of God's power.

The excess of will to sin is the same as defect of will to holiness. The degree of intensity with which any being inclines to evil is the measure of the amount of power to good which he has thereby lost. If the intensity be total, the loss is entire. Sin is the suicidal action of the human will. To do wrong destroys the power to do right. This is illustrated in the effect of a vicious habit in diminishing a man's ability to resist temptation. But habit is the continual repetition of wrong self-decisions, every one of which reacts upon the will as a faculty and renders it less strong and energetic to good. No man can do a wrong act and be as sound in his will and as spiritually strong after it as he was before it.

Again, the totality of the depravity of the will destroys moral ability or ability to good. The whole and not a mere part of the will is determined. Consequently, when a self-determination to a final end has occurred, there is no remainder of uncommitted power in reserve, as it were, behind the existing determination, by which the direction of the will may be reversed. This total and intense determination to evil is inability to good.

The debilitating effect of self-determination upon the will itself is too often overlooked. When cause and effect are in different subjects, the impotence of the cause itself after its own action is always taken into account; but when, as in the case of a sinful inclination, cause and effect are in one and the same subject, namely, the human will, the impotence of the cause itself after its own action is not always noticed or is practically denied. If, for illustration, one man kill another man, all know that the murderer cannot restore the murdered man to life. The cause cannot undo its effect when they are in different subjects. But the same is true when a man kills himself. Here the cause and the effect are in one and the same subject. Now this is true also of the human will in reference to the sin of which it is the cause. Sin is the effect of free will as the cause; and because the will originates sin, it is assumed that the will can nullify sin, can destroy what it originated. But the effect in this instance is as much beyond the power of the cause, when once the cause has acted, as in any other instance. A man certainly cannot undo the guilt of his sin, and neither can he undo the inclination to sin.

Says the younger Edwards (Against Chauncy, 13):

> A certainty that has been established by the will of man with respect to the will itself as effectually binds that will and is equally inconsistent with its liberty [to the contrary] as if that certainty were established by any other cause. Suppose the will of any man shall establish in itself a certain and unfailing bias to any particular action or series of actions; it cannot be pretended that this fixed bias already established is any more consistent with liberty [to the contrary] and moral agency in the man in whom the bias exists than if it had been established by any other cause. If a man were to cut off his own leg, though he might be more blamable for the act of cutting it off than he would be for the same act performed by another, yet the effect, as to his subsequent ability to walk, would be the very same.[100]

But if man, either unfallen or fallen, cannot begin a holy inclination, how is it that he can begin an evil one? If he cannot be the ultimate and meritorious author of holiness, how can he be the ultimate and ill-deserving author of sin? Why may there be a power to the contrary downward from a holy position, but no power to the contrary upward from a sinful position? Why can man ruin, but not save himself?

Because of the difference between self-determination to holiness and self-determination to sin. The first is relative, the last is absolute self-determination. Relative self-determination is self-determination with a divine element in it; absolute self-determination is self-determination without a divine element in it. The former is self-determination under divine impulse and actuation; the latter is solitary self-determination without divine impulse and actuation. Holiness in man is divine-human: the product of God working in the creature to will and to do. Sin in man is human simply and only: the product of the finite will uninfluenced and unimpelled.

Augustine, as quoted by Calvin (2.2.4), defines liberum arbitrium'"[101] as "a power of reason and will by which good is chosen when grace assists and evil is chosen when grace is wanting." Aquinas, as quoted by Neander (History 4.481), says that holy "free will is not an independent causality. God works in the finite will in the way that the nature of it requires that he should; although, therefore, he changes the inclination of man to another direction, nevertheless, by his almighty power he causes that man should freely will the change which he experiences; and thus all constraint is removed. For to suppose otherwise, that the man willed not the change which is a change in his will, would be a contradiction."

The difference between the two kinds of self-determination is marked in language. The noun sin has an active verb to correspond with it; the noun holiness has none. Sin is "sinning" or "to sin"; but holiness is not "holying" or "to holy." Only the passive is employed in the latter case: " to be holy" or "to become holy." But both the active and passive are employed in the former. Man is willing in holiness; and he is willing in sin. But the willingness in the first case is complex. God works in man towill (Phil. 2:13). The willingness in the second case is simple. Man works alone. In the first instance, the human will harmonizes with the divine; in the second, it antagonizes. In the first instance, the voluntariness is recipient: "What have you that you did not receive?" (1 Cor. 4:7); "you have received the spirit of adoption" (Rom. 8:15). In the second instance, the voluntariness is originant.

The question arises whether the divine element in holy self-determination does not, in reality, destroy the self-determination. If God creates voluntary spontaneity when he creates a holy man or recreates it when he regenerates him, is it in either case real and genuine spontaneity? Must not the human will act alone and independently in order to act voluntarily; and is not the sinful will the only free will, because it is not influenced by God in its action? The answer is in the negative: (a) Because revelation teaches this agency of God in and on the finite will and at the same time teaches that the resulting holiness is true freedom: "If the Son shall make you free, you shall be free indeed" (John 8:36); (b) because consciousness reports that the holy inclination is spontaneous and unforced; and (c) because if the human will in order to act freely must not experience any influence or impulse from God, then all divine influence is necessitating. And the same is true of human influence.

Man can originate sin because sin is imperfection. The infinite will cannot originate imperfection: “God’s work is perfect” (Deut. 32:4; 2 Sam. 22:31; Ps. 18:30). This is one of the differentia between the Creator and the creature. Infinite, uncreated, and eternal will cannot cause any defective thing; but finite, created, and temporal will can. Sin is defective because it has less of being in it than holiness has. There was once a time when it was not; but holiness always was. Sin has no positive and eternal right to be; holiness has such a right. Sin is not necessary in the universe of God; had God so decreed, the created will would never have originated it. But holiness is necessary. Because of these facts, the Schoolmen defined sin as a negation, a defect rather than an effect. To originate it is not the sign of power but of weakness. Hence the possibility of sinning is not an excellence but a deficiency. It is one of the limitations of the finite. That it does not belong to God does not prove that God is not free or that he has less power than a man or angel has, any more than the impossibility of having a physical disease or of dying proves that God is inferior to man. The possibility of doing an evil thing is weakness rather than power. (See supplement 4.5.15.)

Moral Inability and Moral Obligation

The foundation of man’s obligation to perfectly obey the divine law was the holiness and plenary power to good with which he was endowed by his Creator. Because God made man in his own image, he was obliged to sinless obedience. Moral obligation rested upon the union and combination of the so-called natural ability with the moral. It did not rest upon the first alone. Not a will without any inclination, but a will with a holy inclination, was the basis of the requirement of sinless obedience. The possession of a will undetermined would not constitute man a moral agent. God did not make man without moral character and then require perfect obedience from him. When man was created and placed under law, he was endowed not only with the faculties of a man, but with those faculties in a normal condition. The understanding was spiritually enlightened, and the will was rightly inclined. He had both “natural” and “moral” ability. He had real and plenary power to obey the law of God. In the beginning of man’s moral existence, ability must equal obligation. And the ability did equal it. Kant's dictum—"I ought, therefore I can"—was true of holy Adam and his posterity in him. If at the instant man came from the hand of God he had been unable to obey, he would not have been obligated to obey:

> The law was not above man's strength when he was possessed of original righteousness, though it be above man's strength since he was stripped of original righteousness. The command was dated before man had contracted his impotency, when he had a power to keep it, as well as to break it. Had it been enjoined to man only after the fall, and not before, he might have had a better pretense to excuse himself, because of the impossibility of it; yet he would not have had sufficient excuse, since the impossibility did not result from the nature of the law, but from the corrupted nature of the creature. It "was weak through the flesh" (Rom. 8:3), but it was promulgated when man had a strength proportioned to the commands of it. (Charnock, Holiness of God)

Obligation being thus founded upon the Creator's gifts cannot be destroyed by any subsequent action of the creature. If he destroys his ability, he does not destroy his obligation. If man by his own voluntary action loses any or all of the talents entrusted to him, he cannot assign this loss as a reason why any or all the talents, together with usury, should not be demanded of him in the final settlement (see Christ's para-ble of the talents): "God's commandments are not the measure of our powers but the rules of our duty. They do not teach what we are now able to do, but what we ought to do, and what we were able to do at one time"[102]" (Turretin 10.4.23). Heidelberg Catechism Q. 9 thus represents the subject: "Does not God, then, wrong man by requiring of him in his law that which he cannot perform? A. No; for God so made man that he could perform it; but man through the instigation of the devil, by willful disobedience, deprived himself and all his posterity of this power."

It is objected that if man is unable to keep the law he is not obligated to keep it. This depends upon the nature of the inability and its cause.

If man were destitute of reason, conscience, will, or any of the faculties of a moral being, he would not be obligated. If he were internally wrought upon by an almighty being and prevented from obeying, he would not be obligated. If he were prevented by any external compulsion, he would not be obligated. If he had been created sinful, he would not be obligated. If he had been created indifferent either to holiness or sin, he would not have been obligated. None of these conditions obtain in the case of man. He was created holy, with plenary power to keep perfectly the moral law, and therefore was obligated to keep it. At the point of creation, ability and obligation were equal.

But if after creation in holiness and plenary power, any alteration be made in the original ratio between ability and obligation by the creature's voluntary agency, this cannot alter the original obligation. If ability is weakened by an act of self-determination, obligation is not weakened. Ifability is totally destroyed by self-determination, obligation is not destroyed. The latter is the fact in the case. There is a total inabil ity, but it is not an original or created inability. It came to be by man's act, not by God's: "Man's inability to restore what he owes to God, an inability brought upon himself, does not excuse man from paying the satisfaction due to justice; for the result of sin cannot excuse the sin itself" (Anselm, Why the God-Man? 1.24).

The principle that if a moral power once possessed is lost by the voluntary action of the possessor he is not thereby released from the original duty that rested upon it is acknowledged by writers upon ethics. Aristotle (Ethics 3.5) remarks that it is just in legislators:

> to punish people even for ignorance itself, if they are the cause of their own ignorance; just as the punishment is double for drunken people. For the cause is in themselves; since it was in their own power not to get drunk, and drunkenness is the cause of their ignorance. And they punish those who are ignorant of anything in the laws which they ought to know and which it is not difficult to know; and likewise in all other cases in which they are ignorant through negligence, upon the ground that it was in their own power to pay attention to it. But perhaps a person is unable to give his attention? But he himself is the cause of this inability, by living in a dissipated manner. Persons are themselves the causes of their being unrighteous by performing bad actions and of being intemperate by passing their time in drunken revels and such like. When a man does those acts by which he becomes unjust, he becomes unjust > voluntarily [i.e., by the action of his own will]. Nevertheless, he will not be able to leave off being unjust and to become just whenever he pleases. For the sick man cannot become well whenever he pleases, even though it so happen that he is voluntarily sick owing to an incontinent life and from disobedience to physicians. At the time indeed, it was in his own power not to be sick; but when he has once allowed himself to become sick, it is no longer in his power not to be sick; just as it is no longer in the power of a man who has thrown a stone to recover it. And yet the throwing of it was in his own power, for the origin of the action was in his own power. In like manner, in the beginning it was in the power of the unjust and the intemperate man not to become unjust and intemperate; and therefore they are so voluntarily. But when they have become so, it is no longer in their power to avoid being unjust and intemperate. . . . And not only are the faults of the soul voluntary, but in some persons those of the body are so likewise, and with these we find fault. For no one finds fault with those who are disfigured and ugly by birth, but only with those who are so through neglect of gymnastic exercise or through carelessness. The case is the same with bodily weakness and mutilation. For no one would blame a man who is born blind or who is blind from disease or a blow, but would rather pity him. But everybody would blame the man who is blind from drunkenness or any intemperance. For those faults of the body which are in our own power originally and which result from our own action, we are blamable.

The assertion of Plato (Laws 5.731) that “the unjust man is not unjust of his own free will; because no man of his own free will would choose to experience the greatest of evils,” if it were true, would relieve the unjust man of obligation. The ethics of Plato in such an assertion is defective. He, however, contradicts himself, because elsewhere he teaches the guiltiness of the unjust man. Even in this very connection (Laws 5.734), he reasons in a self-contradictory manner. The temperate life, he says, is pleasant and the intemperate is painful, “and he who would live pleasantly cannot possibly choose to live intemperately. If this be true, the inference clearly is that no man is voluntarily intern perate, but that the whole multitude of men lack temperance in their lives, either from ignorance or from want of self-control or both.” But “want of self-control” is voluntariness. The probability is that Plato in the above extract employs “voluntary” in the sense of “volitionary.”

In secular commercial life, the loss of ability does not release from obligation. A man is as much a debtor to his creditors after his bankruptcy, as he was before. The loss of his property does not free him from indebtedness. He cannot say to his creditor, “I owed you yesterday, because I was able to pay you; but today I owe you nothing, because I am a bankrupt.” It is a legal maxim that bankruptcy does not invalidate contracts.

That obligation remains fixed and immutable under all the modifications of ability introduced by the action of the human will is proved by the case of the drunkard and the habit which he has formed. The drunkard is certainly less able to obey the law of temperance than the temperate man is. But this law has precisely the same claim upon him that it has upon the temperate. The diminution of ability has not diminished the obligation. If obligation must always keep pace with the changes in the ability, then there are degrees of obligation. The stronger the will is, the more it is obliged; the weaker it is, the less is it bound by law. In this case, sin rewards the sinner by delivering him from the claims of law. The most vicious man would be least under obligation to duty

It is objected that if the apostate will is unable to perfectly obey the divine law it is not free. The reply to this objection requires a definition of finite freedom, both negatively and positively. Negatively, finite freedom is not. . .

1. Freedom of omnipotence (Owen, Arminianism, 12): There are many things out of man’s power, but this does not prove that he is necessitated within his own proper sphere of action.
2. Freedom of independence: This species of freedom requires self-existence and self-sustenation. It is beyond the reach of an influence from another being. It is pure aseity (aseitas) or self-sufficiency.
3. Freedom from the internal consequences of voluntary action: The formation of a habit is voluntary; but when the habit has been voluntarily formed, it cannot be eradicated by a volition.
4. Freedom from the external consequences of voluntary action: The objective fact caused by the will cannot be destroyed by the will.

The suicide cannot restore himself to life; the homicide cannot reanimate his victim.

5. Freedom from action itself: The will is not free not to act at all. The will must will something, as the mind must think something. Inaction of the will is impossible, like inaction of the understanding.
6. Freedom from the regulation and restraint of law: Even in God, freedom is not unbridled almightiness unregulated by other attributes. God can do all that he wills to do, but there are some things which he cannot will because certain of his attributes prevent: for example, logical contradictions and sinful acts. Freedom in God is rational freedom. Kant denominates the practical reason the will, because, ideally, the will is one with reason. "Subjection (douleia)'"[103] to righteousness" (Rom. 6:19) is "obedience from the heart" or spon- taneity (6:17) and also "glorious liberty" (8:21). The moral law is "a law of liberty" (James 2:25). The believer is "free indeed" (John 8:34).
7. The possibility of willing contrary to what is already being willed: The possibility of willing the contrary is an accident, not the substance of freedom. It may be associated, temporarily, with an existing self-determination for the purpose of testing the strength of it, but not for the purpose of making the self-determination any more self-determined than it is already is in its own nature. Freedom is the present actual willingness and not the power to will something else in addition to the present actual willingness. Suppose, for illustration, that a man thinks of only one single act, say, to walk to a certain tree before him. No other act is in his mind. He walks spontaneously to this tree. Here, he does not choose between two actions, but he self-determines to one action. He walks to the tree and is free in so doing, not because he could have walked away from the tree if the thought of so doing had occurred to him, but because he actually walked to the tree proprio motu[104] and without compulsion.
8. Indifference or freedom from a bias or inclination: A bias or inclination of the will is the central and dominant self-determination of the will. The stronger the bias, the more intense is the self-determination and hence the more intense the freedom.

The more the will is self-determined and inclined, the farther off it is from indifference; and hence indifference is not the characteristic of freedom.

9. Mere liberty of performing an outward act: Edwards, in his polemics against the Arminian, finds the substance of freedom in this.[105] According to this, a man is free to worship God only when he is permitted to act out his inclination and to worship externally; and if he is not so permitted, he is not free to worship God. But the truth is that if he has the inclination to worship he is a free worshiper, whether he is allowed to put his inclination into volition and act or not. He is the Lord's freeman and a true worshiper, by virtue of his spontaneous inclination itself. "Fool," says the lady in Comus,

Fool do not boast:
You cannot touch the freedom of my mind
With all thy charms, although this corporal rind
You have immanacled, while Heaven sees good.

The same truth is embodied in the fine lines of Lovelace, written while confined in prison:

Stone walls do not a prison make,
    Nor iron bars a cage,
Minds innocent and quiet take
    That for an hermitage.
If I have freedom in my love,
    And in my soul am free,
Angels alone, that soar above.
    Enjoy such liberty.

—Percy, Reliques

And on the other hand, if a man has an evil inclination, say to earthly ambition and power, he is free in sin, that is, self-deter-minedly sinful, whether he is permitted to carry it out in volition and act or > not. Shut him in prison, so that he can take no part in earthly affairs, he is still Satan's freeman by virtue of the inclination of his will.

The reason of this is the fact that the subjective energy of the human will is all that a man can call his own and be responsible for. The realization of this personal inward energy in outward act depends upon others and especially upon the providence of God, but not upon the man himself. The circumstances of a man are no part of his spontaneous self-determination, and he is not responsible for them. He is not free in regard to them. As in the case supposed, a man may have the inclination to worship God, but his surroundings prevent. These surroundings are no part of his voluntary agency and ought not to be taken into account in determining whether he is a free agent. If the subjective personal energy of his own will, as seen in his inclination, is truly free from compulsion and really spontaneous, he is free, whether he can give it outward form in a particular act or not. Says Calvin (2.4.8):

> The ability of the human will is not to be estimated from the event of things, as some ignorant men are accustomed to do. For they imagine that they disprove the freedom of the human will, because even the greatest monarchs have not all their desires fulfilled. But the ability of which we are speaking is to be considered as within man and not to be measured by external success. For in the dispute concerning free will, the question is not whether a man notwithstanding external impediments can perform and execute whatever he may have determined in his mind, but whether in every case his understanding exerts freedom of judgment (judicii electionem) and his will freedom of inclination (afjectionem voluntatis). If men possess both of these, then Attilius Regulus when confined in the small extent of a cask stuck round with nails will possess as much free will as Augustus Caesar when governing a great part of the world with his rod.

To the same effect, Edwards (Will 3.4) remarks that > if the will [i.e., the inclination] fully complies, and the proposed effect does not prove, according to the laws of nature, to be connected with his [executive] volition, the man is perfectly excused; he has a natural inability to the thing required. For the will [inclination] itself, as has been observed, is all that can be directly and immediately required by command; and other things only indirectly, as connected with the will. If, therefore, there be a full compliance of will [inclination], the person has done his duty, and if other things do not prove to be connected with his [executive] volition that is not owing to him. (cf. Reid, Intellectual Powers 3.4.1)

Defined positively, finite freedom is . . .

1. Self-determination in the sense of moral spontaneity—not self-determination and power to the contrary, but self-determination alone, pure, and simple: The first is true, the last is spurious self-determination and should be denominated indetermination.
2. Freedom from compulsion, either internal or external: "God has endued the will of man with that natural liberty that it is not forced to good or evil" (Westminster Confession 9.1).
3. Freedom from physical necessity or the operation of the law of cause and effect: "God has endued the will of man with that natural liberty that it is not by any absolute necessity of nature determined to good or evil" (Westminster Confession 9.1).

Physical necessity is seen in the sequences of physical cause and effect. There is no freedom in such a series of sequences because there is no true beginning and first start. The cause is itself an effect of a foregoing cause, and this again is the effect of another foregoing cause and so backward indefinitely: causa causae causa causati."[106] No responsible cause can be found in such a line of antecedents and consequents, because as fast as the responsibility is found in a particular cause, it is thrown back upon the cause of this cause. No real and true author or beginner is found until the chain terminates in God, who is not a part of the chain, but the Creator of it. All physical and material events and phenomena must be referred to the Prime Mover. There is no real author and no first cause within the chain of nature itself. But in the sphere of mind, the case is different. The law of cause and effect operating in matter has no operation in the human will. This latter is the faculty of self-motion. Even when the Holy Spirit works in it "to will and to do," the motion is still self-motion—spiritual not physical, voluntary not necessitated. In the origin of sin, the will cannot refer its action back to a physical cause and thus convert it into a mere effect and transfer its responsibility to a foregoing cause of its agency. In respect to sin, it is itself a true originating cause. It begins its own movement ab intra,"[107] by an act of self-determination. There is a first inclin-ing of the will to the creature, and away from the Creator, which is not the effect of a foregoing sin, but is the original nisus or start of self-will. And in the origin of holiness, though the will must refer its action back to God, yet not to him as a physical cause producing a physical effect. Holy inclination is the activity of mind, not of matter. It is not produced by the operation of the law of cause and effect, because the divine Spirit works in the human will in accordance with the nature of mind, not of matter.

If this be the true definition of freedom, it follows that the apostate will is free in being inclined or self-determined and that this inclination to evil constitutes an inability to good. The sinner is at once voluntary in sin and impotent to holiness. He is enslaved by himself to himself. He cannot love God supremely, because he loves himself supremely. He cannot incline rightly, because he is inclining wrongly. He is sponta-neously and freely evil and therefore is unable to be spontaneously and freely good. Self-determination is a hazardous endowment. It may be an evil as well as a good. When free will is wicked will, it is a curse. (See supplement 4.5.16.)

The answer to the question "can the sinner repent if he will?" depends on the meaning of the term wilt: whether it denotes inclination or volition. Can the sinner repent if he incline? Yes. But the inclining is the repentance itself. So that this answer is the truism "he can repent, if he repents." Can the sinner repent, if he choose or resolve? No. A volition of the will cannot produce an inclination of the will. If a man inclines to repent, he repents in so inclining; but if a man resolves to repent, he does not repent in so resolving.

It is objected that if the sinner has no power to obey the law he has nothing to do in the matter of religion. He may say with Macbeth,

> If chance will have me king, why let chance crown me,
> Without my stir.

This does not follow. Because the sinner cannot do the primary work, it does not follow that he cannot do the secondary. He has a very important work to do, namely, to discover his inability. A wide field is open here for his agency, (a) He can compare his character and conduct with the requirements of the law; this tends to convince him of his inability to perfectly obey the law: “I have seen an end of all perfection; your commandment is exceeding broad” (Ps. 119:96). (b) He can try to obey the law; this will convince him of his inability still more.

A sinner has power under common grace to find out that he has no power to the “spiritually good.” This is a preparative work to regeneration. The discovery that he is “without strength” leads to the discovery that “Christ died for the ungodly” (Rom. 5:6). When he is weak then he is strong. God has appointed certain means to be employed by common grace prior to his exercise of regenerating grace, not meritoriously, but as congruous or adapted to the end. The sinner is to use them. Says Howe {Decrees 3.7):

> Where there is not as yet the light of a saint, there is that of a man, and that is to be improved and made use of in order to our higher light; and if there be that self-reflection to which God has given to every man a natural ability, much more may be known than usually is. It belongs to the nature of man to turn his eyes inward. Men can reflect and consider this with themselves: Have I not an aversion toward God? Have not worldly concernments and affairs, by the natural inclination of my own mind, a greater room and place there than heaven and the things of heaven? Are not other thoughts more grateful? And have they not a more pleasant relish with me than thoughts of God? Men, I say, are capable of using such reflections as these. And therefore of considering: This can never be well with me. If there remain with me a habitual aversion to God, who must be my best and eternal good, I cannot but be eternally miserable. If I cannot think of and converse with him with inclination and pleasure, I am lost. If my blessedness lie above, in another world, and my mind is carried continually downward toward this world, I must have a heart > attempered to heaven, or 1 can never come there. Well, then, let me try if I can change the habit of my own mind, make the attempt, make the trial. The more you attempt and try, the more you will find that of yourselves you cannot; you can do nothing of yourselves, you do but lift a heavy log, you attempt to move a mountain upward, when you would lift at your own terrene hearts. Then is this consideration obvious: I must have help from heaven, or I shall never come there. Therefore fall a-seeking, fall a-sup-plicating, as one that apprehends himself in danger to perish and be lost, if he have not another heart, a believing heart, a holy heart, a heavenly heart.'"[108]

It is objected that if the sinner's ability to keep the moral law depends upon the sovereign grace of God he must wait God's time. The reply is that God's time is now and therefore excludes waiting for it: "God says, I have heard you in a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succored you: behold now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2); "God limits (horizei)"[109] a certain day: saying, Today if you will hear his voice harden not your hearts" (Heb. 4:7). God offers the Holy Spirit as a regenerating Spirit this very instant, but confines the offer to this very instant. Nowhere in revelation does God offer to pardon sin or regenerate the soul at a future time. This work is always described as to be done in the sinner's heart, now, this very moment. No future redemption is promised.

The sinner excuses himself from faith and repentance by saying, "I cannot believe. I am unable to repent." He is to be made to feel the truth of his statement, not to be told that his statement is untrue. He needs to become conscious of that inability which in words he asserts, but not in sincerity. The difficulty in the instance in which this objection of inability is urged is that the sinner does not really believe what he says. He does not realize his inability; but he perceives that to urge it is a good verbal objection, an argumentum adhominem"[110] for the preacher. In this case, the work of the preacher is to make the objector eat his own words and seriously feel the truth of his assertion. And in doing this, he will bring out the important fact that the sinner's inability is guilty because self-originated, that the sinner is the sole author of the inability.

It is objected that the doctrine of inability is incompatible with commands and exhortations to believe, repent, and obey the law of God. It is said that we would not command a dead man to rise from the grave or a man without legs to walk. To this it is to be replied that we would so command if God bade us to utter this commandment in a given instance and promised to accompany the word from our lips with his own omnipotent and creative power. Christ's command to preach the gospel to men "dead in trespasses and sins" and who "cannot come unto the Son except the Father draw them" (John 6:44) is coupled with the promise to accompany the truth with the Holy Spirit.

The doctrine of the sinner's ability is exposed to great objections:

1. It contradicts consciousness. The process of "conviction" is a grow-ing sense of inability to everything spiritually good in heart and conduct. Sinful man cannot be made conscious of ability. This form of consciousness has never been in the human soul.
2. The tenet undermines the doctrine of atonement. It is conceded that the sinner has no ability to make atonement for his guilt; it would follow from this theory of ability that he is not obligated to make one, in other words, that punitive justice has no claims upon him.
3. The tenet conflicts with the doctrine of endless punishment. If the power to the contrary belongs inalienably to the apostate will, self-restoration in the future world is possible, and endless punishment is not certain. The Alexandrine theologians Clement and Ori-gen founded their denial of endless punishment upon this view of the will. If the sinner is able at all times to believe and repent, he may do so at any time, and under the impressions of the other world it is probable that he will. Clement and Origen founded the final recovery of Satan and his angels, together with fallen man, in the future world upon the abiding existence of free will to good. It is no reply to this objection to say that the lost man can, but certainly never will repent. If latent power be given in the premise, the natural inference is that it will be used, not that it will not be. Suppose that previous to the fall it had been said, "Adam has the power to sin, but he certainly never will sin." Suppose that it were said, "Gunpowder has the inherent power of self-explosion, but it certainly never will explode." To say that it was certain that Adam would use his power to sin because it was decreed that he would use it is not to the point; because this is inferring the certainty as relative to the divine decree, not as relative to the power of the human will, which is the matter in dispute.

4. The tenet of ability encourages the sinner to procrastination and neglect of the gospel offer. If he believes that from the very nature of free will he has the power to believe and repent at any moment, he will defer faith and repentance. A sense of danger excites; a sense of security puts to sleep. A company of gamblers in the sixth story are told that the building is on fire. One of them answers, “We have the key to the fire escape,” and all continue the game. Suddenly one exclaims, “The key is lost”; all immediately spring to their feet and endeavor to escape. While there was the belief of security, there was apathy; the instant there was a knowledge of insecurity, there was action.
5. If the law can be perfectly obeyed by “natural ability” or by will without right inclination, then “moral ability” is superfluous. But if the law cannot be obeyed except by the union of natural and moral ability or by will with right inclination, then either alone is insufficient.

The following propositions comprise the substance of the Augustino-Calvinistic doctrine of inability. (1) There is a free self-determination or inclining to evil in the sinner’s will. (2) There is an inability of the sinner to self-determine or incline to good that results from his self-determining or inclining to evil. This inability is culpable because it is the product of the sinner’s agency. (3) The Holy Spirit reoriginates self-determination or inclination to good in the sinner’s will. (4) The sinner’s will is wholly, not partially, dependent upon the divine Spirit for a holy self-determination or inclination. (5) God has elected an immense “multitude whom no man can number” to be the subjects of his regenerating power.

Actual transgressions are the particular sins that proceed from original sin. They are the individual’s sins of act in distinction from his inherited nature and inclination. Original sin is one; actual sin is manifold. “Actual” in this connection is not the contrary of “imaginary.” Actual transgressions are accompanied with more or less of self-consciousness.

Actual transgressions are (a) interior, namely, a particular conscious doubt in the mind or a particular conscious lust in the heart. These are single manifestations of the general inclination. The worship of the creature or idolatry (Rom. 1:25) is the generic corruption, and an internal actual transgression is the outworking of this in a particular ambitious purpose or a proud aspiration or a malignant emotion, etc. And actual transgressions are (b) exterior, namely, theft, lie, homicide, suicide, etc.

The depravity or corruption of nature is total: Man is "wholly inclined to evil, and that continually" (Westminster Larger Catechism 25); "God saw that every imagination of the thoughts of man was only evil continually" (Gen. 6:5). There can be but a single dominant inclination in the will at one and the same time, though with it there may be remnants of a previously dominant inclination. Adam began a new sinful inclination. This expelled the prior holy inclination. He was therefore totally depraved, because there were no remainders of original righteousness left after apostasy, as there are remainders of original sin left after regeneration. This is proved by the fact that there is no struggle between sin and holiness in the natural man like that in the spiritual man. In the regenerate, "the flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh" (Gal. 5:17). Holiness and sin are in a conflict that causes the regenerate to "groan within themselves" (Rom. 8:23). But there is no such conflict and groaning in the natural man. Apostasy was the fall of the human will, with no remnants of original righteousness. Regeneration is the recovery of the human will, with some remnants of original sin.

Total depravity means the entire absence of holiness, not the highest intensity of sin. A totally depraved man is not as bad as he can be, but he has no holiness, that is, no supreme love of God. He worships and loves the creature rather than the Creator (Rom. 1:25).

S U P P L E M E N T S

4.5.1 (see p. 551). Edwards {OriginalSin in Works 2.385n) makes Adam's sin to be the union of an evil inclining to an end with an evil choice of a means: "Although there was no natural [created] sinful inclination in unfallen Adam, yet an inclination to that sin of eating the forbidden fruit was begotten in him by the delusion and error he was led into, and this inclination to eat the forbidden fruit must precede his actual eating." Strictly speaking, however, the sinful inclination (desire) was not "to eat the forbidden fruit" as fruit, but to obtain the forbidden knowledge of good and evil. This inclination or desire for the selfish end prompted the choice of means for obtaining it, that is, the volition by which the fruit was plucked and eaten. Edwards here, as in other places, confounds inclination with volition and speaks of "an inclination to eat." which properly was only a decision to eat. An inclination is something permanent; a volition is instantaneous and transient and is indifferent toward the means it employs. Eve desired the forbidden knowledge. This was the main thing with her. She had no desire for the fruit as fruit to satisfy hunger. If she could have obtained the knowledge by any other means she would have chosen it just as readily.

Owen also {Arminianism in Works 5.123-36 [ed. Russell]) describes Adam's sin as the union of inclination and volition, of an evil desire with an evil act: "In the ninth article of our (English) church, which is concerning original sin, I observe especially four things: First, that it is an inherent evil, the fault and corruption of the nature of every man. Second, that it is a thing not subject or conformable to the law of God; but has in itself, even after baptism, the nature of sin. Third, that by it we are averse from God and inclined to all manner of evil. Fourth, that it deserves God's wrath and damnation, all of which are frequently and plainly taught in the word of God. Respecting the first point: It is an inherent sin and pollution of nature, having a proper guilt of its own, making us responsible to the wrath of God, and not a bare imputation of another's fault to us. his posterity. David describes it as the being shaped in iniquity and conceived in sin.' Neither was this peculiar to him alone; he had it not from the particular iniquity of his next progenitors, but by an ordinary propagation from the common parent of us all. The Scriptures cast an aspersion of guilt or desert of punishment on this sinful nature itself, as in Eph. 2:1-3: 'We are dead in trespasses and sins, being by nature children of wrath.' They fix the original pravity in the heart, will, mind, and understanding (Eph. 4:18; Rom. 12:2; Gen. 6:5). They place it in the flesh or whole man (Rom. 6:6; Gal. 5:16), so that it is not a bare imputation of another's fault but an intrinsic adjacent [associated] corruption of our nature itself, that we call by this name of original sin. In respect of our wills, we are not innocent [but guilty] of the first transgression; for we all sinned in Adam, as the apostle affirms. Now all sin is voluntary, say the Remonstrants, and therefore Adam's transgression was our voluntary sin also, and that in divers respects: First, in that his voluntary act is imputed to us as ours, by reason of the covenant which was made with him in our behalf; but because this, consisting in an imputation, must be extrinsic to us; therefore, second, we say, that Adam being the root and head of all humankind, and we all branches from that root, all parts of that body of which he was the head, his will may be said to be ours; we were then all that one man, we were all in him, and had no other will but his; so that though that [will] be extrinsic unto us considered as particular persons, yet it is intrinsic, as we are all parts of one common nature: as in him we sinned, so in him we had a will of sinning. So that original sin, though hereditary and natural, is no way involuntary or put into us against our wills. It possesses our wills and inclines us to voluntary sins. Scripture is clear that the sin of Adam is the sin of us all. not only by propagation and communication (whereby not his singular [individual) fault, but something of the same nature [with it] is derived unto us), but also by an imputation of his actual transgression unto us all, his singular [individual] transgression being by this means made ours. The grounds of this imputation are (1) that we were then in him and parts of him and (2) that he sustained the place of our whole nature in the covenant God made with him. When divines affirm that by Adam's sin we are guilty of damnation, they do not mean that any are damned for his particular act, but that by his sin and our sinning in him. by God's most just ordination we have contracted that exceeding pravity and sinfulness of nature which deserves the curse of God and eternal damnation. It must be an inherent uncleanness that actually excludes out of the kingdom of heaven (Rev. 21:27), which uncleanness the apostle shows to be in infants not sanctified by an interest in the covenant." In the same manner with Owen, the Formula of Concord 1 prohibits the separation of the first sin from the corruption produced by it: "We reject and condemn that dogma by which it is asserted that original sin is merely the liability and debt arising from another's transgression, transmitted to us apart from any corruption of our nature."

One school of later Calvinists, on the contrary, explains the corruption of nature in each individual soul to be the effect of two sovereign acts of God: (1) The imputation to it of the vicarious sin of Adam as its representative; (2) the punitive withholding of divine influences at the instant of its creation ex nihilo, on the ground of this imputation. Hodge, for example {Princeton Essays 1.146.149). says: “According to the common view of immediate imputation, the sin of Adam [as their representative) is imputed to all his posterity as the ground of punishment antecedently to inherent corruption, which in fact results from the penal withholding of divine influences… . The punishment we suffer for Adam’s sin is abandonment on the part of God. the withholding of divine influences; corruption is consequent on this abandonment.” According to this view the corruption of nature is the result not of Adams agency but of the agency of God in the two acts above mentioned It does not naturally and inevitably result from the act of Adam in disobeying the Eden statute. The elder Calvinists, on the contrary, holding to the substantial union of Adam and his posterity, explain this corruption of the individual soul as the natural and inseparable consequence of Adam’s transgression in Eden, thereby making it to be the culpable and punishable product of Adam and his posterity, as a unity, in their fall from God. Owen is an example in the extract just given: “The Scriptures cast an aspersion of guilt or desert of punishment on this sinful nature itself—this original pravity in the heart, will. mind, and understanding—so that it is not a bare imputation of another’s fault, but an intrinsic adjacent [associated] corruption of our nature itself that we call by this name of original sin Adam’s transgression was our voluntary sin also: First, in that his voluntary act is imputed to us as ours by reason of the covenant which was made with him in our behalf; but because this consisting in an imputation must be extrinsic to us therefore. Second, we say that Adam being the root and head of all humankind, and we all branches from that root, all parts of that body of which he was the head, his will may be said to be ours: we were all that one man, we were all in him, and had no other will but his; so that though that [will] be extrinsic unto us considered as particular individual persons, yet it is intrinsic as we are all parts of one common nature; as in him we sinned, so in him we had a will of sinning. So that original sin. though hereditary and natural, is in no way involuntary, or put into us against our wills When divines affirm that by Adam’s sin we are guilty of damnation, they do not mean that any are damned for his particular act [as an individual representing not including his posterity], but that by his sin and our sinning in him, by God’s most just ordination we have contracted that exceeding pravity and sinfulness of nature which deserves the curse of God and eternal damnation.” It is impossible to make this view of the relation of corruption in the individual to the sin of Adam mean that “inherent corruption results from the penal withholding of divine influences” and not from Adam’s act of transgression.

4.5.2 (see p. 552). Howe (Vanity of Man as Mortal) argues in the same way as Anselm respecting the simple self-motion and self-origination of the will’s inclination or willingness and the irrationality of seeking any other cause of self-motion than the self. Speaking of the unwillingness of the Christian to die and his assigning as the reason that he is “unassured of heaven,” he says, “it is not so much because we are unassured of heaven, but because we love this world better, and our hearts center in it as our most desirable good. Therefore we see how unreasonable it is to allege that we are unwilling to change states because we are unassured. The truth is that we are unassured because we are unwilling; and what then follows? We are unwilling because we are unwilling And so we may endlessly dispute round and round, from unwillingness to unwillingness. But is there no way to get out of this unhappy circle? In order to it, let the case be more fully understood. Either this double unwillingness must be referred to the same thing or to divers, either to itself or to something else. If to the same thing, it is not sense, it signifies nothing. For having to assign a cause of their unwillingness to quit the body, to say it is because they are unwilling is to assign no proper cause. But if they refer the unwill-ingness to something else than itself and say that they are unwilling to leave the body because they are unwilling to forsake earth for heaven, this is a proper cause.”

A cause, in the proper sense of the term, is something different from the effect. But when unwillingness is said to be caused by unwillingness, the so-called cause and effect are not different things but the very same. The truth is that when anything is self-caused it is taken out of the category of cause proper and effect proper and brought into that of free will or self-determination. Hence, to ask for a cause of sin that is other than the self-inclining of the will is to make sin like an effect in the natural world; in other words, no sin at all.

4.5.3 (see p. 555). A kind of good in certain respects can be perceived in an object presented as a temptation to a holy being, without there being a sinful lust for it. Besides the instance of unfallen Eve and the fruit of the tree of knowledge as "good for food" and "pleasant to the eye." that of Christ and his temptation is in point. When "all the kingdoms of the earth and the glory of them" were presented to him as an object of temptation, he could perceive a species of good in earthly power and dominion without desiring it ambitiously and lusting after it for the purpose of self-aggrandizement. He could view it unselfishly as affording its possessor the means of influence and usefulness among mankind and might desire it only as such, without longing for it as the means of self-glorification

4.5.4 (see p. 556). Milton represents Adam as perceiving that the inward desire of Eve for the forbidden knowledge was lustful and therefore of the nature of sin:

> Bold deed have you presumed, adventurous Eve,
> And peril great invoked, who thus has dared.
> Had it been only coveting to eye
> That sacred fruit, sacred to abstinence.

—Paradise Lost 9 .920

4.5.5(see p 558). It is a favorite device of rationalism to explain Paulinism by rabbinism. It is contended that the peculiarities of St. Paul's conception of Christianity proceed from his training in the rabbinic theology. Edersheim (Life of Jesus 1.165-66) refutes this by showing the essential difference between the Old Testament and the rabbinic conception of the Messiah and his redemption: "The general conception which the rabbis had formed of the Messiah differed totally from what was presented by the prophet of Nazareth. Thus, what is the fundamental divergence between the two may be said to have existed long before the events which finally divided them. It is the combination of letters which constitutes words, and the same letters may be combined into different words. Similarly, both rabbinism and what by anticipation we des-ignate Christianity might regard the same predictions as messianic and look for their fulfillment; while at the same time the messianic ideal of the synagogue might be quite other than that to which the faith and the hope of the church have clung.

"The Messiah and his history are not presented in the Old Testament as something separated from or superadded to Israel. The history, the institutions, and the predictions of Israel run up into him. He is the typical Israelite, nay. typical Israel itself; alike the crown, the completion, and the representative of Israel. He is the Son of God and the servant of the Lord, but in the highest and only true sense which had given its meaning to all the preparatory development. This organic unity of Israel and the Messiah explains how events, institutions, and predictions which initially were purely Israelitish could with truth be regarded as finding their full accomplishment in the Messiah. From this point of view the whole Old Testament becomes the perspective in which the figure of the Messiah stands out. And perhaps the most valuable element in rabbinic commentary on messianic times is that in which it is so frequently explained that all the miracles and deliverances of Israel's past would be reenacted, only in a much wider manner, in the days of the Messiah. Thus the whole past was symbolic and typical of the future. It is in this sense that we would understand the two sayings of the Talmud: All the prophets prophesied only of the days of the Messiah' and the world was created only for the Messiah.' In accordance with all this the ancient synagogue found references to the Messiah in many more passages of the Old Testament than those verbal predictions to which we generally appeal Their number amounts to upward of 456 (75 from the Pentateuch, 243 from the Prophets, and 138 from the Hagiographa), and their messianic application is supported by more than 558 references to the most ancient rabbinic writings. But comparatively few of these would be termed verbal predictions. Rather would it seem as if every event were regarded as prophetic, and every prophecy, whether by fact or by word (prediction), as a light to cast its sheen on the future, until the picture of the messianic age in the far background stood out in the hundredfold variegated brightness of prophetic events and prophetic utterances. Of course there was danger that, amid these dazzling lights or in the crowd of figures, the grand central personality should not engage the attention it claimed, and so the meaning of the whole be lost in the contem-plation of the details This danger was the greater from the absence of any deeper spiritual elements. All that Israel needed: Study of the law and good works,' lay within the reach of everyone; and all that Israel hoped for was national restoration. Everything else was but means to these ends; the Messiah himself only the grand instrument in attaining them. Thus viewed, the picture presented would be of Israel's exaltation, rather than of the salvation of the world. To this and to the idea of Israel's exclusive spiritual position in the world must be traced much that otherwise would seem utterly irrational in the rabbinic pictures of the latter days. But in such a picture there would be neither room nor occasion for a Messiah Savior, in the only sense in which such a heavenly mission could be rational or the heart of humanity respond to it. The rabbinic ideal of the Messiah was not that of a light to lighten the Gentiles and the glory of his people Israel —the satisfaction of the wants of humanity and the completion of Israel's mission—but quite different even to contrariety. On the other hand, it is equally noteworthy that the purely national elements, which well nigh formed the sum total of the rabbinic expectation, scarcely entered into the teaching of Jesus about the kingdom of God. And the more we realize that Jesus did so fundamentally separate himself from all the ideas of his time, the more evidential is it of the fact that he was not the Messiah of Jewish conception, but derived his mission from a source unknown to or at least ignored by the leaders of the people.

"But still, as the rabbinic ideas were at least based on the Old Testament, we need not wonder that they also embodied the chief features of the messianic history Accordingly, a careful perusal of their Scripture quotations shows that the main postulates of the New Testament concerning the Messiah are fully supported by rabbinic statements. Thus, such doctrines as the premundane existence of the Messiah, his elevation above Moses and even above the angels, his representative character, his cruel sufferings and derision, his violent death and that for his people, his work on behalf of the living and the dead, his redemption and restoration of Israel, the opposition of the Gentiles, their partial judgment and conversion, the prevalence of his law. the universal blessings of the latter days, and his kingdom—can be clearly deduced from unquestioned passages in ancient rabbinic writings. Only, as we might expect, all is there indistinct, incoherent, unexplained, and from a much lower standpoint. Most painfully is this felt in connection with the one element on which the New Testament most insists. There is, indeed, in rabbinic writings frequent reference to the sufferings and even the death of the Messiah, and these are brought into connection with our sins—as how could it be otherwise in view of Isa. 53 and other passages?—and in one most remarkable comment the Messiah is represented as willingly taking upon him all these sufferings, on condition that all Israel—the living, the dead, and those yet unborn—should be saved. But there is only the most indistinct reference to the removal of sin by the Messiah in the sense of vicarious sufferings. In connection with what has been stated one most important point must be kept in view. So far as their opinions can be gathered from their writings, the great doctrines of original sin and of the sinfulness of our whole nature were not held by the ancient rabbis. Of course, it is not meant that they denied the consequences of sin, either as concerned Adam himself or his descendants; but the final result is far from that seriousness which attaches to the fall in the New Testament, where it is presented as the basis of the need of a Redeemer, who as the second Adam, restores what the first had lost"

The difference between St Paul's conception of the Messiah, of the fall and original sin. of vicarious atonement, and of the nature of redemption and the rabbinic conception as enunciated by a writer deeply versed in rabbinic learning is fundamental. Had the apostle not been lifted out of and beyond his early rabbinic training by the "revelations" and inspiration subsequent to his conversion, of which he repeatedly affirms he was the subject, he never could have made that statement of Christian doctrine which goes under his name and which, next to the gospels, has exerted more influence than any other part of Scripture in shaping Christianity and Christendom.

4.5.6 (see p. 562). Graves (Pentateuch3.3) refers the divine threatening to "visit the sins of the fathers upon the children" to the sufferings in this life, which God in an extraordinary manner sometimes inflicted upon violators of the Mosaic statutes and regulations, and not to the retributions of the future [eternal] state, which, though well known and taught by Moses, were not presented and employed by him as the sanctions of his legislation. "The only circumstance." he says, "that makes this denunciation appear severe or unjust is the supposition that the sanctions of a future state are understood; which it would certainly be repugnant to divine justice to suppose should be distributed according to such a rule as this. But this objection vanishes the moment we are convinced that the punishment here meant relates only to outward circumstances of prosperity or distress in the present life. Because if such a direct and visible sanction was necessary in the particular system of providential administration by which God thought fit to govern the Jewish race, it is evident that any inequality as to individuals would be certainly and easily remedied in a future life; so that each should receive his final reward exactly according to his true merit in the sight of God. and thus 'the judge of all the earth do right.'

"Now it seems undeniable that such an immediate and visible sanction was a necessary part of the Jewish polity, so far as this required a providential distribution of national rewards and pun ishments These affecting the great mass of the people and extending through such portions of time as were necessary to give them their full efficacy in forming the national character could not be confined within the limits of a single generation or exclude from their operation each private family in succession, as the heads of that family might drop off whose conduct had originally contributed to swell the mass of national guilt or contribute to the progress of national improvement. This is illustrated in the case of Achan, whose children were involved in the punishment of his violation of the divine command (Josh. 7:24), and in the punishment inflicted in consequence of the idolatries of Jeroboam, Baasha. and Ahab, involving their entire posterity.

"But the operation of this sanction was not confined to the participation of national rewards or punishments; it certainly affected individuals who violated the commands to which it was annexed, even though such violation was confined to themselves and could not therefore draw down any national chastisement. Let it be recollected that the great crime, the temporal punishment of which was to extend to the third and fourth generation, was idolatry— that source of all profaneness and pollution which under the Jewish polity was not only a violation of that religious duty for which the children of Israel were set apart from every nation under heaven, but was besides the highest crime against the state, which acknowledged Jehovah as supreme sovereign, the sole object of civil allegiance as well as of religious worship. To introduce idolatry was therefore to subvert the foundation of the social union and engage in the foulest treason and the most audacious rebellion. The supreme sovereign therefore denounced against such treason and rebellion not only condign punishment on the offender himself, but the extension of this punishment to his family and immediate descendants; a principle recognized by many of the most civilized states in which the crime of treason is punished not only by death but by the confiscation of property and the taint of blood; a principle which when carried into execution by a human tribunal may operate in particular instances with unmerited or excessive severity, but which in the Jewish theocracy was applied in every instance by unerring justice. For the deity,' as Warbur-ton well observes, though he allowed capital punishment to be inflicted for the crime of lese majesty on the person of the offender by the delegated administration of the law, yet concerning his family or posterity he reserved the inquisition of the crime to himself and expressly forbade the magistrate to meddle with it in the common course of justice. The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the father; every man shall be put to death for his own sin (Deut. 24:16). We see the operation of this law in 2 Kings 14:5-6, where we are told that Amaziah. king of Judah. as soon as the kingdom was confirmed in his hand, slew his servants which had slain the king, his father. But the children of the murderers he slew not, according unto that which is written in the book of the law of Moses, wherein the Lord commanded, saying, The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, nor the children be put to death for the fathers; but every man shall be put to death for his own sin. Now God's appropriating to himself the execution of this law would abundantly justify the equity of it. even supposing it had been given as a part of a universal religion; for why was the magistrate forbidden to imitate God's method of punishing but because no power less than omniscient could in all cases keep clear of injustice in such an inquisition?'

"Maimonides also understands that this visiting of the sins of the fathers upon the children is aimed at idolatry: As to that character of God of visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, know that this relates only to the crime of idolatry; as may be proved from the Decalogue, which says, On the third and fourth generation of them who hate me; for nobody is said to hate God but an idolater; as the law expresses (Deut. 12:31), Every abomination to the Lord which he hates have they done unto their gods. And mention is made of the fourth generation, because no man can hope to see more of his progeny than four generations.

"Thus the principle of visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generations, by extending the temporal judgments denounced against the perpetration of idolatry to the immediate posterity of the idolater, is perfectly consistent with divine justice; because it interferes not with that final retribution at which every man shall be rewarded according to his works. That this sanction of the Jewish law was not to be understood as a general principle of the divine economy under every form of civil society and every degree of religious improvement, but merely as a necessary part of that administration of an extraordinary providence by which the Jewish law was sanctioned and upheld during the earlier periods of its existence, has been proved by Warburton from a circumstance which infidel writers have laid much stress upon, as an instance of contradiction between different parts of Scripture, when in truth it was only a gradual change in the divine system, wisely and mercifully adapted to the gradual improvement of the human mind. Toward the conclusion of this extraordinary economy, observes Warburton, when God by the later prophets reveals his purpose to give them a new dispensa-tion, in which a future state of rewards and punishments was to be substituted in place of an immediate extraordinary providence, as the sanction of religion, it is then declared in the most express manner that he will abrogate the law of punishing children for the sins of their parents (Jer. 31:29-33; Ezek. 11:19-21; 18:1ff.).

"In this way. in the Jewish system, a people of gross and carnal minds and shortsighted views, slow to believe anything they could not themselves experience and therefore almost incapable of being sufficiently influenced by the remote prospect of a future life and the pure and spiritual blessedness of a celestial existence, were wisely and necessarily placed under a law which was supported by a visible extraordinary providence, conferring immediate rewards and punishments on the person of the offender; or which laid hold of his most powerful instincts, by denouncing that his crimes would be visited upon his children and his children's children to the third and fourth generation. And this proceeding was a necessary part of that national discipline under which the Jews were placed and was free from all shadow of injustice. Because when the innocent were afflicted for their parents' crimes, as Warburton has well observed, it was by the deprivation of temporal benefits, in their nature forfeitable. Or should this not so clearly appear, yet we may be sure that God, who reserved to himself the right of visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children, would perfectly rectify any apparent inequality in the course of his providential government over the chosen people in another and a better world by repaying the innocent who had necessarily suffered here with an eternal and abundant recompense."

That all this class of sufferings which result from the individual sins of immediate ancestors are not penal and retributive, like the suffering that results from the sin of Adam, is also proved by the fact that the whole penalty threatened for sin in the legal covenant was physical and spiritual death; and this comes upon every man because of Adam's sin, not because of the sins of secondary ancestors. Furthermore, men are not twice punished: once for Adam's sin and again for their immediate parents' sins. And again, this class of sufferings is not universal but extraordinary and special. Penalty proper is common and universal and falls upon all the posterity of Adam in the same way and without exception ; but the sufferings that befell the family of Korah were uncommon and exceptional and distinguished them from the rest of the families of Israel. The same is true of the sufferings which have come upon the descendants of Ham for their father's sin. The descendants of Shem and Japhet have escaped them

4.5.7 (see p. 569). Augustine teaches that original sin is guilt in the following extracts: "We understand the apostle to declare that judgment' is predicated 'of one offense unto condemnation' entirely on the ground that even if there were in men nothing but original sin, it would be sufficient for their condemnation. For however much heavier will be their condemnation who have added their own sins to the original offense (and it will be the more severe in individual cases, in proportion to the sins of individuals), still, even that sin alone which was originally derived unto men not only excludes from the kingdom of God, which infants are unable to enter (as the Pelagians themselves allow) unless they have received the grace of Christ [in baptism] before they die, but also alienates from salvation and everlasting life, which cannot be anything else than the kingdom of God, to which fellowship with Christ alone introduces us" (Forgiveness and Baptism 1.15). "The human race lies under a just condemnation, and all men are the children of wrath. Of which wrath the Lord Jesus says: He that believes not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abides on him ' He does not say it will come, but it abides on him.' For every man is born with it; whereupon the apostle says: 'We were by nature the children of wrath even as others.' Now as men were lying under this wrath by reason of their original sin, and as this original sin was the more heavy and deadly in proportion to the number and magnitude of the actual sins which were added to it, there was need of a mediator, that is, of a reconciler who by the offering of one sacrifice, of which all the sacrifices of the law and the prophets were types, should take away this wrath" (Enchiridion33). "Infants who have not yet done any works of their own, either good or bad, will be condemned on account of original sin alone, if they have not been delivered by the Savior's grace in the laver of regeneration [i.e., baptism]. As for all others who, in the use of their free will, have added to original sin sins of their own commission and who have not been delivered by God's grace from the power of darkness and admitted into the kingdom of Christ, they will receive judgment according to the desert not of original sin only, but also of the acts of their own will" (Letter 215 to Valentinum).

4.5.8 (see p. 575). Job (10:15) refers his holiness to God, but his sinfulness to himself as the author: "If I be wicked woe unto me; and if I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head." Leighton (Theological Lectures, 10) concisely states the doctrine thus: "If you are sinful and act sinfully, blame yourselves; if you are holy and act holily, praise God."

4.5.9 (see p. 577). Calvin thus distinguishes original from indwelling sin (4.15.10—12): “Original sin is the pravity and corruption of our nature which first renders us obnoxious to the wrath of God and then produces in us the works of the flesh.’ Two things are to be distinctly observed. First, that our nature being so entirely depraved and vitiated, we are on account of this very corruption considered as convicted and condemned in the sight of God, to whom nothing is acceptable but righteousness, innocence, and purity. And therefore even infants themselves bring their own condemnation into the world with them, who though they have not yet produced the fruits of their iniquity, yet have the seed of it within them; even their whole nature is, as it were, a seed of sin and therefore cannot but be odious to God. By baptism, believers are certified that this condemnation is removed from them; since the Lord promises us by this sign that a full and entire remission is granted both of the guilt which is to be imputed to us and of the punishment to be inflicted on account of that guilt. They also receive righteousness such as the people of God may obtain in this life, that is. only by imputation, because the Lord in his mercy accepts them as righteous and innocent.

“The other thing to be remarked is that this depravity never ceases in us, but is continually producing new fruits—these ‘works of the flesh,’ which are like the emission of flame and sparks from a furnace or streams of water from an unfailing spring. For concupiscence never dies nor is altogether extinguished in men, till by death they are delivered from the body of death. Baptism, indeed, promises us the submersion of our pharaoh and the mortification of sin; yet not so that it no longer exists or gives us no further trouble; but only that it shall never overcome us. For so long as we live immured in this prison of the body, the relics of sin will dwell in us: but if we hold fast by faith the promise which God has given us in baptism, they shall not domineer or reign over us. But let no one deceive himself, let no one indulge himself in his sin, when he hears that sin always dwells in us. These things are not said in order that those who are already too prone to do evil may securely sleep in their sins, but only that those who are tempted by their corrupt propensities may not faint and sink into despondency; but that they may rather reflect that they are yet in the right way and may consider themselves as having made some progress when they experience their corruption diminishing from day to day, till they shall attain the mark at which they are aiming, even the final destruction of their depravity, which will be accomplished at the close of this mortal life. In the meantime let them not cease to fight manfully and press forward to complete victory. In all this we say nothing different from what is clearly stated by Paul in the sixth and seventh chapters of the Epistle to the Romans.”

4.5.10 (see p. 580). Respecting the use of the term nature when applied to original sin. the Formula of Concord 1 thus defines: “We must carefully observe the various significations of the word nature, the ambiguity of which the Manicheans abusing disguise their error and lead many simple men into error. For sometimes nature signifies the substance itself of man. as when we say: God created human nature. But sometimes by the word nature is understood the disposition, condition, defect, or vice of a thing implanted and inherent in its nature, as when we say: It is the serpent’s nature to strike; man’s nature is to sin and is sin. In this latter signification , the word nature denotes. not the substance itself of man, but something which inheres and is fixed in his nature or substance. As respects the Latin words substantia and accidens, since these are not expressions of Holy Scripture and moreover are not understood by the common people, we should abstain from them in public assemblies where the unlearned multitude are taught; and in this matter account should be taken of the more simple and untaught. But in schools and among learned men (to whom the signification of these words is known and who can use them correctly and without abuse, properly discriminating the essence of anything from that which has been added to it from without and inheres in it by way of accident), they are to be retained in the discussion concerning original sin. For by means of these terms the distinction between the work of God and the work of the devil can be explained with the greatest clearness. For the devil cannot create any substance, but can only by way of accident and under the permission of God deprave a substance created by God."

4.5.11(see p. 580). Turretin (10.4.39) gives the following account of the distinction between natural and moral inability: "The inability of sinful man is not to be denominated moral simply in distinction from natural, since that is called morally impossible by moral philosophers which arises from custom rather than from nature and is indeed difficult to be done, but nevertheless is sometimes done and cannot be reckoned among the things that are absolutely impossible; while the inability of the sinner is innate and insuperable. Neither is it to be denominated natural simply, since that is natural on account of which we are called neither good nor evil, while it is certain that this inability is something vicious and culpable. Nor is it natural in distinction from voluntary, as there is a natural inability in a stone or a brute to speak, since our inability is especially voluntary (maxime voluntaria). Nor is it natural as arising from a lack of natural faculty or power, like the inability of a blind man to see, of a paralytic to walk, of a dead man to rise from the grave; because our inability does not exclude but always supposes in man the natural powers of intellect and will.

"It is better, therefore, to denominate the sinner's inability both natural and moral, in different respects. It is moral (1) objectively because relating to moral duties, (2) originally because it originates from moral corruption spontaneously brought in by the sin of man, and (3) formally because it is voluntary and culpable, overflowing into the disposition (habitum) of the corrupt will It is also natural (1) originally because it is congenital with us and by nature—not as nature was created by God but as nature is corrupted by man—as we are said by St Paul to be by nature children of wrath' and by David to be shaped in iniquity and conceived in sin,' as poison is natural in a serpent and rapacity in a wolf; (2)subjectively because it infects our whole nature and causes the deprivation of that power of well-doing which was bestowed upon the first man and constituted original righteousness, and(3)effectually (eventualiter) because it is unconquerable and insuperable, not less than the merely natural inability of a blind man to see or a dead man to rise For sinful man is no more able to convert himself than a blind man to see or a dead man to rise from the grave. As therefore this inability is rightly called moral and voluntary to indicate the responsibility and guilt of man and render him inexcusable, so it is well denominated natural to express the greatness of his conuption and demonstrate the necessity of divine grace, because, as it is congenital to man, so it is insuperable by him and he cannot shake it off but by the omnipotent energy of the Holy Spirit."

4.5.12 (see p 583). The equivocation and self-contradiction in Edwards's doctrine of "natural ability and inability" are seen by analyzing the following extract from his work on the will given on p. 597: "If the will [i.e.. the inclination] fully complies, and the proposed effect does not prove, according to the laws of nature, to be connected with his [executive] volition, the man is perfectly excused; he has a natural inability to the thing required. For the will [inclination] itself, as has been observed, is all that can be directly and immediately required by command: and other things only indirectly, as connected with the will. If therefore there be a full compliance of will [inclination], the person has done his duty." Edwards here declares that the person who "has a natural inability to the thing required" because he is prevented by the "laws of nature' from executing his inclination by volitions has nevertheless "done his duty" by the inward inclining and "complying" of his will. This shows that "natural inability." as Edwards defines it. does not prevent the performance of man's duty to God. If this be so. then "natural inability" is of little consequence. It may exist, and yet the whole duty of man be performed notwithstanding. And on the other hand, if "natural ability" be as Edwards conceives of it the mere possession of a will apart from its hostile inclination toward God. such an ability is not adequate to the performance of the duty of loving God supremely In this case, also, "natural ability" is valueless, because the duty of man cannot be performed by it. This shows that

Edwards, in order to meet the exigencies of his argument with his Arminian opponents, employs the term ability is a false sense and not in its true and common signification of real efficient power.

Anselm (Why the God-Man?2. 17) directs attention to the two meanings of "power." according as reference is had to inclination or to volition: "We found when considering the question whether Christ could lie that there are two senses of the word power in regard to it: the one referring to his disposition, the other to the outward act; and that though he had the power to lie externally and verbally, he was so disposed (a seipso habuit) that he could not lie inwardly and from inclination." But in this instance there is no equivocal use of "ability" in the sense of quasi power. The ability of Christ to vocalize the words of a lie was real ability; and his inability to incline to lie was real inability.

4.5.13 (see p. 584). The question between the advocate of ability and the advocate of inability is whether sinful man is able to love God supremely because he so wills or inclines under the regenerating operation of the Holy Spirit or whether he so inclines because of his own inherent power. Is ability the effect of human or of divine power? The advocate of inability contends that ability to love and obey God is the result of enabling the fallen will by regenerating it. that ability is the effect of divine acluation of the will. The Westminster Confession, which agrees with all the Calvinistic creeds upon this point, represents "enabling" or ability as the result of inclining the will and inclining as the result of the operation of the divine Spirit in the will: "Effectual calling is the work of God's almighty power and grace, whereby, by savingly enlightening the minds of his elect and renewing and powerfully determining their wills, they are made willing and able freely to answer his call and to accept and embrace the grace offered therein" (Westminster Larger Catechism 67). Apart from the "powerful determining of the sinful will" in effectual calling, there is no power in the natural man to incline the will from sin to holiness. Edwards asserts this with great energy, both in his doctrinal and controversial writings. In his "Reply to Williams" (Works 1.246-47), for example, he argues that an unconverted person has no right to enter into covenant with God in his own strength and to promise to keep it by his own inherent power or ability, because he cannot keep his covenant and fulfill his promise: "The promises and oaths of unregenerate men must not only be insincere, but very presumptuous, upon these two accounts. (1) Because herein they take an oath to the Most High, which it is ten thousand to one they will break as soon as the words are out of their mouths by continuing still unconverted. To what purpose should ungodly men be encouraged to utter such promises and oaths before the church, for the church's acceptance? How contrary is it to the counsel given by the wise man in Eccles. 5:2, 4-6. (2) When an unconverted man makes such a promise he promises what he has not to give or what he has not sufficiency for the performance of—no sufficiency in himself nor any sufficiency in any other that he has a claim to or interest in. There is indeed a sufficiency in God to enable him; but he has no claim to it. If it be true that an unconverted man who is morally sincere may reasonably on the encouragement [given by God to all men indiscriminately in the promises of common grace] promise immediately to believe and repent, though this be not in his own power, then it will follow [according to Williams's affirmation that God will never be worse than his encouragement] that whenever an unconverted man covenants with such moral sincerity as gives a lawful right to the sacraments [according to Williams and the halfway covenant party], God never will fail of giving him converting grace that moment to enable him from thenceforward to believe and repent as he promises."

In Religious Affections (Works 3.71). Edwards finds "ability" in "inclination" alone: This new spiritual sense and the new dispositions that attend it are no new faculties but are new principles of nature. By a principle of nature in this place I mean that foundation which is laid in nature, either old [and sinful] or new [and holy], tor any particular manner or kind of exercise of the faculties of the soul or a natural habit or foundation for action giving a personal ability and disposition to exert the faculties in exercises of such a certain kind." This implies that if there be no "foundation for any particular manner of exercise of the faculties of the soul." that is, no habit, disposition, or inclination of the will; there is no ability to exert the faculties Only a holy disposition is able to love and obey God; only a sinful disposition is able to hate and resist him.

4.5.14 (see p. 587). Calvin and the Reformed theologians generally assert the "necessity" of sinning in the case of the fallen will (see the extract from Ursinus on p. 582 n. 96). Edwards does the same as the extract on p. 586 shows But it is not the necessity of compulsion which is the more common signification of the term. but the necessity produced by voluntary action and the certainty which results from a voluntary state of the will. Edwards (Will 4.3) describes it: "Men in their first use of such phrases as these, 'must, can't, can't help it, can't avoid it, necessary, unable, impossible, unavoidable, irresistible,' etc., use them to signify a necessity of constraint or restraint, a natural necessity or impossibility, or some necessity that the will has nothing to do in; which may be whether men will or no; and which may be supposed to be just the same, let men's inclinations and desires be what they will." Given an evil inclination, and evil thoughts, purposes, and actions are neces-sary in the sense of certain and invariable, but the evil inclination itself is not necessary in the sense of compelled. This is self-originated and is the simple self-motion of the will. Christ teaches this truth when he says that "a good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit" (Matt. 7:18). "The fallen will," says Calvin (2.3.5). is so bound by the slavery of sin that it cannot excite itself, much less devote itself to anything good; for such a disposition is the beginning of a conversion to God. which in the Scriptures is attributed solely to divine grace. Thus Jeremiah prays to the Lord to convert or turn him if he would have him turned (Jer. 31:18). When I assert that the will being deprived of its liberty [to good] is necessarily drawn or led into evil, I should wonder if anyone considered it as a harsh expression, since it has nothing in it absurd, nor is it unsanctioned by the custom of good men. It offends those who know not how to distinguish between necessity (necessilatem) and compulsion (coactionem). But if anyone should ask them whether God is not necessarily good (ne-cessario bonus) and whether the devil is not necessarily evil (ne-cessario malus) —what answer will they make? For there is such a close connection between the goodness of God and his deity that his being God is not more necessary than his being good. But the devil is by his [voluntary] fall so alienated from communion with all that is good that he can do nothing but what is evil. But if anyone should yelp (obganniaf) that little praise is due to God for his goodness which he is compelled (cogalur) to preserve, shall we not readily reply that his inability to do evil arises from his infinite goodness and not from the impulse of violence [compulsion]. Therefore if a necessity [infallible certainty] of doing well impairs not the liberty of the divine will in doing well; if the devil, who cannot but do evil, nevertheless sins voluntarily, who then will assert that man sins less voluntarily, because he is under a necessity of sinning [that springs from the state of his will]?"

In the above extract Calvin speaks of the fallen will's "being deprived of its liberty " He means liberty to good, not liberty in the abstract and unqualified sense. For he says that Satan "sins voluntarily." The action of the fallen will is free agency in the sense of self-motion; but this free action in sin effectually opposes and precludes free action in holiness. One free act prevents another free act. In interpreting the creeds of the Reformation and the systems of the elder divines, it is important to keep in mind the distinction between liberty and ability (for the two things are inseparable) to good and between liberty and ability to evil. They invariably deny to the fallen will liberty to good, but not liberty to evil in the sense of enforced self-determination to evil.

Owen [Saints' Perseverance, chap. 6) explains in the same manner: "God can effectually and infallibly as to the event cause his saints to continue trusting in him without the least abridgment of their liberty. If by [the word] necessitated to continue trusting, not the manner of God's operation with and in them for the compassing of the end proposed and the efficacy of his grace, whereby he does it, be intended, but only the certainty of the issue, rejecting the impropriety of the expression [namely, necessity], the thing itself we affirm to be here promised of God."

Anselm (Why the God-Man?2 b) explains “how although a thing may be necessary God may not do it by a compulsory necessity.” He says, “When one does a benefit from a necessity to which he is unwillingly subjected, little thanks are due to him or none at all. But when he freely places himself under the necessity of ben-efiting another and sustains that necessity without reluctance, then he certainly deserves great thanks for the favor. For this should not be called necessity but grace, inasmuch as he undertook it not with constraint but freely.” When God has voluntarily promised a thing, then he is under a necessity of fulfilling his promise; but he was under no necessity to promise. In like manner the sinner has voluntarily fallen from God and thus came under the necessity of sinning, but was under no necessity of falling from God.

Luther (On the Bondage of the Will, chap. 44) thus distinguishes the two significations of necessity: “We should carefully distinguish between a necessity of infallibility [certainty] and a necessity of coercion; since both good and evil men, though by their actions they fulfill the decree and appointment of God, yet are not forcibly constrained to do anything but act willingly.”

Edwards, in the following extract, seemingly teaches not only that the lost are in a helpless and necessitating self-bondage, but are destitute of liberty and moral agency His opponents contended that lost men and angels are still in a state of trial, because they still had the power to the contrary. “If,” says Edwards, “the damned are in a state of trial, they must be in a state of liberty and moral agency, as the advocates of future redemption will own; and so, according to their notion of liberty, must be under no necessity of continuing in their rebellion and wickedness, but may turn to God in their thorough subjection to his will, very speedily. And if the devils and damned spirits are in a state of probation and have liberty of will and are under the last and most extreme means to bring them to repentance, then it is possible that the greatest part, if not all of them, may be reclaimed by those extreme means and brought to repentance before the day of judgment. And if so, how could it certainly be predicted concerning the devil, that he should be cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and false prophet are, and should be tormented day and night, forever and ever ? And how can it be said that when he fell, he was cast down from heaven and reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day ?”

In this extract Edwards, taking the words as they read, teaches that the lost are not “in a state of liberty and moral agency” and that consequently they are under “a [compulsory] necessity of continuing in their rebellion and wickedness.” But he is using terms in the sense of his opponents and adopting “their notion of liberty.” By “liberty and moral agency” they meant power to the contrary, and by “necessity of continuing in wickedness.” he himself does not mean physical necessity but the self-bondage of the will, which is insuperable by the will. In denying free moral agency to the sinner, as his opponents defined it. he does not deny it as he himself defined it, in the sense of “being the immediate agent or the being that is acting or in the exercise of the act” (Will 4.1). The radical difference between the Augustino-Calvinistic definition of freedom and moral agency on the one side and the Semipelagian and Arminian on the other must ever be kept in mind when Edwards and other Calvinists deny “freedom and moral agency” to the fallen will. His intention is to deny that the sinful will can reverse its inclination and become holy by its own energy, but not that the sinful inclination itself is the unforced agency and movement of the will, for which the sinner is responsible. Both Augustine and the elder Calvinists, however, were more careful than Edwards was to avoid such seeming denials of free moral agency to the sinner, because they did not, even for the sake of argument, temporarily adopt their opponents’ idea of the will and moral agency, but rigorously stuck to their own idea and definition of it as simple self-determination without power to the contrary. The self-determination in sin enabled them to affirm liberty and responsibility in sin; and the want of power to the contrary enabled them to affirm bondage and inability in sin.

Augustine (Enchiridion 30) asserts the sinner’s freedom in sinning and denies his freedom to good because of the bondage pro duced by the sinning: “It was by the evil use of his free will that man destroyed both it and himself. For as a man who kills himself must of course be alive when he kills himself, but after he has killed himself ceases to live and cannot restore himself to life, so, when man by his own free will sinned, then sin begin victorious over him the freedom of the will [to good] was lost. ‘For of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage.’ This is the judgment of the Apostle Peter And as it is certainly true, what kind of liberty. I ask, can the bond slave possess except when it pleases him to sin? For he is freely in bondage who does with pleasure the will of his master. Accordingly, he who is the servant of sin is free to sin. And hence he will not be free to do right until, being freed from sin, he shall begin to be the sen/ant of righteousness [as Paul argues in Rom 6:18-20, 22]. And this is true liberty, for he has pleasure in righteous action; and it is at the same time a holy bondage, for he is subject to the will of God. But whence comes this liberty to do righteousness, to the man who is in bondage to sin and sold under sin. except he be redeemed by him who has said. If the Son shall make you free, you shall be free indeed ? And before this redemption is wrought in a man, when he is not yet free to do righteousness, how can he talk of the freedom of his will and his good works, except he be inflated by that foolish pride of boasting which the apostle restrains when he says, By grace are you saved, through faith ?”

This passage, which might be paralleled with scores like it from Augustine’s writings, contains his doctrine of free will and of freedom. The following are the principal points:

1. Freedom in willing is the actual self-motion or inclining of the will. It excludes indifference, because indifference implies that the will is not yet self-moving and inclining. Freedom is action; indifference is inaction.
2. A distinguishing characteristic of self-motion and inclination is pleasure The holy will enjoys obedience; the sinful will enjoys disobedience This evinces the freedom of the self-motion of the will; for were there compulsion there would be no enjoyment. The agent would not be conscious of doing as he pleases.
3. Right self-motion is incompatible with simultaneous wrong self-motion, and the converse. Free action in one direction is inability in respect to the other. Good inclination precludes evil inclination. The servant of sin is free in sinning, but not free to do right, because of his freedom in sin. His bondage to sin is the effect of his self-motion in sin.
4. Freedom to sin may be affirmed, and freedom to holiness denied. Sinful inclination is as really inclination as holy inclination, but it is false freedom because it conflicts with the moral law. When, therefore, Augustine and Calvin deny freedom to the sinner, as they often do, they do not deny his self-motion and voluntariness in sin, but his ability to the contrary, or his power to reverse and change his self-motion (cf. Shedd on Rom. 6:18-20. 22).

4.5.15 (see p. 592). That “sin is a privation, a defect rather than an effect,” may be thus illustrated. Sickness is the mere defect of health; the absence of health. But health is not the mere defect or absence of sickness. Health is the normal and right condition of the body, the positive state having its own positive characteristics. Sickness is the abnormal and wrong condition of the body, which is marked not by a set of positive characteristics antithetic to those of health, but only of negative characteristics which consist in the absence of the positive. For illustration, indigestion is the absence of certain properties that make up digestion, not the presence of certain other properties that make up indigestion. Simply ceasing to digest is indigestion; it is not necessary to introduce some new physical processes in order to indigestion, but merely to stop some old ones. Augustine [Enchiridion 13-14) thus explains the subject: “Every being, even if it be a defective one, insofar as it is a being is good and insofar as it is defective, is evil. Good and evil are contraries, but evil cannot exist without good or in anything that is not good Good, however, can exist without evil. For a man or an angel can exist without being wicked; but nothing can be wicked except a man or an angel; and so far as he is a man or an angel [i.e., a creature of God] he is good; so far as he is wicked he is an evil. Nothing can be corrupted except what is good, for corruption is nothing else but the destruction of good ‘

4.5.16 (see p. 598). Sin is idolatry, that is, creature worship. This is St. Paul’s definition in Rom 1:25: “Men worshiped and served thecreature more than the Creator.” All forms and aspects of sin are reducible to this. And this is the inclining of the human will to self as the ultimate end. because self is the particular creature in which selfishness is most interested. All other creatures are subordinate and subservient to this one. This idolatry is both freedom and bondage: “Whosoever [freely] commits sin is the slave of sin” (John 8:34); “of whom a man is [voluntarily] overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage” (2 Pet. 2:19). This sin is freedom because it is the uncompelled self-motion of the will; it is bondage because the will is unable to reverse its self-motion. Man is responsible and guilty for this creature worship because he originates and perpetuates it by self-determination;and he is helpless and ruined by it because he cannot overcome and extirpate his central self-determination by his superficial volitions and resolutions

PART 5

Christology

Christ’s Theanthropic Person

Preliminary Considerations

Christology (christou logos)[1] is that division of theological science which treats the person of the Redeemer.

As the doctrine of the Trinity is found in the Old Testament, so is that of the Redeemer. As there is an Old Testament trinitarianism, so there is an Old Testament Christology. Both doctrines, however, are less clearly revealed under the former economy than under the latter. Christ is explicit in asserting that the doctrine of his person is found in the Old Testament: “Many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which you see” (Matt. 13:17); “Abraham saw my day and was glad” (John 8:56; cf. 12:41; Luke 24:27); “the prophets searched diligently what the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow”[2] (1 Pet. 1:10-12).

The Redeemer is announced under several names in the Old Testa-ment. The earliest designation is the “seed of the woman” (Gen. 3:15). Christ himself adopts this designation in the title “Son of Man,” employed by himself but never by his apostles. The next name in order is Shiloh (49:10). Luther, Gesenius, Rosenmuller, Hengstenberg, and others explain this to mean the “peacemaker.” This is favored by other messianic texts: in Isa. 9:6 Messiah is denominated “prince of peace”; in Mic. 5:5 of the Redeemer it is said, “This man shall be our peace”; in Zech. 9:10 he is denominated the “speaker of peace”; and in Eph. 2:14 “our peace.”[3]‘ Others explain the term Shiloh to mean “the desired one” (Hag. 2:7); “he who shall be sent”; “his son” (Calvin); “he whose right it is” (Septuagint, Aquila, Symmachus, Onkelos); “the place Shiloh” (Eich-horn, Bleek, Hit/.ig, Ewald, Delitzsch, Kalisch).[4] In Isa. 7:14 the Redeemer is called Immanuel; in Dan. 9:25 Messiah; in Zech. 6:12 the branch; and in Mai. 3:1 the messenger of the covenant. The designation of the Redeemer that was most common among the Jews was Messiah or Anointed One (masiah),[5] rendered in the Septuagint by christos.[6] It is found 39 times in the Old Testament (see Alexander on Isa. 52:13).

The time of the Redeemer's advent is distinctly foretold in Gen. 49:10: "The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come." Historically, the scepter, that is, self-government, did not depart from the Hebrew nation, represented by the tribe of Judah {Judaei = Jews) until the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The time is again specified very particularly in Dan. 9:24-27: "Seventy weeks are determined upon your people and upon the holy city, to finish the transgression and to make an end of sins and to make reconciliation for iniquity and to bring in everlasting righteousness and to seal up the vision and prophecy and to anoint the Most Holy." In this prophecy, a day stands for a year; 70 weeks denoting 490 years. The prophet announces that in 7 weeks or 49 years from the end of the captivity Jerusalem should be rebuilt; that in 62 weeks or 434 years from the rebuilding Messiah should appear; and that in 1 week or 7 years from his appearance he should "confirm the covenant" and should be "cut off" "in the middle of the week."[7] In the different calculations of exegetes there is a difference of only ten years. The difficulty is to know exactly when the seventy weeks begin. Hales says that they begin from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus. W. Smith supposes that "the final and effectual edict of Artaxerxes was the commencing date and that this was issued in 457 B.C Exactly 490 years may be counted from this to the death of Christ in A.D. 33."

That the Jesus Christ of the New Testament is the Messiah promised in the Old Testament is proved by the agreement between the descriptions of the personage in each. In both he is …

1. the seed of the woman (Gen. 3:15; Ps. 22:10; Mic. 5:3; Gal. 4:4; 1 Tim. 2:15; Rev. 12:15)

2. born of a virgin (Isa. 7:14; Matt. 1:23; Luke 1:26-35)

3. of the family of Shem (Gen. 9:26-27)

4. of the Hebrew race (Exod. 3:18)

5. of the seed of Abraham (Gen. 12:3; 18:18; Matt. 1:1; John 8:56; Acts 3:25)

6. of the line of Isaac (Gen. 17:19; Rom. 9:7; Gal. 4:23-28; Heb. 11:8)

7. of the line of Jacob or Israel (Gen. 28:4-14; Num. 24:5-17; Isa. 41:8; Luke 1:68; 2:32; Acts 28:20)

8. of the tribe of Judah (Gen. 49:10; 1 Chron. 5:2; Mic. 5:2; Matt. 2:6; Heb. 7:14; Rev. 5:5)

9. of the house of David (2 Sam. 7:12-15; 1 Chron. 17:11-14; Ps. 89:4-36; Isa. 9:7; Matt. 1:1; Luke 1:69; 2:4; John 7:42; Acts 2:30; Rom. 1:3; 2 Tim. 2:8; Rev. 22:16)

10. born at Bethlehem (Mic. 5:2; Matt. 2:6; Luke 2:4; John 7:42)

11. to suffer an agony (Gen. 3:15; Ps. 22:1-18; Isa. 53:1-12; Zech. 13:6-7; Matt. 26:37; Luke 24:26)

12. to die in a peculiar manner (Isa. 53:9; Dan. 9:26; Num. 21:9 compared with John 3:14; Ps. 22:18 compared with John 19:24)

13. to be embalmed and entombed (Isa. 53:9; Matt. 27:57; Luke 23:56; John 19:38-41)

14. to rise from the dead (Ps. 16:10; Acts 3:15)

15. to ascend into heaven (Ps. 68:18 compared with Eph. 4:8; Ps. 110:1; Luke 24:51)

16. to come a second time spiritually in regeneration (Isa. 40:10; 62:11; Jer. 23:5-6; Hos. 3:5; Mic. 5:4; Dan. 7:13-14; John 14:3, 18, 23; 16:23, 26)

17. to come a second time visibly (Job 19:25; Ps. 50:1-6; Dan. 12:1-2; Matt. 25:31; 1 Cor. 15:23; 1 Thess. 1:10; Rev. 20:11-12)

The biblical representations of the person of the Redeemer make him to be a complex person, constituted of two natures. He is not merely God or merely man; but a union of both. He is a God-man. The Westminster statement defines him as follows: “The Redeemer of God’s elect is the Lord Jesus Christ, who being [originally] the eternal Son of God became man, and so was and continues to be God and man in two distinct natures and one person, forever” (Westminster Shorter Catechism Q. 21). The principal prooftexts are “the Word was God” (John 1:1); “the Word was made flesh” (1:14); “who being in the form of God took upon him the form of a servant” (Phil. 2:6-7; Gal. 4:4; Luke 1:35; Rom. 9:5; Col. 2:9; Rom. 1:3^1; 1 Tim. 2:5).

In order to a self-consistent scheme of Christ’s complex person, the following particulars are to be marked.

Christ’s Divine Nature and the Second Trinitarian Person

The divine nature in Christ’s person is the second person of the Godhead, the eternal Son, or Logos. This is asserted in John 1:14: “The Word was made flesh.” Neither God the Father nor God the Spirit became man. The Godhead did not become incarnate, because the Godhead is the divine essence in all three modes; and the essence in all three modes did not become incarnate. Says Turretin (13.6.4), “"It is not proper to say that the Trinity itself became incarnate, because the incarnation is not terminated on the divine nature absolutely, but on the person of the Logos relatively."[8] And Aquinas (3.2.1-2) remarks that “it is more proper to say that a divine person assumed a human nature, than to say that the divine nature assumed a human nature.” It was only the divine essence in that particular mode of it which constitutes the second trinitarian person that was united with man’s nature. There was, consequently, something in the triune Godhead which did not enter into Christ’s person. This something is the personal characteristic of the Father and of the Holy Spirit. The paternity of the first person and the procession of the third person do not belong to Jesus Christ. (See supplement 5.1.1.)

The following reasons for the incarnation of the second person, rather than of the first or third, are mentioned by Paraeus (Notes on the Athanasian Creed): First, that by the incarnation the names of the divine persons should remain unchanged; so that neither the Father nor the Holy Spirit should have to take the name of Son. Second, it was fitting that by the incarnation men should become God's adopted sons, through him who is God's natural Son. Third, it was proper that man, who occupies a middle position between angels and beasts in the scale of creatures should be redeemed by the middle person in the Trinity. Last, it was proper that the fallen nature of man which was created by the word (John 1:3) should be restored by him. In addition to these reasons, it is evident that it is more fitting that a father should commission and send a son upon an errand of mercy than that a son should commission and send a father.

Incarnation vs. Transmutation

Incarnation must be distinguished from transmutation or transub-stantiation. The phrase became man does not mean that the second person in the Trinity ceased to be God. This would be transubstanti-ation. One substance, the divine, would be changed or converted into another substance, the human, as in the papal theory the substance of the bread becomes the substance of Christ's body (see Anselm, Why the God-Man? 2.7).

In saying that "the Word was made flesh" (John 1:14), it is meant that the Word came to possess human characteristics in addition to his divine, which still remained as before. The properties of the divine nature cannot be either destroyed or altered. A human nature was united with the divine in order that the resulting person might have a human form of consciousness as well as a divine. Previous to the assumption of a human nature, the Logos could not experience a human feeling because he had no human heart, but after this assumption he could; previous to the incarnation, he could not have a finite perception because he had no finite intellect, but after this event he could; previous to the incarnation, the self-consciousness of the Logos was eternal only, that is, without succession, but subsequent to the incarnation it was both eternal and temporal, with and without succession. This twofold consciousness may be illustrated by the union between the human soul and body. Prior to or apart from its union with a material body, a man's immaterial soul cannot feel a physical sensation or a sensuous appetite; but when united with it in a personal union, it can so feel. In like manner, prior to the incarnation, the second person of the Trinity could not have human sensations and experiences; but after it he could. The unin-carnate Logos could think and feel only like God; he had only one form of consciousness. The incarnate Logos can think and feel either like God or like man; he has two modes or forms of consciousness.

When, therefore, it is said that "God became man," the meaning is that God united himself with man, not that God changed himself into man. Unification of two natures, not transmutation of one nature into another is meant. We might say of the union of soul and body, in the instance of a human person, that "spirit becomes matter," that is, is materialized or embodied. We would not mean by this phrase that spirit is actually changed into matter, but that it is united with matter in that intimate manner which is denominated personal union. In the incarnation, God is humanized, as in ordinary human generation, spirit is materialized or embodied. Each substance, however, still retains its own properties. In an ordinary man, spirit remains immaterial and body remains material; and in the God-man, the divine nature remains divine in its properties and the human remains human.

Christ as a Single Person in Two Natures

The distinctive characteristic of the incarnation is the union of two diverse natures, a divine and a human, so as to constitute one single person. A single person may consist of one nature or of two natures or of three. A trinitarian person has only one nature, namely, the divine essence. A human person has two natures, namely, a material body and an immaterial soul. A theanthropic person has three natures, namely, the divine essence, a human soul, and a human body. By the incarnation, not a God, not a man, but a God-man is constituted. A theanthropic person is a trinitarian person modified by union with a human nature, similarly as a trinitarian person is the divine essence modified by generation or spiration. A theanthropic person is constituted, consequently, in the same general manner in which an ordinary human person is— namely, by the union of diverse natures. In the case of a human individual, it is the combination of one material nature and one immaterial that makes him a person. Says Howe {Oracles 2.37), “The production of a human creature [individual] does not lie in the production of either of the parts, but only in the uniting of them substantially with one another. It neither lies in the production of the soul, nor does it lie in the production of the matter of the body; but it lies in the beginning of these into a substantial union with one another.” Says Hooker (5.54), “The incarnation of the Son of God consists merely in the union of natures, which union does add perfection to the weaker, to the nobler no alteration at all.” The divine-human person, Jesus Christ, was produced by the union of the divine nature of the Logos with a human nature derived from a human mother. Before this union was accomplished, there was no theanthropic person. There was the divine person of the Logos existing in the Trinity before this union, and there was the unindividualized substance of Christ’s human nature existing in the virgin Mary before this union; but until the two were united at the instant of the miraculous conception, there was no God-man. The trinitarian personality of the Son of God did not begin at the incarnation, but the theanthropic personality of Jesus Christ did.

Divine Nature as the Root of Christ’s Person

It is the divine nature and not the human which is the base of Christ’s person. The second trinitarian person is the root and stock into which the human nature is grafted. The wild olive is grafted into the good olive and partakes of its root and fatness.

The eternal Son, or the Word, is personal per se. He is from everlasting to everlasting conscious of himself as distinct from the Father and from the Holy Spirit. He did not acquire personality by union with a human nature. The incarnation was not necessary in order that the trinitarian Son of God might be self-conscious. On the contrary, the human nature which he assumed to himself acquired personality by its union with him. By becoming a constituent factor in the one thean thropic person of Christ, the previously impersonal human nature, “the seed of the woman,” was personalized. If the Logos had obtained personality by uniting with a human nature, he must have previously been impersonal. The incarnation would then have made an essential change in the Logos and thereby in the Trinity itself. But no essential change can be introduced into the triune Godhead, even by so remarkable an act as the incarnation. (See supplement 5.1.2.)

If the human nature and not the divine had been the root and base of Christ's person, he would have been a man-God and not a God-man. The complex person Jesus Christ would have been anthropotheistic, not theanthropic. This was the error of Paul of Samosata, Photinus, and Marcellus, according to whom Christ was an anthrdpos entheos[9] (deified man), the base of the complex person being the human nature. Christ is humanized deity, not deified humanity.

That the personality of the God-man depends primarily upon the divine nature and not upon the human is also evinced by the fact that this complex theanthropic personality was not destroyed by the death of Christ. At the crucifixion, the union between the human soul and the human body was dissolved temporarily, but the union between the Logos and the human soul and body was not. Christ's human soul and body were separated from each other during the "three days and three nights," in which he "lay in the heart of the earth." This was death. The humanity of Christ was thus dislocated for a time, and its complete personality was interrupted. For a soul without its body is not a full and entire human person, although it is the root and the base of the person. Between death and the resurrection, when the human soul and body are separated, although there is self-consciousness in the disembodied spirit, and so the most important element in personality, yet there is an incomplete human personality until the resurrection of the body restores the original union between soul and body.

But no such interruption and temporary dissolution of the unity of Christ's theanthropic personality was caused by the crucifixion. The divine nature was of course unaffected by the bodily dissolution; and although the human soul and body were separated from one another by the crucifixion, they were neither of them separated from the Logos, by this event. Between Christ's death and resurrection, both the human soul and the human body were still united with the Logos. That the body was still united to the Logos is evinced by the fact that it “did not see corruption” (Acts 2:31). Says Hooker (5.53):

> The divine and the human natures from the moment of their first combination have been and are forever inseparable. For even when Christ’s human soul forsook the tabernacle of his body, his deity forsook neither body nor soul. If it had, then could we not truly hold either that the person of Christ was buried or that the person of Christ did raise up himself from the dead. For the body separated from the Word can in no true sense be termed the person of Christ; nor is it true to say that the Son of God in raising up that body did raise up himself, if the body were not both with him and of him even during the time it lay in the sepulcher. The like is also to be said of the soul; otherwise we are plainly and inevitably Nesto-rians. The very’ person of Christ, therefore, forever one and the self-same, was only touching bodily substance concluded within the grave, his soul only from thence severed; but by personal union his deity still inseparably joined with both.

Turretin (13.6.9) makes the same statement: “The natural union of soul and body in the one human nature is separable, which was sundered in Christ’s death. But the personal union of the two natures—divine and human—in the one person is inseparable, because that which the Logos assumed once for all he never laid aside. “[10] Owen also affirms (Holy Spirit 2.3) that the theanthropic personality of Christ “was necessary and indissoluble, so that it was not impeached nor shaken in the least by the temporary dissolution of the humanity by the separation of the soul and body. For the union of the soul and body in Christ did not constitute him a [theanthropic] person, so that the dissolution of them should destroy his [theanthropic] personality; but he was a [theanthropic] person by the uniting of both into the Son of God”[11] (cf. Bel-gic Confession 19).

The unification, then, of the three factors—the Logos, the human soul, and the human body—which was effected in the miraculous conception and which continued through the whole earthly life of our Lord was not interrupted by the crucifixion. The God-man existed between the crucifixion and the resurrection, notwithstanding the separation between the human soul and body, as truly as he did before or as he does this instant. And this, because it was the immutable divinity and not the mutable humanity which constitutes the foundation of his personality.

That the divinity and not the humanity is dominant and controlling in Christ's person is proved by the fact that his acts of power were regulated by it. If the Logos so determined, Jesus Christ was powerless; and if the Logos so determined, Jesus Christ was all powerful. When the divine nature withdrew its support from the human, the latter was as helpless as it is in an ordinary human creature. And when the divine nature imparted its power, the human nature became "mighty in word and deed."[12] When the Logos so pleased, Jesus of Nazareth could no more be taken by human hands and nailed to the cross, than the eternal Trinity could be; and when the Logos so pleased, he could be arrested without any resistance and be led like a lamb to the slaughter. This is taught repeatedly in the gospels, when it is related that no man could lay violent hands upon him "because his hour had not come." Jesus Christ, the Son of Mary, speaking generally, had so much power and only so much as the divine nature in his complex person pleased to exert in him. Sometimes, consequently, he was almighty in his acts, and sometimes he was "a worm and no man" (Ps. 22:6). (See supplement 5.1.3.)

Again, the knowledge of the God-man depended upon the divine nature for its amount, and this proves that the divinity is dominant in his person. The human mind of Jesus Christ stood in a somewhat similar relation to the Logos that the mind of a prophet does to God. Though not the same in all respects, because the Logos and the human mind in the instance of Jesus Christ constitute one person, while the Holy Spirit and the inspired prophet are two persons, yet in respect to the point of dependence for knowledge, there is an exact similarity. As the prophet Isaiah could know no more of the secret things of God than it pleased the Holy Spirit to disclose to him, so the human mind of Christ could know no more of these same divine secrets than the illumination of the Logos made known. And this illumination, like that of the material sun, was dimmed by the cloud through which it was compelled to penetrate. The finite and limited human nature hindered a full manifestation of the omniscience of the deity. This was a part of the humiliation of the eternal Logos. He condescended to unite himself with an inferior nature, through which his own infinite perfections could shine only in part. When deity does not work as simple deity untrammeled but works in “the form of a servant,” it is humbled. The Logos in himself knew the time of the day of judgment, but he did not at a particular moment make that knowledge a part of the human consciousness of Jesus Christ. In so doing, he limited and conditioned his own manifestation of knowledge in the theanthropic person, by the ignorance of the human nature. The same is true respecting the retention of knowledge. Though the Logos himself cannot forget anything, yet he might permit the human nature to forget many things for a season and afterward bring them to remembrance. The gospels, however, mention no instance of Christ’s ignorance excepting that respecting the day of judgment: supposing this to be an instance of ignorance (see p. 622 n. 18).

The difficult subject of the ignorance of Christ and his growth in wisdom and knowledge has light thrown upon it by distinguishing between the existence of the Logos in Christ’s person and the manifestation of this existence. This is the key to the doctrine of the kenosis. The Logos constantly existed in Jesus Christ, but did not constantly act through his human soul and body. He did not work miracles continually; nor did he impart to the human soul of Christ the whole of his own infinite knowledge.

Compare the infancy of Jesus Christ with his manhood. When Christ lay in the manger at Bethlehem, the eternal Logos was the root and base of his person as much and as really as it was when he appeared at the age of thirty on the banks of the Jordan and was inaugurated to his office. Christ in the manger was called the messianic King and was worshiped as such by the Magi. Even the theanthropic embryo (to genno-menon)[13] is denominated the “Son of God” (Luke 1:35). In Heber’s hymn, the “infant Redeemer” is styled “maker and monarch and Savior of all.” But the Logos, though present, could not properly and fittingly make such a manifestation of knowledge through that infant body and infant soul, as he could through a child’s body and a child’s soul and still more through a man’s body and a man’s soul. It would have been unnatural if the Logos had empowered the infant Jesus to work a miracle or deliver the Sermon on the Mount. The repulsive and unnatural character of the apocryphal gospels, compared with the natural beauty of the canonical gospels, arises from attributing to the infant and the child Jesus acts that were befitting only a mature humanity.

During all these infantile years of the immature and undeveloped human nature, the Logos, though present, was in eclipse in the person of Jesus Christ.[14] By this is meant that the Logos made no manifestation of his power through the human nature he had assumed, because this human nature was still infantine. When the infant Jesus lay in the manger, the Logos was present and united with the human nature as really and completely as he is this instant, but he made no exhibition of himself. There was no more thinking going on in the infant human mind of Jesus than in the case of any other infant. The babe lay in the manger unconscious and inactive. Yet the eternal Logos was personally united with this infant. There was a God-man in the manger as truly as there was upon the cross.

It will not follow, however, that because there was no thinking going on in the human mind of the infant Jesus, there was none going on in the Logos. For it must be remembered that though the Logos has condescended to take "the form of a servant," he has not ceased to exist in "the form of God." While he voluntarily submits to the limitations of human infancy and will do no more in the sphere of the finite infant with the feeble instrument which he has condescended to employ than that instrument is fitted to perform, yet in the other infinite sphere of the Godhead he is still the same omniscient and omnipotent person that he always was. The Son of Man was on earth and in heaven at one and the same instant (John 3:13). Because the Logos was localized and limited by a human body on the earth, it does not follow that he did not continue to exist and act in heaven. And because the Logos did not think in and by the mind of the infant Jesus, it does not follow that he did not think in and by his own infinite mind. The humanity of Jesus Christ, then, knew as much and only as much as the Logos pleased to disclose and manifest through a human mind. Says Beza: "The very fullness of the Godhead (theotetos) itself penetrated the assumed humanity just as and as much as it wished.[15] Grotius (on Mark 13:32) says: "It seems to me that it is not impious to explain this passage in this way: that we might say that divine wisdom impressed its effects on the human mind of Christ according to the manner of the times."[16] Says Tillotson: "It is not unreasonable to suppose that divine wisdom, which dwelled in our Savior, did communicate itself to his human soul according to his pleasure, and so his human nature might at some time not know some things." Christ's knowledge was, and ever is, dependent upon the amount of information vouchsafed by the deity in his person. He did not know the time of the day of judgment "because the Word had not revealed this to him,"[17] says Turretin (13.13.5).[18] He could therefore "increase in wisdom" (Luke 2:52) as a child and a youth, because from the unfathomable and infinite fountain of the divine nature of the Logos there was inflowing into the human understanding united with it a steady and increasing stream. But that infinite fountain was never emptied. The human nature is not sufficiently capacious to contain the whole fullness of God.

The ignorance of Jesus Christ may still further be illustrated by the forgetfulness of an ordinary man. No man, at each and every instant, holds in immediate consciousness all that he has ever been conscious of in the past. He is relatively ignorant of much which he has previously known and experienced. But this forgetting is not absolute and total ignorance. This part of his consciousness may reappear here upon earth and will all of it reappear in the day of judgment. But he cannot recall it just at this instant. He is ignorant and must say: "I do not know." Similarly, if we suppose that Christ when he spoke these words to his dis-ciples was ignorant of the time of the judgment, he may subsequently have come to know it as his human nature increased in knowledge through the illumination of the divine. Says Bengel, "The stress in Matt. 24:36 is on the present tense, 'No man knows.' In those days, no man did know, not even the Son. But afterward he knew it, for he revealed it in the Apocalypse." Christ was relatively ignorant, not absolutely, if he was destined subsequently to know the time of the judgment day. It is more probable that the glorified human mind of Christ on the mediatorial throne now knows the time of the day of judgment, than that it is ignorant of it.

The dawning of Christ's messianic consciousness, as seen in the incident of the youth in the temple with the doctors, illustrates the gradual illumination and instruction of the humanity by the divinity in his person. It is not necessary in order to explain this occurrence to suppose that the virgin mother had informed Jesus respecting his miraculous conception. On the contrary, as she did not feel authorized to inform her husband of the fact but left its disclosure to God, so neither did she feel authorized to inform her child of it. Christ's self-consciousness of his theanthropic person and mediatorial office was formed gradually as he passed from youth to manhood by the increasing illumination of the humanity by the divinity, similarly as in an ordinary human person, the self-consciousness gradually forms and increases by the interpenetra-tion of the lower sensuous nature by the higher rational.

That the divinity is the dominant factor in Christ's complex person is proved by the fact that the degree of his happiness was determined by it.

The human nature had no more enjoyment than the divine permitted. The desertion of the humanity by the divinity is implied in the cry: "My God, why have you forsaken me?" The Logos at this moment did not support and comfort the human soul and body of Jesus. This may be regarded equally as desertion by the Father or by the Logos, because of the unity of essence. In the promise "if you shall ask anything [of the Father] in my name I will do it" (John 14:14), the official work of the first person is attributed to the second. As God the Father raised Christ from the dead and Christ also raised himself from the dead, so also God the Father deserted the human nature and God the Logos also deserted it.

That the foundation of Christ's complex personality is the divine nature is proved by his immutability: "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and today and forever" (Heb. 13:8). What has been said concerning the effect of the crucifixion upon the theanthropic personality will apply here. Christ is immutably the God-man, notwithstanding the temporary separation between his human soul and body.

Beginning and Continuation of Christ's Theanthropic Personality

The theanthropic personality of the Redeemer began in time. The God-man was a new person as well as a unique one. There was no God-man until the moment when the incarnation began. This beginning is to be placed at the instant of the miraculous conception, and this at the instant of the salutation, when the angel Gabriel uttered the words: “Hail you that are highly favored, the Lord is with you; blessed are you among women” (Luke 1:28). At this punctum temporis,[19] the eternal Logos united with a portion of human nature in the virgin Mary. The union was embryonic in its first form. Previous to this instant, the only person existing was the second trinitarian person: the human nature existing in the virgin Mary being yet unpersonalized. This trinitarian person was not complex but simple: God the Son but not God-man; the unincar-nate Logos (logos asarkos)[20]’ not the incarnate Logos (logos ensarkos)[21] Jesus Christ is not the proper name of the unincarnate second person of the Trinity but of the second person incarnate: “You shall conceive and bring forth a son and shall call his name Jesus” (1:31). Prior to the incarnation the Trinity consisted of the Father, the unincarnate Son, and the Holy Spirit; subsequent to the incarnation it consists of the Father, the incarnate Son, and the Holy Spirit. Yet it would not be proper to alter the baptismal formula and baptize “in the name of the Father and of Jesus Christ and of the Holy Spirit” because the incarnate Christ is the mediator between the triune God and sinful man, so that the primary trinitarian designation Son, not the secondary mediatorial designation Christ, is the fitting term in the baptismal formula.

Though beginning in time, the theanthropic personality of the Redeemer continues forever. This is taught in the following: “Of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all God blessed for ever ”(Rom. 9:5); “in him dwells [now and forever] all the fullness of the Godhead bodily” (Col. 2:9); “Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, today, and forever” (Heb. 13:8); “believers sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus” (Eph. 2:6); “we have a great high priest who has passed into the heavens” (Heb. 4:14-15).

Incarnation and Divine Immutability

The incarnation makes no change in the constitution of the Trinity. It leaves in the Godhead, as it finds in it, only three persons. For the addition of a human nature to the person of the Logos is not the addition of another person to him. The second trinitarian person, though so much modified by the incarnation as to become a God-man, is not so much modified as to lose his proper trinitarian personality, because incarnation is not the juxtaposition of a human person with a divine person, but the assumption of a human nature to a divine person. The incarnation produces a change in the humanity that is assumed by exalting and glorifying it, but no change in the deity that assumes. “Divine nature,” says Bull (Concerning Subordination 4.4.14), “flows through (immeat) the human nature, but the human nature does not flow through the divine.” If the Logos had united himself with a distinct and separate individual, the modification of the Logos by incarnation would have been essential, and a fourth person, namely, a human person, would have thereby entered into the Godhead, which would have been an alteration in the constitution of the Trinity, making it to consist of four persons instead of three. Says Ussher (Incarnation in Works 1.580):

> We must consider that divine nature did not assume a human person, but the divine person did assume a human nature; and that of the three divine persons, it was neither the first nor the third that did assume this nature, but it was the middle person who was to be the middle one [mediator] that must undertake the mediation between God and us. For if the fullness of the Godhead should have thus dwelled in any human person, there should have been added to the Godhead a fourth kind of person; and if any of the three persons besides the second had been born of a woman, there should have been two Sons in the Trinity. Whereas, now, the Son of God and the Son of the blessed virgin, being but one person, is consequently but one Son; and so, no alteration at all made in the relations of the persons of the Trinity (see Hooker 5.54). (See supplement 5.1.5.)

The Logos, by his incarnation and exaltation, marvelous as it seems, took a human nature with him into the depths of the Godhead. A finite glorified human nature is now eternally united with the second trinitarian person, and a God-man is now the middle person of the Trinity:

> No Paean there, no Bacchic song they raise;
> But the three persons of the Trinity,
> And the two natures joined in one they praise.

—Dante, Paradise 13.25-27

Yet the Trinity itself is not altered or modified by the incarnation. Only the second person is modified. The Trinity is not divine-human, nor is the Father nor is the Holy Spirit. But the eternal Son is. For this reason, the Son stands in a nearer relation to redeemed man than either the Father or the Spirit can. Neither of them is the "elder brother" of the redeemed. Neither of them is the "head" of which the church is the "body " Neither of them is the divine person of whom it can be said, "We are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones" (Eph. 5:30).

The union of the Logos with a human nature does not disturb either the trinitarian relation of the Logos or his relation to the created universe. When the Logos consents to unite with a human nature, he consents to exist and act in "the form of a servant." But, as previously remarked, this does not imply that he ceases to exist and act "in a form of God." Incarnation is not transubstantiation. Consequently, when incarnate, the Logos is capable of a twofold mode of existence, con-sciousness, and agency. Possessing a divine nature, he can still exist and act as a divine being, and he so exists and acts within the sphere of the infinite and eternal Godhead without any limitation. Possessing a human nature, he can also exist and act as a human being, and he so exists and acts within the sphere of finite and temporal humanity and under its limitations. The Son of Man was in heaven and upon earth simultaneously (John 3:13). In heaven he was in glory; on earth he was in sorrow and death. The God-man is both unlimited and limited, illocal and local. He has consequently a twofold consciousness: infinite and finite. He thinks like God; and he thinks like man. He has the eternal, all-comprehending, and successionless consciousness of God; and he has the imperfect, gradual, and sequacious consciousness of man. In this way, the trinitarian relations of the second person remain unchanged by his incarnation. Divine nature, though it condescends to exist and act in and through a human soul and body and to be trammeled by it, at the same time is existing and acting in an untrammeled manner throughout the universe of finite being and in the immensity of the Godhead.

Consider, for illustration, Christ's relations to space. He lived a double life in this reference when he lived in Palestine eighteen centuries ago. He subsisted in both forms—that of God and that of a servant—at one and the same moment. He was simultaneously the absolute and eternal Spirit, unlocalized, filling immensity; and he was also that same Spirit localized, dwelling in and confined to the soul and body of Jesus of Nazareth. Because the Logos voluntarily confined and limited himself to the latter, it does not follow that he could not also continue to be unconfined and unlimited God. Because the sun is shining in and through a cloud, it does not follow that it cannot at the same time be shining through the remainder of universal space unobscured by any vapor whatever. The omnipresence of the Logos is that of the infinite Spirit. Consequently, he is all in every place and at every point. He is all in the human soul and body of Jesus of Nazareth, and simultaneously he is all at every other point of space. His total presence in the man Christ Jesus did not prevent his total presence throughout the universe. He was therefore both omnipresent and locally present. Says Calvin (2.15), "Although the infinite essence of the Logos is united in one person with the nature of man, yet we have no thought of its incarceration or confinement. For the Son of God miraculously descended from heaven, yet in such a manner that he never left heaven: he chose to be miraculously conceived in the womb of the virgin, to live on earth, and to be suspended on the cross; and yet he never ceased to fill the universe in the same manner as from the beginning."[22] "Who will say," says Paraeus (Upon Hunnius, 2 1), "that the deity of the Word was only where his body was, say, in the mother's womb, in the temple, on the cross, in the sepulcher, and was absent in other places where his body was not? Who will say that he did not fill heaven and earth; that he was not at Rome, at Athens, and everywhere outside of Judea, at the same time when his body was within the limits of Judea alone?" "The word of God," says Augustine (Letter 137 to Volusianus), "did so assume a body from the virgin and manifest himself with mortal senses, as neither to destroy his own immortality nor to change his eternity nor to diminish his power nor to relinquish the government of the world nor to withdraw from the bosom of the Father, that is from the secret place where he is with him and in him." Says Aquinas (3.5.2), "Christ is said to have descended from heaven from the standpoint of his divine nature—not in such a way that the divine nature ceased to be in heaven, but because he began to be here below in a new way, namely, according to the nature he assumed."[23] (See supplement 5.1.6.)

As the inspiration of a prophet by the Holy Spirit or his indwelling in a believer does not interfere with the trinitarian relations of the third person, so neither does the incarnation interfere with those of the second. The Holy Spirit makes intercessions that cannot be uttered and thereby unites himself to a certain degree to a particular man, but is still the same distinct person in the Trinity. Moreover, this intercession of the Holy Spirit in the soul of the believer does not disturb or prevent the single self-consciousness of the believer. Here are two distinct persons, confessedly, and yet only one self-consciousness in the believer. But if a single self-consciousness is not dualized and destroyed in the instance when the divine nature and the human, the Holy Spirit and the believer, do not constitute a God-man, still less need it be when they do. The two different modes or forms of consciousness—the divine and the human— in the God-man do not constitute two self-consciousnesses or two persons, any more than two or more different forms of consciousness in a man constitute two or more self-consciousnesses or persons. A man at one moment has a sensuous form of consciousness and at another moment a spiritual form; but he is one and the same person in both instances and has but a single self-consciousness.

Incarnation as the Assumption of a Nature,
Not a Person

In the incarnation, the Logos does not unite himself with a human person, but with a human nature. This is taught in Scripture. Christ “took upon him the seed (sperma)[24] of Abraham” (Heb. 2:16); Christ “was made of the seed of David” (Rom. 1:3); in the first promise the Redeemer is denominated the “seed of the woman” (Gen. 3:15); “forasmuch as the children were partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same” (Heb. 2:14).

The terms seed and flesh and blood imply that the humanity which the Logos laid hold upon and assumed into personal union with himself was not yet personalized. At the instant when it was assumed, it was human nature unindividualized, not a distinct individual person. This is the interpretation of the scriptural statement which is found in the creeds generally. More particular attention was turned to the distinction between a nature and a person by the Nestorian controversy, and ever since that time the creeds have been careful to state that the Logos united a human nature —but not a human person—with himself.

The orthodox statement in the patristic church is made in the following extract from John of Damascus (Concerning the Orthodox Faith 3.2): “The Logos was not united with a flesh which previously existed by itself as an individual man, but, in and by his own infinite person dwelling in the womb of the holy virgin, he personalized (hypeste’sato)[25] of the chaste blood of the ever-virgin a flesh enlivened with a rational and intellectual soul; the Logos thereby assuming the firstfruits of the human lump and becoming a [divine] person in the flesh.”

Westminster Confession 8.2 accords with ancient, medieval, and Reformed Christology in its statement that “the Son of God, the second person in the Trinity, did take upon him man’s nature with all the essential properties thereof; so that the two whole perfect and distinct natures, the Godhead [Godhood] and the manhood, were inseparably joined together in one person.” Athanasian Creed 31 denominates Christ “a man born in the world from the substance of his mother”[26] In the theological nomenclature, “nature” is designated by “substance,” and person by “subsistence.”[27]

Hooker (5.52) enunciates the doctrine in the following language: “The Son of God did not assume a man’s person into his own person, but a man’s nature to his own person; and therefore he took semen, the seed of Abraham, the very first original element of our nature before it was come to have any personal human subsistence.” In similar terms, Owen (Holy Spirit 2.3) expresses himself. He remarks that the Son of God took the nature formed and prepared for him in the womb of the virgin by the operation of the Holy Spirit “to be his own, in the instant of its formation, thereby preventing [going before] the singular [single] and individual subsistence of that nature in and by itself.” Again he says that “as it is probable that the miraculous conception was immediate upon the angelic salutation, so it was necessary that nothing of the human nature of Christ should exist of itself antecedently unto its union with the Son of God.” By the phrase exist of itself Owen here means “exist by itself as constituted and formed into a distinct and separate individual person. That the human nature as bare nature existed antecedently to its union with the Logos, Owen abundantly teaches in all that he says of the work of the Holy Spirit in preparing and forming the human nature as it existed in the virgin mother. In another passage (Trinity Vindicated), Owen is still more explicit: “The person of the Son of God, in his assuming human nature to be his own, did not take an individual person of anyone into a near conjunction with himself, but preventing the personal subsistence of human nature in that flesh which he assumed, he gave it its subsistence (i.e., its personality) in his own person, whence it has its individuation and distinction from all other persons whatever. This is the personal union.” Again, Owen (Vindication of the Gospel, 19) says: “Jesus Christ the mediator, theanthropos,[28] God and man, the Son of God, having assumed hagion to gennomenon[29] (Luke 1:35) that holy thing that was born of the virgin, anypostaton,[30] having no subsistence of its own, into personal subsistence with himself, is to be worshiped with divine religious worship, even as the Father” (see Owen, Person of Christ, chap. 18). Says Charnock (Wisdom of God):

> Christ did not take the person of man, but the nature of man into subsistence with himself. The body and soul of Christ were not united in themselves, had no [personal] subsistence in themselves, till they were united to the [trinitarian] person of the Son of God. If the person of a man were united to him, the human nature would have been the nature of the person so united to him, and not the [human] nature of the Son of God according to Heb. 2:14, 16. The [trinitarian] Son of God took “flesh and blood” to be his own [human] nature, perpetually to subsist in the person of the Logos; which must be by a personal union, or no way: the deity united to the humanity, and both natures to be one person.

Turretin (13.6.18) says:

> Although the human nature of Christ is a spiritual and intelligent substance and perfect in respect to the existence and properties of such a substance, yet it is not at first (statim)a person;[31] because it has not that peculiar incommunicable property which constitutes a subsistence as distinguished from a substance [or a person as distinguished from a nature]. Just as soul (anima) taken by itself is a particular intelligent substance, yet not a person, > because it is an incomplete part of a greater whole. It requires to be joined to a body, before there can be an individual man. It does not derogate from the reality and perfection of Christ's human nature to say that before it was assumed into union with the Logos it was destitute of personality, because we measure the reality and dignity of a human nature by the essential properties of the nature and not by the characteristic of individuality subsequently added to it. These essential properties belong to it by creation, but the individual form is superinduced after creation by generation. The definition of substance or nature, consequently, differs from the definition of subsistence or person. Personality is not an integral and essential part of a nature, but is, as it were, the terminus to which it tends[32] (nec pars integralis nec essentialis naturae, sed quasi terminus); and Christ's human nature acquired a more exalted and perfect personality by subsisting in the Logos, than it would had it acquired personality by ordinary generation.

Similarly, Quenstedt (Hase, Hutterus, 233) asserts that "subsistence does not apply to the essence of man, but to the terminus (terminationem) of humanity."[33] He also remarks (Hase, Hutterus, 232), "For it was not a person but a human nature, lacking its own personality, that was assumed. Otherwise there would be two persons in Christ."[34] Calovius teaches that Christ as man was "born from the seminal mass";'[35] Hollaz says "animated from the seed";[36] Baier says "from the bloodline of the virgin.'"[37]

An American theologian, Samuel Hopkins (1.283), adopts the Catholic Christology:

> The personality of Jesus Christ is in his divine nature and not in the human. Jesus Christ existed a distinct, divine person from eternity, the second person in the adorable Trinity. The human nature which this divine person, the Word, assumed into a personal union with himself is not and never was a distinct person by itself, and personality cannot be ascribed to it and does not belong to it, any otherwise than as united to the Logos, the word of God. The Word assumed the human nature, not a human > person, into a personal union with himself, by which the complex person exists, God-man. Hence, when Jesus Christ is spoken of as being a man, “the Son of Man, the man Christ Jesus,” etc., these terms do not express the per-sonality of the manhood or of the human nature of Jesus Christ; but these personal terms are used with respect to the human nature as united to a divine person and not as a mere man [i.e., as merely human nature]. For the personal terms he,I, and you cannot with propriety or truth be used by or of the human nature considered as distinct from the divine nature of Jesus Christ.[38]

In a similar manner, Hodge explains the subject. After remarking (Theology 2.391) that “though realism may not be a correct philosophy, the fact of its wide and long-continued prevalence may be taken as a proof that it does not involve any palpable contradiction,” he proceeds to make use of realism in the statement that “human nature although endowed with intelligence and will may be, and in fact is, in the person of Christ, impersonal.[39] That it is so, is the plain doctrine of Scripture, for the Son of God, a divine person, assumed a perfect human nature and nevertheless remains one person.”

Van Mastricht (Theology 5.4.7) defines the hypostatic union as “a cer-tain ineffable relation of the divine person to the human nature through which this human nature is peculiarly the human nature of the second person of the deity.”[40] Wollebius (1.16) says that “Christ assumed not man, but the humanity; not the person, but the nature.” John Bunyan (On Imputed Righteousness) says that “the Son of God took not upon him a particular person, though he took to him a human body and soul; but that which he took was, as I may call it, a lump of the common nature of man. ‘For verily he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham.’“[41] (See supplement 5.1.7.)

Since much depends in Christology upon the important distinction between “nature” and “person” or between “substance” and “subsistence,” we shall enlarge somewhat upon it.

When we speak of a human nature, a real substance having physical, rational, moral, and spiritual properties is meant. This human nature or substance is capable of becoming a human person, but as yet is not one. It requires to be personalized in order to be a self-conscious individual man. A human person is a fractional part of a specific human nature or substance which has been separated from the common mass and formed into a distinct and separate individual by the process of generation. Prior to this separation and formation, this fractional portion of the common human nature has all the qualities of the common mass of which it is a part, but it is not yet individualized. It is potentially, not actually personal. It has all the properties that subsequently appear in the particular individual formed of it, such as spirituality, rationality, voluntariness—viewing the nature upon the psychical side of it—and sensuousness with general adaptation to a visible and material world— viewing the nature upon the physical side.[42]

Accordingly, Westminster Confession 8.2 affirms that "the second person in the Trinity did take upon him man's nature with all the essential properties thereof." It does not say "with the individual form thereof." The fact that the nature has all the properties of man, though it has not as yet the form of an individual man, is sufficient to make it human nature. A brute's nature does not have all the properties of human nature; and neither does an angel's nature. Therefore, the Logos "took not upon him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed {sperma)[43]' of Abraham" (Heb. 2:16).

Saint Paul's figure of the potter's clay and the vessels to be shaped from it may be employed in illustration. A lump of clay has all the properties of matter that belong to the vessel of honor or dishonor. But it has not as yet the individual form of the vessel. An act of the potter must intervene, whereby a piece of clay is separated from the lump and molded into a particular vase having its own peculiar shape and figure. In like manner, human nature as an entire whole existing in Adam possessed all the elementary properties that are requisite to personality, though it was not yet personalized. And in like manner, any portion of this entire human nature, when transmitted from Adam and existing in nearer or remote ancestors, is also possessed of all the properties requisite to personality, though it is not yet, in Owen's phrase, "individuated" or transformed from a nature to a person. The difference, then, between nature and person is virtually that between substance and form. As a material substance may exist without being shaped in a particular manner, so a human nature may exist without being individualized (see pp. 469-70).

Thus it appears that although a human nature is not actually personal, that is, a distinct person, it is nevertheless potentially personal, that is, it is capable of becoming a separate self-conscious individual man. Every individual of Adam's posterity has precisely the same properties or qualities in his person that there are in the specific nature of which he is a part and portion. He is physical, rational, intelligent, and voluntary, only because the human nature out of which he is formed is a physical, rational, intelligent, and voluntary substance created by God on the sixth day when he created the species man. It is the properties of a substance that make it what it is, not the particular individual form which it may assume. As Turretin says, in the extract previously quoted, "We measure the reality and dignity of a human nature by the essential properties of the nature, not by the characteristic of individuality subsequently added to it. Personality is not an integral and necessary part of a nature, but, as it were, the terminus to which it tends."

It is evident, then, from this discussion, that the term nature is a more impersonal term than the term person. A human nature, though not absolutely impersonal like a brute nature or like inorganic matter, is yet less personal than a human person. This may be illustrated by considering the divine nature and the trinitarian persons. In the discussion of the doctrine of the Trinity, we have seen that if we abstract trinality from the divine essence we have nothing left but the impersonal substance of pantheism or the unreflecting unit of deism. It is only when the divine nature is contemplated, as it is in Scripture, as "subsisting" or "modified" or, if we may so speak, metamorphosed in the eternal three— Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—that we have full and clear personality. This is what is meant in Phil. 2:6 by morphetheou.[44] This is not the same in every respect with ousia theou[45] orphysis theou.[46] It is a personal form of the ousia[47] or physis theou.[48]" God is self-conscious, self-knowing, and self-communing —in other words is personal—because he subsists in three individual distinctions. As an untrinalized nature merely and only, he is the impersonal unit of deism or pantheism; but as a nature in three persons, or a nature personalized by trinality, he is a unity: the self-conscious and "living" God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The eternal trinitarian processes of generation and spiration personalize the divine nature, as ordinary generation analogously individualizes the human nature. The one human nature or species is personalized gradually in time by division into millions of human individuals; and the one divine nature is personalized simultaneously in eternity by subsisting indivis-ibly and wholly in three divine hypostases. If the human nature were never individualized by ordinary generation, if it remained a mere nature in Adam though it would be human nature still and not brutal nature or inorganic matter, yet it would be impersonal for our minds. It would have no history and none of the interest and impression of individuality. And if the divine nature had no trinality in it—if there were no Father, Son, and Holy Spirit but only the one substance of pantheism or deism— the deity would present no personal characteristics appealing to man's personal feelings and wants.

To apply all this to the subject of Christ's theanthropic person, we say that in the act of incarnation the Logos, who is already a conscious trinitarian person, takes into personal union with himself a human nature— what the Scriptures denominate the "seed of David," the "seed of Abraham," the "seed of a woman," the "flesh and blood" of man. This human nature previous to this assumption is not a person ("for the personal being which the Son of God already had suffered not the substance which he took to be a person," says Hooker), yet it is capable of being personalized and becoming an individual man. It is actually personalized and made to have an individual life and history by being miraculously quickened, formed, and sanctified by the Holy Spirit in the womb of the virgin mother and assumed by the eternal Logos into union with himself. Hence Athanasius (Against the Arians 3.51) defines Christ as "a man impersonated into God" and describes Christ's human body and soul as an instrument which the Logos appropriates personally (organon enypostaton idiopoiese)[49] (Witsius, Apostles' Creed, diss. 16). The human nature thus becomes an integrant constituent of one complex person, the God-man, Jesus Christ. In the phraseology of Owen (Person of Christ, 18), "Assumption is unto [in order to] personality; it is that act whereby the Son of God and our nature become one person." Francis Junius (Theological Theses, 27) similarly remarks: "His human nature, previously anhypostatic (anypostatos), was assumed in the unity of his person by the Logos (logo) and was made enhypostatic (enypostatos).”[50] Aquinas (3.2.2) contends that the human nature of Christ, by being personalized through assumption into union with a trinitarian person, obtained a more exalted personality in this way than it would have obtained by being personalized by ordinary generation; just as the animal soul, when personalized by its union with a rational soul, in the case of a man, is more excellent than when, as in the case of a dog or any mere animal, it is not personalized at all by union with a rational soul.

Still another point of difference between a “nature” and a “person” is the fact that a nature cannot be distinguished from another nature, but a person can be from another person. One fractional portion of human substance has no marks by which it can be discriminated from another portion. It is not until it has been individualized by generation that it has a personal peculiarity of its own that differentiates it. When human “flesh and blood” has acquired personal characteristics, it can then be distinguished from the parents and from the species. “Human nature,” says Owen (Person of Christ, 18), “in itself is anypostatos:[51] that which has not a subsistence of its own which should give it individuation and distinction from the same nature in any other person.” Says Hooker (5.52), “We cannot say, properly, that the virgin bore, or John did baptize, or Pilate condemn, or the Jews crucify, the nature of man; because these are all personal attributes. Christ’s person is the subject which receives them, his nature that which makes his person capable or apt to receive.”

In the case of an ordinary human person, the body or the material nature is personalized by the soul or the spiritual nature within it. The body as a mere corpse, and separate from the soul, is impersonal. Similarly, the human nature of Christ considered as the substance of the virgin is personalized by the Logos uniting with it: “His human nature, as John of Damascus says, has its personality in Christ”[52] (Aquinas, Summa 3.2.3). Viewed merely as the substance, the “blood” and “seed” of the virgin prior to its assumption, it was impersonal. It could not be distinguished as the particular individual man Jesus of Nazareth until the miraculous conception had individualized it. As the mere “substance” and “seed” of the virgin, it had nothing to distinguish it from the “substance” and “seed” of any other woman or from other “substance” of Mary herself, who could have conceived still other sons by ordinary generation.

In the incarnation, the Logos did not unite himself with the whole human nature, but with only a part of it. The term human nature may signify the entire human species as it existed in Adam or only a part of it as it exists in near or remote ancestors. In the first case, it is the human nature; in the second, it is a human nature. The proper statement is that the Logos united himself with a human nature, not with the human nature. Whenever there is any conception of human nature, either ordinary or miraculous, there is abscission of substance. Turretin (13.11.10) speaks of Christ’s humanity as “material taken from the substance of the most blessed virgin.”[53] The union between God and man in the incarna-tion is not a union with the human species as an entirety. At the time of the incarnation of the Logos, the human nature considered as an entire whole had been in the process of generation and individualization for four thousand years, and millions of separate and distinct individuals had been formed out of it. The Logos did not unite himself with this already propagated part of the human nature or species. Neither did he unite with that whole remainder of the common nature which had not yet been individualized by generation. This latter was latent and unin-dividualized in the population existing at the time of the incarnation. The Logos united with only a fraction of this remainder, namely, with that particular portion of human nature which he assumed from the virgin mother. The eternal Word took into a personal union with himself, not the whole human nature both distributed and undistributed, individualized and unindividualized, but only a transmitted fractional part of the undistributed remainder of it, as this existed in the virgin Mary.[54]

That theory of universal redemption which rests upon the hypothesis of a union of the Logos with the whole human species finds no support in Scripture, and we may add in reason or the nature of the case. The humanity of Christ was not a specific whole, but only a part of a specific whole: “It should be stated that the word of God did not assume human nature in general (in universali) but in an individual (in atomo), that is, individually (individuo), just as John of Damascus says (Ortho doxFaith 3.7). Otherwise, any man whatever is the word of God, just as Christ is”[55] (Aquinas, Summa 3.2.2).

Sanctification of Christ's Human Nature

The human nature assumed into union with the Logos was miraculously sanctified, so as to be sinless and perfect: "The Word was made flesh and dwelled among us full of grace and truth" (John 1:14); "God gives not the Spirit by measure unto him" (3:34); "the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of council and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord" (Isa. 11:2); "Christ was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin"[56] (Heb. 4:15); "such a high priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners" (7:26); "that holy thing which shall be born [lit., which is being conceived, to genndmenon]"[57] (Luke 1:35); "butter and honey shall Immanuel eat, that he may know to refuse the evil and choose the good" (Isa. 7:14-15); "a body have you prepared for me" (Heb. 10:5); "this is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17); "in him is no sin" (1 John 3:5).

In accordance with these texts, the creeds affirm the perfect sancti-fication of the human nature in and by the incarnation. Westminster Larger Catechism Q. 37 teaches that "the Son of God became man by being conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit in the womb of the virgin Mary, of her substance and born of her, yet without sin." The Formula of Concord ("Concerning Original Sin"; Hase, 574), after saying that the Son of God assumed the "seed of Abraham," adds: "Christ redeemed our same human nature (namely, his own work), he sanctifies this same human nature (which is his work), he raises this same nature from the dead, and he adorns it with enormous glory (which is his own work)"[58] (cf. Augustine, Enchiridion 36).

With these statements of the creeds, the theologians agree. They assert the sinfulness of the virgin Mary, the consequent sinfulness of human nature as transmitted by her, and the necessity of its being redeemed and sanctified, in order to be fitted for a personal union with the Logos. Says Augustine (Letter 164)

> If the soul of Christ be derived from Adam's soul, he, in assuming it to himself, cleansed it so that when he came into this > world he was born of the virgin perfectly free from sin either actual or transmitted. If, however, the souls of men are not derived from that one soul, and it is only by the flesh that original sin is transmitted from Adam, the Son of God created a soul for himself, as he creates souls for all other men, but he united it not to sinful flesh, but to the "likeness of sinful flesh" (Rom. 8:3). For he took, indeed, from the virgin the true substance of flesh; not however "sinful flesh," for it was neither begotten nor conceived through carnal concupiscence, but was mortal and capable of change in the successive stages of life, as being like unto sinful flesh in all points, sin excepted (see also Enchiridion 36-37).

Athanasius (Against the Arians 2.61) explains the clause firstborn of every creature (Col. 1:5) as meaning the same as "firstborn among many brethren" (Rom. 8:29) and adds that Christ "is the firstborn of us in this respect, that the whole posterity of Adam lying in a state of perdition by the sin of Adam, the human nature of Christ was first redeemed and sanctified (esothe kai eleutherothe)[59] and so became the means of our regeneration, redemption, and sanctification, in consequence of the community of nature between him and us." John of Damascus (Concerning the Faith 3.2) teaches the same doctrine. Says Anselm (Why the God-Man? 2.17), "Christ's mother was purified by the power of his death. The virgin of whom he was born could be pure only by true faith in his death." Anselm supposes that the virgin mother was perfectly sanctified, but does not hold the later dogma of the immaculate conception of the virgin. Yet he prepares the way for it by teaching her immacu-lateness by regeneration. Says Paraeus (Body of Doctrine Q. 35):

> It was not fitting for the Logos, the Son of God, to assume a nature polluted by sin. For whatever is born of flesh—that is, from a sinful, unsanc-tified woman—is flesh, falsehood, and worthlessness. The Holy Spirit well knew how to separate sin from the nature of man, the substance from the accident. For sin is not of the nature of man but was added to the nature from somewhere else, by the devil. The Holy Spirit separated from the fetus all impurity and infection of original sin.[60]

Says Ursinus (Christian Religion Q. 35), “Mary was a sinner; but the mass of flesh which was taken out of her substance was, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, at the same instant sanctified when it was taken.” Says Pearson (On the Creed, art. 3):

> The original and total sanctification of the human nature was first necessary to fit it for the personal union with the Word, who out of his infinite love humbled himself to become flesh and at the same time out of his infinite purity could not defile himself by becoming sinful flesh. Therefore the human nature, in its first original, without any precedent merit, was formed by the Spirit, and in its formation sanctified, and in its sanctification united to the Word; so that grace was coexistent and in a manner conatural with it.

Says Owen (Holy Spirit 2.4), “The human nature of Christ, being thus formed in the womb by a creating [supernatural] act of the Holy Spirit, was in the instant of its conception sanctified and filled with grace according to the measure of its receptivity.” Owen adds that the human nature, “being not begotten by natural generation, derived no taint of original sin or corruption from Adam, that being the only way or means of its propagation.” Says Quenstedt (3.3), “The same Spirit, in his most extraordinary presence and power, made Mary, ever virgin, fruitful for conceiving the Savior of the world. He extracted fecund (prolificum) seed from her chaste blood, purged it from all inherent sin, and provided the power to Mary by which she would conceive the very Son of God.”[61]

Ussher (Incarnation in Works 4.583) speaks of the effect of the incar-nation upon the human nature of Christ, not merely in sanctifying it, but in preserving it from certain innocent defects: “As the Son of God took upon him not a human person but a human nature, so it was not requisite that he should take upon him any personal infirmities such as madness, blindness, lameness, and particular kinds of diseases which are incidental to some individuals only and not to all men generally; but those infirmities which do accompany the whole nature of manhood, such as are hungering, thirsting, weariness, grief, pain, mortality.” Says Gill (Divinity, 165), “Christ was made of a woman, took flesh of a sinful woman, though the flesh he took of her was not sinful, being sanctified by the Spirit of God, the former of Christ's human nature." Turretin (13.11.10), describing the operation of the Holy Spirit in respect to the incarnation, remarks that > the Holy Spirit must prepare the substance abscised from the substance of the blessed virgin by a suitable sanctification, not only by endowing it with life and elevating it to that degree of energy which is sufficient for generation without sexual connection, but also by purifying it from all stain of sin (ab omni peccati labe) so that it shall be harmless and unde-filed, and thus that Christ may be born without sin. Hence there is no need of having recourse to the doctrine of the immaculate conception of Mary. For although there is no created power which can bring a clean thing from an unclean (Job 14:4), yet the divine power is not to be so limited. To this there is nothing impossible. This calls things which are not, as if they were.

Wollebius (1.16) says that "the material cause of Christ's conception was the blood of the blessed virgin. The formal cause of Christ's conception consists in the preparing and sanctifying of the virgin's blood by the virtue of the Holy Spirit." Edwards (Excellency of Christ) remarks that "though Christ was conceived in the womb of one of the corrupt race of mankind, yet he was conceived without sin."

Marck (Person of Christ 11.14) teaches that the virgin's substance was preserved from original sin. After saying that "Christ had his human flesh from the substance of the virgin Mary, since he is called her son in Luke 11:7, and Gal. 4:5 states that he was made of a woman,"[62] he adds respecting the miraculous conception: "The action of the Spirit was exactly threefold: making the virgin's seed fruitful, the formation of the human nature, and the preservation from every stain. From these facts it can well be concluded that Christ, supernaturally generated, was not bound (tene-tur) by Adamic guilt and consequently could not be tainted with Adam's stain."[63] Here nothing is said respecting positive sanctification, but only of preservation from corruption. De Moor, however, in his commentary upon Marck (19.14), adopts the statement of Alting in the following terms:

> Alting observes that “that seed from which the body of Christ was formed, since it was taken from a sinful woman (peccatrice), was therefore infected with sin, at least as far as the disposition. But the Holy Spirit in preparing it purged it from every stain inhering in it. And so he separated from lawlessness and disorder (anomia kai ataxia) even the foundations of weaknesses, common to the entire species, which remained.”[64]

Van Mastricht tends to the Semipelagian anthropology in asserting that the virgin’s seed was cleansed from physical not from moral corruption. In 4.10.5-6 he remarks that the Holy Spirit . . .

> cleansed, as it were {quasi), that virgin seed—not, indeed, from moral impurity or sin, seeing as how the seed, not yet animated, was not liable to it. But he cleansed it from an intemperate physical constitution (intem-perie physica), from which, in its own time, sin could have resulted. At all events, he preserved the birth from every impurity, so that what would be born would be holy (Luke 1:35).[65]

In 4.10.6 he says:[66]

> Moreover, that seed, although it was propagated through sinners to Mary, nevertheless was not liable to sin or to moral wickedness, since that wickedness would not fall on an inanimate and irrational thing. Nevertheless, the seed could have a natural intemperance, which soon could provide the occasion for sin. Consequently, we said that this intemperance was removed from Mary’s seed through the Holy Spirit.[67]

That the human nature derived from Mary in itself and apart from the agency of the Holy Spirit in the incarnation was corrupt is proved by Rom. 8:3: “God sent his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh.” This means that the “flesh” as it existed in the mother and before its sancti-fication in the womb was sinful. “That which is born of the flesh is flesh” (John 3:6); “who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one” (Job 14:4); “how can he be clean that is born of a woman?” (25:4). The Formula of Concord

(“Concerning Original Sin”; Hase, 644) says that “in the first moment of our conception, that seed from which a man is formed is contaminated and corrupted by sin.”[68]” It also condemns the Anabaptists who asserted “that Christ did not assume his flesh and blood from the virgin Mary,[69] but brought them with him from heaven.”[70]

In the adoption controversy in the eighth century, Felix of Urgellis maintained that the Logos united with a human nature that was unsanctified, that Christ had a corrupted nature though he never committed actual transgression. He thought this to be necessary in order that Christ might be tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin. But this implies that corruption of nature is not sin. He was opposed by Alcuin (see Giiricke, Church History §107). The theory was revived about 1830 in Germany by Menken and in Great Britain by Irving.[71] Schleiermacher (Doctrine §97) departs from the Catholic doctrine in holding that Christ had an earthly father, but that by a supernatural operation on the embryo it was cleansed from original sin.

The possibility of a perfect sanctification of the human nature of Christ appears from considering the mode of his conception and comparing it with that of an ordinary man. The individualizing of a portion of human nature is that process by which it becomes a distinct and separate person and no longer an indistinguishable part of the common species. A part of human nature becomes a human person by generation. In all instances but that of Jesus Christ, the individualization of a portion of human substance is accomplished through the medium of the sexes and is accompanied with sensual appetite. By ordinary generation, human nature is transmitted and individualized without any change of its characteristics, either physical or moral. The individual has all the qualities both of soul and body which fallen Adam had. There is no sanctification of the nature possible by this mode. Ordinary generation transmits sin: “That which is born of the flesh [in this manner] is flesh.” But in the instance of the conception of Jesus Christ, the God-man, there was no union of the sexes and no sensual appetite. The quickening of a portion of human nature in the virgin mother was by the creative energy of God the Holy Spirit. This miraculous conception, consequently, was as pure from all sensuous quality as the original creation of Adam’s body from the dust of the ground or of Eve’s body from the rib of Adam. As the dust of the ground was enlivened by a miraculous act and the result was the individual body of Adam, so the substance of Mary was quickened and sanctified by a miraculous act and the result was the human soul and body of Jesus Christ.[72]

The miraculous quickening of the substance of the virgin mother is not sufficient, alone and by itself, to account for its sanctification. As her substance, it was a part of the fallen and corrupt human species. Merely to quicken or vitalize it, even though miraculously, would not change its moral quality. Hence we must postulate a renewing and sanctifying operation of the Holy Spirit in connection with his quickening energy. Witsius (Covenants 2.4.11) quotes Cloppenburg as saying "that the miraculous impregnation of the virgin's womb, of itself alone, could not secure, in the least, an exemption to the flesh of Christ from the inheritance of sin; for the origin of sin is not derived from the male sex alone, or male seed; nor did the apostle in Rom. 5 so understand one man Adam as to exclude Eve: which is the leading error of some." Similarly, Calvin (2.13.4) remarks that > they betray their ignorance in arguing that if Christ is perfectly immaculate and was begotten of the seed of Mary by the secret operation of the Spirit, then it follows that there is no impurity in the seed of women, but only in that of men. For we do not represent Christ as perfectly immaculate merely because he was born of the seed of a woman unconnected with any man, but because he was sanctified by the Spirit, so that his generation was pure and holy, such as it would have been before the fall of Adam.

The doctrine of the sinlessness of Christ is, thus, necessarily connected with the doctrine of the miraculous conception by the Holy Spirit. The one stands or falls with the other. Says Howe (Oracles 2.37):

> It is a mighty confirmation of the natural descent of sin with the nature of man in the ordinary way, that when God designed the incarnation of his own Son, to avoid the corruption of nature descending to him, he then steps out of the ordinary course; a > consideration that has that weight with it, that if anyone allow himself to think, it must overbear his mind, in that matter, that surely there is some secret profound reason in the counsel of God, whether obvious to our view or not obvious, that the descent of cor-rupt nature was in the ordinary way unavoidable: that when God had a design to incarnate his own Son, when it was intended God should be manifested in the flesh, to avoid that contagion and corruption which in the ordinary course is transmitted, he does in this single instance recede and go off from the ordinary natural course. Because the human nature had been corrupted if it had descended in the ordinary way, therefore the ordinary course of procreation is declined and avoided: a most pregnant demonstration that in the ordinary course sin is always naturally transmitted.

Although the human nature of Christ was individualized and personalized by a miraculous conception and not by ordinary generation, yet this was as really and truly a conception and birth as if it had been by ordinary generation. Jesus Christ was really and truly the Son of Mary. He was bone of her bone and flesh of her flesh. He was of her substance and of her blood. He was consubstantial with her, in as full a sense as an ordinary child is consubstantial with an ordinary mother. And she was the mother of his human soul, as well as of his human body.

All the stages in the process of generation and growth are to be found, from the embryo up to the mature man. The union of deity with humanity was first embryonic, then fetal, then infantine, then that of childhood, then that of youth, and last that of manhood. The God-man was conceived in the womb, grew in the womb, was an infant, a child, a youth, and a mature man.

Self-Consciousness of the God-man

Contemplating the mystery of the God-man in this way, as pointed out in Scripture, it is easier to see how only one person and one self-consciousness shall result. If we do not distinguish between nature and person—if we assume that there is no such reality as an unindividual-ized or nonindividualized nature and that we must think of a distinct individual or we must think of nothing—then we must say that the Logos united with a human person. This person must be a self-conscious ego and when united with the second person of the Godhead, which is likewise a self-conscious ego, must still have its own distinct self-consciousness. The God-man, consequently, must be two persons with two self-consciousnesses.

But when it is said that the trinitarian person of the Logos assumes into union with himself a portion of human nature, which portion is not yet a distinct ego, but is capable by reason of its properties of becoming one, then the problem of the single self-consciousness of the God-man becomes much easier of solution. The human nature possessing on the psychical side all the properties requisite to personality, such as spirituality, rationality, and voluntariness, upon being assumed into union with the eternal Son is thereby personalized, that is to say, individualized. The properties of finite reason and finite will, potential in the human nature, now manifest themselves actively in the single self-consciousness of the God-man. He reasons like a man, thinks like a man, feels like a man, and wills like a man. These are truly personal acts and operations of Jesus Christ. But, unlike the case of an ordinary man, these are not the whole of his personal acts and operations. Over and besides these, there is in his complex theanthropic person another and higher series of acts and operations which spring from another and higher nature in his person. He thinks and feels and wills like God. And these are also and equally with the others the personal acts of Jesus Christ.

In the one person of Jesus Christ, consequently, there are two different kinds of consciousness or experience: one divine and one human. But these two kinds of consciousness do not constitute two persons any more than the two kinds of experience or consciousness—the sensuous and the mental—in a man constitute him two persons. There can be two general forms or modes of conscious experience in one and the same person, provided there enter into the constitution of the person two natures that are sufficiently different from each other to yield the materials of such a twofold variety. This was the case with the God-man. If he had had only one nature, as was the case previous to the incarnation, then he could have had only one general form of consciousness: the divine. But having two natures, he could have two corresponding forms of consciousness. He could experience either divine feeling or human feeling, divine perception or human perception. A God-man has a twofold variety of consciousness or experience, with only one self-consciousness. When he says “I thirst” and “I and my Father are one,” it is one theanthropic ego with a finite human consciousness in the first instance and an infinite divine consciousness in the second.

A man can have two forms of consciousness, yet with only one self-consciousness. He can feel cold with his body, while he prays to God with his mind. These two forms of conscious experience are wholly diverse and distinct. He does not pray with his body or feel cold with his mind. Yet this doubleness and distinctness in the consciousness does not destroy the unity of his self-consciousness. So, also, Jesus Christ as a theanthropic person was constituted of a divine nature and a human nature. Divine nature had its own form of experience, like the mind in an ordinary human person; and the human nature had its own form of experience, like the body in a common man. The experiences of divine nature were as diverse from those of the human nature as those of the human mind are from those of the human body. Yet there was but one person who was the subject-ego of both of these experiences. At the very time when Christ was conscious of weariness and thirst by the well of Samaria, he also was conscious that he was the eternal and only begotten Son of God, the second person in the Trinity. This is proved by his words to the Samaritan woman: “Whosoever drinks of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life. I that speak unto you am the Messiah.” The first-mentioned consciousness of fatigue and thirst came through the human nature in his person; the second-mentioned consciousness of omnipotence and supremacy came through divine nature in his person. If he had not had a human nature, he could not have had the former consciousness; and if he had not had a divine nature, he could not have had the latter. Because he had both natures in one person he could have both.” (See supplement 5.1.8.[73])

SUPPLEMENTS

5.1.1 (see p. 615).God the Son can assume a human nature without thereby incarnating the Trinity, because he assumes a human nature into the unity only of his single person , not into the unity of the three persons. He has the essence only in one mode; and the humanity is united with the essence in this one mode to the exclus ion of the essence in the other two modes of the Father and the Spirit. Only the second trinitarian person is humanized; the first and third are not. It is the simple hypost atic personality. not the complex trinal personality that "becomes flesh and dwells among us. full of grace and truth." The simple hypos tatic person is the Son or Word; this assumes human nature by the miraculous conception.The complex trinal person is the Trinity or Godhead: this did not assume human nature.Three simple hypostatic persons make one compl ex trinal person. and three simple hypos tatic consciousnesses make one comple x self-conscious ness . A hypostatic consc iousness is not trinal and complex . but single and simple. God the Father's hypostatic consc iousness is only the consciousness of being the Father; God the Son's hypostatic consciousness is only the consciousness of being the Son; God the Spirit's hypostatic consciousness is only the consciousness of being the Spirit. There is no complexity of self-beholding. self -cognizing, and self-communing in the hypostatic consciousness. But the self-consciousness of the triune Godhe ad is trinal and complex. It results from the whole essence in one mode contemplating the whole essence in another mode. and the whole essence in still another mode perceiving the identity in essence of the other two. There is no trinalizing of a mode or person of the essence . but only of the essence . No one of the divine persons repeats the trinalizing process. The Father does not contemplate himsel f as Father and then reunite the duality in the second act. He contemplates himself in the Son. And so with the Son and the Spirit. The divine persons see themsel ves in each other, not in themselves.

5.1.2 (see p. 618). "The incarnation was not necessary in order that the trinitarian Son of God might be self-consci ous." "Self-conscious" here denotes only the hypostatic consciousness of a single divine person , not the self-consciousness of the Godhead as triune. No single trinitarian person can have self-consciousness in this latte r sense, because this requires all three distinctions. Self-consciousness in the comprehensive sense is the resultant of the three hypostatic consciousnesses. Still, this hypostatic consciousness may. in a secondary sense, be denominated “self-con-sciousness” because it is that consciousness which one trinitarian person has of himself as distinct from the other two. This remark applies also to the statement on p. 640: “This person must be a self-conscious ego….”

5.1.3 (see p. 619). Kidd {Eternal Sonship of Christ, chap. 11)thus describes the passive relation of Christ’s humanity to his divinity and the fact that the latter is omnipotently controlling in his person: “As the humanity of our Lord was formed for the express purpose of existing in his divinity, it was formed, in an especial manner, to assume the appearances and subjection consonant to the designs of divinity. It had no will of its own to assume any state: it could only exist according to the volition of divinity founded on the divine constitution. The subjection in its humiliation was therefore of two kinds: A necessary subjection to the Godhead in whatever condition it existed; and a peculiar subjection indicated by its sufferings in that particular state of humiliation. In relation to God this subjection was a devotion to the divine will and a particular devotion to that divine person in whom it subsisted. This devotion was essential to its very nature and was communicated in its original conformation. While its actions on earth were really those of humanity, they were those of a humanity whose procedure was in union with a divine person. They flowed from that person and were really his; yet they were not the actions of his divinity, but of his humanity subsisting in his divine nature. The Son of God could not suffer in his essential divine nature; yet his assumed human nature was humbled, was ‘made a curse for us, for it is written, Cursed is everyone that hangs on a tree.’ But while the Messiah experienced this temporary humiliation, the inherent glory of his [theanthropic] person was not and could not be lost. This humiliation was not natural to him, but was submitted to, that the glory which was natural to a man received into personal union by one of the persons of the Godhead might afterward be exhibited. When therefore the eclipse of the Messiah’s human nature was past, it appeared, when he ‘ascended up on high,’ in that splendor which was peculiar to its exalted state of existence as united with deity.”

5.1.4 (see p. 621 n.14). The later Lutheran doctrine of the exina-nition of the divine nature differs from the Reformed in that it is a preparation for the union with the human nature, instead of being this union itself. The divine first “empties” itself before it assumes the humanity According to the Reformed view, the assumption of the humanity is immediate, without any preparation, or kenosis, on the part of the divinity, and the union and incarnation is the kenosis. According to the Lutheran view, the Logos ‘look upon him the form of a servant” before, and in order to, being “made in the likeness of men.” According to the Reformed, “taking the form of a servant” was the same thing as being “made in the likeness of men.” Hilary, according to Dorner (Person of Christ 1.1046-47), seems to have held this view. According to him the Logos, prior to the incarnation, and in order to it, put off “the form of God” and put on “the form of a servant.” This forma is the fades (face) or countenance—that which appears to a beholder. The Logos emptied himself of the glorious form which belonged to him in the Trinity and assumed an inglorious form in order that he might then assume a human nature into union. Hilary supposes that the original resplendent “form of God” could not directly make such an assumption. According to the Reformed view, on the contrary, it could; and there is no need of an exinanition prior to the incarnation.

In Hilary’s theory, also, the incarnation is not complete until the exaltation of Christ has occurred, that is, not until the human nature is united with the original resplendent form of God as well as with the humbled “form of a servant.” But this cannot take place until Christ passes from the estate of humiliation into the heavenly glory. In the Reformed theory the incarnation is complete the instant the human nature is united by the miraculous conception with the Logos in his original resplendent form of God, which by this union then becomes temporarily “emptied” and humbled and loses its full resplendence, until at the ascension it is exalted and glorified as at first.

5.1.5 (see p. 624). Owen {Person ofChnst. chap. 19) compares the influence of the divine nature upon the human, in the complex person of Christ, to that of the soul upon the body, in the case of man’s complex person: “As to the way of the communications between the divine and human nature in the personal union between the Logos and his humanity, we know it not. The glorious immediate emanations of virtue from the divine unto the human nature of Christ, we understand not. Indeed, the actings of natures of difference kinds, where both are finite in the same person, one toward the other, is a difficult apprehension. Who knows how directive power and efficacy proceeds from the soul and is communicated unto the body, unto every the least minute action in every member of it; so as that there is no distance between the direction and the action or the accomplishment of it; or how, on the other hand, the soul is affected with sorrow or trouble in the moment wherein the body feels pain, so as that no distinction can be made between the body's sufferings and the soul's sorrow? How much more is this mutual communication in the same person of divers natures above our comprehension, where one of them is absolutely infinite!"

5.1.6 (see p. 626). Ursinus (Christian Religion Q 48) thus reasons respecting the Lutheran doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's humanity: "The Ubiquitaries object, (1) in Christ's person the two natures are found in an inseparable union, therefore, wheresoever Christ's deity is, there also must his humanity needs be. Answer: These two natures remain in such sort joined and united that their property remains distinct, and neither is turned into the other; which would happen if each nature were infinite and everywhere Objection (2): Those two natures, whereof one is not where the other is, are sundered, neither remain personally united, but are separated. In Christ are two natures, whereof one, which is his humanity, is not where is the other, which is his deity; therefore the two natures in Christ are not united, but separated. Answer: The major is true, if it be understood of two equal natures, that is, either both finite or both infinite; but false of unequal natures, that is, one finite and one infinite. For the finite nature cannot be at once in more places than one; but the infinite nature may be at once both whole in the finite nature and whole without it. Christ's human nature, which is finite, is but in one place; but his divine nature, which is infinite, is both in Christ's human nature and without it and everywhere."

5.1.7 (see p. 629). Dorner follows Schleiermacher, who {Glaubenslehre §97) denies the impersonality of Christ's human nature prior to its assumption by the Logos. Schleiermacher does not recognize the distinction between specific and individual human nature. Human nature, he contends is only individual and objects that if the human nature of Christ prior to it assumption was impersonal, "it was different from and inferior to that of the rest of mankind." The church doctrine on this point he describes as an error of Scholasticism: "The position that the human nature of Christ in and for itself is impersonal, or has no [personal] subsistence of its own, but subsists [personally] only through the divine [personality], in this Scholastic drapery is very obscure and embarrassing."

In connection with the denial of this tenet, which enters into all the church Christology. Schleiermacher (§97) also denies that Christ was born of a virgin His view is that Christ must have been born in the ordinary manner by the union of both sexes in order to be a real man like other men; and also that in connection with this ordinary generation there must also have been a creative energy of God in order to cleanse away the original sin which would naturally accompany it. If Christ's conception in the womb of Mary, he argues, took place without cohabitation with Joseph, this would not preclude sinfulness, because this would naturally issue from his mother, who was sinful. And the creative energy of God could as easily purge away a sinfulness that was derived from both father and mother as that derived from the mother alone. This is true; but the question is not what God could do, but what he did do And this can be known only from the gospel account of the subject. This account, given by Matthew and Luke. Schleiermacher declares to be legendary and not historically credible It is one of the inventions of the primitive church. For proof of this we have only his assertion, as is commonly the case when the received manuscript text of the New Testament is declared to be untrustworthy.

Schleiermacher exhibits the same arbitrariness of assertion in declaring that the creeds of the church, both ancient and modern, "are so phrased that they have no dogmatic aim" and do not warrant the deduction of an ecclesiastical doctrine from them He cites only the ancient Roman and Constantinopolitan creeds and the modern Augsburg, Helvetic, Gallican, Anglican, and Belgic confessions which do not bear out his assertion: each and all being of a very positive dogmatic character. An examination of the individual and conciliar creeds of the ancient church will convince any unbiased mind that the doctrine of the virginal birth of Christ, which constitutes one of the principal articles of the Apostles' Creed, has an ecclesiastical support as strong as any of the doctrines of the Christian faith. The following creeds, to none of which does Schleiermacher allude, contain explicit affirmation of it: Irenaeus, Tertullian, Origen, Epiphanius, Basil, Constantinople, Aquileia, Augustine. Maximus Taurinensis, Eusebius Gallicani, Cassian, Chrysologus. Venatius. Alcuin, Etherius. The views of Schleiermacher respecting the virginal birth of Christ have recently been revived by Harnack, whose argument is substantially the same as his (cf. Shedd. Orthodoxy and Heterodoxy, 154-61). Coleridge also (Works 5.76, 78-79, 532 [ed. Harper]) takes the same view of the Christopedia in Matthew's and Luke's gospels.

There is no better account of this subject than that given by Charnock (Power ot God): "Christ was conceived by the Holy Spirit in the womb of the virgin (Luke 1:35): The Holy Spirit shall come upon you, and the power of the highest shall overshadow you'; which act is described to be the effect of the infinite power of God. And it describes the supernatural manner of forming the humanity of our Savior and signifies not the divine nature of Christ [namely, the Logos] infusing itself into the womb of the virgin; for the angel refers it to the manner of the operation of the Holy Spirit in the producing the human nature of Christ and not to the nature assuming that humanity into union with itself. The Holy Spirit, or the third person in the Trinity, overshadowed the virgin and by a creative act framed the humanity of Christ and united it to the divinity [namely, the Logos], It is, therefore, expressed by a word of the same import with that used in Gen. 1:2: 'The Spirit moved upon the face of the waters.' which signifies a brooding upon the chaos, shadowing it with his wings, as hens sit upon their eggs to form them and hatch them into animals; or else it is an allusion to the cloud which covered the tent of the congregation when the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle' (Exod. 40:34). It was not such a creative act as we call immediate, which is a production out of nothing; but a mediate creation, such as God's bringing things into form out of the first [chaotic] matter, which had nothing but an obediential or passive disposition to whatever stamp the powerful wisdom of God should imprint upon it So the substance of the virgin had no active, but only a passive disposition to this work, the matter of the body was earthly, the substance of the virgin; the forming of it was heavenly, the Holy Spirit working upon that matter. And therefore when it is said that she was found with child of the Holy Spirit.' it is to be understood of the efficacy of the Holy Spirit, not of the substance of the Holy Spirit. The matter was natural. but the manner of conceiving was in a supernatural way, above the methods of nature. That part of the flesh of the virgin whereof the human nature of Christ was made was refined and purified from corruption by the overshadowing of the Holy Spirit Our Savior is therefore called that holy thing,' though born of the virgin. He was necessarily in some way to descend from Adam God, indeed, might have created his body out of nothing or have formed it. as he did Adam's, out of the dust of the ground; but had he been thus extraordinarily formed and not propagated from Adam, though he had been a man like one of us. yet he would not have been ot kin to us, because it would not have been a nature derived from Adam, the common parent of us all. But now. by this way of producing the humanity of Christ of the substance of the virgin, he is of the same nature that had sinned, and so what he did and suffered may be imputed to us, which, had he been created as Adam was. could not be claimed in a legal and judicial way.

"It was not fitting, however, that he should be propagated and born in the common order of nature of father and mother; for whatsoever is so born is polluted: A clean thing cannot be brought out of an unclean' (Job 14:4). And our Savior had been incapable of being a Redeemer had he been tainted with the least spot of our corrupt nature, but would have stood in need of redemption himself. Besides, it had been inconsistent with the holiness of the divine nature to have assumed a tainted and defiled body [humanity]. He that was the fountain of blessedness to all nations was not to be subject to the curse of the law for himself, which he would have been had he been conceived in the ordinary way Again, supposing that almighty God by his divine power had so perfectly sanctified an earthly father and mother from all original spot, that the human nature might have been transmitted immaculate to him, as well as the Holy Spirit did purge that part of the flesh of the virgin of which the body [humanity] of Christ was made, yet it was not fitting that that person, who was 'God blessed forever' as well as man. partaking of our nature, should have a conception in the same manner as ours, but different, and in some measure conformable to the infinite dignity of his person; which could not have been had not a supernatural power and a divine person been concerned as an active principle in it; besides, such a birth had not been agreeable to the first promise, which calls him 'the seed ot the woman,' not of the man; and so the veracity of God had suffered some detriment: the seed of the woman only is set in opposition to the seed of the serpent.

“By this manner of conception the holiness of Christ’s human nature is secured, and his fitness for his office is assured to us. It is now a pure and unpolluted humanity that is the temple and tabernacle of the divinity; the fullness of the Godhead dwells in him bodily and dwells in him holily. Though we read of some men sanctified from the womb, it was not a pure and perfect holiness; it was like the light of fire mixed with smoke, an infused holiness accompanied with a natural taint; but the holiness of the Redeemer by this conception is like the light of the sun, pure and without spot: the Spirit of holiness supplying the place of a father in a way of creation. His fitness for his office is also assured to us; for being born of the virgin, one of our nature, but conceived by the Spirit, a divine person, the guilt of our sins may be imputed to him. because our nature in him is without the stain of inherent sin; because, by reason of his supernatural conception, he is capable, as one of kin to us, to bear our curse without being touched by our taint. By this means our sinful nature is assumed without sin in that nature which was assumed by him: flesh he has, but not sinful flesh (Rom. 8:3).” Paul here says that Christ “condemned sin in his flesh.” not in his “sinful flesh.”

Augustine (Forgiveness and Baptism 238) thus describes the human nature of Christ as it was first in the virgin mother and as it was afterward when completely sanctified in the God-man: “The Word, which became flesh, was in the beginning and was with God (John 1:1). But at the same time his participation in our infe rior condition, in order to our participation in his higher state, held a kind of medium between the two in his birth in the flesh. We were born in sinful flesh, but he was born in the likeness of sinful flesh; we were born not only of flesh and blood [human seed], but also of the will of man [human will] and of the will of the flesh [sexual appetite]; but he was born only of flesh and blood [the seed of the virgin], not of the will of man [human will] nor of the will of the flesh [sexual appetite], but of God. He. therefore, having become man, but still continuing to be God, never had any sin, nor did he assume a flesh of sin though born of a material flesh of sin [i.e., of a flesh which, prior to its miraculous sanctification, was sinful in the virgin mother, because propagated from Adam]. For what he then took of flesh he either cleansed, in order to take it, or cleansed by taking it. His virgin mother, therefore, whose conception of him was not according to the law of sinful flesh, in other words, not by the excitement of carnal concupiscence, he formed in order to choose her [as the mother of the God-man] and chose her in order to be formed from her."

5.1.8 (see p. 641). The principal difference between the Reformed and the later Lutheran Christology lies in the difference between union and transmutation. The former affirms that Jesus Christ is constituted of two divers natures, united together without any change in the properties of either; the latter, that he is constituted of two diverse natures, one of which when the union takes place changes the other. The Lutheran asserts that divine nature communicates some of its properties, such as omnipresence, omnipotence, and omniscience, to the human nature, thereby expelling the finite properties of confinement to locality, weakness, and ignorance; the Reformed denies this. And this substitution or transmutation of natures for union of natures arose from an erroneous conception of personality. The Lutheran assumed that if there is to be only one person there must be only one nature. Hence his conversion of the two natures into a third single one. This was also the erroneous opinion of the ancient monophysitism. If two natures, then two persons; if one nature, then one person. This was the assumption. But a self-conscious person may be simple or complex in his constitution; he may have one nature or two natures or three natures. A trinitarian person, for example, is constituted of only one nature, namely, the divine. He is wholly spiritual, immaterial, and infinite. The second person in the Godhead, prior to his incarnation, is the divine essence in a particular mode or form of subsistence. He is pure spirit without body, parts, or passions. A human person, again, is constituted of two natures: an immaterial soul and a material body. A man is not, like the unincarnate Son of God, purely and only spirit. He is composed of two substances or natures as diverse as mind and matter. And yet there is only one self, only one self-consciousness, only one person. One and the same man is conscious of the spiritual feelings of his soul and of the physical sensations of his body. The former issue out of his immaterial nature, the latter out of his material; and both are equally and alike the experience of but one person. Having double natures he has a double form of consciousness or experience, with only a single self-consciousness. In this respect a human person differs from a trinitarian person. The latter can have only one form or mode of consciousness, namely, a spiritual. The former can have two; one spiritual and one sensuous and physical. A divine person has one mode of consciousness and one self-consciousness; a human person has two modes of consciousness and one self-consciousness.

And yet even a human person, like a trinitarian person, may for a time have self-consciousness or personality with only one nature. When, for example, the human body is separated from the human soul at death, the self-consciousness continues, but only one form of conscious experience is now possible. The soul without the body cannot feel physical sensations. The experience or consciousness of the disembodied state must be wholly mental and spiritual. There can be no sensuous elements in it, because the body with the five senses is temporarily separated from the soul. The man must now get all of his conscious experience through his immaterial nature. There may be, and is. a memory of past sensuous experiences, but no present actual sensation through the bodily senses. Not until the resurrection of the body and its reunion with the soul can both modes of consciousness— the physical and the mental—be experienced again together. This proves that a single self-consciousness or personality is possible either with one or with two natures: only the elements in it will not be so various in one case as in the other

A theanthropic person, again, is yet more complex than a human person. He has three diverse natures, each yielding their diverse experiences or modes of consciousness, and yet only a single self-consciousness. The Lord Jesus Christ is constituted of three substances, distinct and different in kind from each other. He is constituted of one infinite spirit, one finite spirit, and one finite body The God-man is composed of the divine essence in its filial form (Phil. 2:6), a rational human soul, and a human body. Why should such a diversity in the components of the one theanthropic person be thought to be incompatible with a single self-consciousness? If two natures or substances, as different in kind from each other as a man’s immaterial spirit and his material body, can constitute only one person and yield a single self-consciousness with its doubleness of experiences or consciousnesses, why is it so difficult, as the later Lutheran asserts it is. to believe that three natures or substances as diverse as the divine essence, a man’s spirit, and a man’s body should likewise constitute only a single person and yield only a single self-consciousness with its three-foldness of experiences or consciousnesses, namely, those of the divine essence, of a rational soul, and of a sensuous body? If it is not necessary to assume that spirit is transmuted into body, or body into spirit, in order to account for a single self-conscious personality in the instance of a man. why is it necessary to assume that the human nature must be transmuted into the divine in order that there may be a single self-conscious personality in the instance of a God-man? If complexity of natures is not incompatible with self-consciousness in human psychology, why is it in theanthropic psychology? Had more attention been given to the complexity and diversity of natures found in ordinary human personality, the assumption that began in Apollinarianism and has run through the whole kenotic controversy, namely, that personality necessarily implies simplicity of structure and singleness of nature and is incompatible with complexity of structure and duality and trinality of natures, would have been invalidated more readily. If two points are kept in view, namely, that the divine and human natures in Christ’s theanthropic person are united but not transmuted and that the human nature is assumed into union in its unin-dividualized state, there need be no logical difficulty in the construction of Christ’s single personality and self-consciousness. The fathers at Chalcedon did this, and so did leading Schoolmen like Aquinas. The Reformed theologians did the same; while some of the later Lutheran divines showed a tendency toward the ancient monophysitism, a tendency which in some of their latest speculations has gone to even a greater extreme than those of Apolli-naris and Eutyches. And finally, if the important distinction between consciousness and self-consciousness had been perceived and employed, the conscious experience of the person at a particular moment, such as a physical sensation or a mental emotion, which is transient and gives place to a multitude of similar experiences like it. would not have been mistaken for the permanent and immutable ego whose self-consciousness lies under all this stream of consciousness or experiences and combines them into the unity of a person.

Christ's Divinity 2

The subject of the divinity of Christ has been examined under the head of theology (doctrine of God) (see pp. 257-62). All scriptural texts and data prove the deity of Christ that prove his trinitarian position and relations. The act and process of incarnation makes no essential change in the Logos. The incarnate Word has all the properties of the unincarnate Word. To the God-man are ascribed in Scripture divine names, attributes, works, and adorableness.

There is a class of texts which taken by themselves would imply in Jesus of Nazareth an inferiority to God. They are such as describe his acts and experiences from the side of the humanity in his person and of his estate of mediatorial humiliation. This inferiority may run all the way from the comparatively exalted view of the Semiarian to the low humanitarian view of the Socinian. All of these parties really contemplate Jesus Christ only kata sarka,[1] omitting that aspect of him presented in the other class of passages that describe him kata pneuma hagidsynes[2] (Rom. 1:4), ho on epi panton'[3] (9:5), en morphe theou hyparchon[4] (Phil. 2:6), and theos[5] (John 1:1).

Strictly speaking, none of these parties accept the theanthropic personality of Christ. Divine nature is left out in the constitution of his person, so that it is really only anthropic. For although the Semiarian conceded a complex personality in Christ composed of two natures, one of which was immensely higher than the other, and in reference to which he cherished a feeling akin to adoration, yet since there is no true mean between the infinite and finite, the Creator and the creature, this exalted higher nature must fall into the same finite class with the lower one. Such a Christology cannot be harmonized with the scriptural representations except by omitting those passages which attribute to Jesus of Nazareth a nature to which divine titles, attributes, and works are ascribed and which is the object of worship both in heaven and on earth.

images Christ's Humanity

Christ's humanity is undisputed, being demonstrable from all the descriptions of him given in the gospels. Some of the more important of the numerous texts are "the seed of the woman" (Gen. 3:15); "the Son of Man" (Matt. 13:37); "a virgin shall conceive and bear a son and shall call his name Immanuel" (Isa. 7:14); "God shall give unto him the throne of his father David" (Luke 1:32); Christ was "the son of David, of Abraham, and of Adam" (3:23-38); Christ was "made of a woman" (Gal. 4:4); "Jesus Christ concerning the flesh was made of the seed of David" (Rom. 1:3); "the man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. 2:5). Christ was born and died, hungered and thirsted, grew from infancy to childhood and manhood, was subject to the alternations of pleasure and pain, was tempted and struggled with temptation—in short, had all the experiences of man excepting those which involve sin (Luke 2:52; 24:36-44; Matt. 4:1; John 11:33, 35; 13:23; Heb. 4:15; 5:8; Phil. 2:7-8).

What is implied in humanity has never been a dispute within the church; but as some heretical parties have asserted a defective or mutilated humanity in Christ, the church has specified particulars:

1. Christ had "a true body" (Westminster Larger Catechism 37). This was maintained in opposition to the Docetists (dokein),[1] who asserted that Christ's body was seeming only, and spectral, a phantom of ghostlike appearance and not solid flesh and blood. This heresy is refuted by the following: "A spirit has not flesh and bones, as you see me have" (Luke 24:39); "reach hither your hand and thrust it into my side" (John 20:27); "he did eat before them" (Luke 24:43).
2. Christ had "a rational soul" (Westminster Larger Catechism 37). This was held in opposition to Apollinarianism, which would find the rational element for the human nature in the eternal reason of the Logos. Apollinaris at first asserted that the Logos united with a human body only. Afterward he modified this by asserting that he united with a body and an irrational animal soul (Socrates, History 2.66). Texts that disprove this are “my soul is sorrowful” (Matt. 26:38) and Jesus “marveled” (Mark 6:6; Matt. 8:10; Luke 7:9). Sorrow and wonder are rational emotions, proper to man, but not to God. Apollinaris, from the account given of him by Gregory of Nyssa (Against the Apollinarians) , seems to have blended and confused the human and divine natures even in the Godhead, for he asserted a human element in the divine essence itself. The divine, he contended, is also essentially and eternally human. There is, thus, an eternal humanity. Divine nature necessarily tends to the human form, inherently yearns to become man, and is unsatisfied until it is incarnate. This is the worst feature in Apollinaris’s scheme, who was nevertheless a strong advocate of the Athanasian trinitarianism against the Arians. Apollinaris also held that the mental suffering of Christ was the suffering of divine nature; otherwise it could not be a real atonement (see Dorner, Person of Christ). The rational objections to Apollinarianism are the following: (a) A human nature destitute of finite reason would be either idiotic or brutal. If the Logos assumed into union only the body and the animal soul—the soma[2] and psyche[3] and not the pneuma[4] in St. Paul’s classification in 1 Thess. 5:23—he did not unite himself with a rational nature, (b) In this case, also, he did not unite with a complete, but a defective humanity. Some of the essential properties of human nature, namely, rationality and voluntariness, would have been wanting, (c) In this case, none of Christ’s mental processes could have been of a finite kind. Nothing but infinite and divine reason could have been manifested in his self-consciousness. The same would be true of his voluntary action. This must have been infinite only. There could have been no exhibition of finite human will or of finite human reason in his earthly life.

3. Christ “continues to be God and man in two distinct natures” (Westminster Larger Catechism 36). This statement is in opposition to Eutychianism, which asserts that the union of the Logos with a human nature results in a single nature of a third species, which nature is neither divine nor human, but theanthropic. Eutychianism is contradicted by Rom. 1:3-4, which describes Christ kata sarka[5] and kata pneuma hagiosynes,[6] and by 9:5, which describes him kata sarka[7] and epi panton theos[8] Christ, in these and similar passages, is represented as having two natures, not one only. A nature is necessarily incomplex and simple. A person may be incomplex, like a trinitarian person who has only one nature, or complex, like a human person who has two natures and a theanthropic person who has three natures. A person may have two or more heterogeneous natures, but a nature cannot have two or more classes of heterogeneous properties. A substance or nature is homogeneous as to its qualities. A theanthropic nature, therefore, such as Eutyches supposed, having two classes of heterogeneous properties, divine and human, is inconceivable. We cannot think of a substance composed of both immaterial and material properties, a substance which is both mind and matter. This is Spinoza's error. But we can think of a person so composed. We cannot logically conceive of a divine-human nature. It would be like an immaterial-material nature. But a person may be immaterial-material. Man is such.[9]

Christ’s Unipersonality

Biblical Evidence for Christ’s Unipersonality

That the two natures, divine and human, constitute only one person is proved by the following scriptural texts. In Rom. 1:3 the one person called “Jesus Christ our Lord” is said to be “made of the seed of David according to the flesh” and “declared to be the Son of God according to the spirit of holiness.” This latter phrase, being antithetic to the phrase according to the flesh, means “according to the divinity” (Shedd on Rom. 1:4). Christ is described by St. Paul kata sarka’[1] and kata pneuma hagiosynes,[2] the first denoting the human nature, the last the divine. In 9:5 Christ is represented as “God over all, blessed forever,” and as having also a descent from the fathers of the Jewish nation (Phil. 2:6-11; 1 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 1:6-9 compared with 2:14; John 1:14; 1 John 1:1-3; 4:3; Gal. 4:4). Ussher (Incarnation in Works 4.580) combines the scriptural data as follows:

> He “in whom dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily” is the person; that fullness which so does dwell in him is the natures. Now, there dwells in him not only the fullness of the Godhead, but the fullness of the manhood also. For we believe him to be both perfect God, begotten of the sub-stance of his Father before all worlds, and perfect man made of the substance of his mother in the fullness of time. And therefore we must hold that there are two distinct natures in him; and two so distinct that they do not make one compounded nature; but still remain uncompounded and unconfounded together. But he in whom the fullness of the manhood dwells is not one person, and he in whom the fullness of the Godhead dwells, another person; but he in whom the fullness of both these natures dwells is > one and the same Immanuel, and consequently it must be believed as firmly that he is but one person.

That the two natures constitute only one person, is also proved by the fact that in Scripture human attributes are ascribed to the person designated by a divine title; and divine attributes are ascribed to the person designated by a human title. This interchange of titles and of attributes in respect to one and the same person proves that there are not two different persons, each having its own particular nature and attributes, but only one person having two natures and two classes of attributes in common.

Passages in which human attributes are ascribed to the person designated by a divine title are "blood of God" (Acts 20:28);[3] "God spared not his own son (idiou huiou)"[4] (Rom. 8:32); "they crucified the Lord of glory" (1 Cor. 2:8); "redemption through the blood ton htiiou te's agape's autou"[5] (Col. 1:13-14); "a virgin shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel" (Matt. 1:33); and "the Son of the Highest is conceived in the womb" (Luke 1:31-32).

Passages in which divine attributes are ascribed to the person designated by a human title are "no man has ascended up to heaven, but the Son of Man which is in heaven" (John 3:13); "what and if you shall see the Son of Man ascend up where he was before?" (6:62); "as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is God over all" (Rom. 9:5); and "worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power" (Rev. 5:12).

Predication of Divine and Human Qualities to the God-man

From these biblical representations, therefore, it follows that both human and divine qualities and acts may be attributed to the God-man under any of his names. If the God-man be called Jesus Christ, then it is proper to say that Jesus Christ raised the dead and Jesus Christ died; that Jesus Christ is God and Jesus Christ is man. If the God-man be called the Redeemer, then it is proper to say that the Redeemer created all things and the Redeemer hungered and thirsted; that the Redeemer existed before

Abraham and the Redeemer was born eighteen centuries after Abraham. If the God-man be called Messiah, then it is proper to say that Messiah is seated upon the eternal throne and Messiah was crucified, dead, and buried. In 1 Cor. 15 the God-man is called "man," the "second man," and the "last Adam" and divine acts are attributed: "By man came also the resurrection of the dead"; "the second man is the Lord from heaven"; "the last Adam was made a quickening spirit." It would be correct to say: "The last Adam groaned and wept: and the last Adam will judge the world." In Acts 20:28 the God-man is called "God," and human characteristics are attributed, namely, blood and the pains of death. "Feed the church of God, which he has purchased with his own blood." The term God here denotes incarnate God: a complex person, not an incomplex nature. In this use, the ecclesiastical phrase God's blood is proper.[6] So also is the expression God the mighty maker died because "God" here designates the theanthropic person having two natures—God in the flesh—not the one abstract divine nature. It would be improper to say "God's nature died" because this can have but one meaning. But it is proper to say "God died" because this may mean either "God's nature" or the "God-man"—either unincarnate or incarnate God, either the Logos or Jesus Christ. It would be proper to speak of the blood of Immanuel. But Immanuel means "God with us."

The humanity assumed by the Logos is the Logos's or God's humanity; just as the body is the soul's body. When, therefore, the humanity suffers, it is as proper to say that it is "God's suffering" as it is when the body suffers to say that is the "soul's suffering"—not meaning, thereby, the suffering of the soul considered separately as an immaterial substance, but of the soul as put for the total person. We speak of "the blood of souls" because the soul is united with a body that bleeds. Similarly, Scripture speaks of "the blood of God" because God is united with a humanity that has blood:

> The matter of which the human body is composed does not subsist by itself, is not under all those laws of motion to which it would be subject if it were mere inanimated matter; but by the indwelling and actuation of the soul it has another spring within it and has another course of operations. According to this then, to "subsist by another" is when a being is acting according to its natural properties but yet in a constant dependence upon another being; so our bodies subsist by the subsistence of our souls. This may help us to apprehend how that > as a body is still a body and operates as a body, though it subsists by the indwelling and actuation of the soul, so in the person of Jesus Christ, the human nature was entire and still acting according to its own character, yet there was such a union and inhabitation of the eternal Word in it, that there did arise out of that such a communication of names and characters as we find in the Scriptures. A man is called tall, fair, and healthy, from the state of his body; and learned, wise, and good, from the qualities of his mind; so Christ is called holy, harmless, and undefiled, is said to have died, risen, and ascended up into heaven, with relation to his human nature. He is also said to be in the form of God, to have created all things, to be the brightness of the Father's glory, with relation to the divine nature. (Burnet, Thirty-nine Articles, art. 2)

Christ's Twofold Consciousness

In accordance with this complex constitution of Christ's person, we find that his consciousness, as expressed in language, is sometimes divine and sometimes human. When he spoke the words "I and my Father are one" (John 10:30), the form of his consciousness at that instant was divine. Divine nature yielded the elements in this particular experience. When he spoke the words "I thirst" (19:28), the form of his consciousness at that instant was human or an experience whose elements were furnished by the human nature. When he said: "Now, O Father, glorify me with your own self, with the glory which I had with you before the world was" (17:5), his mode of consciousness at that instant was that of the eternal Word who was in the beginning with God. When he said: "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Matt. 27:46), his mode of consciousness was that of a finite creature deserted of his Creator.

In each of these instances, it was one and the same person, namely, Jesus Christ, who possessed the consciousness. The ego denoted by / in the phrase which I had with you before the world was is the very same ego denoted by / in the phrase / thirst. There is no alteration in the person, but there is in the form of the consciousness. And this alteration arises from the fact that there are two natures in the person which furnish the materials of consciousness. Had Christ possessed, like an ordinary man, only a human nature, there could not have been this variety in the modes of his consciousness. A brute can have some of the forms of human consciousness. He can feel hunger and thirst and physical pain, like a man, because he has a physical nature like that of man. But he cannot experience religious emotions like joy in God or esthetic emo-tions like delight in beauty or rational perceptions like the intuitions of geometry, because he has no rational nature like man. These modes of consciousness are precluded in his case because there does not belong to his constitution that rational, esthetic, and moral nature which alone can furnish the materials of such a consciousness. Man has two general forms of consciousness, the animal and the rational, because he is complex in his constitution; but the brute has only one form of consciousness, the animal, because he is simple in his constitution.

Similarly, there arise in the person of the God-man two general forms of consciousness, divine and human, because there are two distinct and specific natures in his person. When the human nature yields the matter of consciousness, Jesus Christ hungers, thirsts, sorrows, rejoices, and expresses his consciousness accordingly. When divine nature yields the matter of consciousness, the very same Jesus Christ commands the raging sea to be still and it obeys; commands the dead Lazarus to rise and he obeys; says, “My Father works hitherto and I work”; “before Abraham was, I am”; “I say unto you, that in this place is one greater than the temple.”

This fluctuation of consciousness in the identity of a person is occurring continually in the sphere of human life. When a man says “I am thirsty,” the elements and form of his consciousness, at this particular instant, are furnished from his material and physical nature. When the same man says, with David, “I love the Lord, because he has heard my voice and my supplications” (Ps. 116:1), the elements and form of his consciousness issue from his mental and spiritual nature. The difference between these two modes of consciousness, the sensuous and the spiritual, is as real and marked, though it is not as great, as between divine and human consciousness in the person of the God-man. And yet there is no schism in the person or duplication of the person. It is the very same individual man who says “I thirst” and “I love God.”[7]

These varying modes and forms of consciousness chase each other over the field of human personality like the shadows of the clouds over a landscape. At one moment, the man's experience is sensuous. At another, perhaps the very next moment, it is intensely spiritual. If the nature of the individual person should be inferred from the sensuous consciousness in him, we should say that he is nothing but an animal; if only from the spiritual consciousness in him, we should say that he is nothing but a spirit. Putting the two together, we say that the person who has these different modes of conscious experience is "human." We do not say, using terms strictly, that he is a sensuous person, though he has a sensuous nature. We do not say that he is a spiritual person, though he has a spiritual nature. "Human" is the proper denomination of the person.

In like manner, in the complex person of Christ there was a continual fluctuation of consciousness, according as divine or human nature was uppermost, so to speak, in the self-consciousness. At one moment, he felt and spoke as a weak, dependent, and finite creature; at the next instant, he felt and spoke as an almighty, self-existent, and infinite being. Finite and infinite, man and God, creature and Creator, time and eter- nity, met and mingled in that wonderful person who was not divine solely or human solely, but divine-human. Says Bengel (on Mark 13:32):

> There is an admirable variety in the motions of the soul [i.e., in the self-consciousness] of Christ. Sometimes he had an elevated feeling, so as hardly to seem to remember that he was a man walking on the earth; sometimes he had a lowly feeling, so that he might almost have seemed to forget that he was the Lord from heaven. And he was wont always to express himself according to his mental feeling for the time being; at one time, as he who was one with the Father; at another time, again, in such a manner as if he were only of that condition in which are all ordinary and human saints. Often, these two are blended together in wonderful variety. (See supplement 5.4.1.)

At this point, it is proper to notice the effect of Christ's exaltation upon his humanity. When the humiliation of Christ ends and his exaltation begins, the human nature, though still unchanged in its essential properties, no longer yields certain elements of consciousness which it previously yielded. Christ on the mediatorial throne hungers no more and suffers no more. Certain accidental properties are left behind, but all essential properties of humanity are retained. The exalted human nature still keeps its finiteness. It is not invested with infinite properties. It does not acquire omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence by Christ's exaltation. It is man's nature still. The change which occurs in the instance of the perfected nature of a redeemed man illustrates the alteration in Christ's human nature. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," and yet the redeemed are as really and truly men as they ever were. But there will be certain modes of consciousness which the redeemed experienced when upon earth that will be impossible to them in heaven. Not because they are different persons in heaven from what they were upon earth, but because there has been a change wrought in their physical nature by the resurrection and glorification of their bodies, so that this nature, though human and physical still, does not need meat and drink as it did while upon earth and is not liable to sickness, suffering, and death as it was here below. Those modes of consciousness which involved pain and suffering, which man was capable of here upon earth by reason of the state and condition of his body while here upon earth, are no longer possible to him as redeemed and glorified in heaven. And so, likewise, those experiences of earthly suffering and sorrow which Christ passed through in his state of humiliation will constitute no part of his self-consciousness in his state of exaltation.

Lutheran Doctrine of "Communication of Properties"

While, in this way, the acts and qualities of either nature may be attributed to the one theanthropic person, the acts and qualities of one nature may not be attributed to the other nature. It would be erroneous to say that divine nature suffered or that the human nature raised the dead; as it would be erroneous to say that the human body thinks or that the human soul walks. The man or "person" whose is the body and whose is the soul both thinks and walks; but the natures by whose instrumentality he performs these acts do not both of them think and walk. One thinks, and the other walks.

Properties belong to a nature and are confined to it. Hence properties are always homogeneous. A material nature or substance can have only material properties. It cannot be marked partly by material and partly by immaterial properties. Natures, on the other hand, belong to a person and may be heterogeneous. A nature must be composed wholly of material or wholly of immaterial properties; but a person may be composed partly of a material and partly of an immaterial nature. Hence two or even three kinds of natures may be ascribed to a person, but only one kind of properties may be attributed to a nature.

By overlooking the difference between person and nature, the later Lutherans have partially revived the ancient error of Eutyches of confounding or mixing the natures in Christ's person. They distinguish three kinds of communicatio idiomatum[8] or communication of properties, namely, genus idiomaticum —the attribution of the properties of either nature to the person; genus apotelesmaticum —the attribution of the mediatorial acts to either nature; and genus majestaticum. The last of these is of such an exalted species as to amount to a communication of the properties of one nature to the other. It is founded upon those texts in which, according to Hase's definition of this genus, the Scriptures speak of "the human nature as exalted by divine attributes: quibus natura humana attributis divinis effertur"[9] (Hutterus, 238). The texts in which this is supposed to be done are "the Son of Man is in heaven" (John 3:13); "the Son of Man has authority to execute judgment" (5:27); "all power is given unto me … I am with you always" (Matt. 28:18, 20); "concerning the flesh, Christ is God over all, blessed forever" (Rom. 9:5); "at the name of Jesus, every knee shall bow" (Phil. 2:10). In these passages, the titles "Son of Man," "Jesus," and "Christ," according to the advocate of the genus majestaticum, denote, not the theanthropic person, but the human nature; and this human nature is exalted by divine attributes of omnipresence—being upon earth and in heaven simultaneously; of sov-ereignty—being the judge of mankind; of omnipotence—having all power in heaven and earth; of absolute deity—being God over all. (See supplement 5.4.2.)

The foundation for this view is laid in the Formula of Concord, though this creed is somewhat wavering and contradictory and not so pronounced as later individual theologians. It affirms that by the glorification of the human nature, after Christ's resurrection, this human nature received, in addition to its own natural essential properties, certain "supernatural, inscrutable, ineffable, and celestial prerogatives of majesty, glory, virtue, and power above everything that is named in time or eternity" (Hase, Symbolical Books, 774). This, however, is guarded by the affirmations that "these two natures in the person of Christ are never confounded or changed the one into the other"[10] (Hase, Symbolical Books, 762); that "the essential properties of one nature never become the essential properties of the other nature"[11] (Hase, Symbolical Books, 763); that "in this union, each nature retains its essence and properties"[12] (Hase, Symbolical Books, 765). But these statements, again, are modified and seemingly contradicted by the affirmations that Christ "not only as God, but even as man, is everywhere present and rules and reigns from sea to sea, even to the ends of the earth"[13] and that Christ's promise to be continually with his apostles, cooperating with them and confirming their word with attending miraculous signs, was fulfilled "not in an earthly manner (non terreno modo), but as Luther was wont to say, after the manner and method of God's right hand: which certainly does not mean a certain circumscribed locality in heaven, as the Sacramentari-ans claim, but denotes the omnipotent energy (virtus) of God, which fills heaven and earth, into possession of which Christ according to his humanity (juxta humanitatem suam) really and truly came, yet without any confusion or equalizing of the natures" (Hase, Symbolical Books, 768). This last clause is contradictory to preceding statements in the creed, unless it can be shown that Christ's human nature can have the attributes of omnipresence and omnipotence without any equalizing of the natures and without causing any essential property of divine nature to become a property of the human nature.[14] In a similar contradictory manner, Brentz (Concerning the Incarnation of Christ, 1001) affirms that the humanity of Christ is omnipotent and omnipresent, and yet is not omnipotence itself (quoted by Bruce, Humiliation of Christ, 113).

Later Lutheran theologians are more explicit and self-consistent than the Formula of Concord. Hollaz defines the genus majestaticum as that mode "in which the Son of God, on account of the personal union, truly and really communicated the attributes (idiomata) of his divine nature to his human nature, unto a common possession, use, and designation"[15] (Hase, Hutterus, 238). He asserts that "the subject, to which divine majesty is given, is Christ according to his human nature, or, what is the same thing, the human nature assumed into the hypostasis of the Word (hypostasin ton logou)"[16] (Hase, Hutterus, 238). He defines the communicatio idiomatum in the following terms: "The communication of the natures in the person of Christ is a mutual participation of the divine and human nature of Christ, through which the divine nature of the Word (ton logon) —made a partaker of the human nature—permeates, perfects, inhabits, and appropriates it to itself. But the human nature—made a partaker of divine nature—is permeated, perfected, and inhabited by it"[17] (Hase, Hutterus, 234). According to this Lutheran definition, the "communication of idioms" or of properties means far more than the Reformed divines meant by it. The latter intended by it only the communication of the properties of both natures to the person constituted of them. In the Lutheran use, it denotes the communication of the properties of one nature to the other nature. It is thus the communication of a nature to a nature, rather than of properties to a person.[18] Similarly, Hahn (Hase, Hutterus, 238) says: "The genus majestaticum includes the propositions in which the attributes (idiomata) of divine nature are predicated of human nature."[19] Gerhard (Loci 4.12) says: "We teach that the [human] soul of Jesus in the very first moment of the incarnation was personally enriched, as with other excellences, so also with the proper omniscience of the Logos, through, and in virtue of, the intimate union and communion with the Logos. But as he did not always use his other excellences in the state of exinanition, so also the omniscience personally communicated to him he did not always exercise" (quoted by Bruce, Humiliation of Christ, 143).

The principal motive for the Lutheran tenet of the ubiquity of Christ's humanity is to explain the presence of the entire Christ. The God-man promises to be with his disciples upon earth, "always, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. 28:20). The Reformed explanation is by the con-junction and union of the limited and local humanity with the illocal and omnipresent divinity. "Presence by way of conjunction is in some sort presence," says Hooker (5.55). The divine nature of Christ is pres-ent with his human nature wherever the latter may be, though his human nature is not, as the Lutheran contends, present with his divine nature wherever the latter may be. But this continual presence of the deity with the humanity is equivalent to the presence of the humanity with the deity. The humanity is in effect ubiquitous, because of its personal connection with an omnipresent nature and not because it is in itself so immense as to be ubiquitous. Christ's deity never is present anywhere in isolation and separation from his humanity, but always as united with and modified by his humanity. But in order to this union and modification, it is not necessary that his humanity should be locally present wherever his deity is. Distance in space is no bar to the personal union between the Logos and his human nature. Suppose, for illustration, the presence of the divine nature of Christ in the soul of a believer while partaking of the sacrament in London. This divine nature is at the same moment conjoined with and present to and modified by the human nature of Christ which is in heaven and not in London. This conjunction between both is equivalent to the presence of both. The whole Christ is present in this London believer's soul, because, though the human nature is in heaven and not in London, it is yet personally united with the divine nature which is both in heaven and in London. There is no separation between the two natures; so that whatever influence or effect the divine nature exerts in the believer's soul as he receives the sacrament is a divine-human influence—an influence proceeding from the union of the divine with the human in Jesus Christ.

Hypostatic Union and the Two Wills in Christ

The union of the two natures in Christ's person is denominated hypostatic, that is, personal. The two natures or substances (ousiai)[20] constitute one personal subsistence (hypostasis).[21] A common illustration employed by the Chalcedon and later fathers is the union of the human soul and body in one person or the union of heat and iron, neither of which loses its own properties (Formula of Concord; Hase, Symbolical Books, 765). (See supplement 5.4.3.)

The doctrine of the two natures implies the doctrine of two wills in Christ. Either nature would be incomplete and defective without the voluntary quality of property in it. Each nature, in order to be whole and entire, must have all of its essential elements. A human nature without voluntariness would be as defective as it would be without rationality.

The monothelite party regarded the two natures as having only one theanthropic will between them: mia theandrike enargeia.[22] From the union of the two natures there resulted a will that was not divine solely nor human solely, but divine-human. The Monothelite contention was that "the one Christ works that which is divine, and that which is human, by one divine-human mode of agency" (Neander, History 3.177). This was in reality a conversion of the two natures, so far as the voluntary property in the nature is concerned, into a third species which is neither divine nor human. It was thus a modified Eutychianism.

In opposition to this error, the Catholic theologians asserted two wills in order to the completeness of each nature and met the objection of the monothelites that there must then be two persons, by affirming that by reason of the intimate personal union of the two natures neither will works without the other's participation in the efficiency. If the human will acts, the divine will submits and coacts. This is the humiliation of the divine. If the divine will acts, the human will submits and coacts. This is the exaltation of the human. One and the same Christ, therefore, performs the divine or the human action, as the case may be, although each action is wrought in accordance with the distinctive qualities of the will that corresponds with it and takes the lead in it. Moreover, as the human will in Christ was sinless, there was no antagonism between it and the will of the Logos. This is taught in the words nevertheless, not my will, but yours be done (Luke 22:42). Thus, in any agency of the God-man, although there are two wills concerned in it, a divine and a human, there is but one resulting action. Two wills are not incompatible with a single self-consciousness, even when they are not hypostaticly united in one person. The divine will works in the regenerate will "to will and to do," and yet there is not duality in the self-consciousness of the regenerate man.

We have already observed that the personalizing of the human nature by its union with the Logos is seen in the fact that the activities of the human nature appear as factors in the single self-consciousness of the God-man. He is conscious of finite inclination and finite volitions; this proves that there is voluntariness in the human nature that has been individualized. He is conscious also of finite and limited perceptions, judgments, and conclusions; this proves that there is rationality in the human nature that has been individualized. These two elements or properties of human nature, the rational and the voluntary, are no longer dormant, as they are in all nonindividualized human nature, but are active and effective in the one self-conscious person Jesus Christ. And one of them is as necessary as the other to the wholeness and completeness of the human nature. To omit the will from the humanity is as truly an error as to omit the reason; and therefore the Monothelites deviated from the true doctrine as really as did the Apollinarians.

S U P P L E M E N T S

5.4.1 (see p. 653). The alternation in the self-consciousness of Christ, according as the human and divine natures advanced or retreated, explains how it was possible for him to have his desires unrealized and his endeavors thwarted. The question naturally arises how Christ could consistently and sincerely say, “How often would I have gathered your children, and you would not.” when as incarnate deity he could have inclined them to come to him. How could he have wept genuine tears over refusing Jerusalem, when he might, by the irresistible energy of the Holy Spirit, have overcome the opposition that caused his tears? The answer is that though he was God incarnate, it was a part of his humiliation to be “emptied,” for most of the time while here upon earth, of his divine power—that is, not to employ it continually and invariably as he did in his preexistent state. This exinanition made him like an ordinary man, who cannot prevail upon men except in the ordinary way of argument, entreaty, and persuasion, all of which might fail to move them. Though God incarnate, yet the nature of his mediatorial office while on earth, as one of humiliation, prohibited the constant use of his omnipotence. He was therefore in this low estate subject to the disappointment and grief which any one of his own ministers is subject to, when he sees no fruit of his labors and grieves over the perversity and obstinacy of men.

5.4.2 (see p. 654). Ursinus (Christian Religion Q. 37) thus explains the communicatio idiomatum or communication of properties: “The communicating of the properties is to attribute that to the whole person which is proper unto one nature; and this is attributed in a concrete term [denoting the person], not in an abstract [denoting the nature]; because the concrete term signifies the whole person in which are both natures, and. consequently, the properties of that particular nature whereof something is affirmed. But the abstract term signifies only the nature which is in the whole per-son, but not the whole person. And therefore it is that nothing hinders why that which is proper to one nature only may not be affirmed of the whole person, so that this property itself may be in and of the person; but contrariwise of the abstract term, only the properties of that nature designated by it are affirmed unto it. As, for example, of the Godhood [deity], which is the abstract impersonal term, no property of the manhood may be affirmed, but only the properties of the Godhood. because Godhood [deity] signifies not the whole person who has both natures, but only the divine nature itself. But of [incarnate] God, which is the concrete or personal term, the properties not of the Godhood only, but of the manhood also may be affirmed; because incarnate God signifies not the divine nature merely and only, but the person who has both the divine nature and the human.”

5.4.3 (see p. 657). Charnock’s (Power of God) account of the hypostatic union of the two natures of Christ in one person is as follows: “(1) There is in this redeeming person a union of two natures. He is God and man in one person: Your throne. 0 God. is forever and ever; God, even your God, has anointed you with the oil of gladness above your fellows’ (Heb. 1:8-9). The Son is called God, having a throne forever and ever, and the unction speaks him man: the Godhead cannot be anointed, nor has any fellows. Humanity and divinity are ascribed to him in Rom. 1:3-4: He was of the seed of David according to the flesh, and declared to be the son of God by the resurrection from the dead.’ The divinity and humanity are both prophetically joined in Zech. 10:10: ‘I will pour out my Spirit’; the pouring forth of the Spirit is an act only of divine grace and power And they shall look upon me, whom they have pierced’; the same person pours forth the Spirit of God and is pierced as man. The Word was made flesh’ (John 1:14). Word from eternity was made flesh in time; word and flesh in one person; a great God and a little infant. (2) The terms [factors] of this union were infinitely distant from each other. What greater distance can there be than between the deity and humanity, between the Creator and a creature? A God of unmixed blessedness is linked personally with a man of perpetual sorrows; infinite purity with a reputed sinner; eternal blessedness with a cursed nature; almightiness with weakness; omniscience with ignorance; immutability with changeableness; incomprehensibleness with comprehensibility; a holiness incapable of sinning made sin [a sin offering]; a person possessed of all the perfections of the Godhead inheriting all the imperfections of the manhood in one person, sin only excepted. (3) This union is strait [strict]. It is not such a union as is between a man and his house he dwells in; nor such a union as is between a man and his garment; nor such a union as one friend has with another. The strait-ness [strictness] of this union may be somewhat conceived by the union of fire with iron; fire pierces through all the parts of iron, it unites itself with every particle, bestows a light, heat, purity upon all of it; you cannot distinguish the iron from the fire, or the fire from the iron, yet they are distinct natures; so the deity is united to the whole humanity, seasons it, and bestows an excellency upon it, yet the natures still remain distinct. As during that union of fire with iron, the iron is incapable of rust or blackness, so is the humanity as united with the deity incapable of sin; and as the operation of fire is attributed to the red-hot iron (as the iron may be said to heat and burn, and the fire may be said to cut and pierce), yet the imperfections of the iron do not affect the fire, so in this mystery those things which belong to the divinity are ascribed to the humanity, and those things which belong to the humanity are ascribed to the divinity, in regard to the person in whom these natures are united. The divinity of Christ is as really united with the humanity as the soul with the body; so united that the sufferings of the human nature were the sufferings of that ‘person, and the dignity of the divine was imputed to the human by reason of that unity of both in one person; hence the blood of the human nature is said to be the blood of God’ (Acts 20:28).”

Christ's Impeccability 5

The doctrine of Christ's person is not complete without considering the subject of his impeccability. That he was sinless is generally acknowledged.[1] But the holiness of the God-man is more than sinlessness. The last Adam differs from the first Adam by reason of his impeccability. He was characterized not only by the posse non peccare,[2] but by the non posse peccare.[3] He was not only able to overcome temptation, but he was unable to be overcome by it.

An impeccable will is one that is so mighty in its self-determination to good that it cannot be conquered by any temptation to evil, however great. A will may be positively holy and able to overcome temptation, and yet not be so omnipotent in its holy energy that it cannot be overcome. The angels who fell could have repelled temptation with that degree of power given them by creation, and so might Adam. But in neither case was it infallibly certain that they would repel it. Though they were holy, they were not impeccable. Their will could be overcome because it was not omnipotent, and their perseverance was left to themselves and not made sure by extraordinary grace. The case of Jesus Christ, the second Adam, was different, in that he was not only able to resist temptation, but it was infallibly certain that he would resist it. The holy energy of his will was not only sufficiently strong to overcome, but was so additionally strong that it could not be overcome. (See supple-ment 5.5.1.)

Christ's Impeccability Proven from Scripture

The scriptural proof of Christ's impeccability is the following.

The immutability of Christ taught in Heb. 13:8 pertains to all the characteristics of his person. His holiness is one of the most important of these. If the God-man, like Adam, had had a holiness that was mutable and might be lost, it would be improper to speak of him in terms that are applicable only to the unchangeable holiness of God. He would not be "holy, harmless, and undefiled, yesterday, today, and forever."

A mutable holiness would be incompatible with other divine attributes ascribed to the God-man. (a) The possibility of being overcome by temptation is inconsistent with the omnipotence of Christ. It implies that a finite power can overcome an infinite one. All temptation to sin must proceed from a created being: either man or fallen angel. Temptation proper, in distinction from God's paternal trial, must always be finite. God tempts no man, in the strict sense of the term (James 1:13). But if a finite temptation is met by an infinite power of resistance, the result must be the failure of the temptation, and not the defeat of the tempted person, (b) The success of temptation depends, in part, upon deceiving the person tempted: "Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression" (1 Tim. 2:14). A finite intelligence may be deceived, but an infinite intelligence cannot be. Therefore, the omniscience which characterizes the God-man made his apostasy from good impossible. (See supplement 5.5.2.)

A mutable holiness is irreconcilable with the fact that the God-man is the author of holiness. He is the "author and finisher of our faith" (Heb. 12:2). He is denominated the "last Adam" in distinction from the first, and as such he is "a quickening spirit" (1 Cor. 15:45). This means that unlike the first Adam he is the fountain of spiritual and holy life for others; and this implies the unchangeable nature of his own holiness. In Rom. 1:4 the divine nature of Christ is described as "a spirit of holiness." The genitive, here, is not equivalent to an adjective, but denotes that the noun which it limits is a source of the quality spoken of.

In accordance with these statements of Scripture respecting the person of Christ, the creeds and theologians have generally affirmed his impeccability.[4] Augustine and Anselm attribute this characteristic to him (Neander, History 4.495-96; Athanasius, Against the Arians 1.35).

Christ's Impeccability Proven from the Constitution of His Person

The truth and self-consistence of the doctrine of Christ's impeccability appear, also, from a consideration of the constitution of his person.

Christ's person is constituted of two natures: one divine and the other human. Divine nature is both intemptable and impeccable: "God cannot be tempted with evil" (James 1:13); "it is impossible for God to lie" (Heb. 6:18). Human nature, on the contrary, is both temptable and peccable. When these two natures are united in one theanthropic person, as they are in the incarnation, the divine determines and controls the human, not the human the divine (see pp. 617-18). The amount of energy, therefore, which the total complex person possesses to resist temptation, must be measured not by the human nature but by the divine; and the amount of energy to resist temptation determines the peccability or impeccability of the person. Jesus Christ, consequently, is as mighty to overcome Satan and sin, as his mightiest nature is. His strength to prevent a lapse from holiness is to be estimated by his divinity, not by his humanity, because the former and not the latter is the base of his personality and dominates the whole complex person.

Consequently, what might be done by the human nature if alone and by itself cannot be done by it in this union with omnipotent holiness. An iron wire by itself can be bent and broken in a man's hand; but when the wire is welded into an iron bar, it can no longer be so bent and bro- ken. And yet iron, whether in a bar or in a wire, is a ductile and flexible metal; and human nature, whether in a God-man or a mere man, is a temptable and fallible nature. A mere man can be overcome by temptation, but a God-man cannot be. When, therefore, it is asked if the person named Jesus Christ and constituted of two natures was peccable, the answer must be in the negative. For in this case divine nature comes into the account. As this is confessedly omnipotent, it imparts to the person Jesus Christ this divine characteristic. The omnipotence of the Logos preserves the finite human nature from falling, however great may be the stress of temptation to which this finite nature is exposed. Consequently, Christ while having a peccable human nature in his constitution, was an impeccable person. Impeccability characterizes the God-man as a totality, while peccability is a property of his humanity.

But it may be asked: If the properties of either nature may be attributed to the person of the God-man, why may not both peccability and impeccability be attributed to the person of the God-man? We say that Jesus Christ is both finite and infinite, passible and impassible, impotent and omnipotent, ignorant and omniscient, why may we not also say that he is both peccable and impeccable? If the union in one person of the two natures allows the attribution of contrary characteristics to the one God-man in these former instances, why not also in this latter?

Because, in this latter instance, divine nature cannot innocently and righteously leave human nature to its own finiteness without any support from the divine, as it can in the other instances. When the Logos goes into union with a human nature, so as to constitute a single person with it, he becomes responsible for all that this person does through the instrumentality of this nature. The glory or the shame, the merit or the blame, as the case may be, is attributable to this one person of the God-man. If, therefore, the Logos should make no resistance to the temptation with which Satan assailed the human nature in the wilderness and should permit the humanity to yield to it and commit sin, he would be implicated in the apostasy and sin. The guilt would not be confined to the human nature. It would attach to the whole theanthropic person. And since the Logos is the root and base of the person, it would attach to him in an eminent manner. Should Jesus Christ sin, incarnate God would sin, as incarnate God suffered when Jesus Christ suffered.

In reference, therefore, to such a characteristic as sin, the divine nature may not desert the human nature and leave it to itself. In reference to all other characteristics, it may. Divine nature may leave human nature alone, so that there shall be ignorance of the day of judgment, so that there shall be physical weakness and pain, so that there shall be mental limitation and sorrow, so that there shall be desertion by God and the pangs of death. There is no sin or guilt in any of these. These characteristics may all attach to the total person of the God-man without any aspersion upon his infinite purity and holiness. They do, indeed, imply the humiliation of the Logos, but not his culpability. Suffering is humiliation, but not degradation or wickedness. The Logos could consent to suffer in a human nature, but not to sin in a human nature. The God-man was commissioned to suffer (John 10:18), but was not commissioned to sin.

Consequently, all the innocent defects and limitations of the finite may be attributed to Jesus Christ, but not its culpable defects and limitations. The God-man may be weak or sorrowful or hungry or weary; he may be crucified, dead, and buried; but he may not be sinful and guilty. For this reason, divine nature constantly supports human nature under all the temptations to sin that are presented to it. It never deserts it in this case. It empowers it with an energy of resistance that renders it triumphant over the subtlest and strongest solicitations to transgress the law of God. It deserts the humanity so that it may suffer for the atonement of sin, but it never deserts the humanity so that it may fall into sin itself. When Christ cried, "My God, why have you forsaken me?" the desertion of the finite by the infinite nature occurred in order that there might be suffering, not that there might be sin. Divine nature, at the very moment of this agony and passion, was sustaining human nature so that it should not sinfully yield to what was the most powerful temptation ever addressed to a human nature, namely, the temptation to flee from and escape the immense atoning agony, which the God-man had covenanted with the Father to undergo. This is implied in Christ's words: "If it be possible, let this cup pass; nevertheless, not my will but yours be done. The cup that my Father gives me, shall I not drink it?"

Again, the impeccability of Christ is proved by the relation of the two wills in his person to each other. Each nature, in order to be complete, entire, and wanting nothing, has its own will; but the finite will never antagonizes the infinite will, but obeys it invariably and perfectly. If this should for an instant cease to be the case, there would be a conflict in the self-consciousness of Jesus Christ similar to that in the self-consciousness of his Apostle Paul. He too would say, "The good that I would, I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do. It is no more I that do it, but sin that dwells in me. O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me?" (Rom. 7:19-20, 24). But there is no such utterance as this from the lips of the God-man. On the contrary, there is the calm inquiry of Christ: "Which of you convinces me of sin?" (John 8:46); and the confident affirmation of St. John: "In him was no sin" (1 John 3:5). There is an utter absence of personal confession of sin, in any form whatever, either in the conversation or the prayers of Jesus Christ. There is no sense of indwelling sin. He could not describe his religious experience as his apostle does and his people do:

“The flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh” (Gal. 5:17).

Impeccability Consistent with Temptability

It is objected to the doctrine of Christ’s impeccability that it is inconsistent with his temptability. A person who cannot sin, it is said, cannot be tempted to sin.

This is not correct; any more than it would be correct to say that because an army cannot be conquered, it cannot be attacked. Temptability depends upon the constitutional susceptibility, while impecca-bility depends upon the will. So far as his natural susceptibility, both physical and mental, was concerned, Jesus Christ was open to all forms of human temptation excepting those that spring out of lust or corruption of nature. But his peccability, or the possibility of being overcome by these temptations, would depend upon the amount of voluntary resistance which he was able to bring to bear against them. Those temptations were very strong, but if the self-determination of his holy will was stronger than they, then they could not induce him to sin, and he would be impeccable. And yet plainly he would be temptable.

That an impeccable being can be tempted is proved by the instance of the elect angels. Having “kept their first estate,” they are now impeccable, not by their own inherent power, but by the power of God bestowed upon them. But they might be tempted still, though we have reason to believe that they are not. Temptability is one of the necessary limitations of the finite spirit. No creature is beyond the possibility of temptation, though he may, by grace, be beyond the possibility of yielding to temptation. The only being who cannot be tempted is God: ho gar theos apeirastos[5] (James 1:13). And this, from the nature of an infinite being. Ambition of some sort is the motive at the bottom of all temptation. When the creature is tempted, it is suggested to him to endeavor to “be as gods.” He is incited to strive for a higher place in the grade of being than he now occupies. But this, of course, cannot apply to the Supreme Being. He is already God over all and blessed forever. He, therefore, is absolutely intemptable.

Again, redeemed men in heaven are impeccable through the grace and power of Christ their head. Yet they are still temptable, though not exposed to temptation. Redemption, while it secures from the possibility of a second apostasy, does not alter the finite nature of man. He is still a temptable creature.

And, in like manner, Christ the God-man was temptable, though impeccable. But his impeccability, unlike that of the elect angels and redeemed men, is due not to grace but to the omnipotent and immutable holiness of the Logos in his person. One of the reasons mentioned in Scripture (Heb. 2:14-18) for the assumption of a human nature into union with the second person of the Trinity is that this person might be tempted. The Logos previous to the incarnation could not be tempted. The human nature was the avenue to temptation; but the divine nature so empowered and actuated the human, the divine will so strengthened the human will, that no conceivable stress of temptation could overcome Jesus Christ and bring about the apostasy of the second Adam.

The temptability of Christ through his human nature may be illustrated by the temptability of a man through his sensuous nature. A man's body is the avenue of sensual solicitation to his soul. A certain class of human temptations are wholly physical. They could not present themselves through the mental or immaterial part of man. Take away the body, and the man could not be assailed by this class of temptations. These, it is true, do not constitute the whole of human temptations. Fallen man is tempted through his soul as well as through his body. But we can distinguish between the two inlets of temptation. Now, as the mind of man, which may be called his higher nature, is approached by temptation through the body, which is his lower nature; so the divinity of Christ, which is his higher nature, was approached by temptation through his humanity, which is his lower nature. The God-man was temptable through his human nature, not through his divine; and he was impeccable because of his divine nature, not because of his human.

Temptability and peccability may be in inverse proportion to each other, and this proves that the two things are entirely distinct and diverse. Theremay be a great temptation with little possibility of its succeeding, owing to the great strength of character and the great voluntary resis- tance that is made. Here, there is great temptability and little peccability. A very strong temptation is required to overcome a very virtuous person. The God-fearing man must be plied with far more solicitation than the irreligious man in order to bring about a fall into sin. Some saintly men repel a species and stress of solicitation, which, if it were applied to some vicious men, would cause them to sin immediately. To such apply the lines of Watts:

> Nor can a bold temptation draw
> His steady soul aside.

The patriarch Joseph was as strongly tempted as ever Charles II was, but there was less possibility of yielding to temptation, that is, less peccability. A godly poor man with a suffering family whom he tenderly loves may be as strongly tempted to steal or embezzle for the sake of his family as an ungodly poor man in a similar case, but the peccability of the former is less than that of the latter. And for the reason that has been mentioned, namely, that the temptability is in the susceptibility, but the peccability is in the will. And while the susceptibility, or sensibility to the solicitation, may be the same in two men, the wills of the two men have become very different from each other. The will of one has been renewed and endowed with a divine energy of resistance, while the other possesses only the power of a self-enslaved faculty.

Upon the same principle, there may be the very greatest degree of temptation where there is no possibility at all of its succeeding; there may be the highest temptability and absolute impeccability. Such we suppose to have been the case of the God-man. He had a perfectly pure human nature which was exceedingly sensitive, because of this purity, to all innocent desires and cravings. No human being ever felt the gnaw-ings of hunger as he experienced them after the forty-day fast, during which he was miraculously kept alive "and was afterward hungry" (Matt. 3:4). No human being ever felt a deeper sorrow under bereavement than he felt at the death of Lazarus, when the God-man wept. No human soul was ever filled with such an awful agony of pain as that which expressed itself in the words my God, why have you forsaken me? and which had previously forced the globules of blood through the pores of the flesh: "The Lord Jesus endured most grievous torments immediately in his soul and most painful sufferings in his body" (Westminster Confession 8.4). It is to this extreme sensibility and susceptibility and temptability that our Lord alludes when he says (Luke 22:28-29): "You are they which have continued with me in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father has appointed unto me, that you may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." And when he says (Matt. 26:41) with the deepest emphasis, because of the experience he had just passed through, and of the experience which he knew he was yet to have: "Watch and pray that you enter not into temptation; the spirit indeed is willing but the flesh is weak." And when, in reference to this whole subject, he both permits and commands tempted man to pray: "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

The fact is that as there may be the most violent attack upon a strategic point where there is an invincible power of resistance, so there may be the most extreme and powerful of temptations addressed to a person in whom there is absolute impeccability. A holy God-man who can meet Satan's solicitation with an almighty energy of opposition will be assailed by a fiercer trial than an irresolute sinful man would experience. A far heavier ordnance will be brought to bear upon Gibraltar than upon a packet boat. Christ was exposed to a severer test and trial than the first Adam was. And this, for the very reason that his resistance was so steady and so mighty. Had he showed signs of yielding or had he succumbed in the outset, the stress of the temptation would have been far less than it actually was. Had the first temptation in the wilderness succeeded, it would not have been followed by the second and third. But the more the God-man baffled the tempter, the more the tempter returned to the charge and intensified his attack.

Neither let it be supposed that our Lord's temptations were slight because they were sinless. An innocent temptation may be greater in its force than a sinful one. Christ was solicited by sinless temptation more strongly than any man ever was by sinful temptation. No drunkard or sensualist was ever allured by vicious appetite so fiercely as Christ was by innocent appetite, when after the forty days "he was a hungered." For the stress of the appetite was supernaturally heightened in this instance. A natural appetite may be stronger and more difficult to control than an unnatural and vicious one. The craving of the glutton for artificial sauces and highly seasoned food is not so intense as the hunger of the traveler in the desert who is upon the brink of starvation. The thirst of the inebriate, great as it is, is not so dreadful and overpowering as that of an English soldier in the Black Hole of Calcutta or of a Negro slave in the middle passage.

Furthermore, the innocent temptations of Christ were made more stringent and powerful by reason of the steady resistance which he offered to them. Temptations that are accompanied with struggle and opposition against them are fiercer than those that are not so accompanied. The good man, in this way, often feels the distress of temptation far more than the bad man. The latter yields supinely and making no opposition does not experience the anguish of a struggle. The former is greatly wearied and strained by his temptation, though he is not conquered by it. Christ "resisted unto blood, striving against sin, and offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death." But his people "have not so resisted" (Heb. 12:4; 5:7).

Sinful vs. Innocent Temptations

At this point, it is necessary to notice the difference between the temptability of Christ and that of a fallen man; for while there is a resemblance, there is also a dissimilarity between them. Christ's temptations were all of them sinless, but very many of the temptations of a fallen man are sinful: that is, they are the hankering and solicitation of forbidden and wicked desire. The desire to steal, to commit adultery, to murder, is sinful, and whoever is tempted by it to the act of theft or adultery or murder is sinfully tempted. St. James (1:14) refers to this species of temptation when he says that "a man is tempted when he is drawn away by his own lust and enticed." The epithymia[6] spoken of is the same which St. Paul mentions in Rom. 7:7 as the equivalent of hamartia![7]. It is also the same thing that is forbidden in the tenth commandment: "You shall not lust"—which Luther (ed. von Gerlach 5.25) renders: Du sollst nicht bose Begierden haben[8] St. James (1:2-3) bids the believer to "count it all joy when he falls into divers [innocent] temptations" by the will and providence of God, "knowing this, that the trial of his faith works patience," but he does not bid him to count it all joy when he is tempted and drawn away by his own lust.

A man, for illustration, is sinfully tempted when he is solicited to perform a certain outward act, say to preach a sermon, by the craving of pride or ambition. This craving or inward lust after human applause is itself sin (John 5:44; 12:43; Rom. 1:25), and to be tempted by it is to be sinfully tempted. It is idolatry or creature worship in the heart. Even if he does not perform the outward act to which his pride or ambition tempted and urged him, he must repent of his wicked lust or pride of heart and obtain forgiveness for it. This is taught in Acts 8:21-22: "Your heart is not right in the sight of God. Repent, therefore, of this your wickedness [of heart], and pray God if peradventure the thought (epinoia)[9] of your heart may be forgiven you." Simon Magus's particular lust was avarice; it was wickedness (kakia)[10] and needed the exercise of mercy. Had it been an innocent desire, he might have continued to have it and needed not to repent of it.

When, again, a man is solicited by the lust of gluttony to perform the external act of intemperate eating of food for the sake of the sensual pleasure of eating, he is not innocently but sinfully tempted. This is wholly different from the solicitation of the natural and innocent appetite for food, such as a famishing sailor on a wreck experiences; such as our Lord felt when having "fasted forty days and forty nights he was afterward a hungered." The craving of gluttony is vicious, and whoever is tempted by it is sinfully tempted. Gluttony is not merely and only physical appetite, but contains also a mental and voluntary element. It thinks of eating as enjoyment and calculates for this. Hunger, pure and simple, on the contrary, is physical merely, not mental and voluntary. Gluttony is a part of original sin; it is the corruption of human nature as respects the body.

Now our Lord was not tempted by the sinful lusts of pride, ambition, envy, malice, hatred, anger, jealousy, avarice, gluttony, voluptuousness, drunkenness; in short by evil desire or "concupiscence" of any kind. He never felt the hankering of pride and vainglory so common to man, but was always in his inmost spirit meek and lowly. The appeal of Satan, in the last of the three temptations, to a supposed pride and ambition in Christ was met with the avaunt: "Get you hence, Satan." Christ had no sinful lust of any sort. This is taught in Christ's own words: "The prince of this world comes and has nothing in me" (John 14:30). It is also taught in Heb. 4:15: "We have a high priest who was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." This text teaches that the temptations of Christ were "without sin" in their source and nature and not merely, as the passage is sometimes explained, that they were "without sin" in their result. The meaning is not that our Lord was tempted in every respect exactly as fallen man is—by inward lust as well as by other temptations— only he did not outwardly yield to any temptation; but that he was tempted in every way that man is, excepting by that class of temptations that are sinful because originating in evil and forbidden desire.[11] This is evident, because, in the original choris hamartias'[12] qualifies pepeira-smenon.[13] Christ was tempted without sin, or sinlessly, "in all points like as we are."[14]

Temptations from evil desire have a different moral quality from those presented through innocent desire. The former are di'hamartias[15] or ex hamartias,[16] not choris hamartias.[17] A temptation from pride, envy, or malice is plainly different in its nature from the temptation from hunger experienced by our Lord in the wilderness or from the desire to be acknowledged as the Messiah or from the dread of suffering experienced by him in the garden of Gethsemane. Says Owen (Indwelling Sin, 6):

> When a temptation comes from without it is unto the soul an indifferent thing, neither good nor evil, unless it be consented to. But the very proposal from within, it being the soul's own act, is its sin. Christ had more temptations from Satan and the world than ever had any of the sons of men; and yet in all of them he had to do with that which came from without. But let a temptation be proposed to a man, and immediately he has not only to do with the temptation as outwardly proposed, but also with his own heart about it.

Again he remarks (Holy Spirit 2.3):

> Although Christ took on him those infirmities which belong unto our human nature as such and are inseparable from it until it be glorified, yet he took none of our particular infirmities which cleave unto our persons, occasioned either by the vice of our constitutions or irregularity in the case of our bodies. Those natural [and innocent] passions of our minds which are capable of being the means of affliction and trouble, as grief, sorrow, and the like, he took upon him; and also those infirmities of nature which are troublesome to > the body, as hunger, thirst, weariness, and pain. Yea, the purity of his holy constitution made him more highly sensible of these things than any of the children of men. But as to our bodily diseases and distempers, which personally adhere unto us upon the disorder and vice of our constitutions, he was absolutely free from them.

If Christ, like fallen man, were subject to that class of forbidden appetences and selfish desires mentioned in Gal. 5:19,21, namely, “idolatry, hatred, emulation, envyings, murder, wrath, uncleanness, drunkenness, and such like,” the dignity and perfection of his character would be gone, and he could not be looked up to with the reverence that he is. The words of the dead kings to the fallen king of Babylon would apply: “Are you also become weak, as we? Are you become like unto us?” (Isa. 14:10). (See supplement 5.5.3.)

Reasons for Christ’s Temptations

The reasons why Christ was tempted are the following: (1) The suffering involved in his temptations was a part of his humiliation and satisfaction for sin. A tempted being is, insofar, a sufferer. Hence we have reason to believe that no temptation is experienced in the heavenly world. (2) In submitting to temptation, Christ sets an example to his disciples of constancy in obedience and resistance to evil. Believers are bidden to “look unto Jesus, who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross despising the shame,” and to “consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself lest they be wearied and faint in their minds” (Heb. 12:2-3).

The fact that Christ was almighty and victorious in his resistance does not unfit him to be an example for imitation to a weak and sorely tempted believer. Because our Lord overcame his temptations, it does not follow that his conflict and success was an easy one for him. His victory cost him tears and blood: “His visage was so marred more than any man” (Isa. 52:14). There was “the travail of his soul” (52:14). In the struggle he cried, “O my Father, if it be possible let this cup pass from me!” (Matt. 26:39). Because an army is victorious, it by no means follows that the victory was a cheap

one. “One more such victory,” said Pyrrhus after the battle of Asculum, “will ruin me.” The physical agony of the martyr is not diminished in the least by the strength imparted to him by God to endure it. The fire is as hot and the pain as great in his case as in that of an unbeliever. Divine grace does not operate like chloroform and deaden pain. The bereavement of a believer by the death of a beloved object is nonetheless sore and heavy, because of the grace which helps him to bear it. The promise is “cast your burden on the Lord and he shall sustain you”—not the burden. Such facts show that victory over a temptation does not imply that the temptation is a slight one; that because Christ could not be overcome by temptation, therefore his temptation must have been less severe than that of his people.

On the contrary, Christ’s human nature, while it was supported and strengthened by the divine, was for this very reason subjected to a severer strain than an ordinary human nature is. Suppose that an additional engine should be put into a vessel that is adapted to carry only one and that a safe passage is guaranteed to it. When it comes into port after boring through three thousand miles of billows, it will show marks of the strain such as an ordinary ship, under ordinary pressure, will not. “The small boat groaned under the burden”[18] (Aeneid 6.413). The traditions of the church and the representations of the old painters founded upon the scriptural statements present Christ’s humanity as weighed down and worn by the awful burden of that heavy cross which the finite nature supported by the infinite was compelled to bear and which with- out that support it could not have borne. For “it was requisite that the mediator should be God, that he might sustain and keep the human nature from sinking under the infinite wrath of God and the power of death” (Westminster Larger Catechism 38).

By this almighty and victorious resistance of temptation, Christ evinced his power to succor those that are tempted and to carry them through all temptation. He showed that he is Lord and conqueror of Satan and his kingdom: “Having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them” (Col. 2:15); “the kings of the earth set themselves against the Lord’s anointed; he that sits in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision” (Ps. 2:2, 4); “he must reign till he has put all enemies under his feet” (1 Cor. 15:25); “it became him for whom are all things, to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings” (Heb. 2:10). The “perfection” spoken of here is not sanctification from sin; but a suitable preparation and accomplishment for his mediatorial office and work by trial and grief, whereby he is able to sympathize with those that are tempted. Hence telidsai[19] and not hagiazein[20] is the word employed.

In the first place, then, the Redeemer of sinful men must be truly human not weakly human, unfallen man not fallen, the ideal man not the actual, temptable not peccable. He must be truly human in order to be assailable by temptation and thereby able to sympathize with every tempted man. In order to sympathize with a person, it is not necessary to have had exactly the same affliction that he has. It is only necessary to have been afflicted. A different kind of affliction may make a man all the more sympathetic. Because Christ was sinlessly tempted, he feels a deeper and more tender sympathy with sinfully tempted man than he would had he been lustfully and viciously tempted. And this, for three reasons: (a) lustful desire deadens the sensibility and blunts the tenderness and delicacy of the nature; (b) there is much selfishness in the sympathy of vice with vice, of one drunkard with another ("misery loves company"), but the sympathy of a benevolent temperate man for a drunkard is disinterested; (c) the strength and reality of sympathy are seen in the amount of self-sacrifice that one is willing to make for the miserable, rather than in the mere fact that one has felt precisely the same misery himself. Tested by this, Christ has infinitely more sympathy for man than any man has had or can have: "Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (John 15:13). One man may know very vividly from personal experience how another man feels and yet not be willing to undergo any suffering for him, for the purpose of delivering him from suffering. Drunkards have a common feeling of misery, but they do not make sacrifices for one another. On the contrary, they "bite and devour one another" (Gal. 5:15). Satan well knows from personal experience what remorse is and how his fellow angels suffer from remorse, but he has no disposition to help them at his own expense.

Second, the Redeemer of man must not be weakly and peccably human, because he must be "mighty to save, traveling in the greatness of his strength" (Isa. 63:1). He must have power to overcome all temptation when it assails himself personally in order that he may be able " tosuccor them that are tempted" (Heb. 2:18). Fallen and helpless man cannot trust himself to one who is himself liable to fall from God. The second Adam must be mightier to repel temptation than the first Adam. And certainly if good and evil were so proportioned to each other in Christ that they trembled in the balance, as they sometimes do in his disciples, no fallen man could go to him with confidence of victory over evil. After the cry “O wretched man that I am: who shall deliver me from the body of this death?” there would not be the exulting shout, “I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord.” If Christ could meet all the temptations that approached him through his innocent and sinless human nature, from the wiles of Satan, and from suffering positively inflicted by eternal justice upon the sinner’s voluntary substitute, if Christ could meet this vast amount of temptation with only a feeble finite will not reinforced and strengthened by an infinite will, he would not be “mighty to save,” nor would he “travel in the greatness of his strength.” The monophysite error, which makes Christ to be nothing but God, is not so great and discouraging as the Socinian, which makes him to be nothing but man. For it would be possible for a helpless sinner fainting in the conflict with sin and death to trust in a merely infinite person, but not in a merely finite one.

SUPPLEMENTS

5.5.1 (see p. 659). Edersheim (Life of Jesus 1.298) thus explains the impeccability of the God-man: “The passage of Scripture in which Christ’s equali ty with us as regards all temptation is expressed, also emphatically excepts from it this one particular, sin (Heb. 4:15:James 1:14); not only in the sense that Christ actually did not sin, nor merely in this. that ’our concupiscence ’ had no part in his temptation s, but emphaticall y in this also, that the not ion of sin has to be wholly exc luded from our thoug hts of Christ’s temptations.

”To obtain, if we can, a clearer understan ding of this subject, two points must be kept in view. Christ’s was real, though unfallen human nature; and Christ’s human nature was in inseparable union with his divine nature . Now it is clear that human nature, that of Adam before his fall, was created both sinless and peccable . If Christ’s human nature was not sinful like ours, but morally like that of Adam before his fall. then must it likewise have been both sinless and in itself peccable. We say, in itself-for there is a great difference between the statement that human nature, as Adam and Christ had it, was capable of sinning and the stateme nt that Christ was peccable. From the tatter the Christian mind instinctively recoils, even as it is metaphysically impossible to imagine the [infinite and omnipotent] Son of God peccable. Jesus voluntarily took upon himself human nature, with all its infirmities and weaknesses, but without the moral taint of the fall: without sin. It was human nature in itsell capable of sinning, but not having sinned. The position of the first Adam was that of being capable of not sinning, not that of being incapable of sinning. The second Adam also had a human nature capable of not sinning, but not incapable of sinning. This explains the possibility of temptation or assaul t upon him, just as Adam could be tempted before there was any inward consensus [concupiscence] to it. The first Adam would have been ’perfected,’ or passed from the capability of not sinning to the incapability of sinning, by obedience. That obedience,or submission to the will of God, was the grand charac teristic of Christ’s work; but it was so because he was not only the unsinning, unfallen man, but also the [infinite and omnipotent] Son of God. With a peccable human nature he himself was impeccable: not because he obeyed, but being impeccable he so obeyed because his human nature was inseparably united with his divine nature . To keep this inseparable union of the two natures out of view would be Nestorianism. To sum up: The secon d Adam,morally unfallen, though voluntar ily subject to all the conditions of our nature,was,with a peccable human nature, absolutely impeccable,as being also the [infinite and omnipotent] Son of God-a peccable nature, yet an impeccable person: the God-man 'tempted in regard to all (things) in like manner (as we),without (excepting)sin."

because his human nature was inseparably united with his divine nature . To keep this inseparable union of the two natures out of view would be Nestorianism. To sum up: The secon d Adam,morally unfallen, though voluntar ily subject to all the conditions of our nature,was,with a peccable human nature, absolutely impeccable, as being also the [infinite and omnipotent] Son of God-a peccable nature, yet an impeccable person: the God-man 'tempted in regard to all (things) in like manner (as we),without (excepting) sin." Edwards (WiI/3.2) argues the impeccability of Christ from the promises made to him and the operation of the Holy Spirit in him,not from the constitut ion of his person . The follow ing are some of the principal points : "II was imposs ible that the acts of the will of the human soul of Christ should, in any instance, degree, or circumstance,be otherwise than holy, because : (1) God had promised so effectually to preserve and uphold him by his Spirit, under all his temptations, that he could not fail of reach ing the end for which he came into the world (Isa. 43:1-4; 49:7-9;50:5-9). (2) The same thing is evident from all the promises which God made to the Messiah himsell, of his future glory, kingdom, and success in his office and character as a mediator;which glory could not have been obtained if his holiness had failed and he had been guilty of sin (Ps. 110:4 ; 2:7-8; Isa. 52:13-15; 53 :10-12). (3) God promised to the church of God of old to give them a righteous, sinless Savior 'in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed '(Jer. 23 :5-6; 33 :15; Isa. 9:6-7: Luke 24:44; Heb. 6:17-18; Ps.89 :3-4). (4) God promised the virgin Mary that her Son should 'save his people from their sins' and that he 'would give him the throne of his father David, that he should reign over the house of Jacob forever and that of his kingdom there should be no end' (Luke 1:45). (5) If it was possible for Christ to have failed of doing the will of his Father and so to have failed of effectually working out redemption for sinners, then the salvation of all the saints who were saved from the beginning of the world to the death of Christ was not built upon a firm foundation:

5.5.2 (see p. 660). Calvin (3.20.46) thus discriminates between temptation by God and temptation from concupiscence or inward lust: "The forms of temptations are many and various. For the corrupt imaginations of the mind provoking us to transgressions of the law. whether suggested by our own concupiscence or excited by the devil, are temptations And these temptations are either from prosperous or adverse events. From prosperous ones, as riches, power, honors, which generally dazzle men's eyes by their glitter and ensnare them with their blandishments, so that caught with such delusions they forget God. From unpropitious ones, as poverty, reproaches, contempt, afflictions; overcome by the bit-terness of which they fall into despondency, cast away faith and hope, and at length become altogether alienated from God. To both of these kinds of temptations we pray our heavenly Father not to permit us to yield, but rather to sustain us. that, strong in might, we may be able to stand firm against all the assaults of our malignant enemy.

"The temptations of God are widely different from those of Satan. Satan tempts to overthrow, condemn, confound, and destroy. But God. that, by proving his people, he may make a trial of their sincerity, to confirm their strength by exercising it, to mortify, purify, and refine their flesh, which without such restraints would run into the greatest excesses. Besides, Satan attacks persons unarmed and unprepared, to overwhelm the unwary. 'God, with the temptation, always makes a way to escape, that they may be able to bear' whatever he brings upon them (1 Cor. 10:13). To some there appears a difficulty in our petition to God that he will not lead us into temptation, whereas, according to James, it is contrary to his nature for him to tempt us (James 1:13-14). But this objection has already been partly answered, because our own lust is properly the cause of all the temptations that seduce and overcome us. Nor does James intend any other than to assert the injus-tice of transferring to God the tempting concupiscence which we are bound to impute to ourselves because we are conscious of being guilty of it. But notwithstanding this, God may when he sees fit deliver us to Satan, abandon us to a reprobate mind and lust-ful concupiscence, and in this manner 'lead us into temptation' by a righteous judgment as a punishment of our sinful self-indulgence (Rom. 1:24,26, 28)."

5.5.3 (see p. 668). There is a difference between trial and seduction, yet both are brought under the term temptation in James 1:14: "Every man is tempted when he is drawn away [seduced] of his own lust and enticed." So. also, are they in Gal. 6:1: "Considering yourself lest you also be tempted." The preceding con-text shows that the term here denotes seduction or "being overtaken in a fault." Mere trial without seduction is denoted in James 1:2,12. Seduction is temptation with sin or sinful temptation. Trial is temptation "without sin" or innocent temptation. Ebrard (on Heb. 4:15) explains the difference as follows: "Whoever is seduced does not hold a mere passive relation to the seducer, but his own will harmonizes with his; whoever is tried is purely passive. But it is not merely physical passivity; headache is not peirasmos.[21] To get the full meaning of innocent and passive temptation we must mark the difference between nature and spirit, involuntary psychical life and free self-conscious life, innate affections and temperaments and personal character. Our Lord as a real man led a truly human psychical life; he experienced the feelings of pleasure and pain, of hope, fear, and anxiety as we do He enjoyed life and recoiled from death. In brief, within the sphere of natural involuntary psychical life he was passively excitable as we are. But duty requires of every man that he rule, and not be ruled by, these instinctive natural affections which are not sinful in themselves. The temperaments illustrate this: That a person is of a sanguine temperament is not sinful; but if he suffers himself to be carried away through this temperament to anger, this is sin. A phlegmatic temperament is not sinful: but if it is permitted by the person's will and character to become sloth, this is sin. In this way every innocent temperament involves temptation in the sense of trial, but not in the sense of seduction. The same is true of the natural and instinctive feelings or affections. That I take pleasure in an undisturbed and comfortable life is not sinful; but if I am placed by providence where duty requires me to enter upon a severe experience and a life full of discomfort, and I refuse, this is sin. I ought to sacrifice my innocent love of comfort to the divine command." Our Lord's instinctive and sinless recoil from agony and death was a temptation in the sense of a trial to him, but not seduction. It was a temptation "without sin" or lust after ease and comfort.

PART images

Soteriology

1 Christ's Mediatorial Offices

Soteriology (soterias logos[1] treats the work of the God-man and its application to individuals by the Holy Spirit.

When we pass from the complex constitution of Christ's person to the work which he wrought for man's redemption, we find him represented in Scripture as a mediator: "There is one God and one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. 2:5). In this passage, the term man denotes the entire theanthropic person Jesus Christ, not the human nature. The human nature is not the mediator. Man, here, designates the God-man under a human title and is like the title "Son of Man" or "last Adam" (1 Cor. 15:45) or "second man" (15:47). Again, the God-man is described in Scripture as being appointed and consecrated to the work of human redemption by God the Father as the representative of the Trinity. Hence the incarnate Word is also denominated the Messiah, the Anointed One (Dan. 9:25; Ps. 2:2; 45:7).

Speaking generally, Messiah is the Old Testament term for the Redeemer, and Mediator is the New Testament term. The word Christ which translates Messiah is generally a proper name in the New Testament, not an official title. Sometimes, however, the God-man is denominated Jesus "the Christ" or "that Christ" (Matt. 16:20; Luke 9:20; John 1:25; 6:29). The Christian church prefers the New Testament designation mediator to the Old Testament designation Messiah. Westminster Larger Catechism 0. 36 denominates Christ "the only mediator of the covenant of grace."

Some Characteristics of Christ as Mediator

Several characteristics of Christ as the mediator must be carefully noted in order to avoid misconception.

The mediator between God and man cannot be God only or man only. This is taught in Gal. 3:20: “A mediator is not of one, but God is one.” A mediator supposes two parties between whom he intervenes; but God is only one party. Consequently, the mediator between God and man must be related to both and the equal of either. He cannot be simply God, who is only one of the parties and has only one nature. Therefore the eternal Word must take man’s nature into union with himself, if he would be a mediator between God and man. As a trinitarian person merely, he is not qualified to mediate between them. The same truth is taught in the following: “For if one man sin against another, the judge shall judge him; but if a man sin against the Lord, who shall entreat for him?” (1 Sam. 2:25); “there is not any daysman between us, to lay his hand upon us both” (Job 9:33); and “therefore when he [the mediator] comes into the world, he says, A body have you prepared for me” (Heb. 10:5).

Second, the office of a mediator between God and man is one of condescension and humiliation:

1. Because it involves the assumption of a human nature by a divine person. This is taught in Phil. 2:5, 8: “Let this [lowly] mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, who being in the form of God made himself of no reputation and took upon him the form of a servant.” To unite the finite with the infinite is to humble the infinite. Incarnate deity is a step down from unincarnate deity. The latter is wholly unconditioned; the former is conditioned by the inferior nature which it has assumed.
2. Because to be a mediator between God and man implies a condition of dependence. When the second person in the Trinity agrees to take the place of a mediator between the Trinity and rebellious man, he agrees to be commissioned and sent upon a lowly errand. He consents to take a secondary place. A king who volunteers to become an ambassador to his own subjects condescends and humbles himself. The office of a commissioner sent to offer terms to rebels is inferior to that of the king. This is taught in many passages of Scripture: “All things are given me of my Father” (Matt. 11:27); “all power is given to me in heaven and in earth" (28:18); "you has given unto him power over all flesh" (John 17:2); "it pleased the Father that in him all fullness should dwell" (Col. 1:19); "the revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him to show unto his servants" (Rev. 1:1); "he became obedient unto death" (Phil. 2:8); the Son of God "was made under the law" (Gal. 4:4); "he put all things under his feet and gave him to be head over all things" (Eph. 1:22-23). This class of texts is cited by Socinus to disprove the doctrine of Christ's original deity. But it has reference to Christ in his capacity and office of mediator, which is an assumed not an original office. These texts do not describe the Logos prior to his incarnation, but subsequent to it. When Christ speaks of his preexistent and eternal place in the Trinity, he does not employ such phraseology. He says, "I and my Father are one" (John 10:30); "glorify me with the glory which I had with you before the world was" (17:5); "before Abraham was I am" (8:58); "my Father works hitherto, and I work" (5:17); "the Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath" (Luke 6:5); "I am the resurrection and the life" (John 11:25); "I am the living bread which came down from heaven" (6:51); "whoso eats my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life" (6:54). But when Christ refers to his incarnate and mediatorial position, he says, "My Father is greater than I" (14:28); "say of him whom the Father has sanctified and sent into the world, you blaspheme: because I said, I am the Son of God?" (10:36); "I came down from heaven not to do my own will, but the will of him that sent me" (6:38); "I have finished the work which you gave me to do" (17:4); "then shall the Son be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all" (1 Cor. 15:28). Accordingly, Westminster Confession 8.3, speaking of Christ's office of mediator, says that "this office he took not unto himself, but was thereunto called by his Father; who put all power and judgment into his hand and gave him commandment to execute the same."

3. Because the office of mediator is temporary. It begins to be exercised in time, and a time will come when it will cease to be exercised. This is taught in 1 Cor. 15:24, 28: "Then comes the end [of the economy of redemption], when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father, when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that did put all things under him, that [the triune] God may be all in all." As there was once a time when there was no mediatorial work of salvation going on, so there will be a time when there will be none. The Logos was not actually and historically a mediator until he assumed human nature. It is true that in the Old Testament church the second trinitarian person discharged the office of a mediator by anticipation, and men were saved by his mediatorial work; but it was in view of his future advent and future performance of that work. Types and symbols stood in the place of the incarnate Word. Not however until the miraculous conception was there actually a God-man; and not until then was there an actual historical mediator. And although there will now always be a God-man, yet there will not always be a mediatorial work going on. The God-man will one day cease to redeem sinners. St. Paul is explicit in saying that a day will come when Christ will deliver up and return his mediatorial commission to the Father, from whom as the representative of the Trinity he received it. There will then "remain no more [available] sacrifice for sin" (Heb. 10:26); and there will be no longer an access to a holy God for sinful men through Christ's blood. Hence it is said: "Now is the accepted time, and now is the day of salvation"; "today if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts"; "he limits a certain day, saying, Today if you will hear his voice" (3:13, 15, 18; 4:1, 7).[2] But a function that begins in time and ends in time, when discharged by a divine person, is evidently one of condescension and secondary nature. The second person of the Trinity as a Creator holds no position of condescension and humiliation and performs no function that is secondary and temporary in its nature. He is a Creator by reason of his absolute and eternal deity and is so from everlasting to everlasting. There never was a time when he was not a Creator, and there never will be a time when he will cease to be a Creator. He never was commissioned to the office of Creator; he never assumed this office; and he will never lay it down. It belongs to him by virtue of his divinity. Creation is a primary, not a secondary function. But the second person as mediator assumes an office and takes a position which is not necessarily implied in his deity. He might be God the Son without being God the mediator; but he could not be God the Son without being God the Creator.

4. Because the office of mediator is one of reward. The condescension and humiliation of the Logos in assuming a finite nature and executing a commission is to be recompensed. It is a self-sacrifice that merits a return from the person who commissioned and sent the mediator upon this service. This is taught in Phil. 2:5-11: "Christ Jesus took upon him the form of a servant; wherefore God also has highly exalted him and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and things in earth and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." This is not a reward for that which the Logos was and did as unincarnate and as the second person of the Trinity, but of what he was and did as the incarnate Logos and as the commissioned mediator between God and man. A divine person, as such, cannot be either exalted or rewarded. This phraseology of St. Paul refers not to the eternal and preexistent state and position of Jesus Christ, but to his postexistent state and condition. It does not relate to the "form of God" which he had originally and from all eternity, but to the "form of a servant" which he assumed in time and which he retains forever. The same truth is taught in Heb. 2:9: "We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels [i.e., was made a man; v. 7.], for the suffering of death crowned with glory and honor"; and in Rev. 3:21: "To him that overcomes will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne."
5. Because the Son of God enters into a covenant with the Father to take a mediatorial office and position. But if he were originally in a subordinate position, he could not covenant or agree to become subordinate. (See supplement 6.1.1.)

Jesus Christ is represented in Scripture as the mediator of a covenant: “Jesus the mediator of the new covenant” (Heb. 12:24); “he is the mediator of abetter covenant” (8:6); “the Lord whom you seek shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant” (Mai. 3:1); “this cup is the new covenant (diathekef)[3] in my blood” (Luke 22:20; cf. Matt. 14:24; 26:28). Accordingly, the creeds so represent him: “The only mediator of the covenant of grace is the Lord Jesus Christ” (Westminster Larger Catechism 36).

A difference in the scriptural representations has given rise to a distinction between the covenant of grace and the covenant of redemption. The covenant of grace is made between the Father and the elect. This is taught in those passages which speak of Christ as the mediator of the covenant: “For this cause, he is the mediator of the new covenant” (Heb. 9:15); “he is the mediator of a better covenant” (8:6). This implies that the promises of the covenant are made by God the Father to his people and that Christ stands between the two parties. The same is taught in Gal. 3:16: “Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He says not, And to seeds, as of many [seeds]; but as to one [seed], And to your seed, which is Christ.” The contracting parties here are the Father and the elect “seed.” This also has its type in the Sinaitic theocratic covenant between Jehovah and the Hebrews as a chosen nation, of which national covenant Moses was the mediator: “The law was ordained by angels in the hands of a mediator” (3:19). The following passages mention the covenant of God the Father with the elect church: “Fear not, O Israel, for I have redeemed you: you are mine. When you pass through the waters, I will be with you; and through the rivers, they shall not over-flow you” (Isa. 43:1-6); “this is my covenant with them, says the Lord: My spirit that is upon you and my words which I have put in your mouth shall not depart out of your mouth nor out of the mouth of your seed, says the Lord, from henceforth and forever”[4] (59:21).

The covenant of redemption is made between the Father and the Son. The contracting parties here are the first and second persons of the Trinity; the first of whom promises a kingdom, a glory, and a reward, upon condition that the second performs a work of atonement and redemption.[5] The following are passages in which it is spoken of: “Behold my servant whom I uphold. He shall not cry nor lift up nor cause his voice to be heard in the street. I the Lord have called you and will hold your hand and will keep you and will give you for a light of the Gentiles, to open the blind eyes" (Isa. 42:1-6); "I appoint (diatithemai)[6] unto you a kingdom, as my father has appointed unto me" (Luke 22:29); "when you shall make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed" (Isa. 53:10-12); "I will give you for a light to the Gentiles, that you may be my salvation unto the ends of the earth" (49:6); "my covenant will I not break; once have I sworn, that I will not lie unto David; his seed shall endure forever" (Ps. 89:34-36); "ask of me, and I will give you the heathen for your inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for your possession" (2:8).

Though this distinction is favored by the scriptural statements, it does not follow that there are two separate and independent covenants antithetic to the covenant of works. The covenant of grace and that of redemption are two modes or phases of the one evangelical covenant of mercy. The distinction is only a secondary or subdistinction. For when, as in Isa. 43:1-6, the elect are spoken of as the party with whom God the Father makes a covenant, they are viewed as in Christ and one with him. The covenant is not made with them as alone and apart from Christ. This is taught in Gal. 3:16: "To Abraham and his seed were the promises made"; but this seed "is Christ." The elect are here (as also in 1 Cor. 12:12) called "Christ," because of the union between Christ and the elect. And in like manner, when Christ, as in Isa. 42:1-6, is spoken of as the party with whom the Father covenants, the elect are to be viewed as in him. As united and one with him, his atoning suffering is looked upon as their atoning suffering: "I am crucified with Christ" (Gal. 2:20); his resurrection involves their resurrection: "Grown together in the likeness of his resurrection" (Rom. 6:5); his exaltation brings their exaltation: "You shall sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19:28); "we shall judge angels" (1 Cor. 6:3). The covenant of redemption is not made with Christ in isolation and apart from his people. It is with the head and the members: "He gave him to be the head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that fills all in all" (Eph. 1:22-23).

The following statement, then, comprises the facts. There are only two general covenants—the legal and the evangelical: "These are the two covenants, the one from Mount Sinai which genders to bondage" (Gal. 4:24). The first in order is the legal covenant of works, founded upon the attribute of justice. Its promise is "do this and you shall live." This covenant failed upon the part of man in the fall of Adam. The second is the evangelical covenant, founded upon the attribute of mercy. Its promise is twofold: (a) To the mediator: “Make your soul an offering for sin, and I will give you the heathen for your inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for your possession” (Isa. 53:10; Ps. 2:8); and (b) to the elect: “Fear not, for I have redeemed you, I have called you by your name; you are mine. When you pass through the waters, I will be with you; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow you” (Isa. 43:1-2); “believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you shall be saved, and your house” (Acts 16:31). The evangelical covenant, as opposite to the legal covenant, may therefore be called (a) the covenant of redemption when Christ and his offices are the principal thing in view and (b) the covenant of grace when the elect and their faith and obedience are the principal thing under consideration.

Respecting the validity of the distinction, there is some difference of opinion, though the weight of authority is in favor of it. Turretin (12.2.12) adopts it; also Witsius (Covenants 2.2.1) and Hodge (Theology 2.358). Fisher (On the Catechism Q. 20 §57) asserts that the Westminster “standards make no distinction between a covenant of redemption and a covenant of grace.” The phrase covenant of redemption is not found in them. In Westminster Larger Catechism Q. 31 it is said that “the covenant of grace was made with Christ and in him with all the elect.” This would be the covenant of redemption. In Westminster Confession 7.3 it is stated that “the Lord was pleased to make a second covenant, commonly called the covenant of grace, wherein he freely offers unto sinners life and salvation by Jesus Christ, requiring of them faith in him that they may be saved and promising to give unto all those that are ordained unto life his Holy Spirit, to make them willing and able to believe.” Here the covenant is made with the elect. The phraseology in Westminster Shorter Catechism Q. 20 is somewhat ambiguous: “God, having elected some to everlasting life, did enter into a covenant of grace, to deliver them out of the estate of sin and misery and to bring them into an estate of salvation by a Redeemer.” Whether the “covenant” mentioned is made with the elect or with the mediator is not to be indisputably determined from the wording of the statement.

The evangelical covenant, as the opposite of the legal covenant, is essentially one and the same under the old dispensation and the new. The difference is only in the mode of administration. In the old dis-pensation, comprising the patriarchal and Jewish churches, it was administered through animal sacrifices and visible types and symbols; in the new dispensation, by the advent and sacrifice of Christ. The old administration was ceremonial and national; the new is spiritual and universal. This difference is mentioned in 2 Cor. 3:14: “Moses put a veil [of types and ceremonies] over his face, that the children of Israel could not steadfastly look to the end of that which is abolished; but their minds were blinded; for until this day, remains the same veil untaken away in the reading of the old testament; which veil is taken away in Christ.” In Heb. 8:6-13 the “first covenant” is the covenant of grace made “with their fathers when God took them by the hand to lead them out of Egypt,” administered by types and symbols; and the “second covenant” is the covenant of grace under the administration of Christ personally, who is “the mediator of a better covenant.” Hebrews 9:15 speaks of the “new covenant” in distinction from the “first covenant” (which had “ordinances of divine service and an earthly sanctuary”) and of the “redemption of transgressions under the first covenant.” This shows that the “first covenant” was a gracious one.[7]

Threefold Office

Christ the God-man, as the mediator of the evangelical covenant, discharges three offices: those of prophet, priest, and king: “Our mediator was called Christ, because he was anointed with the Holy Spirit above measure; and so set apart and fully furnished with all authority and ability, to execute the offices of prophet, priest, and king of his church, in the estate both of his humiliation and exaltation” (Westminster Larger Catechism 42). His prophetic office is taught in the following: “The Lord your God will raise up unto you a prophet from among you, of your brethren, like unto me” (Deut. 18:15, 18; Acts 3:22); “the spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord has anointed me to preach good tidings” (Isa. 16:1; Luke 4:18). His priestly office is taught in the following: “You are a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek” (Ps. 110:4; Heb. 5:5-6); “we have a great high priest that is passed into the heavens” (Heb. 4:14-15). His kingly office is taught in the following: “He shall be called the prince of peace” (Isa. 9:6-7); “I have set my king upon my holy hill of Zion” (Ps. 2:6).

These offices were each and all of them executed by the mediator before, as well as after his advent (Westminster Confession 7.5; 8.6). This is proved by the following: “The Lamb slain from the foundation of the world” (Rev. 13:8); “the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent’s head” (Gen. 3:15); “to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past” (Rom. 3:25); “he is the mediator of the new testament, that by means of death for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance” (Heb. 9:15; Gal. 3:8, 14, 16-18 compared with Gen. 17:7; 22:18); “we believe that through the grace of Christ we shall be saved even as they [the fathers]” (Acts 15:11); “to him give all the prophets witness that through his name whosoever believes in him shall receive remission of sins” (10:43); “for the law [Jewish dispensation] having a shadow of good things to come” (Heb. 10:1-10); the Jewish ordinances “are a shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ” (Col. 2:17; Isa. 53); “I the Lord have called you and will give you for a light of the Gentiles” (Isa. 42:6); “unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them” (Heb. 4:2).

Faith in the mediator was the unmeritorious but indispensable condition of salvation[8] before the advent as well as after it: “The just [i.e., the justified] shall live by faith” (Hab. 2:4, quoted by St. Paul in Rom. 1:17); “blessed are all they that put their trust in him” (Ps. 2:12); “Abraham believed God and it was counted to him for righteousness” (Rom. 4:3); “David says, Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin” (4:8); “these all died in faith” (Heb. 11:13); Enoch “pleased God” by his faith” (11:5); “the Old Testament is not contrary to the New: for both in the Old and New Testament everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ, who is the only mediator between God and Man” (Thirty-nine Articles 7). Says Calvin (on Gal. 4:1-7):

> We learn from this passage that the fathers under the Old Testament had the same hope of the inheritance which we have at the present day, because they were partakers of the same adoption. Notwithstanding their outward servitude, their consciences were still free. Though bearing the yoke of the [ceremonial] law upon their shoulders, they nevertheless with a free spirit worshiped God. More particularly, having been instructed concerning the free pardon of sin, their consciences were delivered from the tyranny of sin and death. They held the same doctrine, were joined with us in the true unity of faith, placed reliance on one mediator, called on God as > their Father, and were led by the same Spirit. Hence it appears that the difference between us and these ancient fathers lies not in substance, but in accidents or circumstantials.

The Old Testament believer had both the penitent consciousness of sin and the remission of sin. The account of the religious experience of Abraham, Moses, David, and Isaiah discloses a contrite spirit before the absolute holiness of God. The Old Testament saint cast himself upon divine mercy (Ps. 32:1-11; 51; 103:2-3). And this mercy he expected through the promised "seed of the woman," the Messiah, and through an atonement typified by the levitical sacrifices. The forgiveness of sin was both promised and received under the old dispensation.

Christ's Prophetic Office

The prophetic office of Christ is thus described in Westminster Larger Catechism Q. 43: "Christ executes the office of a prophet in revealing to the church, in all ages, by his Spirit and word, the whole will of God in all things concerning edification and salvation." The prophetic function of Christ is not confined to the prediction of future events. The idea is wider than that of mere vaticination, though it includes this. Christ, as "that prophet that should come into the world" (John 6:14; 1:21; Luke 24:19), is the source and teacher of truth—and particularly of that truth which relates to human redemption. This is implied in the names that are given to him in Scripture. He is called counselor (Isa. 9:6), witness (55:4), interpreter (Job 33:23), apostle (Heb. 3:1), word (John 1:1), truth (14:6), and wisdom (Prov. 8). In the Logos doctrine of St. John, all the previous statements respecting the prophetic or teaching function of the mediator are summed up and more fully unfolded: He is "the light of men" (1:4), the "light of the world" (9:5), the "true light which coming into the world lights every man" (1:9), "the light to lighten the Gentiles" (Luke 2:32; Isa. 60:3), "the Word dwelling among us full of truth" (John 1:14), and the "Christ in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. 2:3). Hence the voice from heaven to mankind: "This is my beloved Son, hear him" (Matt. 17:5).

The great characteristic of Christ as a prophet is his consciousness of infallibility: “He spoke as one having authority and not as the scribes” (Mark 1:22); “but I say unto you” (Matt. 5:34). Merely human prophets, like Isaiah (see Isa. 6), are abashed in the presence of deity when receiving communications from him. Christ never shows the least trace of such a feeling: “No man knows the Father but the Son, and no one knows the Son but the Father” (Matt. 11:27). This implies coequality with the Father in the knowledge of the mystery of the Trinity. Christ speaks out of the fullness of his own immediate intuition. He never says, “The word of the Lord came unto me.” From the omniscience of his own divine nature he draws all his teachings, as a prophet: “In him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily” (Col. 2:9). He is the source to others of prophetic knowledge: He “opened the understanding of his disciples that they might understand the Scriptures” (Luke 24:45). The Old Testament prophets “prophesied of the grace that should come, searching what or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow” (1 Pet. 1:10-11).

Christ executes the office of prophet personally and directly. This he did (a) in all the theophanies of the Old Testament: The appearances of Jehovah to individuals before the flood, to the patriarchs and Moses after the flood, to the prophets of Israel and Judah, were a discharge of the prophetic function of the mediator. These were all harbingers and adumbrations of his incarnation. And he also did this (b) in his incar-nation itself: This was as direct and personal teaching as is possible. The second person of the Trinity when incarnate upon earth spoke as never man spoke and spoke face to face to man. And his teaching was not confined to his words, though most of his instruction was so conveyed. The works of Christ as well as his words, and especially his miraculous works, taught man: “If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do, though you believe not me, believe the works” (John 10:37-38). His disciples describe him as “a prophet mighty in deed and word before the people” (Luke 24:19). This prophetic office continues to be discharged personally by the incarnate Word, in his state of exaltation. In the description of the heavenly world, the “Lamb” is said to be “the light thereof (Rev. 21:23).

Christ executes the office of prophet mediately (a) through the Holy Spirit. All the truth that was conveyed previous to the advent through the inspired prophets of the Old Testament and subsequent to it through the apostles of the New Testament comes to man in the discharge of the prophetic function of the mediator. Hence it is said (1 Pet. 1:10-12) that it was “the Spirit of Christ” that was in the prophets “who prophesied of the grace that should come” and who “testified beforehand the suf-ferings of Christ.” By this same Holy Spirit, Christ “preached unto those that were disobedient in the days of Noah” and who are now and forever more “in prison” for their disobedience (1 Pet. 3:19-20; see p. 841). Christ as prophet is thus the source of all revelation, unwritten and written. The truths of natural religion come to man through him. He is the “light of men” in the sense that what “may be known of God” is an unwritten and internal revelation to them (Rom. 1:19). And he is the “light of the world” in the sense that all that higher and more perfect knowledge respecting God and human salvation which constitutes the written word has him for its author: “The only begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, he has declared him” (John 1:18). Christ also executes the office of prophet mediately (b) through the instrumentality of the Christian ministry and church. Christ, in the first place, commissioned his apostles as inspired agents both to teach and to preach the gospel. Their writings are the infallible documents by which the church is to be instructed and guided: “Go and teach all nations” (Matt. 28:19-20); “the Spirit of truth will guide you into all truth; he shall glorify me, for he shall receive of mine and show it unto you” (John 15:13-14). Again, second, Christ provided for successors to the apostles considered as preachers and ministers of the word, and through this ministry he instrumen-tally executes his prophetic office. The supernatural gifts of inspiration and miracles which the apostles possessed were not continued to their ministerial successors, because they were no longer necessary. All the doctrines of Christianity had been revealed to the apostles and had been delivered to the church in a written form. There was no further need of an infallible inspiration. And the credentials and authority given to the first preachers of Christianity in miraculous acts did not need continual repetition from age to age. One age of miracles well authenticated is sufficient to establish the divine origin of the gospel. In a human court, an indefinite series of witnesses is not required. “By the mouth of two or three witnesses” the facts are established. The case once decided is not reopened. With the exception, therefore, of the two supernatural gifts of inspiration and miracles, the ministry who took up the work of preaching the word had the same preparation for the work that the apostles had. They were like them regenerated, sanctified, and enlightened by the Holy Spirit. This is taught in Eph. 4:11-12: Having “ascended far above all heavens” and being seated upon the mediatorial throne, the mediator “gave some to be apostles and some to be prophets and some to be evangelists and some to be pastors and teachers: for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ.” Accordingly, the preaching of the gospel by his ministers is called Christ’s preaching: “Then the deputy Sergius Paulus, when he saw what was done to Elymas the sorcerer, believed, being astonished at the doctrine [teaching] of the Lord [through Paul]” (Acts 13:12). In 1 Cor. 1:6 and Rev. 1:2 the preaching of the gospel is denominated “the testimony of Christ.” In 2 Cor. 5:20 Paul represents himself and his colaborers as ambassadors for Christ and beseeches men in Christ’s stead to be reconciled to God. In 1 Pet. 3:19 and Eph. 2:17 the preaching of Noah and the apostles is called Christ’s preaching.

Again, the mass of the church, as well as the Christian ministry, are represented as an agency by which the mediator executes his prophetic office. After the death of Stephen, all the church “excepting the apostles” were scattered by persecution and “went everywhere preaching the word” (Acts 8:4). The church is represented as “a chosen generation, a royal priesthood,” to “show forth the praises of him who has called it out of darkness into his marvelous light” (1 Pet. 2:9). The Holy Spirit dwelling in the church, in all the fullness of his graces and gifts, enriches it with wisdom and knowledge, so that it is capable both by word and example of proclaiming Christ crucified to the sinful world of which it is said to be the light (Matt. 5:14-16). The superiority of the church to the secular world, in regard to the comprehension of religious truth and of everything relating to the eternal destiny of mankind, is boldly and strongly asserted by St. Paul: “We speak wisdom among them that are perfect [saints enlightened]; even the hidden wisdom of God which none of the princes of this world knew. The natural man cannot know the things of the Spirit of God, because they are spiritually discerned. He that is spiritual judges all things, yet he himself is judged of no man” (1 Cor. 2:6-15). The Christian mind is qualified to be a critic of secular knowledge; but the secular mind is not qualified to be a critic of Christianity. Christ crucified is foolishness to the Greek; yet this foolishness of God is wiser than men (1:23, 25).

Christ's Priestly Office

The priestly office of Christ is thus defined in Westminster Larger Catechism 0. 44: "Christ executes the office of a priest, in his once offering himself a sacrifice without spot to God, to be a reconciliation for the sins of his people; and in making continual intercession for them." The function of a priest is described in Heb. 5:1: "Every high priest is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins."[9] The priest is a mediator in religion, as an ambas-sador is one in politics. He is appointed to officiate between God and man in religious matters. And since the fact of sin is a cardinal fact in the case of man, the function of a mediating priest for man must be mainly expiatory and reconciling. Since "every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices, it is of necessity that Jesus Christ have somewhat to offer" (8:3).

Accordingly, we find the expiatory priest in existence long before the Mosaic institute. Noah, at the cessation of the deluge, nearly a thousand years before the exodus of the Israelites, officiated as the priest of his household: "Noah built an altar unto the Lord and took of every clean beast and of every clean fowl and offered burnt offerings on the altar. And Jehovah smelled a sweet savor" (Gen. 8:20). This implies that the system of sacrifices was then in existence. There was an altar and a victim. The distinction between clean and unclean beasts and birds was made, a distinction which has its principal significance in reference to a piacular offering. Not any and everything may be offered as an atonement, but only that which is specified.

Still more than this, there is evidence in the first chapters of Genesis that atoning sacrifices and an officiating priest to offer them were instituted immediately after the apostasy and in connection with the promise of a mediator. It was a common Jewish opinion that Adam was the first human priest. The correctness of this opinion is favored by the following considerations. The permission to eat vegetable food is given to Adam in Gen. 1:29, but nothing is said of animal food. The permission to eat both vegetable and animal food is given to Noah in 9:3. Yet ani- mals were slain by Adam; for "the Lord God made coats of skins and clothed both Adam and Eve" (3:21). It is a natural explanation of this fact to suppose that animals had been killed and offered in sacrifice by Adam. For even if it be assumed that animal food was permitted to Adam, the narrative respecting the coats of skins implies that more animals were slain than would be required for the food of Adam and Eve. Again, in 4:3-4 both Cain and Abel are represented as offering sacrifices; the former, the bloodless eucharistic offering of the fruit of the ground; the latter, the bloody expiatory offering of the firstlings of the flock. They are described as “bringing” their offering (4:3—4) to a locality which is described as the “face of the Lord” and the “presence of the Lord” (4:14, 16). This looks like a sacred place appointed for the offering of sacrifice and a sacred person to officiate, namely, Adam the head and priest of his family, as Noah was of his. The words of God to Cain (4:7) teach that a piacular offering for sin had been appointed: “If you do not well, sin [a sin offering] lies at the door.” Subsequently, the lamb or goat was to be brought “to the door of the tabernacle.” Again, the prohibition in 9:4, 16 to eat blood, given to Noah, is the same that is afterward given to the Israelites in Lev. 17:10, 12; and the reason assigned when the command is laid upon the Israelites is that the blood is the life of the flesh and is to be poured upon the altar “to make atonement for your souls.” From this it follows with great probability that the statute as given to Moses was only a reenactment of the statute as given to Noah and given for the same reason, namely, that the blood of animals must be used only for piacular purposes. Even under the levitical law, the use of animal food was considerably restricted. The blood and fat were interdicted in all cases. The sin offering and trespass offering were to be eaten only by the priests; and the more solemn sin offerings could not be eaten even by them. The burnt offerings, the most numerous of all, were wholly consumed.

Similar proofs of the institution of an expiatory sacrifice and an officiating priest are found in the history of Abraham and the other patriarchs. On first entering Canaan, Abram “built an altar and called upon the name of the Lord” (Gen. 12:7-8). When he returned from his victory over the kings, he is congratulated and blessed by Melchizedek the Canaanite king of Salem, who is called “the priest of the most high God” (14:18-19). Isaac builds an altar (26:25). Jacob offers sacrifice (31:54).

The indications of a priest and a sacrifice are plain in the Book of Job. It was the “continual” custom of this patriarch, who probably lived between the deluge and Abraham, as the head of his family to “offer burnt offerings according to the number of them all” (Job 1:5). The Septuagint rendering of 12:19 is “he leads priests [Authorized Version: princes] away spoiled.” In 33:23-24 the idea of one who furnishes a ransom is presented. The rite of sacrifice under the Old Testament taught that God is both just and merciful: just, in that his law requires death for sin; merciful, in that he permits and provides a vicarious death for sin. In this way it deepened fear and inspired hope—fear of divine holiness and hope in divine mercy.

The priestly office of the mediator, unlike his prophetic, is not administered mediately but directly. The priests of the old dispensation, both patriarchal and Mosaic, were types of Christ, not his agents or delegates. The human priests "were many, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death"; but the divine high priest is one and alone, "because he continues ever and has an unchangeable priesthood" (Heb. 7:23-24). And because he constantly discharges his priestly office, he does not delegate it to others. This unique and solitary character of Christ's priesthood is taught in the comparison of him to Melchizedek in Heb. 7. The king of Salem was the only one of his class. He was "without father, without mother, without descent (agenealoge'tos),[10] having neither beginning of days nor end of life." That is, he was not one of a line of priests having predecessors and successors. In this respect he was like the Son of God, who was also alone and solitary in his priesthood.

The Romish theory of an ecclesiastical priesthood acting, since Christ's ascension, as the delegates and agents of the great high priest has no support in Scripture. Had Christ intended to discharge his sacerdotal office through a class of persons in his church, he would have appointed and commissioned such a class and provided for its continuation. He did this in regard to his prophetic office. He appointed "apos-tles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints and the work of the ministry" (Eph. 4:11-12). But he did not appoint any to be priests to "offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins" (Heb. 5:1). On the contrary, he abolished the earthly priesthood when he formally assumed his own priestly office. The substance having appeared, the shadow disappeared. The antitype makes the type useless (9:23-26). The earthly sacrifice was done away, and the earthly priest with it.

The two parts of Christ's priestly work are atonement and intercession, (a) Atonement: "How much more shall the blood of Christ purge your conscience" (Heb. 9:14, 28); Christ "was once offered to bear the sins of many"; "the lamb of God which takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29); "a merciful and faithful high priest to make reconciliation for the sins of the people" (Heb. 2:17); "a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:28); "my blood is shed for you" (Luke 22:19); "he made him to be sin for us" (2 Cor. 5:21); "Christ was made a curse for us" (Gal. 3:13); "Christ suffered for our sins the just for the unjust" (1 Pet. 3:18); "he is the propitiation for our sins" (1 John 2:2); "he made his soul an offering for sin" (Isa. 53:10); "he spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us" (Rom. 8:32); "by him we have received the atonement" (5:11); "Christ died for us; scarcely for a righteous man will one die" (5:6-7); "Christ has loved us and given himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God" (Eph. 5:2). (b) Intercession: "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous" (1 John 2:1); "wherefore he is able to save them to the uttermost, seeing he ever lives to make intercession for them" (Heb. 7:25); "I pray for them which you have given me; neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word" (John 17:9, 20).

The intercession of Christ is intimately connected with his atoning work. Westminster Confession 8.8, after saying that Christ "effectually applies and communicates redemption to those for whom he has purchased it," adds that "he makes intercession for them" (cf. Westminster Larger Catechism Q. 44). This is in accordance with the Scriptures. The Apostle John asserts that "if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father" (1 John 2:1-2) and adduces as the ground of his success as an advocate two facts: that he is "Jesus Christ the righteous" and is "the propitiation for our sins." The Apostle Paul in Rom. 8:34 states that Christ is "at the right hand of God making intercession for us" and men- tions as the reason why he is fitted for this work the fact that he "died and is risen again." In Heb. 4:14-16 believers are encouraged to "come boldly unto the throne of grace" because they "have a great high priest who is passed into the heavens and is touched with the feeling of their infirmities." Again, in 7:24-25 Christians are assured that because Christ has an "unchangeable priesthood, he is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever lives to make intercession for them." In 9:7-12 the writer reminds the reader that the Jewish "high priest went alone once every year into the second tabernacle, not without blood, which he offered for himself and the errors of the people"; and then he states that Christ, "a high priest of good things to come, by his own blood entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us."

Still further proof of the close connection of Christ's intercessory work with his atoning work is found in that class of texts which represent the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit as being procured by Christ's intercession. These teach that that plenary effusion of the Holy Spirit which is the characteristic of the Christian economy is owing to the return of the mediator to the Father and his session upon the mediatorial throne: "I indeed baptize with water; he shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit" (Matt. 3:11); "Jesus spoke this of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive, for the Holy Spirit was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified" (John 7:39); "it is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart I will send him unto you" (16:7). In 14:16-26 and 15:26 Christ assures his disciples that after he has left them and returned to the Father "where he was before," he "will pray the Father, and he will give them another Comforter, that he may abide with them, even the Spirit of truth"; and furthermore that he will himself "send the Comforter unto them from the Father."

In accordance with these statements of Christ, we find Peter referring the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost to the mediatorial agency and intercession of Christ: "Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted and having received of the Father the gift of the Holy Spirit, he has shed forth this which you now see and hear" (Acts 2:33). And the whole Book of Acts contains frequent allu-sions and references to the person and work of the Holy Spirit, in a manner and to a degree which are not seen in the four gospels, showing that immediately after the ascension of Christ a more powerful agency and influence of the third trinitarian person began to be experienced in the church. This descent and gift of gracious operation and influence was directly connected with Christ's presence and intercession in heaven. And this intercession rested for its ground and reason of success upon that atoning work which he had performed upon earth.

The same connection between Christ's atonement and Christ's intercession is noticed in the epistles. Christ was "made a curse for us that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith" (Gal. 3:13-14). The Holy Spirit is "shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Savior" (Titus 3:5-6). When Christ "ascended up on high, he received gifts for men" (Eph. 4:8). The intercession of Christ relates (a) to the application of his own atonement to the individual and (b) to the bestow-ment of the Holy Spirit as enlightening and sanctifying the believer (cf. Smith, Theology, 481-90).

S U P P L E M E N T

6.1.1 (seep. 678). Witsius (Aposftes' Creed, diss. 10.42-44) thus explains Christ's divesting himself of the mediatorial commission and kingdom, as taught in 1 Cor. 15:24-28. "It is certain (1) that the divine, essential, and natural kingdom of Christ [as the second person of the Trinity] is eternal. (2) That the humanity of Christ will always remain personally united with the divinity and will on that account enjoy a glory very far surpassing the glory of all creatures. (3) Christ will always be the head, that is, by far the most noble member of the church and as such will be recognized, adored, and praised by the church. (4) The mediatorial kingdom itself will be eternal as to its glorious effects, as well in the head as in the members Some of these effects are in Christ, the effulgence of divine majesty shining most brightly in his person as God-man; in the elect, complete liberty, the subjugation of all their enemies, the entire abolition of sin, and unutterable joy arising from intimate communion with God. In these respects the kingdom of Christ is eternal, and Paul is so far from opposing these sentiments that, on the contrary, he teaches them at great length.

"But after the day of the last judgment the exercise of Christ's kingly office and the form of his mediatorial kingdom will be widely different from what they now are. (1) The economic government of this kingdom, as now exercised by an ecclesiastical ministry and by civil authority as conducive to the protection of the church, will then cease, 'when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power.' (2) After the last judgment Christ will render an account to God the Father of his whole mediatorial office, as perfectly accomplished in what relates not only to the purchase, but also to the full application of salvation to the whole church; presenting to him a truly glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing. To this may be referred the expression he shall deliver up the kingdom, that is, the church, in her perfect state, to God, even the Father.' (3) This account having been rendered, the Godhead itself without the intervention of a mediator (for which there seems no more occasion, sin being removed) will hold communion immediately with the redeemed, in almost the same manner in which it holds fellowship with the angels; with this difference, however, that the redeemed will through eternity acknowledge themselves indebted to the merits of Christ for this immediate communication ot the deity. This is what is intended by the expression that God may be all in all. (4) There, also, Christ, no longer discharging any part of the mediatorial office, will, with regard to his human nature, be subject unto God, as one of the brethren, possessing manifold and most excellent glory, without any diminution of the glory which he now enjoys. This seems to be intimated by these words: And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him.' (5) Thus far there shall be an end' of the mediatorial kingdom, the exercise of which supposes some imperfection in the church. It is an end of such a nature as brings all things to a state of complete and endless perfection."

Owen (Person ot Chhst. chap. 19) says on his subject: "For the discharge of this mediatorial work Christ has a sovereign power over all things in heaven and earth committed unto him. Herein he does and must reign. And so absolutely is it vested in him that upon the ceasing of the exercise of it he himself is said to be subject unto God. It is true that the Lord Christ, in his human nature, is always less than or inferior to God, even the Father. In this sense he is in subjection unto him now in heaven. But yet he has an actual exercise [as mediator] of divine power, wherein he is absolute and supreme. When this [mediatorial and redeeming power] ceases he shall be subject unto the Father in that [human] nature, and only so Wherefore when this work [of mediation between God and sinners] is perfectly fulfilled and ended, then shall all the mediatory actings of Christ cease forevermore. For God will then have completely finished the whole design of his wisdom and grace [in redemption]. Then will God be all in all “

Edward Irving (Christ’s Kingly Office) remarks to the same effect: “To give up this superinduced power [of mediator between God and sinful men] and return into the condition of his primeval equality, into the condition of the Son begotten from all eternity, this is what I understand St. Paul to mean when he says. Then shall the Son also be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all’; that is, the earth shall no longer be under mediatorial regiment, but under the same direct regiment of God in which the unfallen worlds are. And God—not God and a mediator, but God in his [tri]personalities and offices—shall be all in all.”

images Vicarious Atonement

Atonement as Substitutionary

The atonement of Christ is represented in Scripture as vicarious. The satisfaction of justice intended and accomplished by it is for others, not for himself. This is abundantly taught in Scripture: “The Son of Man came to give his life a ransom for (anti)[1] many” (Matt. 20:28); “this is my body which is given for (anti)[2] you” (Mark 10:45). In these two passages the preposition (anti)[3] indisputably denotes substitution. Passages like “Archelaus reigned in the room (anti)[4] of his father Herod” (Matt. 2:22), “an eye for an eye” (5:38), and “will he for a fish give him a serpent?” (Luke 11:11) prove this.

In the majority of the passages, however, which speak of Christ’s sufferings and death, the preposition hyper[5] is employed: “This cup is the new covenant in my blood which is shed for (hyper)[6] you” (Luke 22:19-20); “the bread that I will give is my flesh which I will give for the life of the world” (John 6:51); “greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends” (15:13); “Christ died for the ungodly; while we were yet sinners Christ died for us” (Rom. 5:6-8); “he delivered him up for us all” (8:32); “if one died for all then all died” (2 Cor. 5:14-15); “he made him to be sin for us” (5:21); “being made a curse for us” (Gal. 3:13); “Christ gave himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God” (Eph. 5:2, 25); “the man Christ Jesus gave himself a ransom for all” (1 Tim. 2:5-6); Christ “tasted death for every man” (Heb. 2:9); Christ “suffered the just for the unjust” (1 Pet. 3:18).

The preposition hyper[7], like the English preposition for, has two significations. It may denote advantage or benefit, or it may mean substitution. The mother dies for her child, and Pythias dies for Damon. The sense of “for” in these two propositions must be determined by the context and the different circumstances in each instance. Christ lays down the proposition: “Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for (hyper)[8] his friends” (John 15:13). The preposition hyper[9] here may mean either “for the benefit of or “instead of.” In either case, the laying down of life would be the highest proof of affection. The idea of substitution, therefore, cannot be excluded by the mere fact that the preposition hyper[10] is employed, because it has two meanings. In 2 Cor. 5:20-21 hyper[11] is indisputably put for anti:[12] “Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ’s stead (hyper christou),[13] be reconciled to God. For he has made him who knew no sin to be sin for us (hyper he’mon).”[14] In Philem. 13 hyper[15] is clearly equivalent to anti:[16] “Whom I would have retained with me, that in your stead (hyper sou)[17] he might have ministered unto me.” In 2 Cor. 5:14 it is said that “the love of Christ constrains us, because we thus judge that if one died for all (hyper panton),[18] then all died (pontes apethanon) .”[19] Here, the notion of substitution is plain. If Christ died in the room and place of the “all,” then the “all” are reckoned to have died. The vicarious atonement of Christ is regarded as the personal atonement of the believer. It would be nonsense to say that “if one died for the benefit of all, then all died.”

There is also abundant proof from classical usage that hyper[20]” may be used in the sense of anti.[21] Magee (Atonement, diss. 30) quotes the following: Xenophon (Anabasis 7.4) relates that the Thracian prince Seuthes asked Episthenes if he would be willing to die instead of the young lad who had been captured in war (e kai ethelois an, ho episthenes, hyper toutou apothanein).[22] The same use of hyper[23] is seen in Xenophon’s Hellenica and On Hunting; Plato’s Symposium 180 and 207; Euripides’ Alcestis 446, 540, 732 compared with 155-56, 698, 706, 715-17. In the first three lines anti[24] is employed, and in the remainder hyper[25] in respect to the same subject, showing that classical usage allows their being interchanged. Demosthenes (Concerning the Crown) says, “Ask these things, and surely I shall do them for (hyper) you.”[26] Winer (Grammar, 383 [ed. Thayer]) remarks that “hyper[27] is sometimes nearly equivalent to anti”[28] (see especially Euripides, Alcestis 700; Thucydides 1.141; Polybius 3.67; Philem. 13). De Wette on Rom. 5:7 says: “Hyper[29] can signify ‘in place of; 2 Cor. 5:20.” Baur (Paul the Apostle, 168) says: “Although in many passages the expression ‘to die for’ (apothanein hyper) means only ‘to die for the benefit of another,' nevertheless, certainly in Rom. 4:25; Gal. 1:4; Rom. 8:3; 1 Cor. 15:3; 2 Cor. 5:14, the concept of substitution, at least in substance, ought not to be rejected."[30]

The meaning, therefore, of hyper[31] must be determined by the context. Since both classical and New Testament usage permit its being employed to signify either benefit or substitution, it is plain that it cannot be confined to either signification. It would be as erroneous to assert that it uniformly means "for the advantage of as to assert that it uniformly means "in the place of." The remark of Magee (Atonement , diss. 30) is just:

> The word for or the Greek words anti,[32] hyper,[33] dia,[34] peri,[35] of which it is the translation, admitting different senses, may of course be differently applied, according to the nature of the subject, and yet the doctrine remain unchanged. Thus it might be proper to say that Christ suffered instead of us (anti hemon),[36] although it would be absurd to say that he suffered instead of our offenses (anti ton hamartematon hemon).[37] It is sufficient if the different applications of the word carry a consistent meaning. To die "instead of us" and to die "on account of our offenses" perfectly agree.[38] But this change of the expression necessarily arises from the change of the subject. And, accordingly, the same difficulty will be found to attach to the exposition proposed by these writers (Sykes and H. Taylor): since the word for, interpreted "on account of," i.e., "for the benefit of," cannot be applied in the same sense in all the texts. For although dying "for our benefit" is perfectly intelligible, dying "for the benefit of our offenses" is no less absurd than dying "instead of our offenses."

In the light of these facts, it is easy to see why the New Testament writers employ hyper[39] so often, rather than anti,[40] to denote the relation of Christ's death to man's salvation. The latter preposition excludes the idea of benefit or advantage and specifies only the idea of substitution. The former may include both ideas. Whenever, therefore, the sacred writer would express both together and at once, he selects the preposition hyper.[41] In so doing, he teaches both that Christ died in the sinner's place and for the sinner's benefit.

Vicariousness implies substitution. A vicar is a person deputized to perform the function of another. In the case under consideration, the particular function to be performed is that of atoning for sin by suffering. Man the transgressor is the party who owes the atonement and who ought to discharge the office of an atoner; but Jesus Christ is the party who actually discharges the office and makes the atonement in his stead. The idea of vicariousness or substitution is, therefore, vital to a correct theory of Christ's priestly office. Man the transgressor would make his own atonement, if he should suffer the penalty affixed to transgression. So far as the penalty is concerned, retributive justice would be satisfied if the whole human race were punished forever.[42] And if God had no attribute but retributive justice, this would have been the course that he would have taken. A deity strictly and simply just, but destitute of compassion for the guilty, would have inflicted the penalty of the violated law upon the actual transgressor. He would not have allowed a substituted satisfaction of justice, and still less would he have provided one. It is important to notice this fact, because it shows the senselessness of a common objection to the doctrine of vicarious atonement, namely, that it is incompatible with mercy. If God, it is asked, insists upon satisfying justice by allowing his Son to suffer in the place of sinners, where is his mercy? The ready answer is that it is mercy to the criminal to permit the substitution of penalty and still more to provide the substitute after the permission. If God had no compassionate feeling toward the sinner, he would compel the sinner himself to satisfy the demands of the law which he has transgressed. But in permitting and still more in providing a substitute to make that satisfaction which man is under obligation to make for himself, God manifests the greatest and strangest mercy that can be conceived of, for the vicarious atonement of Christ is the sovereign and the judge putting himself in the place of the criminal. (See supplement 6.2.1.)

It is important, at this point, to mark the difference between personal and vicarious atonement, (a) Personal atonement is made by the offending party; vicarious atonement is made by the offended party. The former is made by the sinner; the latter is made by God: "our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ" (Titus 2:13 Revised Version). If a citizen pays the fine appointed by the civil law, he satisfies justice for his own civil transgression. If the murderer is executed, he atones for his own crime before the human law, though not before the divine. And when a sinner suffers endless punishment, he personally satisfies eternal justice for his sin. (b) Personal atonement is given by the criminal, not received by him; but vicarious atonement is received by the criminal, not given by him. This is indicated in the scriptural phraseology. In Rom. 5:11 it is said that the believer "receives the atonement" vicariously made for him by Christ. If he had made an atonement for himself, he would have given to justice the atonement, not received it. (c) Personal atonement is incompatible with mercy, but vicarious atonement is the highest form of mercy. When the sinner satisfies the law by his own eternal death, he experiences justice without mercy; but when God satisfies the law for him, he experiences mercy in the wonderful form of God's self-sacrifice, (d) Personal atonement is incompatible with the eternal life of the sinner, but vicarious atonement obtains eternal life for him. When the sinner suffers the penalty due to his transgression, he is lost forever, but when God incarnate suffers the penalty for him, he is saved forever.

Vicarious atonement in the Christian system is made by the offended party. God is the party against whom sin is committed, and he is the party who atones for its commission. Vicarious atonement, consequently, is the highest conceivable exhibition of the attribute of mercy: "Herein is love, that God sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (1 John 4:10). For God to remit penalty without inflicting suffering upon God incarnate would be infinitely less compassion than to remit it through such infliction. In one case, there is no self-sacrifice in the Godhead; in the other there is. The pardon in one case is inexpensive and cheap; in the other, costly and difficult of execution.

The Socinian objection that vicarious atonement is unmerciful because it involves the full and strict satisfaction of justice has no force from a trinitarian point of view. It is valid only from a Unitarian position. If the Son of God who suffers in the sinner's stead is not God but a creature, then of course God makes no self-sacrifice in saving man through vicarious atonement. In this case, it is not God the offended party who makes the atonement. The trinitarian holds that the Son of God is true and very God and that when he voluntarily becomes the sinner's substitute for atoning purposes, it is very God himself who satisfies God's justice. The penalty is not inflicted upon a mere creature whom God made from nothing and who is one of countless millions; but it is inflicted upon the incarnate Creator himself. The following extract from Channing (Unitarian Christianity) illustrates this misconception: "Unitarianism will not listen for a moment to the common errors by which this bright attribute of mercy is obscured. It will not hear of a vindictive wrath in God which must be quenched by blood or of a justice which binds his mercy with an iron chain, until its demands are satisfied to the full. It will not hear that God needs any foreign influence to awaken his mercy." The finger must be placed upon this word foreign. The trinitarian does not concede that the influence of Jesus Christ upon God's justice is an influence "foreign" to God. The propitiating and reconciling influence of Jesus Christ, according to the trinitarian, emanates from the depths of the Godhead; this suffering is the suffering of one of the divine persons incarnate. God is not propitiated (1 John 2:2; 4:10) by another being, when he is propitiated by the only begotten Son. The term foreign in the above extract is properly applicable only upon the Unitarian theory, that the Son of God is not God, but a being like man or angel alien to the divine essence.

This fallacy is still more apparent in the following illustration from the same writer: "Suppose that a creditor, through compassion to certain debtors, should persuade a benevolent and opulent man to pay in their stead? Would not the debtors see a greater mercy and feel a weightier obligation, if they were to receive a free gratuitous release?" (Unitarian Christianity). Here, the creditor and the debtors' substitute are entirely different parties. The creditor himself makes not the slightest self-sacrifice in the transaction, because he and the substitute are not one being, but two. Consequently, the sacrifice involved in the payment of the debt is confined wholly to the substitute. The creditor has no share in it. But if the creditor and the substitute were one and the same being, then the pecuniary loss incurred by the vicarious payment of the debt would be a common loss. Upon the Unitarian theory, God the Father and Jesus Christ are two beings as different from each other as two individual men. If this be the fact, then indeed vicarious atonement implies no mercy in God the Father. The mercy would lie wholly in Jesus Christ, because the self-sacrifice would be wholly in him. But if the trinitarian theory is the truth, and God the Father and Jesus Christ are two persons of one substance, being, and glory, then, the self-sacrifice that is made by Jesus Christ is not confined to him alone, but is a real self-sacrifice both on the part of God the Father and also of the entire Trinity. This is taught in Scripture: "God [the Father] so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son" (John 3:16); "he spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all" (Rom. 8:32); "[the triune] God commends his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (5:8).[43]

Though it was God the Son and not God the Father who became incarnate and suffered and died, it by no means follows that the first person of the Trinity made no self-sacrifice in this humiliation and crucifixion of the incarnate second person. He gave up to agony and death, his "dear" and "beloved" son. He passed the sword, as Zech. 13:7 says, through "the man who was his fellow." Such Scriptures imply that the redemption of sinful man caused God the Father a species of sorrow: the sorrow of "bruising and putting to grief (Isa. 53:10) the Son of his love; the Son who is "in the bosom of the Father" (John 1:18). The self-sacrifice, therefore, that is made by the Son in giving himself to die for sinners involves a self-sacrifice made by the Father in surrendering the Son for this purpose. No person of the Godhead, even when he works officially, works exclusively of the others. The unity of being and nature between Father and Son makes the act of self-sacrifice in the salvation of man common to both: "He that has seen me has seen the Father. I and my Father are one" (John 14:9; 10:30). "The mediator," says Augustine (On the Trinity 4.19), "was both the offerer and the offering; and he was also one with him to whom the offering was made" (see South, sermon 30).

And this does not conflict with the doctrine that the divine essence is incapable of suffering. Divine impassability means that the divine nature cannot be caused to suffer from any external cause. Nothing in the created universe can make God feel pain or misery.[44] But it does not follow that God cannot himself do an act which he feels to be a sacrifice of feeling and affection and insofar an inward suffering. When God gave up to humiliation and death his only begotten Son, he was not utterly indifferent and unaffected by the act. It was as truly a sacrifice for the Father to surrender the beloved Son as it was for the Son to surrender himself. The Scriptures so represent the matter: “God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son”; “God spared not his own Son, but freely gave him up.” When the Father, in the phrase of the prophet, “awoke the sword against the man who was his fellow,” he likewise pierced himself.

Vicarious atonement, unlike personal atonement, cannot be made by a creature: “None of them can by any means redeem his brother nor give to God a ransom for him” (Ps. 49:7); “shall I give my firstborn for my transgression?” (Mic. 6:7); “what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?” (Matt. 16:26). This is acknowledged in the province of human law. No provision is made in human legislation for the substitution of penalty. In the case of capital punishment, one citizen may not be substituted for another; in the case of civil penalty such as fine or imprisonment, the state cannot seize an innocent person and compel him to suffer for the guilty. And even if there should be a willingness upon the part of the innocent to suffer for the guilty, legislation makes no provision for the substitution. The state would refuse to hang an innocent man, however willing and urgent he might be to take the place of the murderer. The state will not fine or imprison any but the real culprit.

The reason for this is twofold. First, each citizen owes duties toward man that could not be performed if he should assume the obligations of another citizen. There are debts to the family, to society, and to the commonwealth, of which these would be defrauded, if the life or property of one person should be substituted for that of another. Second, each individual owes duties toward God which would be interfered with by the substitution of one man for another within the sphere of human relations. And the state has no right to legislate in a manner that interferes with God’s claims upon his creatures.

The instances in pagan or Christian communities in which there seems to be substitution of penalty are exceptional and irregular. They are not recognized as legitimate by pagan authorities and still less by Christian jurists. When, as in the early Roman history, an individual citizen was allowed to devote himself to death for the welfare of the state, this was an impulse of the popular feeling. It was not regularly provided for and legitimated by the national legislature. It was no part of the legal code. And human sacrifices among savage nations cannot be regarded as parts of the common law of nations.

That vicarious atonement cannot be made by a created being within the province of divine law will be made evident when we come to consider the nature of Christ's substituted work. At this point, it is sufficient to observe that if within the lower sphere of human crimes and penalties one man cannot suffer for another it would be still more impossible in the higher sphere of man's relations to God. No crime against man is of so deep a guilt as is sin against God; and if the former cannot be expiated by a human substitute, still less can the latter be.

It should be remembered, however, that the reason why a creature cannot be substituted for a creature for purposes of atonement is not that substitution of penalty is inadmissible, but that the creature is not a proper subject to be substituted, for the reasons above mentioned. Substitution is sometimes allowed within the province of commercial law. One man may pay the pecuniary debt of another, if this can be done without infraction of any rights of other parties. If, however, it cannot be, then vicarious payment is inadmissible. A man would not be permitted to take money due to one person to pay the debt of another. A man is not allowed in the State of New York to leave all his property to benevolent purposes if he has a family dependent upon him.

Atonement as Suffering and Forgiveness as Its Result

The priestly office of Christ cannot be understood without a clear and accurate conception of the nature of atonement.

The idea and meaning of atonement is conveyed in the following statements in Lev. 6:2-7 and 4:13-20:[45] "If a soul sin and commit a trespass against the Lord, he shall bring his trespass offering unto the Lord, a ram without blemish, and the priest shall make an atonement for him before the Lord, and it shall be forgiven him." This is individual atonement for individual transgression. "If the whole congregation of Israel sin and are guilty, then the congregation shall offer a young bullock for the sin, and the elders of the congregation shall lay their hands upon the head of the bullock, and the bullock shall be killed, and the priest shall make an atonement for them, and it shall be forgiven them." This is national atonement for national transgression. Two particulars are to be noticed in this account, (a) The essence of the atonement is in the suffering. The atoning bullock or ram must bleed, agonize, and die. And he who offers it must not get any enjoyment out of it. It must be a loss to him, and so far forth a suffering for him. He must not eat any of the trespass offering. The sin offering must be wholly burned: "skin, flesh, and dung" (Lev. 16:27). In harmony with this, our Lord lays stress upon his own suffering as the essential element in his atonement: "The Son of Man must suffer many things" (Luke 9:22; Matt. 16:21); "that Christ would suffer" (Acts 3:18; Luke 24:26). Christ refused the anodyne of "wine mingled with gall" that would have deadened his pain (Matt. 27:34).[46] (b) The forgiveness is the noninfliction of suffering upon the transgressor. If the substituted victim suffers, then the criminal shall be released from suffering. In these and similar passages, Hebrew kappar,'[47] which in the Piel[48] is translated "to make an atonement," literally signifies "to cover over" so as not to be seen. And Hebrew salah,[49] translated "to forgive," has for its primary idea that of "lightness, lifting up," perhaps "to be at rest or peace" (Gesenius in voce). (See supplement 6.2.2.)

The connection of ideas in the Hebrew text appears, then, to be this: The suffering of the substituted bullock or ram has the effect to cover over the guilt of the real criminal and make it invisible to the eye of God the holy. This same thought is conveyed in the following: "Blot out my transgressions. Hide your face from my sins" (Ps. 51:19); "you have cast all my sins behind your back" (Isa. 38:17); "you will cast all their sins into the depths of the sea" (Mic. 7:19). When this covering over is done, the conscience of the transgressor is at rest.

These Hebrew words, however, are translated in the Septuagint by Greek words which introduce different ideas from "covering" and "resting." The word kappar[50] is rendered by exilaskomai[51] (to propitiate or appease), and the word salah[52] is translated by aphietni[53] (to release or let go). The connection of ideas in the Greek translation appears, therefore, to be this: By the suffering of the sinner's atoning substitute, divine wrath at sin is propitiated, and as a consequence of this propitiation the punishment due to sin is released or not inflicted upon the transgressor. This release or noninfliction of penalty is "forgiveness" in the biblical representation. This is conceded by the opponents of the evangelical system. Says Wegscheider (Institutes §140): "Forgiveness or pardon of sins, in the common and biblical usage, is the abolition of the penalty contracted for sins and the restoration of divine benevolence toward the sinner."[54] In the Lord's prayer, the petition for forgiveness is aphes hemin ta opheilemata hemon[55] (Matt. 6:12). Christ assures the paralytic that his sins are forgiven, in the words apheontai soi hai hamartiai sou[56] (9:2). The preaching of the gospel is the preaching of the "release of sins" (aphe-sis hamartionf;[57] Acts 13:38).

It is highly important to notice that in the biblical representation "forgiveness" is inseparably connected with "atonement," and "remis-sion" with "propitiation." The former stands to the latter in the relation of effect to cause. The Scriptures know nothing of forgiveness or remission of penalty in isolation. It always has a foregoing cause or reason. It is because the priest has offered the ram that the individual transgression is "forgiven," that is, not punished in the person of the individual. It is because the priest has offered the bullock upon whose head the elders have laid their hands that the national sin is "forgiven," that is, not visited upon the nation. Without this vicarious shedding of blood, there would be no remission or release of penalty (Heb. 9:22). Not until the transgression has been "covered over" by a sacrifice can there be "peace" in the conscience of the transgressor. Not until the Holy One has been "propitiated" by an atonement can the penalty be "released." Neither of these effects can exist without the antecedent cause. The Bible knows nothing of the remission of punishment arbi-trarily, that is, without a ground or reason. Penal suffering in Scripture is released or not inflicted upon the guilty because it has been endured by a substitute. If penalty were remitted by sovereignty merely without any judicial ground or reason whatever, if it were inflicted neither upon the sinner nor his substitute, this would be the abolition of penalty, not the remission of it.

According to the biblical view, divine mercy is seen more in the cause than in the effect, more in the "atonement" for sin than in the "remission" of sin, more in "expiation" than in "forgiveness," more in the vicarious infliction than in the personal noninfliction. After the foundation has been laid for the release of penalty, it is easy to release it. When a sufficient reason has been established why sin should be pardoned, it is easy to pardon. It is the first step that costs. This is taught by St. Paul in Rom. 5:10: "If when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more being reconciled we shall be saved by his life." The greater includes the less. If God's mercy is great enough to move him to make a vicarious atonement for man's sin, it is certainly great enough to move him to secure the consequences of such an act. If God's compassion is great enough to induce him to lay man's punish- ment upon his own Son, it is surely great enough to induce him not to lay it upon the believer. If God so loves the world as to atone vicariously for its sin, he certainly so loves it as to remit its sin.

In looking, therefore, for the inmost seat and center of divine compassion, we should seek it rather in the work of atonement than in the act of forgiveness, rather in the cause than in the effect. That covenant transaction in the depths of the Trinity, in which God the Father commissioned and gave up the only begotten as a piacular oblation for man's sin and in which the only begotten voluntarily accepted the commission, is a greater proof and manifestation of divine pity than that other and subsequent transaction in the depths of a believer's soul in which God says, "Son, be of good cheer, your sin is forgiven you." The latter transaction is easy enough, after the former has occurred. But the former transaction cost the infinite and adorable Trinity an effort and a sacrifice that is inconceivable and unutterable. This is the mystery which the angels desire to look into. That a just God should release from penalty after an ample atonement has been made is easy to understand and believe. But that he should himself make the atonement is the wonder and the mystery: "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us" (1 John 3:16).

Atonement as Objective

It follows from this discussion that atonement is objective in its essential nature. An atonement makes its primary impression upon the party to whom it is made, not upon the party by whom it is made. When a man does a wrong to a fellow man and renders satisfaction for the wrong, this satisfaction is intended to influence the object not the subject, to produce an effect upon the man who has suffered the wrong not the man who did the wrong. Subjective atonement is a contradiction. Atoning to oneself is like lifting oneself.[58] The objective nature of atonement is wrought into the very phraseology of Scripture, as the analysis of the biblical terms just made clearly shows. To "cover" sin is to cover it from the sight of God, not of the sinner. To "propitiate" is to propitiate God, not man.

The Septuagint idea of "propitiation," rather than the Hebrew idea of "covering over," is prominent in the New Testament and consequently passed into the soteriology of the primitive church and from this into both the Romish and the Protestant soteriology. The difference between the two is not essential, since both terms are objective; but there is a difference. Hebrew kappar[59] denotes that the sacrificial victim produces an effect upon sin. It covers it up. But the corresponding Septuagint term hilaskomai[60] denotes that the sacrificial victim produces an effect upon God. It propitiates his holy displeasure. When St. John (1 John 2:2; 4:10) asserts that "Jesus Christ the righteous is the propitiation (hilasmos)[61] for our sins" and that God "sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins," the implication is that the divine nature is capable of being conciliated by some propitiating act. This propitiating act under the old dispensation was, typically and provisionally, the offering of a lamb or goat as emblematic of the future offering of the Lamb of God; and under the new dispensation it is the actual offering of the body of Jesus Christ, who takes the sinner's place and performs for him the propitiating and reconciling act.

The objective nature of atonement appears, again, in the New Testament term katallage [62] and the verb katallassein[63] ." These two words occur nine times in the New Testament with reference to Christ's atoning work (Rom. 5:10-11, 15; 2 Cor. 5:18-20). In the Authorized Version, katallage[64] is translated "atonement" in Rom. 5:11; but in the other instances "reconciliation" and "reconcile" are the terms employed. The verb katallassein^[65] primarily signifies “to pay the exchange or difference” and secondarily “to conciliate or appease.” The following from Athenaeus (10.33) brings to view both meanings of the word: “Why do we say that a tetradrachma katallattetai ,[66] when we never speak of its getting into a passion?” A coin is “exchanged” in the primary signification; and a man is “reconciled” in the secondary. Two parties in a bargain settle their difference or are “reconciled” by one paying the exchange or balance to the other. In like manner two parties at enmity settle their difference or are “reconciled” by one making a satisfaction to the other. In each instance the transaction is called in Greek katallage[67].” The same usage is found in the Anglo-Saxon language. Saxon hot, from which comes the modern boot, denotes, first, a compensation paid to the offended party by the offender; then, second, the reconciling effect produced by such compensation; and, last, it signifies the state of mind which prompted the boot or compensation, namely, repentance itself (Bosworth, Anglo-Saxon Dictionary).

The term reconciliation is objective in its signification. Reconciliation terminates upon the object, not upon the subject. The offender reconciles not himself but the person whom he has offended, by undergoing some loss and thereby making amends. This is clearly taught in Matt. 5:24: “First, be reconciled to your brother (diallage’thi to adelpho).’[68] Here, the brother who has done the injury is the one who is to make up the difference. He is to propitiate or reconcile his brother to himself by a compensation of some kind. Reconciliation, here, does not denote a process in the mind of the offender, but of the offended. The meaning is not: “First conciliate your own displeasure toward your brother,” but, “First conciliate your brother’s displeasure toward you.” In the Episco-palian order for the holy communion, it is said: “If you shall perceive your offenses to be such as are not only against God, but also against your neighbors; then you shall reconcile yourselves unto them: being ready to make restitution and satisfaction, according to the uttermost of your powers, for all injuries and wrongs done by you to any other.” The biblical phrase be reconciled to your brother agrees with that of common life in describing reconciliation from the side of the offending party, rather than of the offended. We say of the settlement of a rebellion that “the subjects are reconciled to their sovereign,” rather than that “the sovereign is reconciled to the subjects”;

though the latter is the more strictly accurate, because it is the sovereign who is reconciled by a satisfaction made to him by the subjects who have rebelled. In Rom. 5:10 believers are said to be "reconciled to God by the death of his Son." Here the reconciliation is described from the side of the offending party; man is said to be reconciled. Yet this does not mean the subjective reconciliation of the sinner toward God, but the objective reconciliation of God toward the sinner. For the preceding verse speaks of God as a being from whose "wrath" the believer is saved by the death of Christ. This shows that the reconciliation effected by Christ's atoning death is that of divine anger against sin. Upon this text, Meyer remarks that "the death of Christ does not remove the wrath of man toward God, but it removes God's displeasure toward man." Similarly, De Wette remarks that "the reconciliation must mean the removal of the wrath of God; it is that reconciliation of God to man which not only here, but in Rom. 3:25; 2 Cor. 5:18-19; Col. 1:21; Eph. 2:16 is referred to the atoning death of Christ."[69]

The priestly work of Christ is also represented in Scripture under the figure of a price or ransom. This, also, is an objective term. The price is paid by the subject to the object: "The Son of Man is come to give his life a ransom (lytron) [70] for (anti)[71]' many" (Matt. 20:28); "the church of God which he has purchased (peripoiesato)[72] with his own blood" (Acts 20:28); "the redemption (apolytrdsis)[73]' that is in Jesus Christ" (Rom. 3:24); "you are bought (egorasthete)[74]' with a price" (1 Cor. 6:20); "Christ has redeemed (exegorasen)[75] us from the curse" (Gal. 3:13); "redemption through his blood" (Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14); "who gave himself a ransom (antilytron)[76] for all" (1 Tim. 2:6). The allusion in the figure is sometimes to the payment of a debt and sometimes to the liberation of a captive. In either case, it is not Satan but God who holds the claim. Man has not transgressed against Satan, but against God. The debt that requires can-celing is due to a divine attribute, not to the rebel archangel. The ransom that must be paid is for the purpose of delivering the sinner from the demands of justice, not of the devil. Satan cannot acquire or establish legal claims upon any being whatever.

Some of the early fathers misinterpreted this doctrine of a "ransom" and introduced a vitiating element into the patristic soteriology, which however was soon eliminated and has never reappeared. They explained certain texts which refer to sanctification as referring to justification. In 2 Tim. 2:26 sinful men are said to be “taken captive by the devil at his will.” In 1 Tim. 1:20 Hymenaeus and Alexander are “delivered unto Satan.” In 1 Cor. 5:5 St. Paul commands the church to “deliver over” the incestuous member “to Satan for the destruction of the flesh.” In these passages, reference is had to the power which Satan has over the creature who has voluntarily subjected himself to him. The sinner is Satan’s captive upon the principle mentioned by Christ in John 8:34: “Whoso- ever commits sin is the servant (doulos)[77] of sin”; and by St. Paul in Rom. 6:16: “Know not that to whom you yield yourselves servants (doulous)[78] to obey, his servants you are to whom you obey; whether of sin unto death or of obedience unto righteousness?” There is in these passages no reference to any legal or rightful claim which the devil has over the transgressor, but only to the strong and tyrannical grasp which he has upon him. This captivity to Satan is related to the work of the Holy Spirit, more than to the atoning efficacy of Christ’s blood; and deliverance from it makes a part of the work of sanctification, rather than of justification. This deliverance is preceded by another. In the order of nature, it is not until man has been first redeemed by the atoning blood from the claims of justice, that he is redeemed by the indwelling Spirit from the captivity and bondage of sin and Satan.

When, therefore, the efficacy of Christ’s death is represented as the payment of a ransom price, the same objective reference of Christ’s work is intended as in the previous instances of “propitiation” and “reconciliation.” By Christ’s death, man is ransomed from the righteous claims of another being than himself. That being is not Satan, but God the holy and just. And these claims are vicariously met. God satisfies God’s claims in man’s place. God’s mercy ransoms man from God’s justice.

We have thus seen from this examination of the scriptural representations that Christ’s priestly work has an objective reference, namely, that it affects and influences the divine being. Christ’s atonement “covers sin” from God’s sight. It “propitiates” God’s wrath against sin. It “reconciles” God’s justice toward the sinner. It “pays a ransom” to God for the sinner. None of these acts terminate upon man the subject, but all terminate upon God the object. Christ does not “cover sin” from the sinner’s sight. He does not “propitiate” the sinner’s wrath. He does not “reconcile” the sinner to the sinner. He does not “pay a ransom” to the sinner. These acts are each and all of them outward and transitive in their aim and reference. They are directed toward the infinite, not the finite; toward the Creator, not the creature. Whatever be the effect wrought by the vicarious death of the Son of God, it is wrought upon the divine nature. If it appeases, it appeases that nature; if it propitiates, it propitiates that nature; if it satisfies, it satisfies that nature; if it reconciles, it reconciles that nature. It is impossible to put any other interpretation upon the scriptural ideas and representations. A merely subjective reference, which would find all the meaning of them within the soul of man, requires a forced and violent exegesis of Scripture and a self-contradictory use of the word atonement.

At the same time, revelation plainly teaches that the author of this atoning influence and effect upon the divine being is the divine being himself. God propitiates, appeases, satisfies, and reconciles God. None of these are the acts of the creature. In all this work of propitiation, reconciliation, and redemption, God himself is the originating and active agent. He is therefore both active and passive, both agent and patient. God is the being who is angry at sin, and God is the being who propitiates this anger. God is the offended party, and he is the one who reconciles the offended party. It is divine justice that demands satisfaction, and it is divine compassion that makes the satisfaction. God is the one who holds man in a righteous captivity, and he is the one who pays the ransom that frees him from it. God is the holy judge of man who requires satisfaction for sin, and God is the merciful Father of man who provides it for him. This fact relieves the doctrine of vicarious atonement of all appearance of severity and evinces it to be the height of mercy and compassion. If it were man and not God who provided the atonement, the case would be otherwise. This peculiarity of the case is taught in Scripture. In 2 Cor. 5:18-19 it is said that “God has reconciled us to himself (heautd)[79] by Jesus Christ” and that “God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself (heautd).”[80] The statement is repeated in Col. 1:20: “It pleased the Father through the blood of Christ’s cross to reconcile all things unto himself.” According to this, in the work of vicarious atonement God is both subject and object, active and passive. He exerts a propitiating influence when he makes this atonement, and he receives a propitiating influence when he accepts it. He performs an atoning work, and his own attribute of justice feels the effect of it. Says Augustine (On the Trinity 4.14.19): “The same one and true mediator reconciles us to God by the atoning sacrifice, remains one with God to whom he offers it, makes those one in himself for whom he offers it, and is himself both the offerer and the offering.” Similarly, Frank {Christian Certainty, 352) remarks that “freedom from guilt is possible for man, because it has been provided for by God, and this provision rests upon a transaction of God with himself, whereby as other [i.e., as Son] he has made satisfaction to the claims of his own justice upon the sinner.”

This doctrine of Scripture has passed into the creeds and litanies of the church. In the English litany there is the petition: “From your wrath and from everlasting damnation, Good Lord, deliver us.” Here, the very same being who is displeased is asked to save from the displeasure. The very same holy God who is angry at sin is implored by the sinner to deliver him from the effects of this anger. And this is justified by the example of David, who cries, “O Lord, rebuke me not in your wrath, neither chasten me in your hot displeasure” (Ps. 38:1); and by the words of God himself addressed to his people through the prophet, “In my wrath I smote you, but in my favor have I had mercy upon you” (Isa. 60:10). The prophet Hosea (6:1) says to the unfaithful church: “Come and let us return unto the Lord: for he has torn, and he will heal us; he has smitten, and he will bind us up.” In Zech. 1 \1-A Jehovah is described as “sore displeased” and yet at the same time as exhibiting clemency toward those with whom he is displeased: “The Lord has been sore displeased with your fathers. Therefore say unto them, Thus says the Lord of hosts, Turn unto me, says the Lord of hosts, and I will turn unto you, says the Lord of hosts.” “The Lord said to Eliphaz, My wrath is kindled against you, and against your two friends. Therefore take unto you seven bullocks and seven rams and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering, lest I deal with you after your folly” (Job 42:7-8). Here, the very same God who was displeased with Job’s friends devises for them a method whereby they may avert the displeasure. Upon a larger scale, God is displeased with every sinful man, yet he himself provides a method whereby sinful man may avert this displeasure. This is eminently the case with the believer. “When,” says Calvin (3.2.21), “the saints seem to themselves to feel most the anger of God, they still confide their complaints to him; and when there is no appear-ance of his hearing them, they still continue to call upon him." Says Anselm (Meditation 2), "Take heart, O sinner, take heart! Do not despair; hope in him whom you fear. Flee to him from whom you have fled. Boldly call on him whom you have haughtily provoked."[81]

The doctrine of vicarious atonement, consequently, implies that in God there exist simultaneously both wrath and compassion. In this fact is seen the infinite difference between divine and human anger. When God is displeased with the sinner, he compassionately desires that the sinner may escape the displeasure and invents a way of escaping it. But when man is displeased with his fellowman, he does not desire that his fellowman may escape the displeasure and devises no way of escape. Divine wrath issues from the constitutional and necessary antagonism between divine holiness and moral evil. Divine compassion springs from the benevolent interest which God feels in the work of his hands. The compassion is founded in God's paternal relation to man; the wrath is founded in his judicial relation to him. God as a Creator and Father pities the sinner; as a judge he is displeased with him. Wrath against sin must be both felt and manifested by God; compassion toward the sinner must be felt, but may or may not be manifested by him. Justice is necessary in its exercise, but mercy is optional. The righteous feeling of wrath toward sin is immutable and eternal in God, but it may be propitiated by the gracious feeling of compassion toward the sinner, which is also immutable and eternal in God. God the father of men may reconcile God the judge of men. Whether this shall be done depends upon the sovereign pleasure of God. He is not obliged and necessitated to propitiate his own wrath for the sinner, as he is to punish sin; but he has mercifully determined to do this and has done it by the atonement of Jesus Christ. By the method of vicarious substitution of penalty, God satisfies his own justice and reconciles his own displeasure toward the transgressor. That moral emotion in the divine essence which from the nature and necessity of the case is incensed against sin, God himself placates by a self-sacrifice that inures to the benefit of the guilty creature. Here, the compassion and benevolent love of God propitiate the wrath and holy justice of God. The two feelings exist together in one and the same being. The propitiation is no oblation ab extra:[82] no device of a third party or even of sinful man himself to render God placable toward man. It is wholly ab intra:[83] a self-oblation upon the part of the deity himself, in the exercise of his benevolence toward the guilty, by which to satisfy those constitutional imperatives of the divine nature which without it must find their satisfaction in the personal punishment of the transgressor or else be outraged by arbitrary omnipotence.

Upon this point, Augustine (Tractates on the Gospel of John, ex. 6), remarks:

> It is written, “God commends his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us.” He loved us, therefore, even when in the exercise of enmity toward him we were working iniquity. And yet it is said with perfect truth, “You hate, O Lord, all workers of iniquity.” Wherefore, in a wonderful and divine manner, he both hated and loved us at the same time. He hated us, as being different from what he had made us; but as our iniquity had not entirely destroyed his work in us, he could at the same time, in everyone of us, hate what we had done and love what he had created. In every instance it is truly said of God “You hate nothing which you have made; for never would you have made anything, if you had hated it.”

Calvin, after quoting the above from Augustine, remarks (2.16.3) that

> God who is the perfection of righteousness cannot love iniquity, which he beholds in us all. We all, therefore, have in us that which deserves God’s hatred. Wherefore, in respect to our corrupt nature and the consequent depravity of our lives, we are all really offensive to God, guilty in his sight, and born to the damnation of hell. But because God is unwilling to lose that in us which is his own, he still finds something in us which his benevolence (benignitas) can love. For notwithstanding that we are sinners by our own fault, we are yet his creatures; though we have brought death upon ourselves yet he had created us for life.

Turretin (Concerning the Truth of Christ’s Satisfaction 1.1) distinguishes between “compassion” and “reconciliation.” Because God is compassionate in his own excellent and perfect nature, he can become reconciled toward a transgressor of his law. If he were inherently destitute of compassion, he would be incapable of reconciliation. Compassion is a feeling, reconciliation is an act resulting from it. The former is inherent and necessary; the latter is optional and sovereign. If God were not compassionate and placable, he could not be propitiated by the sacrifice of Christ. An implacable and merciless being could not be conciliated and would do nothing to effect a reconciliation. God is moved by a feeling of compassion and a benevolent affection toward sinners, prior to and irrespective of the death of Christ: “When we were yet sinners, Christ died for us” (Rom. 5:8). The death of Christ did not make God compassionate and merciful. He is always and eternally so. But God’s holy justice is not reconciled to sinners unless Christ die for their sin. The compassion is prior in the order of nature to the death of Christ; the reconciliation of justice is subsequent to it: “Before the death of Christ, God was already compassionate (misericors) and placable. This moved him to provide salvation and redemption for man. But he was actually reconciled and propitiated, only upon the condition and supposition of that death of Christ which was required by eternal justice.”

In this manner, compassion and wrath coexist in God. Says Turretin (as above):

> To us indeed it seems difficult to conceive that the same person who is offended with us should also love us; because, when any feeling takes possession of us we are apt to be wholly engrossed with it. Thus if our anger is inflamed against anyone, there is usually no room in us for favor toward him; and on the other hand, if we regard him with favor, there is often connected with it the most unrighteous indulgence. But if we could cast off the disorders of passion and clothe ourselves in the garments of righteousness, we might easily harmonize these things with one another. A father offended with the viciousness of his son loves him as a son, yet is angry with him as being vicious. A judge, in like manner, may be angry and moved to punish, yet not the less on this account inclined by compassion to pardon the offender, if only someone would stand forth and satisfy the claims of justice for him. Why then, should not God, who is most righteous and > benevolent, at once by reason of his justice demand penalty and by reason of his compassion provide satisfaction for us?

Turretin quotes in proof of this view the following from Aquinas (3.49.4): "We are not said to have been reconciled as if God began to love us anew (de novo), for he loved us with an eternal love. Rather, we are said to have been reconciled because through this reconciliation every cause of hatred was removed, on the one hand through the cleansing of sin, and on the other hand through the compensation of a more acceptable good (acceptabilioris boni)."[84] He also remarks: "The Scholastics say that God loved the human race insofar as he himself made that nature, but he hates it insofar as men have brought guilt on themselves."[85]

In all that is said, consequently, respecting the wrath of God, in Christian theology, it is of the utmost importance to keep in view the fact that this wrath is compatible with benevolence and compassion. This is the infinite difference in kind between divine and human anger. At the very moment when God is displeased, he is capable of devising kind things for the object of his displeasure: "While we were yet sinners Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8). And at the very instant when guilty man is conscious that divine wrath is resting upon him, he may address his supplication for a blessing to the very being who is angry with his sin and may pray: "From your wrath, good Lord, deliver me." And the great and ample warrant and encouragement for men to do this is found in the sacrifice of the Son of God. For in and by this atoning oblation, divine compassion conciliates divine wrath against sin. In the death of the God-man, "righteousness and peace, justice and mercy, kiss each other" (Ps. 85:10). The mercy vicariously satisfies the justice; divine compassion in the sinner's stead receives upon itself the stroke of divine wrath; God the Father smites God the Son, in the transgressor's place: "Awake, O sword, against the man that is my fellow, says the Lord of hosts" (Zech. 13:7).[86]

This subject is elucidated still further by noticing the difference between the holy wrath of God and the wicked wrath of man: "The wrath of man works not the righteousness of God" (James 1:20). When man is angry at man, this feeling is absolutely incompatible with the feeling of compassion and benevolent love. Selfish human anger and benevolence cannot be simultaneous. They cannot possibly coexist. When a man, under the impulse of sinful displeasure, says to his brother “Raca” or “you fool” (Matt. 5:22), when he feels passionate and selfish wrath, he cannot devise good things for his brother man. On the contrary, he devises only evil things. He plots his neighbor’s destruction. The wrath of the human heart is not only incompatible with benevolence, but is often intensely malignant. It is even increased by the moral excellence that is in the object of it. Holiness in a fellow creature sometimes makes wicked human anger hotter and more deadly. The Jews gnashed their teeth in rage at the meekness and innocence of Christ. “The hatred of the wicked,” says Rousseau (Confessions 9), “is only roused the more from the impossibility of finding any just grounds on which it can rest; and the very consciousness of their own injustice is only a grievance the more against him who is the object of it.” “They hated the one whom they injured,”[87] says Tacitus. This kind of wrath requires complete eradication before compassion can exist. “Better it were,” says Luther (Table Talk: Of God’s Works), “that God should be angry with us than that we be angry with God, for he can soon be at a union with us again, because he is merciful; but when we are angry with him, then the case is not to be helped.”

Still further elucidation of this subject is found in the resemblance between the holy wrath of God and the righteous anger of the human conscience. The sinful feeling of passionate anger to which we have just alluded is an emotion of the heart; but the righteous feeling of dispassionate anger to which we now allude is in the conscience. This is a different faculty from the heart.[88] Its temper toward sin is unselfish and impartial, like the wrath of God. And this feeling can exist simultaneously with that of benevolence. When a man’s own conscience is displacent and remorseful over his own sin, there is no malice toward the man himself, “for no man ever yet hated his own flesh” (Eph. 5:29). At the very moment when a just and righteous man’s conscience is offended and incensed at the wickedness of a fellowman, he can and often does devise good things toward him. The most self-sacrificing philanthropists are those whose conscience is the most sensitive toward the moral evil which they endeavor to remove and whose moral displeasure against sin is the most vivid and emphatic. It is not the sentimental Rousseau, but the righteous Calvin who would willingly lay down his life, if thereby he could save men from eternal retribution. The conscience of Rousseau was dull and torpid, compared with the keen and energetic conscience of Calvin; but the desire of the latter for the spiritual and eternal welfare of sinful men was a thousand times greater than that of the former, supposing that there was in Rousseau any desire at all for the spiritual and eternal welfare of man. When St. Paul says respecting Alexander the coppersmith, “The Lord reward him according to his works” (2 Tim. 7:14), he gives expression to the righteous displeasure of a pure conscience toward one who was opposing the gospel of Christ and the progress of God’s kingdom in the earth. It was not any personal injury to the apostle that awakened the desire for divine retribution in the case, but a zeal for the glory of God and the welfare of man. Could St. Paul by any self-sacrifice on his own part have produced repentance and reformation in Alexander, he would gladly have made it. As in the instance of his unbelieving Jewish kindred, he would have been willing to be “accursed from Christ” for this purpose (Rom. 9:3). But when a profane man angrily says to his fellowman: “God damn you,” this is the malignant utterance of the selfish passion of the human heart and is incompatible with any benevolent feeling.[89]

We find, then, that in the exercise of Christ’s priestly office the agency is wholly within the divine nature itself. The justice and the mercy, the wrath and the compassion, are qualities of one and the same eternal being. It follows, consequently, that the explanation of the great subject of divine reconciliation lies in the doctrine of the Trinity. The doctrine of vicarious atonement stands or falls with that of the triune God. If God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are three distinct persons, each one of them really objective to the others, then one of them can do a personal work not done by the others that shall have an effect upon the Godhead. And if God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are also one undivided being in nature and essence, then this effect, whatever it be, is not limited and confined to any one of the persons exclusive of the oth-ers, but is experienced by the one whole undivided nature and essence itself. The Godhead, and not merely God the Father or God the Son or God the Spirit, is reconciled to guilty man by the judicial suffering of one of the persons of the Godhead incarnate. The Son of God is a person distinct from and objective to the Father and the Spirit. Hence, he can do a work which neither of them does. He becomes incarnate, not they. He suffers and dies for man, not they. And yet the efficacy of this work, which is his work as a trinitarian person, can terminate upon that entire divine nature which is all in God the Father and all in God the Spirit, as it is all in God the Son. “Christ,” says Frank (Christian Certainty, 366), “experienced as a [vicarious] sinner both subjection to God and rejection by God; but yet as one who can call the God who has rejected him, his God, and who while the wrath of God goes forth upon him and delivers him up to the punitive infliction, nevertheless can pray: ‘Not my will, but yours be done.’“

Atonement as Subjective

Before leaving the subject of vicarious atonement, it is in place here to notice its relation to the soul of man. For, while Christ’s atonement has primarily this objective relation to the divine nature, it has also a secondary subjective relation to the nature of the guilty creature for whom it is made. The objective atonement is intended to be subjectively appropriated by the act of faith in it.

In the first place, the priestly work of Christ has an influence upon the human conscience similar to that which it has upon divine justice. Man’s moral sense is pacified by Christ’s atonement. Peace is everywhere in Scripture represented as the particular effect produced by faith in Christ’s blood: “Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God” (Rom. 5:1); “we are made nigh to God by the blood of Christ, for he is our peace” (Eph. 2:13-14); “having made peace through the blood of his cross” (Col. 1:20); “peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you” (John 14:27); “the peace of God passes all understanding” (Phil. 4:7).

The human conscience is the mirror and index of the divine attribute of justice. The two are correlated. What therefore God’s justice demands, man’s conscience demands. “Nothing,” says Matthew Henry, “can pacify an offended conscience but that which satisfied an offended God.” The peace which the believer in Christ’s atonement enjoys, and which is promised by the Redeemer to the believer, is the subjective experience in man that corresponds to the objective reconciliation in God. The paci fication of the human conscience is the consequence of the satisfaction of divine justice. God’s justice is completely satisfied for the sin of man by the death of Christ. This is an accomplished fact: “Jesus Christ the righteous is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world” (1 John 2:2). The instant any individual man of this world of mankind believes that divine justice is thus satisfied, his conscience is at rest. The belief of a fact is always needed in order to a personal benefit from it. Belief is not needed in order to establish the fact. Whether a sinner believes Christ died for sin or not will make no difference with the fact, though it will make a vast difference with him: “If we believe not, yet he abides faithful: he cannot deny himself (2 Tim. 2:13). Unbelief cannot destroy a fact. Should not a soul henceforth believe on the Son of God, it would nevertheless be a fact that he died an atoning death on Calvary and that this death is an ample oblation for the sin of the world. But it must be remembered that the kind of belief by which a man obtains a personal benefit from the fact of Christ’s death is experimental, not historical or hearsay. A man may believe from common rumor that the death of Christ satisfies divine justice for the sin of the world and yet experience no benefit and no peace from his belief, even as a blind man may believe from common rumor that there is a mountain in front of him and yet have none of the pleasing sensations and personal benefits that accompany the vision of it. The blind man may have no doubt of the fact that there is a mountain before him; he may even argue to prove its existence and still have all the wretched sensations of blindness and obtain no per-sonal advantage from his hearsay belief. And a sinful man may have no skeptical doubt that the death of Christ on Mount Calvary has completely expiated human guilt and may even construct a strong argument in proof of the fact and still have all the miserable experience of an unforgiven sinner, may still have remorse and the fear of death and the damnation of hell. The belief by which men obtain personal benefit, namely, mental peace and blessedness, from the fact of Christ’s atonement involves trust and reliance upon Christ. A man may believe Christ and yet not believe on him. Christ himself marks the difference between historical or hearsay belief and experimental faith in Matt. 13:13-15: “Seeing, they see not; and hearing, they hear not, neither do they understand. In them is fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah, which says, By hearing you shall hear and shall not understand; and seeing you shall see and shall not perceive.” Whenever there is an experimental belief of the actual and accomplished fact of Christ’s atonement, there is a subjective pacification of the conscience corresponding to the objective reconciliation of divine justice.

But this subjective effect of Christ's death is neither the primary nor the whole effect of it. It presupposes the objective satisfaction or propitiation. In this instance, as in all others, the object is prior to the subject and determines its consciousness.

Second, the subjective appropriation of Christ's atonement is the evidence and test of genuine repentance. An unselfish godly sorrow for sin is shown by a willingness to suffer personally for sin. In Lev. 26:41, 43 the truly penitent are described as "accepting the punishment of their iniquity." The criminal who complains of punishment or resists it or endeavors to escape from it evinces by this fact that he cares more for his own happiness than he does for the evil and wickedness of his act. If he were certain of not being punished, he would repeat his transgression. There is of course no genuine sorrow for sin in such a temper. If, on the contrary, a wrongdoer approves of and accepts the punish ment denounced against his crime and voluntarily gives himself up to suffer for his transgression, he furnishes the highest proof of true sorrow. He does not make his own happiness the first thing, but the maintenance of justice. With Angelo (Measure for Measure 5.1), he says:

> So deep sticks it in my penitent heart,
> That I crave death more willingly than mercy;
> 'Tis my deserving, and I do entreat it.

With the penitent thief, he says, "We are in this condemnation justly, for we receive the due reward of our deeds" (Luke 23:41). Says Dorner (Christian Doctrine 1.302):

> No one can deny that true penitence includes the candid acknowledgment of actual desert of punishment and that the denial of this desert and the unwillingness to suffer punishment and to surrender to the disgrace of justice is the most certain proof of a mere semblance of penitence. And it is not essentially different, when repentance and the resolution to live a better life are put in the place of that suffering which constitutes satisfying atonement and gives a title to remission of sin. Such views are a poisoning of penitence, which, in order to be genuine, must stand > the test of being ready to suffer punishment and approve of the ret-ribution of justice.

The first impulse consequently of true penitence is to make a personal atonement. This distinguishes penitence from remorse, the godly sorrow from the sorrow of the world (2 Cor. 7:10). Mere remorse has no desire or impulse to suffer and make amends for what has been done. Its impulse and desire is wholly selfish, namely, to escape suffering. Remorse leads to suicide, penitence never. The suicide's motive is to put an end to his misery. He supposes that he will be happier by dying than by continuing to live. This was the motive of the impenitent Judas.[90] But the broken and contrite heart is willing to do and to suffer anything that would really satisfy God's holy law. This is taught in Ps. 51:16: David in his genuine sorrow for his great transgression says: "You desire not sacrifice, else would I give it." He perceives that any expiation which he could make for his sin would be unequal to what justice requires; but this does not render him any the less ready to make it if he could. And when the true penitent perceives that another competent person, divinely appointed, has performed that atoning work for him which he is unable to perform for himself, he welcomes the substitution with joy and gratitude. Any aversion, therefore, to Christ's vicarious atonement evinces that there is a defect in the supposed sorrow for sin. The lust of self is in the experience. The individual's happiness is in the foreground, and divine holiness is in the background. And the positive and deliberate rejection of Christ's atonement, upon the same principle, is absolute and utter impenitence. A hostile and polemic attitude toward the blood of Christ as atoning for human guilt is fatal hardness of heart. Christ refers to it in his awful words to the Pharisees: "If you believe not that I am he, you shall die in your sins" (John 8:24). Impenitence shows itself both in unwillingness to make a personal atonement for sin and to trust in a vicarious atonement for it. (See supplement 6.2.3.)

Christ's Sufferings as Penal Substitution

It becomes necessary now to consider the question how the suffering of Christ meets the requisitions involved in the case of substitution of penalty or vicarious atonement. We have seen that suffering is the inmost essence of an atonement. The sacrificial victim must agonize and die. Without shedding of blood there is no remission of penalty. Even in cases where physical suffering does not take place, a suffering of another kind does. A citizen within the province of civil law is said to make amends for his fault when he pays a fine and suffers a loss of money as the compensation to civil justice. What, then, is suffering?

Suffering is of three kinds: (1) calamity, (2) chastisement, and (3) punishment or penalty.

Calamity does not refer to sin and guilt. It is a kind of suffering that befalls man by the providence of God for other reasons than disciplinary or judicial. Calamitous suffering, however, it should be noticed, occurs only in a sinful world. Consequently, it is never found isolated and by itself alone. It is associated either with chastisement (as when a calamity falls upon a child of God) or with punishment (as when it falls upon the impenitent sinner). Calamity is therefore rather an element in suffering than the whole of the suffering. When, for illustration, some of the Galileans had been cruelly put to death by Pilate (Luke 13:1-5), our Lord distinctly told those who informed him of this fact that these Galileans “were not sinners above all the Galileans because they suffered such things.” They were sinners, but not the worst of sinners. In other words, he taught them that the whole of this suffering was not penal. As sinners, they deserved to suffer; and some of this suffering was for their sins. But as they were not greater sinners than other Galileans, they did not deserve a suffering that was so much greater than that of the Galilean people as a whole. A part of this extraordinary suffering, therefore, was calamity, not punishment. As such, it had no reference to the guilt of the Galileans. If it had, it would have been a proof that they “were sinners above all the Galileans.” Our Lord then repeats and emphasizes the same truth by an allusion to the fall of the tower in Siloam upon some of the inhabitants of Jerusalem. This event did not prove that these few persons were sinners “above all men that dwelled in Jerusalem.” There was, therefore, a calamitous as well as a penal element in this fall of the tower. The same doctrine is taught by the extraordinary sufferings of the patriarch Job. Job’s friends contended that these were all and wholly penal. They inferred that Job had been guilty of some extraordinary sin which merited this extraordinary punishment, and they urged him to confess it. The patriarch, though acknowledging himself to be a sinner and deserving to suffer for sin (Job 42:5-6), was not conscious of any such extraordinary act of transgression as his friends supposed he must have committed and cannot understand why he should have been visited with such enormous afflictions. Both he and they are finally informed by God himself, out of the whirlwind, that the extraordinariness of the suffering is due to the will of God; that it is of the nature of calamity, not of penalty. Jehovah resolves the mystery in the uncommon treatment of Job into an act of almighty power by an infinitely wise being who gives no reason for his procedure in this instance (Job 38-41). Elihu, the youngest of the speakers, seems to have had an intimation in his own mind that this was the true explanation of the dark problem: “I will answer you that God is greater than man. Why do you strive against him? For he gives not account of any of his matters” (33:12-13).

The second species of suffering is chastisement. This is spoken of in Heb. 12:6: “For whom the Lord loves, he chastens (paideuei).”[91] Chastisement and punishment are distinguished from each other in 1 Cor. 11:32: “When we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world.” The purpose of chastisement is discipline and moral improvement. The reason for it is not secret and unknown, as in the case of calamity. It is adapted to reform. It is administered by parental affection, not by judicial severity. It is the form which suffering assumes within the family. The parent does not cause the child to feel pain for the satisfaction of justice, but for personal improvement. The suffering does indeed remind the child of his guilt and is suggestive of penalty, but it is not itself penal. Family discipline is not of the nature of retribution.

Hence analogies drawn from the family do not apply to the civil government and still less to divine government, when guilt and retribution are the subjects under consideration. Guilt and retribution are not res domi;[92] they are not family affairs. The family was not established for the purpose of punishing criminals, but of educating children. Because a human father may forgive a child, that is, may forego the infliction of suffering for an offense, without any satisfaction being rendered for him by a substitute and without any reference to the claims of law, it does not follow that the state can do this or that the supreme ruler can. Within the sphere of family life, there is nothing judicial and retributive. There is,

therefore, no analogy between the two spheres. There can be no legitimate arguing from a sphere in which the retributive element is altogether excluded, such as that of the father and the child, over into a sphere in which the retributive is the prime element, such as that of God the just and man the guilty. It is metabasis eis alio genos.[93] A parent is at liberty in case he judges that in a particular instance the child will be morally the better for so doing to forego chastisement altogether. He can pass by the transgression without inflicting any pain at all upon the child. But the magistrate has no right to do this in the instance of crime against the state. He must cause each and every transgression to receive the penalty prescribed by the statute. Furthermore, since chastisement has no reference to crime, it is not graduated by justice and the degree of the offense, but by expediency and the aim to reform. Sometimes a small fault in a child may be chastised with a severe infliction, and a great fault with a mild one. The object not being to weigh out penalty in exact proportion to crime, but to discipline and reform the character, the amount of suffering inflicted is measured by this aim and object. A very slight offense, if there is a tendency frequently to repeat it on the part of the child, may require a heavy chastisement, so that the habit may be broken up. And on the other hand, a very grave offense which is exceptional in its nature and to which there is no habitual tendency on the part of the child, may be best managed with a slight infliction of pain or even with none at all. A rebuke merely may be better adapted to promote the reformation of the offender. All this is illustrated in God's dealings with his own children. A Christian of uncommon excellence to human view sometimes experiences a great affliction, while one of less devoutness, apparently, is only slightly afflicted or perhaps not at all. This difference is not caused by the degree of demerit in each instance, but by what the divine eye sees to be required in each case in order to the best development of character.

Now the relation of a believer to God is like that of the child to the earthly father. Man enters into God's heavenly family by the act of faith in Christ. All the suffering that befalls him in this sphere is therefore of the nature of chastisement, not of punishment or retribution. It is not intrinsically endless and hopeless, as divine retribution is: "I will visit their transgression with the rod; nevertheless my loving-kindness I will not utterly take from him"; "he will not always chide; neither will he keep his anger forever" (Ps. 89:31

-34; 103:9; Jer. 10:24). The penalty due to the believer's sin has been endured for him by his Redeemer, and therefore there is no need of his enduring it. Justice does not exact penalty twice over. Consequently, whenever the believer suffers pain from any cause or source whatever, he is not suffering retributive punishment for purposes of law and justice, but corrective chastisement for purposes of self-discipline and spiritual improvement: epi to sympherorT[94] (Heb. 12:10). This suffering, though for the present moment not joyous but grievous, yet after it has been submissively endured, works out the peaceable fruit of righteousness (12:11). Even death itself, which is the climax of suffering, is not penal for a believer. Its sting, that is, its retributive quality, is extracted (1 Cor. 15:55-56). Suffering is penal when it is intended and felt to be such and is chastisement when it is not so intended and felt. God intends a benefit, not a punishment, when he causes a believer in Christ to suffer the pains of dissolution; and the believer so understands it. He feels that it is fatherly discipline. When a penitent believer dies, God supports and comforts the departing soul; but when an impenitent unbeliever dies, the soul is left to itself without support and comfort from God. The tranquilizing presence of God converts death into chastisement; the absence of such a presence makes it penalty. (See supplement 6.2.4.)

The relation of a rebellious and unbelieving man to God is like that of a rebellious citizen to the state. All that such a citizen can expect from the government under which he lives is justice, the due reward of his disobedience. The state is not the family, and what is peculiar to the one is not to the other. The disobedient citizen cannot expect from the magistrate the patient forbearance and affectionate tuition which the disobedient child meets with from a parent with a view to his discipline and moral improvement. The citizen is entitled only to justice, and if he gets it in the form of the righteous punishment of his crime he must be silent. No man may complain of justice or quarrel with it. To do so is an absurdity, as well as a fault. By creation, man was within the circle both of divine government and the divine family. Holy Adam was at once a subject and a child. By apostasy and rebellion, he threw himself out of the circle of God's family, but not out of the circle of God's government. Sinful man is invited and even commanded to reenter the divine family when he is invited and commanded to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ for the remission of his sins. But so long as he is an unbeliever, he has not reentered it and is not an affectionate or “dear” child of God. The phraseology in Jer. 31:20 (Ephraim is “my dear son”); Eph. 5:1 (“be followers of God as dear children”); Rom. 8:16-17 (“the Spirit itself bears witness with our spirit that we are the children of God, and if children then heirs”); Gal. 3:26 (“you are the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus”); and Matt. 5:9 (“the peacemakers shall be called the children of God”) is not applicable to men indiscriminately, but only to believers. The childhood and the fatherhood in this case is special, because it is founded in redemption.

There is a providential fatherhood and childhood spoken of in Scripture which is not sufficient to constitute fallen man a member of God’s heavenly family. In Acts 17:28 all men are called the “offspring” of God; and in Mai. 2:10 the question is asked: “Have we not all one father?” This providential fatherhood and childhood is founded in creation. This is proved by a second question in 2:10, which follows the one already cited and explains it: “Has not one God created us?” And in Acts 17:26 the reason given why all nations are the offspring of God is that they are “made of one blood” by their Creator. Creation is a kind of paternity. In Job 38:28-29 this is extended even to the inanimate creation: “Has the rain a father? Or who has begotten the drops of the dew? Out of whose womb came the ice? And the hoary frost of heaven, who has gendered it?” In Deut. 2:27 idolatrous Israel is represented as “saying to a stock, You are my father; and to a stone, You have brought me forth.” In acknowledging a false God to be their maker, they acknowledged him to be their providential father. In accordance with this, God says to a wicked generation “whose spot is not the spot of his children,” who are not “dear” children in the special sense: “Do you thus requite the Lord, O foolish people and unwise? Is not he your father that bought you? Has he not made you and established you?” (Deut. 32:6). Our Lord teaches (Matt. 7:11) that “evil” men have a “father in heaven” and explains this fatherhood by God’s readiness to bestow “good things” in his general providence. This association of paternity with creation and providence is found also in secular literature. Plato (Timaeus 9) says that “to discover the Creator and Father of this universe is indeed difficult.” Horace (Odes 1.12) speaks of “the Father of all, who governs the affairs of men and gods.” Creation, together with providence and government which are necessarily associated with creation, is a solid basis for this kind of paternity. It implies benevolent care and kindness toward its objects, and these are paternal qualities. God's providential and governmental goodness toward all his rational creatures is often referred to in Scripture: "Your Father which is in heaven makes his sun to rise on the evil and the good and sends rain upon the just and the unjust" (Matt. 5:45); "he left not himself without witness, in that he did good and gave us rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness" (Acts 14:17).

The fact, then, that God creates man after his own image a rational and immortal being, that he continually upholds him and extends to him the blessings of a kind and watchful providence, and still more that he compassionates him in his sinful and guilty condition and provides for him a way of salvation—all this justifies the use of the term father in reference to God and the term child in reference to man. But the fatherhood and childhood, in this case, are different from those of redemption and adoption. The former may exist without the latter. God as the universal parent, while showing providential benevolence and kindness to an impenitent sinner, "filling his mouth with food and gladness" all the days of his earthly existence, may finally punish him forever for his ungrateful abuse of paternal goodness, for his transgression of moral law, and especially for his rejection of the offer of forgiveness in Christ. And this lost man is still, even in his lost condition, one of God's "offspring." Abraham, speaking in the place of God, calls Dives in hell a child of the universal parent: "Son, remember that you in your lifetime received your good things" (Luke 16:25). And Dives recognizes the relationship when he says, "Father Abraham, have mercy on me" (16:24). The providential fatherhood of God is thus shown to be consistent with the punishment of a rebellious son. It is also consistent with the refusal to abate the merited punishment. Dives asks for a drop of water to cool his tongue and is refused. Dives was an impenitent man. He did not confess his sin or implore its forgiveness. He only asked for deliverance from suffering. He lacked the spirit of the prodigal son and of the pen-itent thief. He did not say, "Father, I have sinned and am no more worthy to be called your son; make me as one of your hired servants. I am in this condemnation justly. I am receiving the due reward of my deeds."

The universal fatherhood and childhood may exist without the special, but not the special without the universal. There may be creation, providence, and government without redemption, but not redemption without the former. A man may experience all the blessings of God's general paternity without those of his special, but not the blessings of God's special fatherhood without those of his general. Christ speaks of those who are not God's children in the special sense, when he says, in reply to the assertion of the Jews that "we have one Father, even God": "If God were your Father, you would love me. You are of your father, the devil" (John 8:41-44). St. John refers to the same class in the words "in this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil" (1 John 3:10).

When men universally are commanded to say "our Father who is in heaven," they are commanded to do so with the heart, not with the lips merely. They have no permission to employ the terms of the family from the position of a rebel. Says Christ, "Why call me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" (Luke 6:46). In like manner God says, "A son honors his father: If I be a father, where is my honor?" (Mai. 1:6). The fact of the providential fatherhood, as previously remarked, is not sufficient to constitute fallen men members of God's heavenly family. Unfallen man was a member of the heavenly family merely by the fatherhood of creation and providence; but after his rebellion and apostasy this ceased to be the case. Redemption was needed in order to restore him to membership. The whole human family is not now God's heavenly family. Only a part of it are the dear children of God. Those only are members of God's family who are members of Christ, "of whom the whole family in heaven and earth [the church above and below] is named" (Eph. 3:15). All others "are bastards and not sons" (Heb. 12:8).[95]

The third species of suffering is punishment. This is pain inflicted because of guilt. The intention of it is the satisfaction of justice. Re- tributive justice is expressed in the saying "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." This is the lex talionis[96] or law of requital.'[97] Our Lord, in the Sermon on the Mount, did not abolish this law, but placed its execution upon the proper basis. "That which was addressed to the judges," says Calvin (Henry, Life 1.287), "private individuals applied to themselves, and it was this abuse which our Lord Jesus Christ would correct." The private person may not put out the eye of him who has put out an eye, but the government may. Retribution is not the function of the individual. It belongs to God and to the government, which is ordained of God: “Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves; for it is written, Vengeance is mine, I will repay, says the Lord” (Rom. 12:19). This retributive function is delegated by God to the magistrate: “For he is the minister of God, an avenger to execute wrath upon him that does evil” (13:4). When the private individual takes the lex talionis[98] into his own hands, it is revenge. Christ forbade this. When God or the government administers it, it is vengeance. Christ did not forbid this. The former is selfish and wrong; the latter is dispassionate and right.

That particular amount and kind of suffering which is required by the law of requital is punishment. Its primary aim is the satisfaction of justice, not utility to the criminal. The criminal is sacrificed to justice. His private interest is subservient to that of law and government, because the latter is of more importance than the former. Even if he derives no personal benefit from the retribution which he experiences, the one suf-ficient reason for it still holds good, namely, that he has voluntarily transgressed and deserves to suffer for it. Both the quantity and the quality of the suffering must be considered, in order to penalty. In the first place, the amount of the suffering must be proportionate to the offense. To take human life for a petty larceny would be unjust. To take money as an offset for murder would be unjust. In the second place, suffering must be intended as penal and felt to be penal in order to be penal. It must have this retributive quality. Two men might suffer from God pre-cisely the same amount of suffering, and in one case it might be retribution and in the other chastisement, because in the one case his intention was the satisfaction of law, in the other the correction of his child. Physical death in the case of a wicked man is penal evil, because it is designed as a punishment on the part of God and is felt to be such by the man. God grants no comfort to the wicked in his death; the sting is not extracted, and death is remorseful and punitive. But the very same event of death and the same suffering in amount is chastisement and not punishment for a believer, because it is accompanied with inward strength from God to endure it and is known to be the means of entrance into heaven.

The sufferings of Christ the mediator were vicariously penal or atoning because the intention, both on the part of the Father and the Son, was that they should satisfy justice for the sin of man. They were not calamity, for their object is known. The reason for calamitous suffering is secret. And they were not disciplinary, because Christ having no sin could not pass through a process of progressive sanctification. Scrip-ture plainly teaches that our Lord's sufferings were vicariously retributive; that is, they were endured for the purpose of satisfying justice in the place of the actual transgressor: "Christ has once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust" (1 Pet. 3:18); "Christ was made a curse for us" (Gal. 3:13); "Immanuel was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities" (Isa. 53:5); "Jesus our Lord was delivered for our offenses" (Rom. 4:25); "he has made him to be sin [a sin offering] for us, who knew no sin" (2 Cor. 5:21); "he is the propitiation for our sins" (1 John 2:2); "behold the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world" (John 1:29); "he spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all" (Rom. 8:32). With this, compare 2 Pet. 2:4: "He spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell." Penalty in the case of Christ was vicarious; in that of the fallen angels was personal.

The penal and atoning sufferings of Christ were twofold: ordinary and extraordinary. The first came upon him by virtue of his human nature. He hungered, thirsted, was weary in body, was sad and grieved in mind, by the operation of the natural laws of matter and mind. All that Christ endured by virtue of his being born of a woman, being made under the law, living a human life, and dying a violent death belongs to this class. The extraordinary sufferings in Christ's experience came upon him by virtue of a positive act and infliction on the part of God. To these belong, also, all those temptations by Satan which exceeded in their force the common temptations incident to ordinary human life. Through these Christ was caused to suffer more severely than any of his disciples have. And that this was an intentional and preconceived infliction on the part of God, for the purpose of causing the sinner's substitute to endure a judicial suffering, is proved by the statement that "Jesus was led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil" (Matt. 4:1). These severe temptations from Satan occurred more than once: "The devil departed from him for a season" (Luke 4:13). But still more extraordinary was that suffering which was caused in the soul of Christ by the immediate agency of God in the garden and on the cross. That agony which forced the blood through the pores of the skin and wrung from the patient and mighty heart of the God-man the cry, “My God, why have you forsaken me!” cannot be explained by the operation of natural laws. There was positive desertion and infliction on the part of God. The human nature was forsaken, as the words of Christ imply. That support and comfort which the humanity had enjoyed, in greater or less degree, during the life of the God-man upon earth was now withdrawn utterly and entirely. One consequence of this was that the physical suf-fering involved in the crucifixion was unmitigated. Christ had no such support as his confessors have always had in the hour of martyrdom. But this was the least severe part of Christ’s extraordinary suffering. The pain from the death of crucifixion was physical only. There was over and above this a mental distress that was far greater. This is indicated in the terms employed to describe the spiritual condition of Christ’s soul, in the so-called agony in the garden: “He began to be sore amazed and to be very heavy and says unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death” (Mark 14:33-34). The words ekthambeislhai[99] and ademo-nein[100] imply a species of mental distress that stuns and bewilders. This mental suffering cannot be explained upon ordinary psychological principles, but must be referred to a positive act of God. Christ was sinless and perfect. His inward distress did not result from the workings of a guilty conscience. The agony in the garden and on the cross was not that of remorse; though it was equal to it. Neither was it the agony of despair; though it was equal to it.[101]

The positive agency of God, in causing a particular kind of suffering to befall the mediator which could not have befallen him by the operation of natural causes, is spoken of in Isa. 53:5-6, 10: “He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities. The Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all. It pleased the Lord to bruise him.” And again in Zech. 13:7: “Awake, O sword, against my shepherd and against the man that is my fellow, says the Lord of hosts; smite the shepherd.” This language teaches that the incarnate second person of the Trinity received upon himself a stroke inflicted by the positive act of another divine person. The Son of God was bruised, wounded, and smitten by God the Father, as the officer and agent of divine justice; and the effects of it appear in that extraordinary mental distress which the mediator exhibited, particularly during the last hours of his earthly life: “While he was buffeted, scourged, and nailed to the cross, we hear nothing from him; but like a lamb before the shearers, he was mute. But when God reached forth his hand and darted his immediate rebukes into his very soul and spirit, then he cries out, My God, my God, why have you forsaken me!”[102]

The nature of this suffering is inexplicable, because it has no parallel in human consciousness. The other forms of Christ’s suffering are intelligible, because they were like those of men. Thirst, hunger, weariness, grief at the death of a friend, were the same in Christ that they are in us. But that strange and unique experience which uttered itself in the cry “My God, why have you forsaken me?” belongs to the consciousness of the God-man. Only he who occupied the actual position of the sinner’s substitute can experience such a judicial stroke from eternal justice, and only he can know the peculiarity of the suffering which it produces. Suffering is a form of consciousness, and consciousness can be known only by the possessor of it. (See supplement 6.2.5.)

There are some particulars respecting this positive infliction upon the mediator which must be carefully noted. Though the Father “smote,” “wounded,” and “bruised” the Son, he felt no emotional anger toward the person of the Son. The emotional wrath of God is revealed only against personal unrighteousness, and Christ was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners. The Father smote his “beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased” (Matt. 3:17). At the very instant when the Father forsook the Son, he loved him emotionally and personally with the same infinite affection with which he had loved him “before the world was.” When it is said that Christ experienced the “wrath of God,” the meaning is that he experienced a judicial suffering caused by God. The “wrath” of God in this instance is not a divine emotion, but a divine act by which God the Father caused pain in Jesus Christ for a particular purpose. This purpose is judicial and penal, and therefore the act may be called an act of wrath. “The wrath of God is his will to punish”[103] (Anselm, Why the God-Man? 1.6). In Rom. 13:4 the infliction of suffering by the magistrate upon the criminal is denominated an act of “wrath”: “He is the minister of wrath.” But the magistrate has no emotional anger toward the criminal. God the Father could love the Son, therefore, at the very instant when he visited him with this punitive act. His emotion might be love, while his act was wrath. Nay, his love might be drawn forth by this very willingness of the Son to suffer vicariously for the salvation of man. “We do not admit,” says Calvin (2.16.11), “that God was ever hostile or [emotionally] angry with him. For how could he be angry with his beloved Son in whom his soul delighted? or how could Christ by his intercession appease the Father for others, if the Father were incensed against him? But we affirm that he sustained the weight of divine severity; since being smitten and afflicted of God, he experienced from God all the tokens of wrath and vengeance.” Says Witsius (Covenants 2.6.38):

> To be the beloved Son of God and at the same time to suffer the wrath of God are not such contrary things as that they cannot stand together. For, as Son, as the Holy One, while obeying the Father in all things, he was always the beloved; and indeed most of all when obedient to the death of the cross; for that was so pleasing to the Father that on account of it he raised him to the highest pitch of exaltation (Phil. 2:9); though as charged with our sins he felt the wrath of God burning not against himself, but against our sins which he took upon himself.

Second, the Son of God understands the judicial infliction which he undergoes, in this sense. God the Son knows that the blow which he experiences from God the Father is not for sin which he has himself committed. The transaction between the two divine persons is of the nature of a covenant between them. The Son agrees to submit his person, incarnate, to a penal infliction that is required by the attribute of justice. But this attribute is as much an attribute of the Son as it is of the Father. The second trinitarian person is as much concerned for the maintenance of law as is the first. The Son of God is not seized an unwilling victim and offered to justice by the Father. The Son himself is willing and desires to suffer. “I have,” he says, “a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished” (Luke 12:50). This explains the fact that Christ everywhere represents himself as voluntarily giving up his life: “No man takes my life from me; I lay it down of myself” (John 10:18). In some instances he employs his miraculous power to prevent his life from being taken because “his hour was not yet come.” But when the hour had come, though in the full consciousness that “twelve legions of angels” were at his command, he suffers himself to be seized by a handful of men, to be bound, and to be nailed to a cross. So far as the feature of mere voluntariness is concerned, no suicide was ever more voluntary in the manner of his death than was Jesus Christ.

Christ's Active and Passive Obedience

A distinction is made between Christ's active and passive obedience.[104] The latter denotes Christ's sufferings of every kind—the sum total of the sorrow and pain which he endured in his estate of humiliation. The term passive is used etymologically. His suffering is denominated "obedience" because it came by reason of his submission to the conditions under which he voluntarily placed himself when he consented to be the sinner's substitute. He vicariously submitted to the sentence "the soul that sins, it shall die" and was "obedient unto death" (Phil. 2:8).

Christ's passive or suffering obedience is not to be confined to what he experienced in the garden and on the cross. This suffering was the culmination of his piacular sorrow, but not the whole of it. Everything in his human and earthly career that was distressing belongs to his passive obedience. It is a true remark of Edwards that the blood of Christ's circumcision was as really a part of his vicarious atonement as the blood that flowed from his pierced side. And not only his suffering proper, but his humiliation, also, was expiatory, because this was a kind of suffering. Says Edwards (Redemption 2.1.2):

> The satisfaction or propitiation of Christ consists either in his suffering evil or his being subject to abasement. Thus Christ made satisfaction for sin by continuing under the power of death while he lay buried in the grave, though neither his body nor soul properly endured any suffering after he was dead. Whatever Christ was subject to that was the judicial fruit of sin had the nature of satisfaction for sin. But not only proper suffering, but all abasement and depression of the state and circumstances of mankind [human nature] below its primitive honor and dignity, such as his body remaining under death, and body and soul remaining separate, and other things that might be mentioned, are the judicial fruits of sin.

Christ's active obedience is his perfect performance of the requirements of the moral law. He obeyed this law in heart and in conduct, without a single slip or failure. He was "holy, harmless, and undefiled" (Heb. 7:26). Some theologians confine Christ's atonement to his passive obedience, in such sense that his active obedience does not enter into it and make a part of it.[105] Since atonement consists in suffering and since obedience of the divine law is not suffering but happiness, they contend that Christ's active obedience cannot contribute anything that is strictly piacular or atoning. This would be true in reference to the active obedience of a mere creature, but not in reference to the active obedience of the God-man. It is no humiliation for a created being to be a citizen of divine government, to be made under the law, and to be required to obey it. But it is humiliation for the Son of God to be so made and to be so required to obey. It is stooping down when the Ruler of the universe becomes a subject and renders obedience to a superior. Insofar as Christ's active obedience was an element in his humiliation, it was an element also in his expiation. Consequently, we must say that both the active and the passive obedience enter into the sum total of Christ's atoning work. Christ's humiliation confessedly was atoning, and his obedience of the law was a part of his humiliation. The two forms of Christ's obedience cannot therefore be so entirely separated from each other as is implied in this theory which confines the piacular agency of the mediator to his passive obedience.

But while there is this atoning element in Christ's active obedience, it is yet true that the principal reference of the active obedience is to the law as precept, rather than to the law as penalty. It is more meritorious of reward than it is piacular of guilt. The chief function of Christ's obedience of the moral law is to earn a title for the believer to the rewards of heaven. This part of Christ's agency is necessary, because merely to atone for past transgression would not be a complete salvation. It would, indeed, save man from hell, but it would not introduce him into heaven. He would be delivered from the law's punishment, but would not be entitled to the law's reward: "The man which does the things of the law shall live by them" (Rom. 10:5). Mere innocence is not entitled to a reward. Obedience is requisite in order to this. Adam was not meritorious until he had obeyed the commandment, "Do this." Before he could "enter into life," he must "keep the commandment," like every subject of divine government and candidate for heavenly reward. The mediator, therefore, must not only suffer for man, but must obey for him, if he would do for man everything that the law requires. Accordingly, Christ is said to be made of God unto the believer “wisdom” and “sanctification” as well as “righteousness” and “redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30). Believers are described as “complete” in Christ (Col. 1:10); that is, they are entitled to eternal blessedness as well as delivered from eternal misery. Christ is said to be “the end (telos)[106] of the law for righteousness to everyone that believes” (Rom. 10:4). This means that Christ completely fulfills the law for the believer; but the law requires obedience to its precept as well as endurance of its penalty. Complete righteousness is conformity to the law in both respects: “By his obedience shall many be made righteous” (Rom. 5:19); “by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many” (Isa. 53:11); “the Lord our righteousness” (Jer. 23:6); “in the Lord have I righteous-ness” (45:24; Rom. 8:4; Phil. 3:9; 2 Cor. 5:21).

The imputation of Christ’s active obedience is necessary, also, in order to hope and confidence respecting the endless future. If the believer founds his expectation of an eternity of blessedness upon the amount of obedience which he has himself rendered to the law and the degree of holiness which he has personally attained here upon earth, he is filled with doubt and fear respecting the final recompense. He knows that he has not, by his own work, earned and merited such an infinite reward as “glory, honor, and immortality”: “We cannot by our best works merit eternal life at the hand of God, by reason of the great disproportion between them and the glory to come” (Westminster Confession 16.5).[107] But if he founds his title to eternal life and his expectation of it upon the obedience of Christ for him, his anxiety disappears. (See supplement 6.2.6.)

A distinction is made by some theologians between “satisfaction” and “atonement.” Christ’s satisfaction is his fulfilling the law both as precept and penalty. Christ’s atonement, as antithetic to satisfaction, includes only what Christ does to fulfill the law as penalty. According to this distinction, Christ’s atonement would be a part of his satisfaction. The objections to this mode of distinguishing are that (a) satisfaction is better fitted to denote Christ’s piacular work than his whole work of redemption; in theological literature, it is more commonly the synonym of atonement; (b) by this distinction, atonement may be made to rest upon the passive obedience alone to the exclusion of the active. This will depend upon whether “obedience” is employed in the comprehensive sense of including all that Christ underwent in his estate of humiliation, both in obeying and suffering.

Another distinction is made by some between “satisfaction” and “merit.” In this case, “satisfaction” is employed in a restricted signification. It denotes the satisfaction of retributive justice and has respect to the law as penalty. Thus employed, the term is equivalent to “atonement.” “Merit” as antithetic to “satisfaction” has respect to the law as precept and is founded upon Christ’s active obedience. Christ vicariously obeys the law and so vicariously merits for the believer the reward of eternal life. Respecting this distinction, Turretin (14.13.12) remarks that > the two things are not to be separated from each other. We are not to say as some do that the “satisfaction” is by the passive work of Christ alone and that the “merit” is by the active work alone. The satisfaction and the merit are not to be thus viewed in isolation, each by itself, because the benefit in each depends upon the total work of Christ. For sin cannot be expiated until the law as precept has been perfectly fulfilled; nor can a title to eternal life be merited before the guilt of sin has been atoned for. Meruit ergo satisfaciendo, et merendo satisfecit.[108]

There is some ambiguity in this distinction, also. The term merit is often applied to Christ’s passive obedience as well as to his active. The “merit of Christ’s blood” is a familiar phrase. The mediator was meritorious in reference to the law’s penalty as well as to the law’s precept.[109]

Atonement and Its Necessity in Relation to Divine Justice

Having thus considered the nature of atonement and the sufferings of the mediator as constituting it, we proceed to notice some further characteristics of it.

In the first place, atonement is correlated to justice, not to benevolence. Some have maintained that retributive justice is a phase of benevolence. They would ultimately reduce all the moral attributes to one, namely, divine love. This theory is built upon the text “God is love.” But there are texts affirming that “God is light” (1 John 1:5) and that “God is a consuming fire” (Heb. 12:29). The affirmation “holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts” (Isa. 6:3) is equivalent to “God is holiness.” Upon the strength of these texts, it might be contended that all divine attributes may be reduced to that of wisdom or of justice or of holiness.[110] The true view is that each of the attributes stands side by side with all the others and cannot be merged and lost in any other. Justice is no more a phase of benevolence than benevolence is a phase of justice. Each attribute has a certain distinctive characteristic which does not belong to the others and by which it is a different attribute. The fact that one divine attribute affects and influences another does not convert one into another. Omnipotence acts wisely, but this does not prove that omnipotence is a mode of wisdom. God’s justice acts benevolently, not malevolently, but this does not prove that justice is a mode of benevolence. God’s benevolence acts justly, not unjustly, but this does not prove that benevolence is a mode of justice. Divine attributes do not find a center of unity in any one of their own number, but in the divine essence. It is the divine nature itself, not the divine attribute of love or any other attribute, in which they all inhere.

Accordingly, the atoning sufferings and death of Christ are related to the attribute of justice rather than to any other one of the divine attributes. They manifest and exhibit other attributes, such as wis-dom, omnipotence, benevolence, and compassion, nay, all the other attributes, but they are an atonement only for retributive justice. Christ’s death does not propitiate or satisfy God’s benevolence nor his wisdom nor his omnipotence; but it satisfies his justice. Atonement cannot be correlated to benevolence, any more than creation can be correlated to omniscience. It is true that the creation of the world supposes omniscience, but creation is an act of power rather than of knowledge and is therefore referred to omnipotence, rather than to omniscience. In like manner, Christ’s atonement supposes benevolence in God, but benevolence is not the particular attribute that requires the atonement. It is retributive justice that demands the punishment of sin. If there were in God mere and isolated benevolence, there would be neither personal nor vicarious punishment; just as there would be no creation if there were in God mere and isolated omniscience. Benevolence alone and wholly disconnected from justice would not cause pain but pleasure. It would relieve from suffering instead of inflicting it. St. Paul in Rom. 5:7 teaches the diversity between the attribute of justice and that of benevolence, in saying that "scarcely for a just man will one die; yet peradventure for a benevolent man some would even dare to die."[111]

Second, an atonement for sin of one kind or the other, if not personal then vicarious, is necessary, not optional. The transgressor must either die himself, or someone must die for him. This arises from the nature of that divine attribute to which atonement is a correlate. Retributive justice, we have seen (pp. 297-302), is necessary in its operation. The claim of law upon the transgressor for punishment is absolute and indefeasible. The eternal judge may or may not exercise mercy, but he must exercise justice. He can neither waive the claims of law in part nor abolish them altogether. The only possible mode, consequently, of delivering a creature who is obnoxious to the demands of retributive justice is to satisfy them for him. The claims themselves must be met and extinguished, either personally or by substitution: "Let justice fall from heaven."[112] And this necessity of an atonement is absolute, not relative. It is not made necessary by divine decision in the sense that the divine decision might have been otherwise. It is not correct to say that God might have saved man without a vicarious atonement had he been pleased so to do. For this is equivalent to saying that God might have abolished the claims of law and justice had he been pleased to do so.

In the third place, atonement, either personal or vicarious, naturally and necessarily cancels legal claims. This means that there is such a natural and necessary correlation between vicarious atonement and justice that the former supplies all that is required by the latter. It does not mean that Christ's vicarious atonement naturally and necessarily saves every man; because the relation of Christ's atonement to divine justice is one thing, but the relation of a particular person to Christ's atonement is a very different thing. Christ's death as related to the claims of the law upon all mankind cancels those claims wholly. It is an infinite "propitiation for the sins of the whole world" (1 John 2:2). But the relation of an impenitent person to this atonement is that of unbelief and rejection of it. Consequently, what the atonement has effected objectively in reference to the attribute of divine justice is not effected subjectively in the conscience of the individual.

There is an infinite satisfaction that naturally and necessarily cancels legal claims, but unbelief derives no benefit from the fact.

In like manner, a personal atonement naturally and necessarily cancels legal claims. When the prescribed human penalty has been personally endured by the criminal, human justice is satisfied, and there are no more outstanding claims upon him. And this, by reason of the essential nature of justice. Justice insists upon nothing but what is due, and when it obtains this, it shows its righteousness in not requiring anything further, as it does in not accepting anything less. Consequently, personal atonement operates inevitably and, we might almost say, mechanically. If a criminal suffers the penalty affixed to his crime, he owes nothing more in the way of penalty to the law. He cannot be punished a second time. Law and justice cannot now touch him, so far as this particular crime and this particular penalty are concerned. It would be unjust to cause him the least jot or tittle of further retributive suffering for that crime which by the supposition he has personally atoned for. The law now owes him immunity from suffering anything more. It is not grace in the law not to punish him any further, but it is debt. The law itself is under obligation not to punish a criminal who has once been punished. St. Paul says respecting grace and debt in the case of active obedience that “to him that works is the reward not reckoned of grace but of debt; otherwise work is no more work” (Rom. 4:4; 11:6). In like manner, it may be said that “to him who atones for sin, the legal consequence of atonement is not reckoned of grace but of debt; otherwise atonement is no more atonement.”

This reasoning applies to vicarious atonement equally with personal. Justice does not require a second sacrifice from Christ in addition to the first: “Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many” (Heb. 10:28). This one offering expiated “the sins of the whole world,” and justice is completely satisfied in reference to them. The death of the God-man naturally and necessarily canceled all legal claims. When a particular person trustsin this infinite atonement and it is imputed to him by God, it then becomes his atonement for judicial purposes as really as if he had made it himself, and then it naturally and necessarily cancels his personal guilt, and he has the testimony that it does in his peace of conscience. Divine justice does not, in this case, require an additional atonement from the believer. It does not demand penal suffering from a person for whom a divine substitute has rendered a full satisfaction, which justice itself has accepted in reference to this very person. By accepting a vicarious atonement for a particular individual, divine justice pre-cludes itself from requiring a personal atonement from him. Accordingly, Scripture represents the noninfliction of penalty upon the believer in Christ's atonement as an act of justice to Christ and also to the believer viewed as one with Christ: "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins" (1 John 1:9); "who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? Who is he that condemns? It is Christ that died" (Rom. 8:33-34). The atoning mediator can demand upon principles of strict justice the release from penalty of any sinful man in respect to whom he makes the demand. And if in such a case we should suppose the demand to be refused by eternal justice, we should suppose a case in which eternal justice is unjust. For, by the supposition, justice has inflicted upon the mediator the full penalty due to this sinner and then refuses to the mediator that release of this sinner from penalty which the mediator has earned by his own suffering and which is now absolutely due to him as the reward of his suffering. Says Edwards (Wisdom in Salvation in Works 4.150):

> It is so ordered now that the glory of the attribute of divine justice requires the salvation of those that believe. The justice of God that [irrespective of Christ's atonement] required man's damnation and seemed inconsistent with his salvation now [having respect to Christ's atonement] as much requires the salvation of those that believe in Christ, as ever before it required their damnation. Salvation is an absolute debt to the believer from God, so that he may in justice demand it on the ground of what his surety has done, (see also Edwards, God's Sovereignty in Works 4.552)

Similarly Anselm (Why the God-Man? 2.20) asks, "Can anything be more just than for God to remit all debt, when in the sufferings of the God-man he receives a satisfaction greater than all the debt?" Says Ezekiel Hopkins (Exposition of the Lord's Prayer):

> The pardon of sin is not merely an act of mercy, but also an act of justice. What abundant cause of comfort may this be to all believers that God's justice as well as his mercy shall acquit them; that that attribute of God at the apprehension of which they are wont to tremble should interpose in their behalf and plead for them! And yet, through the all-sufficient expiation and atonement that Christ has made for our sins, this mystery is affected and justice itself brought over from being a formida ble adversary' to be of our party and to plead for us. (Shedd, Theological Essays, 310-16)

It may be asked: If atonement naturally and necessarily cancels guilt, why does not the vicarious atonement of Christ save all men indiscriminately, as the universalist contends? The substituted suffering of Christ being infinite is equal in value to the personal suffering of all mankind; why then are not all men upon the same footing and in the class of the saved, by virtue of it? The answer is because it is a natural impossibility. Vicarious atonement without faith in it is powerless to save. It is not the making of this atonement, but the trusting in it, that saves the sinner: "By faith are you saved" (Eph. 2:8); "he that believes shall be saved" (Mark 16:16). The making of this atonement merely satisfies the legal claims, and this is all that it does. If it were made but never imputed and appropriated, it would result in no salvation. A substituted satisfaction of justice without an act of trust in it would be useless to sinners. It is as naturally impossible that Christ's death should save from punishment one who does not confide in it as that a loaf of bread should save from starvation a man who does not eat it. The assertion that because the atonement of Christ is sufficient for all men therefore no men are lost is as absurd as the assertion that because the grain produced in the year 1880 was sufficient to support the life of all men on the globe therefore no men died of starvation during that year. The mere fact that Jesus Christ made satisfaction for human sin, alone and of itself, will save no soul. Christ, conceivably, might have died precisely as he did and his death have been just as valuable for expiatory purposes as it is, but if his death had not been followed with the work of the Holy Spirit and the act of faith on the part of individual men, he would have died in vain. Unless his objective work is subjectively appropriated, it is useless so far as personal salvation is concerned. Christ's suffering is sufficient to cancel the guilt of all men and in its own nature completely satisfies the broken law. But all men do not make it their own atonement by faith in it by pleading the merit of it in prayer and mentioning it as the reason and ground of their pardon. They do not regard and use it as their own possession and blessing. It is nothing for them but a historical fact. In this state of things, the atonement of Christ is powerless to save. It remains in the possession of Christ who made it and has not been transferred to the individual. In the scriptural phrase, it has not been "imputed." There may be a sum of money in the hands of a rich man that is sufficient in amount to pay the debts of a million debtors; but unless they individually take money from his hands into their own, they cannot pay their debts with it. There must be a personal act of each debtor in order that this sum of money on deposit may actually extinguish individual indebtedness. Should one of the debtors, when payment is demanded of him, merely say that there is an abundance of money on deposit, but take no steps himself to get it and pay it to his creditor, he would be told that an undrawn deposit is not a payment of a debt. "The act of God," says Owen (Justification , chap. 10), "in laying our sins on Christ, conveyed no title to us to what Christ did and suffered. This doing and suffering is not immediately by virtue thereof ours or esteemed ours; because God has appointed something else [namely, faith] not only antecedent thereto, but as the means of it." (See supplement 6.2.7.)

The supposition that the objective satisfaction of justice by Christ saves of and by itself, without any application of it by the Holy Spirit and without any trust in it by the individual man, overlooks the fact that while sin has a resemblance to a pecuniary debt, as is taught in the petition "forgive us our debts," it differs from it in two important particulars. In the instance of pecuniary indebtedness, there is no need of a consent and arrangement on the part of the creditor when there is a vicarious payment. Any person may step up and discharge a money obligation for a debtor, and the obligation ceases ipso facto. But in the instance of moral indebtedness to justice or guilt, there must be a consent of the creditor, namely, the judge, before there can be a substitution of payment. Should the Supreme Judge refuse to permit another person to suffer for the sinner and compel him to suffer for his own sin, this would be just. Consequently, substitution in the case of moral penalty requires a consent and covenant on the part of God, with conditions and limitations, while substitution in the case of a pecuniary debt requires no consent, covenant, or limitations. Second, after the vicarious atonement has been permitted and provided, there is still another condition in the case, namely, that the sinner shall confess and repent of the sin for which the atonement was made and trust in the atonement itself.

Another error underlying the varieties of universalism is the assumption that because an atonement sufficient for all men has been made, all men are entitled to the benefits of it. This would be true if all men had made this atonement. But inasmuch as they had nothing to do with the making of it, they have not the slightest right or title to it. No sinner has a claim upon the expiatory oblation of Jesus Christ. It belongs entirely to the maker, and he may do what he will with his own. He may impute it to any man whom he pleases or not impute it to any man whom he pleases (Rom. 9:18). Even the act of faith does not by its intrinsic merit entitle the believer to the benefits of Christ's satisfaction. This would make salvation a debt which the Redeemer owes because of an act of the believer. It is only because Christ has promised and thereby bound himself to bestow the benefits of redemption upon everyone that believes that salvation is certain to faith.

It is objected that it is unjust to exact personal penalty from any individuals of the human race if a vicarious penalty equal in value to that due from the whole race has been paid to justice. The injustice alleged in this objection may mean injustice toward the individual unbeliever who is personally punished; or it may mean injustice in regard to what the divine law is entitled to on account of man's sin. An examination will show that there is no injustice done in either respect. When an individual unbeliever is personally punished for his own sins, he receives what he deserves; and there is no injustice in this. The fact that a vicarious atonement has been made that is sufficient to expiate his sins does not stop justice from punishing him personally for them, unless it can be shown that he is the author of the vicarious atonement. If this were so, then indeed he might complain of the personal satisfaction that is required of him. In this case, one and the same party would make two satisfactions for one and the same sin: one vicarious and one personal. When therefore an individual unbeliever suffers for his own sin, he "receives the due reward of his deeds" (Luke 23:24). And since he did not make the vicarious atonement "for the sins of the whole world" and therefore has no more right or title to it or any of its benefits than an inhabitant of Saturn, he cannot claim exemption from personal penalty on the ground of it. Says Owen (Satisfaction of Christ):

> The satisfaction of Christ made for sin, being not made by the sinner, there must of necessity be a rule, order, and law constitution how the sinner may come to be interested in it and made partaker of it. For the consequent of the freedom of one by the sacrifice of another is not natural or necessary, but must proceed and arise from a law constitution, compact, and agreement. Now the way constituted and appointed is that of faith, as explained in the Scriptures. If men believe not, they are no less liable to the punishment due to their sins, than if no satisfaction at all were made for sinners.

The other injustice alleged in the objection relates to the divine law and government. It is urged that when the unbeliever is personally punished, after an infinite vicarious satisfaction for human sin has been made, justice, in this case, gets more than its dues, which is as unjust as to get less. This is a mathematical objection and must receive a mathematical answer. The alleged excess in the case is like the addition of a finite number to infinity, which is no increase. The everlasting suffering of all mankind, and still more of only a part, is a finite suffering. Neither the sufferer nor the duration is mathematically infinite, for the duration begins, though it does not end. But the suffering of the God-man is mathematically infinite because his person is absolutely infinite. When, therefore, any amount of finite human suffering is added to the infinite suffering of the God-man, it is no increase of value. Justice, mathematically, gets no more penalty when the suffering of lost men is added to that of Jesus Christ than it would without this addition. The law is more magnified and honored by the suffering of incarnate God than it would be by the suffering of all men individually, because its demand for a strictly infinite satisfaction for a strictly infinite evil is more completely met. In this sense, “Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound” (Rom. 5:20).

It is for this reason, that finite numbers, small or great, are of no consequence when the value of Christ’s oblation is under consideration.

One sinner needs the whole infinite Christ and his whole sacrifice because of the infinite guilt of his sin. And a million sinners need the same sacrifice and no more. The guilt of one man in relation to God is infinite; and the infinite sacrifice of Christ cancels it. The guilt of a million men is infinite—not, however, because a million is a larger number than one, but because of the relation of sin to God—and the one infinite sacrifice of Christ cancels it. If only one man were to be saved, Christ must suffer and die precisely as he has; and if the human race were tenfold more numerous than it is, his death would be ample for their salvation. An infinite satisfaction meets and cancels infinite guilt, whether there be one man or millions.

Atonement in Its Relation to Divine Mercy

Fourth, the vicarious satisfaction of justice is a mode or form of mercy. It is so because it unites and harmonizes the two attributes in one divine act, namely, the suffering of incarnate deity for human guilt. When the Supreme Judge substitutes himself for the criminal, his own mercy satisfies his own justice for the transgressor. This single act is, therefore, both an exercise of mercy and an exercise of justice. It is certainly mercy to suffer for the sinner; and it is certainly justice to suffer the full penalty which he deserves. The personal satisfaction of justice, on the contrary, is not a mode or form of mercy, because in this case the Supreme Judge inflicts the suffering required by the violated law upon the criminal himself. Personal satisfaction of justice is justice without mercy. It is the “severity” spoken of by St. Paul in Rom. 11:22.

Vicarious atonement is both evangelical and legal—gospel with law; personal atonement is merely legal—law without gospel. The former is complex: both merciful and just; the latter is simple: just, not merciful. In the legal sphere of ethics and natural religion, where personal satisfaction rules, justice and mercy are entirely separated attributes, unblended and unharmonized. Justice obstructs the exercise of mercy by presenting its unsatisfied claims, and “mercy stands silent by.” There is “no eye to pity, and no arm to save” (Isa. 59:16; 63:5). But in the evangelical sphere of revealed religion, the two attributes are united and harmonized: “Mercy and truth meet together; righteousness and peace kiss each other” (Ps. 85:10). Divine mercy now satisfies divine justice, and divine justice accepts the satisfaction. The mercy is now infinitely just, and the justice is now infinitely merciful. The two coordinate and distinct attributes, which outside of the gospel and apart from the incarnation are separate—the one forbidding the exercise of the other—are now blended; the one meeting all the demands of the other, and both concurring in the salvation of the guilty sinner, for whose advantage all this costly sacrifice is made by the adorable Trinity. (See supplement 6.2.8.)

Fifth, the vicarious satisfaction of justice is the highest mode or form of mercy because it is mercy in the form of self-sacrifice. A comparison of the different modes of divine mercy will show this. When the Creator bestows temporal blessings in his providence upon the sinner; when he makes his rain to fall and his sun to shine upon him; this is a form of mercy greatly inferior to that shown in Christ's atonement. There is no loss on the part of the giver involved in the gifts of providence. They do not cost the deity any sacrifice. Again, should we conceive it possible for God to waive the claims of law by a word and to inflict no penal suffering upon either the sinner or a substitute, this would be a lower form of mercy than that of vicarious atonement, for the same reason as in the previous instance. There is no suffering and no death undergone in the manifestation of such a species of compassion. This would be the easiest and cheapest of all methods of deliverance from punishment. Again, should we conceive of God, in the exercise of ownership and sovereignty, as taking one of his creatures, say an archangel, and making him a vicarious substitute for man, this too would be a low species of mercy, and for the same reason as in the previous cases. It involves no self-sacrifice upon the part of God. The transaction does not affect anything in the divine essence. There is no humiliation and no suffering of God incar-nate. But when justice is satisfied for man by the extraordinary method of substituting God for man, by the method of incarnating, humiliating, and crucifying a person of the Trinity, we see the highest conceivable form of divine compassion and pity. It is so strange and stupendous that it requires very high testimony and proof to make it credible.

The vicarious satisfaction of justice is then the highest form of mercy because (a) the offended party permits a substitution of penalty, (b) the offended party provides the substitute, and (c) the offended party substitutes himself for the offender. The infinite and eternal judge allows, prepares, and is a substitute for the criminal. “How have you loved us,” says Augustine (Confessions 10.43), “for whom he that thought it no rob bery to be equal with you was made subject even to the death of the cross; for us, both victor and victim, and victor because victim; for us, both priest and sacrifice, and priest because sacrifice.” Aquinas (1.21.3) remarks of the self-sacrificing pity of God: “Mercy did not abolish justice, but is a certain fullness of justice.”“[113] Similarly, Wessel (Concerning the Causes of the Incarnation, 17) describes the vicarious atonement: “God himself, the priest himself, the victim himself, made satisfaction for himself, from himself, to himself.”“[114] Pascal (Thoughts) expresses the same truth in the remark that in the Christian redemption “the judge himself is the sacrifice.” And Livingstone (Last Journal, 5 Aug. 1872) cries from the heart of Africa: “What is the atonement of Christ? It is himself: it is the inherent and everlasting mercy of God made apparent to human eyes and ears. The everlasting love was disclosed by our Lord’s life and death. It shows that God forgives because he loves to forgive. He works by smiles if possible; if not by frowns; pain is only a means of enforcing love.”

In this fact that the vicarious satisfaction of justice is self-sacrificing mercy, we have the answer to the objection that if justice is satisfied there is no exhibition of mercy. There would be none if the satisfaction were made personally by the sinner. But when it is made vicariously by the eternal judge himself, it is the acme of mercy and compassion. Says Westminster Larger Catechism Q. 71: “Although Christ by his obedience and death did make a full satisfaction to God’s justice in the behalf of them that are justified, yet inasmuch as God accepts the satisfaction from a surety which he might have demanded of them and did provide this surety, their justification is to them of free grace.”

This truth is made still more evident by remarking the distinction between mercy and indulgence. The first is founded in principle; the latter is unprincipled. Mercy has a moral basis; it is good ethics. Indulgence has no moral foundation; it is bad ethics. Indulgence is foolish good nature. It releases from punishment without making any provision for the claims of law. Its motive is sensuous, not rational. It suffers, itself, from the sight of suffering, and this is the reason why it does not inflict it. It costs an effort to be just, and it does not like to put forth an effort. Indulgence, in the last analysis, is intensely selfish. Mere happiness in the sense of freedom from discomfort or pain is the final end which it has in view. Consequently, the action of indulgence as distinguished from mercy is high-handed. It is the exercise of bare power in snatching the criminal away from merited suffering. It is might, not right. A mob exercises indulgence when it breaks open a prison and drags away the criminal merely because the criminal is suffering. No member of this mob would take the criminal's place and suffer in his stead. This would be real mercy, and mercy in its highest form of vicarious satisfaction. Should God deliver man from the claims of law without the substitution of penalty, it would be a procedure the same in principle with that of the mob in the case supposed. It would be indulgence, not mercy.

In Rom. 3:25 indulgence in distinction from mercy is referred to. St. Paul mentions as a secondary reason why Christ was set forth as a propitiation for sin the fact that in the history of the sinful world of mankind God had been indulgent toward those who deserved immediate and swift retribution. He had "passed by" and omitted to punish. Instead of inflicting penalty, he had bestowed "rain and fruitful seasons" upon rebellious men and had "filled their hearts with food and gladness." He had "suffered (eiase)[115] all nations to walk in their own ways" and had "winked at," that is, overlooked (hyperidon),[116] "the times of this ignorance" (Acts 14:16-17; 17:30). St. Paul does not designate this indulgent treatment of sinful men by chaRIs,[117] the usual and proper term for forgiving mercy, but by anoche.[118] It is not mercy, but "forbearance." It is in itself irregular and requires to be legitimated. And it is explained and set right by the piacular offering of the Son of God. Because the vicarious atonement of Christ is sufficient to atone for the sins of the whole world, therefore it is that the sins of the whole world experience the forbearance of the Holy One; therefore it is that the whole world receives many temporal blessings instead of swift retribution; therefore it is that God "overlooks" the times of guilty ignorance and disobedience and delays punishment.[119]

This "pretermission" of transgressions differs from their "remission" in being only temporary. This forbearance, even though explained and legitimated by the propitiation of Christ, is not to be eternal. Justice will finally assert its claims, and those whose unrepented transgressions have met with this temporary indulgence and delay of punishment, on account of Christ's atonement, will in the end receive the just punishment of sin. St. Paul, in this passage, does not say that these sins had been eternally pardoned by divine grace (charis),[120] but had been only temporarily passed by through divine forbearance (anoche).[121]

In the sixth place, the vicarious satisfaction of justice is the only mode of exercising mercy that is possible to a just being. This follows from the nature of justice and its relation to other divine attributes. If it be conceded that legal claims must be met at all hazards and cannot be either waived in part or abolished altogether, then it is evident that the great problem before divine mercy is how to meet these claims in behalf of the object of mercy. The problem is not how to trample upon justice in behalf of the criminal, but how to satisfy justice for him. And if this problem cannot be solved, then there can be no manifestation of mercy at all by a just being. The penalty must be endured by the actual criminal, and the matter end here. God is a perfectly just being and therefore cannot forever exercise mere forbearance and indulgence toward a transgressor. The mercy of the Supreme Being must be ethical, that is, must stand the test and scrutiny of moral principle and righteousness. If therefore the merciful God desires to release a transgressor from the suffering which he deserves, he must find someone who is fitted and willing to undergo this suffering in his place. And there is in the whole universe no being who is both fitted and willing to do this but God himself. A creature might be willing, but he is unfit for the office of substitute. The language of Milton (Paradise Lost 3.209-12) respecting the transgressor is theology as well as poetry:

> Die he, or justice must, unless for him
> Some other able, and as willing, pay
> The rigid satisfaction, death for death.

Possibility of Substitution

Respecting the possibility of the substitution of penalty, it is to be observed in the first place that the punishment inflicted by justice is aimed, strictly speaking, not at the person of the transgressor, but at his sin. The wrath of God falls upon the human soul considered as an agent, not as a substance. The spiritual essence or nature of man is God's own work, and he is not angry at his own work and does not hate anything which he has created from nothing. Man's substance is not sin. Sin is the activity of this substance; and this is man's work. God is displeased with this activity and visits it with retribution. Consequently, justice punishes the sin rather than the sinner, the agency rather than the agent, the act rather than the person. It does not fix its eye upon the transgressor as this particular entity and insist that this very entity shall suffer and prohibit any other entity from suffering for him. Justice, it is true, is not obliged to allow substitution, but neither is it obliged to forbid it. If it were true that the penalty must be inflicted upon the transgressor's very substance and person itself as well as upon the sin in his person, then there could be no substitution. The very identical personal essence that had sinned must suffer, and justice would be the only attribute which God could manifest toward a sinner".[122]

Second, justice is dispassionate and unselfish. It bears no malice toward the criminal. It is not seeking to gratify a grudge against him personally, but only to maintain law and righteousness. It inflicts pain not for the sake of inflicting it upon a particular individual, but for the sake of a moral principle. Hence if the sin can be punished in another way than by causing the sinner to be punished; if the claims of law can be really and truly satisfied by a vicarious method; there is nothing in the spirit and temper of justice toward the sinner's person or soul to forbid this. "The aspect of the law upon a sinner," says Bates (On Forgiveness), "being without passion, it admits satisfaction by the sufferings of another." And the same truth is condensed in the Schoolman's dictum: "It is necessary that punishment be inflicted impersonally on every sin, but not personally on every sinner.'""

Third, the substitution of penalty is implied in divine sovereignty in administering government. If God from his very nature could not permit a proper person to take the place of a criminal, but were necessitated in every single instance to inflict the penalty upon the actual transgressor, his government would be just, but not sovereign. He could make no changes in the mode of its administration—which is what is meant by a sovereign government. But God may vary the mode of administering justice, provided the mode adopted really satisfies justice and there be no special reason in his own mind why in a particular instance the variation may not be permitted. There were such special reasons, apparently, in the case of the fallen angels, but not in the case of fallen men. This exercise of sovereignty in permitting substitution of penalty is by some Calvinistic theologians called a "relaxation" of justice, not in respect to the penalty demanded, but to the person enduring it. Justice relaxes its demands to the degree of permitting a vicar to suffer for the actual criminal, but not to the degree of abating the amount of the suffering. The vicar must pay the debt to the uttermost farthing. Owen uses the term relaxation in the sense of substitution, but describes our Lord's suffering as the strict and full satisfaction of retributive justice (Communion with the Trinity 1.2):

> To see him who is the wisdom of God and the power of God, always beloved of the Father; to see him, I say, fear and tremble and bow and sweat and pray and die; to see him lifted up upon the cross, the earth trembling under him, as if unable to bear his weight, and the heavens darkened over him, as if shut against his cry, and himself hanging between both, as if refused by both, and all this because our sins did meet upon him; this of all things does most abundantly manifest the severity of God's vindictive justice. Here, or nowhere, is it to be learned.

This is very different from Scotus's and Grotius's "relaxation." The latter is a relaxation in respect to the amount of the penalty, as well as the person enduring it.

In case the administrative sovereignty of God decides to permit and provide a substituted penalty, the following conditions are indispensable, not by reason of any external necessity, but by reason of an internal necessity springing from the divine nature and attributes. First, the suffering substituted must be penal in its nature and purpose and of equal value with the original penalty. The theory of Duns Scotus, afterward perfected by Grotius, according to which God's administrative sovereignty is so extended that he can by a volitionary decision accept a substituted penalty of inferior value, is the same in principle with the later theory of Socinus. This scheme, denominated "acceptilation"[123] from a term of the Roman law, logically carried out is fatal to the doctrine of vicarious atonement. For the same arbitrary sovereignty which compels justice to be content with less than its dues can compel it to be content with none at all. If a government has power and authority to say that fifty cents shall pay a debt of a dollar, it has the power to extinguish debts entirely by a positive decision of the same kind. The principle of justice being surrendered in part is surrendered altogether.

An illustration sometimes employed, taken from the instance of Zaleu-cus and his son, contains the false ethics of the theory of acceptilation. This Locrian lawgiver had decreed that a person guilty of adultery should be made blind. His own son was proved to be an adulterer. He ordered one of his son's eyes and one of his own to be put out (Aelian, Historical Miscellany 13.24). This was an evasion, not a satisfaction of the law. The penalty threatened and intended to be threatened against adultery was total blindness. In a substitution of this kind, no one was made blind. Two eyes were put out, but not the two eyes of one man. Had Zaleucus ordered both of his own eyes to be put out, the case would have been a proper illustration of Christ's vicarious atonement. As the case actually stood, the lawgiver had principle enough to acknowledge the claims of justice, but not principle enough to completely satisfy them. That he was willing to lose one eye proves that he felt the claims of law; but that he was unwilling to make himself totally blind in the place of his son shows that he preferred to sacrifice justice to self rather than self to justice.[124]

In saying that the suffering substituted for that of the actual criminal must be of equal value, it is not said that it must be identical suffering. A substituted penalty cannot be an identical penalty, because identical means the same in every respect. Identity is inconsistent with any exchange whatever. To speak of substituting an identical penalty is a contradiction in terms. The identical punishment required by the moral law is personal punishment, involving personal remorse; and remorse can be experienced only by the actual criminal. If, in commercial law, a substituted payment could be prevented, a pecuniary debtor would be compelled to make an identical payment. In this case, he must pay in person and wholly from his own resources. Furthermore, he could not pay silver for gold, but gold for gold; and not only this, but he must pay back exactly the same pieces of gold, the ipsissima pecunia,[125] which he had received. Identical penalty implies sameness without a difference in any particular. Not only is the quantity the same, but the quality is the same. But substituted penalty implies sameness with a difference in some particular. And in the case before us, that of Christ's satisfaction, the difference is in the quality, the quantity being unchanged. The vicarious suffering of Christ is of equal value with that of all mankind but is not the same in kind.

Equivalency, not identity, is the characteristic, therefore, of vicarious penalty. The exchange implied in the term substitution is of quality not of quantity. One kind of judicial suffering—that is, suffering endured for the purpose of satisfying justice—is substituted for another kind. Christ's sufferings were of a different nature or quality from those of a lost man.[126] But there was no difference in quantity or value. A less degree of suffering was not exchanged for a greater degree. The sufferings of the mediator were equal in amount and worth to those whose place they took. Vicarious penalty then is the substitution of an equal quantity, but a different quality of suffering. The mediator suffers differently from the lost world of sinners, but he suffers equally.

Equivalency satisfies justice as completely as identity. One hundred dollars in gold extinguishes a debt of one hundred dollars as completely as does one hundred dollars in silver. If the sufferings of the mediator between God and man are of equal value with those of the world of mankind, they are as complete a satisfaction of justice as the eternal death of mankind would be, although they do not, in their nature or quality, involve any of that sense of personal wickedness and remorse of conscience which enters into the punishment of a lost man. They get their value from the nature of the God-man, and it is the value of what is substituted which justice looks at.

The following extract from Samuel Hopkins (System of Doctrine in Works 1.321) enforces this truth:

> The mediator did not suffer precisely the same kind of pain, in all respects, which the sinner suffers when the curse is executed on him. He did not suffer that particular kind of pain which is the necessary attendant or natural consequence of being a sinner and which none but the sinner can suffer. But this is only a > circumstance of the punishment of sin and not of the essence of it. The whole penalty of the law may be suffered, and the evil may be as much and as great, without suffering that particular sort of pain. Therefore, Christ, though without sin, might suffer the whole penalty, that is, as much and as great evil as the law denounces against transgression.

Second, the penalty substituted must be endured by a person who is not himself already indebted to justice and who is not a subject of the government under which the substitution takes place. If he be himself a criminal, he cannot of course be a substitute for a criminal. And if he be an innocent person, yet owes all his own service to the government, he cannot do a work of supererogation such as is implied in vicarious sat-isfaction. An earthly state could not righteously allow an innocent citizen to die for another, even if he were willing so to die, because there are claims upon the person and life of every citizen which must go undischarged if his life should be taken. These are the claims of family, of society, of the commonwealth, and of God. Says Owen (Person of Christ, 16):

> It is impossible that by anything a man can do well he should make satisfaction for anything he has done ill. For what he so does is due in and for itself. And to suppose that satisfaction can be made for a former fault, by that whose omission would have been another fault had the former never been committed, is madness. An old debt cannot be discharged with ready money for new commodities; nor can past injuries be compensated by present duties which we are anew obliged unto.

Says Anselm (Why the God-Man? 1.20), “When you pay back something that you owe to God you ought not to reckon this as counting toward the debt that you owe for sin. For you owe everything to God.”[127] The words of the Jewish elders to Christ respecting the Roman centurion illustrate the point under consideration. They besought Christ to heal his servant, saying that the centurion was worthy of such a favor: “For he loves our nation, and he has built us a synagogue” (Luke 7:5). The centurion had acquired merit, because as a Roman citizen he was under no obligation to build a Jewish synagogue.

The sufferings of Christ meet all these conditions. First, they were penal in their nature and intent, since they were neither calamitous nor disciplinary. They were a judicial infliction voluntarily endured by Christ for the purpose of satisfying the claims of law due from man; and this purpose makes them penal: “It pleased the Lord to bruise him. He was wounded for our transgressions” (Isa. 53:5, 10); “Christ was made a curse for us” (Gal. 2:13); “no man takes my life from me, but I lay it down of myself (John 10:17-18).

Some writers, while defending the doctrine of vicarious atonement, object to applying the terms penal and penalty to Christ’s sufferings. Magee (Atonement, diss. 13) does so:

> The idea of punishment cannot be abstracted from [personal] guilt. Christ’s sufferings are a judicial infliction and may perhaps be figuratively denominated punishment, if thereby be implied a reference to the actual transgressor and be understood that suffering which was due to the offender himself and which if inflicted upon him would then take the name of punishment. In no other sense can the suffering inflicted on account of the transgressions of another be called a punishment.

Ebrard (quoted by Van Oosterzee 2.603, who agrees with Ebrard) says: “If I endure the infliction due to another instead of him, this suffering which for him would have had the moral quality of a punishment has not the moral quality of a punishment for me, because I am an innocent person. For the idea of a punishment contains, besides the objective element of suffering inflicted by the judge, also in addition the sub-jective element of the sense of guilt or an evil conscience possessed by the guilty.” This last assertion is the point in dispute. Does the idea of a punishment “contain, besides the objective element of suffering inflicted by the judge, also the subjective element of the sense of guilt?” The question is whether the simple purpose and aim of the suffering in a given instance is sufficient to constitute it punishment. If a person suffers with a view to satisfy the claims of law, be he guilty himself or not, is this a “penal” suffering? Is such a “judicial infliction,” as Magee calls it, properly denominated “penalty?” Does the existence of the objective element alone, apart from the subjective element, in the case of suffering for the purpose of atonement for sin, warrant the use of the terms penal and penalty? There are three reasons why it does, (a) There is no other term but this by which to designate a suffering that is endured for the sole purpose of satisfying justice. It cannot be denominated either calamity or chastisement, (b) When a commercial debt is vicariously paid by a friend of the debtor, it is as truly a "payment" as if paid personally, and the term payment is applied to it in the strict sense of the word. But if there is no valid objection to denominating the vicarious satisfaction of a pecuniary claim a "payment," there is none to denominating the vicarious satisfaction of a moral claim a "punishment." (c) A third reason for the use of the term punishment or penalty in this connection is found in the use of the corresponding term atonement. No objection is made to calling Christ's suffering an atonement. But atonement and punishment are kindred in meaning. Both alike denote judicial suffering. There is, consequently, no more reason for insisting that the term punishment be restricted to personal endurance of suffering for personal transgression than there would be in insisting that the term atonement be restricted to personal satisfaction for personal sin. But the vicarious sufferings of Christ are as truly an atonement for sin as would be the personal sufferings of the sinner himself and are as freely called so. It is as proper, therefore, to denominate Christ's suffering a vicarious punishment as to denominate it a vicarious atonement. The objection of Magee and Ebrard is met by the qualifying term vicarious, invariably joined with the term punishment when Christ's sufferings are denominated a punishment. No one asserts that they were a "personal" punishment. Anselm (Why the God-Man? 1.15)[128] marks the difference by denominating the infliction when laid upon the sinner poena[129] and when laid upon the substitute satisfaction[130]

Second, the vicarious sufferings of Christ were infinite in value. In the substitution, the amount is fully equal to that of the original penalty. A smaller suffering, an inferior atonement, was not put in the place of a greater and superior. The worth of any suffering is determined by the total subject who suffers, not by the particular nature in the subject which is the seat of the suffering. Physical suffering in a brute is not so valu-able as it is in a man, because a brute has only an animal nature, while a man has an animal united with a rational nature. Yet the nature which is the sensorium or seat of the physical pain is the same in both cases. But one hour of human suffering through the physical sentiency is worth more than days of brutal suffering through the physical sentiency, as “one hour of Europe is worth a cycle of Cathay.” When animal life and organization suffer in a man’s person, the agony is human and rational. It is high up the scale. It has the dignity and greatness of degree which pertain to man. But when animal life and organization suffer in an ox or a dog, the agony is brutal and irrational. It is low down the scale. It has nothing of the worth and dignity that belong to the physical agony of the martyr and confessor. To apply this reasoning to the case before us: When a human nature suffers in an ordinary human person, the suffering is human and rational but finite. No mere man’s suffering can be infinite in value because the total subject or person is finite. Whatever a man suffers in either of his natures, body or mind, gets its value from his personality. Measured by this, it is limited suffering. But when a human nature suffers in a theanthropic person, the suffering is divine and infinite because of the divinity and infinity of such a person. The suffering of the human nature, in this instance, is elevated and dignified by the union of the human nature with the divine, just as the suffering of an animal nature in an ordinary man is elevated and dignified by the union of the animal nature with the rational. The suffering of a mere man is human; but the suffering of a God-man is divine. Yet the divine nature is not the sensorium or seat of the suffering in the instance of the God-man, any more than the rational nature is the sensorium or seat of the suffering in the instance of physical suffering in the man. A man’s immaterial soul is not burned when he suffers human agony in martyrdom, and the impassible essence of God was not bruised and wounded when Jesus Christ suffered the divine agony. Hence it is said that Christ “suffered in the flesh,” that is, in his human nature (1 Pet. 4:1).

It has been objected that the sufferings of Christ, not being endless, cannot be of equal value with those of all mankind. But when carefully examined and strictly computed, they will be found to exceed in value and dignity the sufferings for which they were substituted. The suffering of the God-man during a section of time is more exactly and mathematically infinite than would be the suffering of the human race in endless time. The so-called infinitude of human suffering is derived from the length of its duration, not from the dignity of the sufferer. It is the suffering of a finite creature in a duration that is eternal only a parte post.[131] This would not yield strict eternity. The suffering of the whole human race in an endless duration would, consequently, be only relatively infinite. But the vicarious suffering of the God-man obtains its element of infinitude from the person, not from the duration. And this person is absolutely, not relatively infinite. The suffering of an absolutely infinite person in a finite duration is, therefore, a greater suffering in degree and dignity than is the suffering of a multitude of finite persons in an endless but not strictly infinite time. God incarnate is a greater being and a greater sufferer than all mankind collectively; and his cru-cifixion involved a greater guilt upon the part of the perpetrators and a more stupendous sacrifice than would the crucifixion of the entire human family. “If,” inquires Anselm (Why the God-Man? 2.14) of his pupil Boso, “that God-man were here present before you, and (you having a full knowledge of his nature and character) it should be said, Unless you slay that person, the whole world and the whole created universe will perish, would you put him to death in order to preserve the whole creation?” To this question the pupil makes answer, “I would not, even if an infinite number of worlds were spread out before me.”

Another proof that the vicarious work of Christ is of greater value in satisfying the claims of the divine law than would be the endless punishment of the whole human race is the fact that Christ not only suffered the penalty but obeyed the precept of the law. In this case, law and justice get their whole dues. But when lost man only suffers the penalty but does not obey the precept, the law is defrauded of a part of its dues. No law is completely obeyed if only its penalty is endured. The law does not give its subjects an option either to obey or to suffer punishment. It does not say to them, “If you will endure the penalty, you need not keep the precept.” It requires obedience primarily and principally; and then it also requires suffering in case of disobedience. But this suffering does not release from the primary obligation to obey. The law still has its original and indefeasible claim on the transgressor for a sinless obedience, at the very time that it is exacting the penalty of disobedience from him. Consequently, a sinner can never completely and exhaustively satisfy the divine law, however much or long he may suffer, because he cannot at one and the same time endure the penalty and obey the precept. He “owes ten thousand talents and has nothing wherewith to pay” (Matt. 18:24). But Christ did both; and therefore he “magnified the law and made in honorable” (Isa. 42:21) in an infinitely higher degree than the whole human family would have done, had they all personally suffered for their sins (cf. Edwards, Redemption in Works 1.406).

Third, the vicarious sufferings of Christ were not due from him as from a guilty person. He was innocent, and retributive justice had no claims upon him. What he voluntarily suffered could, therefore, inure to the benefit of another than himself. The active obedience of Christ was also a work of supererogation,”[132] as well as his passive obedience.

For although his human nature as such owed obedience, yet it owed only a human and f inite obedience. But the obedience which the mediator actually rendered to the moral law was not that of a mere man, but of a God-man. It was theanthropic obedience, not merely human. As such, it was divine and infinite. It could, therefore, like the passive obedience of an innocent person, inure to the benefit of another and earn for him a title to eternal life and reward. And, last, the God-man, not being a mere creature, but also the Creator and Lord of all things, could rightfully dispose of himself and his agency as he pleased. He asserted this sovereign lordship over himself: “No man takes my life from me, but I lay it down of myself: I have power and authority (exousian)[133] to lay it down, and I have power to take it again” (John 10:18).

The above-mentioned grounds and reasons for the substitution of penalty abundantly demonstrate its harmony with the principles of law and justice; but should they still be disputed, the whole question may be quickly disposed of by asking, Who objects? Objections to any method of administering a government can be urged only by some party whose rights and claims have been disregarded or trampled upon. In the instance of the vicarious atonement of the Son of God, no objection is raised by God the Father, for he officially proposed and planned the method. No objection is raised by God the Son, for he not only consents to be a party in the transaction, but to be the sacrificial victim required by it. And no objection is raised by God the Spirit, for he likewise is a party in the transaction and cooperates in its execution and application. This substitution of penalty is, therefore, a method devised and authorized by the entire Godhead. It is a trinitarian transaction. Nothing is urged against it from this quarter.

And when we pass from the divine being to angels and men and ask for objections from one having real grounds of complaint, there must be of course a dead silence. No angelic or human rights have been interfered with. Objections to the method of vicarious atonement from the world of mankind especially would be not merely unthankful but absurd. That the criminal, who has no claims at all before the law which he has transgressed and under whose eternal condemnation he lies in utter helplessness, that the criminal in whose behalf eternal pity has laid down its own life should object to the method, would deserve not only no reply, but everlasting shame and contempt.

Extent of the Atonement

Having considered the nature and value of Christ's atonement, we are prepared to consider its extent.[134]

Some controversy would have been avoided upon this subject had there always been a distinct understanding as to the meaning of words. We shall therefore first of all consider this point. The term extent has two senses in English usage. It has a passive meaning and is equivalent to value. The "extent" of a man's farm means the number of acres which it contains. The "extent" of a man's resources denotes the amount of property which he owns. In this signification of the word, the "extent" of Christ's atonement would be the intrinsic and real value of it for purposes of judicial satisfaction. In this use of the term, all parties who hold the atonement in any evangelical meaning would concede that the "extent" of the atonement is unlimited. Christ's death is sufficient in value to satisfy eternal justice for the sins of all mankind. If this were the only meaning of "extent," we should not be called upon to discuss it any further. For all that has been said under the head of the nature and value of the atonement would answer the question "what is the extent of the atonement?" Being an infinite atonement, it has an infinite value.

The word also has an active signification. It denotes the act of extending. The “extent” of the atonement, in this sense, means its personal application to individuals by the Holy Spirit. The extent is now the intent. The question “what is the extent of the atonement?” now means: To whom is the atonement effectually extended? The inquiry now is not: What is the value of the atonement? but: To whom does God purpose to apply its benefits?[135]

The active signification is the earlier meaning of the word in English literature. The following are a few out of many instances in which “extent” means extending or putting to use:

> Let my officers of such a nature,
> Make an extent [levy] upon his house and lands.

—Shakespeare, As You Like It 3.1

> Let thy fair wisdom, not thy passion, sway
> In this uncivil and unjust extent [attack] > Against thy peace.

—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night 4. 1

> But both his hands, most filthy feculent,
> Above the water were on high extent [extended],
> And fayned to wash themselves incessantly;
> Yet nothing cleaner were for such intent.

—Spenser, Faery Queen 2.7

> Second him
> In his dishonest practices; but when
> This manor is extended [applied] to my use,
> You’ll speak in an humble way and sue for favor.

—Massinger, New Way to Pay Old Debts 4.1

> The rule of Solon, concerning the territory of Athens is not extendible [applicable] unto all; allowing the distance of six foot > unto common trees, and nine for the fig and olive.

—Browne, Cyrus's Garden 4

The following are examples of the use of the term in the active signification in the older theologians and doctrinal statements:

> The rest of mankind God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extends or withholds mercy as he pleases, to pass by. (Westminster Confession 3.7)
>
> According to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, God extends or withholds favor as he pleases. (Westminster Larger Catechism 13)

In these passages, to "extend" mercy means to effectually apply Christ's redemption, not merely to offer it, because in the latter sense God does not "withhold" mercy from any man. "Is grace impaired in its extent? We affirm it to be extended to everyone that is or was or ever shall be delivered from the pit" (Owen, Against Universal Redemption 4.7). Here, to "extend" grace is to actually save the soul by effectual calling.

In modern English, the term extent is so generally employed in the passive signification of value that the active signification has become virtually obsolete and requires explanation. Writers upon the "extent" of the atonement have sometimes neglected to consider the history of the word, and misunderstanding has arisen between disputants who were really in agreement with each other.

Accordingly, in answering the question as to the "extent" of Christ's atonement, it must first be settled whether "extent" means its intended application or its intrinsic value, whether the active or the passive signification of the word is in the mind of the inquirer. If the word means value, then the atonement is unlimited; if it means applying, then the atonement is limited.

The dispute also turns upon the meaning of the preposition for. One theologian asserts that Christ died “for” all men, and another denies that Christ died “for” all men. There may be a difference between the two that is reconcilable, and there may be an irreconcilable difference. The preposition for denotes an intention of some kind. If, in the case under consideration, the intention is understood to be the purpose on the part of God both to offer and apply the atonement by working faith and repentance in the sinner’s heart, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, then he who affirms that Christ died “for” all men is in error, and he who denies that Christ died “for” all men holds the truth. These two parties are irreconcilable.

But he who asserts that Christ died “for” all men may understand the intention signified by the preposition to be the purpose on the part of God only to offer the atonement, leaving it to the sinner whether it shall be appropriated through faith and repentance. The intention, in this latter case, does not include so much as in the former, and the preposition is narrower in meaning. When the word for is thus defined, the difference between the two parties is reconcilable. The latter means by for “intended for offer or publication”; the former means “intended for application.”

Again, the preposition for is sometimes understood to denote not intention, but value or sufficiency. To say that Christ died “for” all men then means that his death is sufficient to expiate the guilt of all men. Here, again, the difference is possibly reconcilable between the parties. The one who denies that Christ died “for” all men takes “for” in the sense of intention to effectually apply. The other who affirms that Christ died “for” all men takes “for” in the sense of value. As to the question “which is the most proper use of the word for?” it is plain that it more naturally conveys the notion of intention than of sufficiency or value. If it be said to a person, “This money is for you,” he does not understand merely that it is sufficient in value to pay his debt, but that it actually inures to his benefit in paying it. In the scriptural statement that Christ “gave himself a ransom for all” (1 Tim. 2:6), if the word for be made to denote value, so that the text reads, Christ “gave himself a ransom sufficient for all,” a circumlocution is introduced. The preposition for does not express the idea of sufficiency or value directly, but through an explanation; but it expresses the idea of intention immediately and without circumlocution. And this agrees better with the term ransom, which denotes subjective redemption rather than objective satisfaction. This remark applies to such a text as that Christ “tasted death for every man” (Heb. 2:9), which is explained by “many sons” in 2:10. If we interpolate and say that Christ tasted a death that is sufficient for every man, we indeed state a truth, but we inject into the preposition for a larger meaning than accords with the strictly idiomatic use of it.

The distinction between the “sufficiency” of the atonement and its “extent” in the sense of “intent” or effectual application is an old and well-established one. It is concisely expressed in the dictum that Christ died “sufficiently for all, but efficiently only for the elect".[136] The following extracts from Owen (Against Universal Redemption 4.1) illustrate it:

> It was the purpose and intention of God that his Son should offer a sacrifice of infinite worth, value, and dignity, sufficient in itself for the redeeming of all and every man, if it had pleased the Lord to employ it for that purpose; yea, and of other worlds, also, if the Lord should freely make them and would redeem them. Sufficient we say, then, was the sacrifice of Christ for the redemption of the whole world and for the expiation of all the sins of all and every man in the world. This is its own true internal perfection and sufficiency; that it should be applied unto any, made a price for them, and become beneficial to them, according to the worth that is in it, is external to it, does not arise from it, but merely depends upon the intention and will of God. It was in itself of infinite value and sufficiency to have been made a price to have bought and purchased all and every man in the world. That it did formally become a price for any is solely to be ascribed to the purpose of God intending their purchase and redemption by it. The intention of the offerer and acceptor [of the sacrifice] that it should be for such, some, or any is that which gives the formality of a price unto it; this is external [to the sacrifice]. But the value and fitness of it to be made a price arises from its own internal sufficiency.

In respect to the phrase ransom price for all (1 Tim. 2:6), Owen remarks that it must be understood to mean that Christ’s blood was sufficient to be made a ransom for all, to be made a price for all; but that the terms ransom and ransom price more properly denote the application than the value of Christ's sacrifice. He adds that "the expression to die for any person holds out the intention of our Savior in the laying down of the price, to be their Redeemer."

Atonement must be distinguished from redemption. The latter term includes the application of the atonement. It is the term redemption, not atonement, that is found in those statements that speak of the work of Christ as limited by the decree of election. In Westminster Confession 8.8 it is said that "to all those for whom Christ has purchased redemption, he does certainly and effectually apply and communicate the same." In 8.5 it is stated that "the Lord Jesus has purchased not only reconcil- iation, but an everlasting inheritance in the kingdom of heaven, for all those whom the Father has given unto him." Since redemption includes reconciliation with God and inheritance in the kingdom of heaven, it implies something subjective in the soul: an appropriation by faith of the benefits of Christ's objective work of atonement. Reconciliation and inheritance of heaven are elements and parts of redemption and are limited to those who have believed; and those who have believed are those who have been called and chosen: "Faith is the gift of God" (Eph. 2:9); "you believed, even as the Lord gave to every man" (1 Cor. 3:5); "as many as were ordained to eternal life believed" (Acts 3:48). Accordingly the Scriptures limit redemption, as contradistinguished from atonement, to the church. Christ "makes reconciliation for the sins of his people" (Heb. 2:17). His work is called "the redemption of the purchased possession" (Eph. 1:14). He is "the mediator of the New Testament, that by means of his death they which are called might receive an eternal inheritance" (Heb. 9:15). He "has visited and redeemed his people" (Luke 1:68). David, addressing Jehovah, says, "Remember your congregation which you have purchased of old, the rod of your inheritance which you have redeemed" (Ps. 74:2). The elders of Ephesus are commanded to "feed the church of God which he has purchased with his own blood" (Acts 20:28). "He sent redemption unto his people" (Ps. 3:9). "O Israel, fear not; for I have redeemed you" (Isa. 43:1). "He shall save his people from their sins" (Matt. 1:21). Christ is "the Savior of his body the church" (Eph. 5:23). "He said, surely they are my people: so he was their Savior" (Isa. 63:8). "I will save my people from the east country and from the west country" (Zech. 8:7). See the Old Testament passages in which Jehovah is called the Savior of Israel and the New Testament passages in which God is called "our Savior," that is, of the church.

Since redemption implies the application of Christ's atonement, universal or unlimited redemption cannot logically be affirmed by any who hold that faith is wholly the gift of God and that saving grace is bestowed solely by election. The use of the term redemption, consequently, is attended with less ambiguity than that of "atonement," and it is the term most commonly employed in controversial theology.[137] Atonement is unlimited, and redemption is limited. This statement includes all the scriptural texts: those which assert that Christ died for all men, and those which assert that he died for his people. He who asserts unlimited atonement and limited redemption cannot well be misconceived. He is understood to hold that the sacrifice of Christ is unlimited in its value, sufficiency, and publication, but limited in its effectual application. But he who asserts unlimited atonement and denies limited redemption might be understood to hold either of three views: (1) The doctrine of the uni-versalist that Christ's atonement, per se, saves all mankind; (2) the doctrine of the Arminian that personal faith in Christ's atonement is necessary to salvation, but that faith depends partly upon the operation of the Holy Spirit and partly upon the decision of the sinful will; or (3) the doctrine of the school of Saumur (hypothetic universalism) that personal faith in Christ's atonement in the first arrangement of God depended in part upon the decision of the sinful will, but since this failed, by a second arrangement it now depends wholly upon the work of the Spirit, according to the purpose of election. (See supplement 6.2.9.)

The tenet of limited redemption rests upon the tenet of election, and the tenet of election rests upon the tenet of the sinner's bondage and inability. Soteriology here runs back to theology, and theology runs back to anthropology. Everything in the series finally recurs to the state and condition of fallen man. The answer to the question "how is the atonement of Christ savingly appropriated?" depends upon the answer to the question "how much efficient power is there in the sinful will to savingly trust in it?" If the answer be that there is efficient power, either wholly or in part, in the sinful will itself to believe, then faith is either wholly or in part from the sinner himself and is not wholly the gift of God (which is contrary to Eph. 2:8) and justification does not depend wholly upon electing grace (which is contrary to 1 Pet. 1:2) and redemption is not limited. But if the answer be that there is not efficient power in the sinful will itself, either wholly or in part, to savingly believe, then faith is wholly the gift of God, is wholly dependent upon his electing grace, and redemption is limited by election, as is taught in 1 Cor. 3:5: "Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, by whom you believed, even as the Lord gave to every man"; and in Rom. 9:16: "It is not of him that wills nor of him that runs, but of God that shows mercy." (See supplement 6.2.10.)

The difference between the Calvinist and the Arminian appears at this point. Both are evangelical in affirming that salvation is solely by faith in Christ's atoning blood. This differentiates them from the legal Socinian, who denies the doctrine of vicarious atonement and founds salvation from condemnation on personal character and good works. But they differ regarding the origin of faith. The Calvinist maintains that faith is wholly from God, being one of the effects of regeneration; the Arminian, that it is partly from God and partly from man. The Calvinist asserts that a sinner is unconditionally elected to the act of faith and that the Holy Spirit in regeneration inclines and enables him to the act, without cooperation and assistance from him. The Arminian asserts that a sinner is conditionally elected to the act of faith and that the Holy Spirit works faith in him with some assistance and cooperation from him. This cooperation consists in ceasing to resist and yielding to the operation of the Spirit. In this case, the Holy Spirit does not overcome a totally averse and resisting will, which is the Calvinistic view, but he influences a partially inclining will.

The Calvinist contends that unconditional election and total inability agree best with the scriptural representations and that the Arminian really adopts them when he sings with Charles Wesley:

> Other refuge have I none,
> Hangs my helpless soul on thee.

Conditional election is inconsistent with the biblical texts which describe God as independent and sovereign in bestowing faith and salvation. It is no sufficient reply to say that plenary ability to appropriate the atonement of Christ is not attributed to the fallen soul, but only a partial ability, that it is not contended that sinful man can exercise faith in the atonement without any aid at all from God, but only that he can and must contribute a certain degree of voluntary power which if united with that of God the Spirit will produce faith and that the exercise of this is the condition of election. This position of partial ability or synergism comes to the same result with that of plenary ability, so far as divine independence and sovereignty are concerned. For it is this decision of the sinner to contribute his quota, to "do his part" in the transaction, which conditions the result. It is indeed true, upon this theory, that if God does not assist the act of faith is impossible; but it is equally true, that if the sinner does not assist the act of faith is impossible. Neither party alone and by himself can originate faith in Christ's atonement. God is as dependent in this respect as man. In this case, therefore, it cannot be said that faith depends wholly upon the divine purpose or that redemption is regulated and limited by election.

The middle theory of partial ability and conditional election is found in the Greek anthropology and the Semipelagian fathers generally and is opposed by Calvin (3.24.1) as follows:

> The proposition of Paul, "It is not of him that wills nor of him that runs, but of God that shows mercy," is not to be understood in the sense of those who divide saving power between the grace of God and the will and exertion of man; who indeed say that human desires and endeavors have no efficacy of themselves unless they are rendered successful by the grace of God, but also maintain that with the assistance of his blessing these things have their share in procuring salvation. To refute their views, I prefer Augustine's words to my own: "If the apostle only meant that it is not of him that wills or of him that runs, without the assistance of the merciful Lord, we may retort the converse proposition, that it is not of [God's] mercy alone without the assistance of [man's] willing and running. But it is certain that the apostle ascribes everything to the Lord's mercy and leaves nothing to our wills or exertions."

Again (3.24.13), Calvin marks the difference between Augustine and Chrysostom in the following terms:

> Let us not hesitate to say with Augustine that God could convert to good the will of [all] the wicked, because he is omnipotent. Why then does he not? Because he would not. Why he would not remains with himself. For we ought not to aim at more wisdom than becomes us. That would be much belter than adopting the evasion of Chrysostom "that God draws those who are willing and who stretch out their hands for his aid," so that the difference may not appear to consist in the decree of God, but in the will of man.

Luther took the same ground with Calvin:

> Some allege that the Holy Spirit works not in those that resist him, but only in such as are willing and give consent thereto, whence it follows that free will is a cause and helper of faith and that consequently the Holy Spirit does not alone work through the word, but that our will does something therein. But I say it is not so; the will of man works nothing at all in his conversion and justification; non est efficiens causa justificationis sed mate-rialis tantuin.[138] It is the matter on which the Holy Spirit works (as a pot-ter makes a pot out of clay), equally in those that resist and are averse, as in St. Paul. But after the Holy Spirit has wrought in the wills of such resis-tants, then he also manages that the will be consenting thereunto. (Table Talk: Of Free Will)[139]

In saying that Christ's atonement is limited in its application and that redemption is particular not universal, it is meant that the number of persons to whom it is effectually applied is a fixed and definite number. The notion of definiteness, not of smallness, is intended. In common speech, if anything is "limited," it is little and insignificant in amount. This is not the idea when the redemptive work of Christ is denominated a "limited" work. The circle of election and redemption must indeed be a circumference, but not necessarily a small one. No man is redeemed outside of the circle. All the sheep must be within the fold. But the circle is that of the heavens, not of the earth. The fold is that of the Great Shepherd, not that of an undershepherd. The biblical representation is to this effect: “Yours is the kingdom and the power and the glory” (Matt. 6:13); “Christ must reign till he has put all enemies under his feet” (1 Cor. 15:25); “the Lord has prepared his throne in the heavens and his kingdom rules overall” (Ps. 103:21); “the tabernacle of God is with men, and they shall be his people” (Rev. 21:3); “the angel having the everlasting gospel to preach to every nation, kindred, and tongue” (14:6); “the voice of a great multitude and as the voice of many waters” (19:6); the new Jerusalem “lies foursquare, and the length is as large as the breadth” (21:16); “where sin abounded, grace did much more abound” (Rom. 5:20); “the chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands upon thousands” (Ps. 68:17).

Although Christ’s atonement, in the discussion of its value and sufficiency, can be separated from the intention to apply it, yet in the divine mind and decree the two things are inseparable. The atonement and its application are parts of one covenant of redemption between the Father and Son. The sacrifice of Christ is offered with the intention that it shall actually be successful in saving human souls from death. It is not rational to suppose that God the Father merely determined that God the Son should die for the sin of the world, leaving it wholly or in part to the sinful world to determine all the result of this stupendous transaction, leaving it wholly or in part to the sinful world to decide how many or how few this death should actually save. Neither is it rational to suppose that the Son of God would lay down his life upon such a peradventure; for it might be that not a single human soul would trust in his sacrifice, and in this case he would have died in vain. On the contrary, it is most rational to suppose that in the covenant between the Father and Son, the making of an atonement was inseparably connected with the purpose to apply it: the purpose, namely, to accompany the atoning work of the Son with the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit. The divine Father in giving the divine Son as a sacrifice for sin simultaneously determined that this sacrifice should be appropriated through faith by a definite number of the human family, so that it might be said that Christ died for this number with the distinct intention that they should be personally saved by this death.

This is taught in Scripture: “The good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep” (John 10:15); “greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends” (15:13); “being high priest that year he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation; and not for that nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad” (11:51-52); “Christ loved the church and gave himself for it” (Eph. 5:25). The annunciation to Joseph respecting the miraculous conception described the Savior as one who “should save his people from their sins” (Matt. 1:21). Furthermore, in accordance with this fact of an intention to apply the atonement at the time when the atonement is provided, we find that believers are said to have been “chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world” (Eph. 1:4); that they have been given to Christ by the Father (John 10:29); that Christ knows them as so given (10:27); that he claims them as his sheep before they have actually believed and even before they have been born, saying, “Other sheep I have which are not of this fold, them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one flock (poimng)[140] and one shepherd” (10:16). And when Paul was at Corinth, Christ encouraged his apostle to continue his labors, notwithstanding that little success had thus far attended them, by saying, “I have much people in this city” (Acts 18:9).

That the atonement in the mind of God was inseparable from his purpose to apply it to individuals is proved by the following:

> 1. The fact that atonement in and by itself, separate from faith, saves no soul. Christ might have died precisely as he did, but if no one believed in him he would have died in vain. Hence it is said that “God has set forth Christ to be a propitiation through faith in his blood” (Rom. 3:25). It is only when the death of Christ has been actually confided in as an atonement that it is completely “set forth” as God’s propitiation for sin. In like manner, Christ is said to have been “delivered for our offenses and raised again for our justification” (4:25). If Christ had not risen from the dead, he could not have been believed in. A dead and buried Christ could not have been an object of personal trust and confidence. Consequently, although it was the suffering and death of Christ, and not his resurrection and exaltation, that properly constitutes the atoning sacrifice, yet this sacrifice in itself and apart from its vital appropriation is useless. In order therefore to man's justification, Christ must not only be delivered to death for offenses, but raised again from death so that he might be an object of faith. Says Owen (Justification, 9):

It cannot be said that Christ's satisfaction was made in such a way as to render it uncertain whether it should save or not. Such an arrangement might be just in pecuniary payments. A man may lay down a sum of money for the discharge of another, on such a condition as may never be fulfilled. For on the failure of the condition, his money may and ought to be returned to him; whereupon, he has received no injury or damage. But in penal suffering for crime and sin, there can be no righteous arrangement that shall make the event and efficacy of it to depend on a condition absolutely uncertain, and which may not be fulfilled. For if the condition fail, no recompense can be made to him that has suffered. Wherefore the application of the satisfaction of Christ unto them for whom it was made is sure and steadfast in the purpose of God.

2. If in the mind of God the death of Christ was separate from the intention to apply it, then it would be as true that Christ died for lost angels as for lost men; because his atonement, being infinite, is sufficient in value to atone for their sin as well as that of mankind. When it is said that Christ died for the sin of the world, it is implied that he did not die for any sin but that of man. The offer of Christ's atonement is confined to the human race and not made to the angelic world. Now as the divine intention accompanies the providing of an atonement in respect to the difference between angels and men, so it accompanies the application of the atonement in respect to the difference between elect and nonelect men. As the atonement of Christ is not intended to be offered to the angels though it is sufficient for them, so it is not intended to be applied to nonelect men though it is sufficient for them.

3. If in the mind of God the purpose that Christ should die had not been accompanied with the purpose that his death should be effective for individuals, the former purpose would have been an unproductive and useless one. It would have accomplished nothing, because of man's unbelief and rejection of the gospel offer. But no purpose of God is unproductive and useless.

4. The analogy of the typical atonement under the Mosaic economy shows that Christ's atonement is intended for application only to believers. The lamb offered by the officiating priest was offered for the particular person who brought it to the priest to be offered. Each man had his own lamb, and there was no lamb that belonged to no one in particular but to everyone indiscriminately.

5. The atoning work of Christ in its intended application is no wider than his intercessory work. He pleads the merit of his death for those to whom the Father purposed to impute it and only for those: "I pray not for the world, but for them which you have given me" (John 17:9). This was Christ's intercessory prayer. He here teaches that he does not discharge the particular office of intercessor for the nonelect (the "world") as distinguished from those whom the Father had given him. It is logical therefore to conclude that he does not discharge the particular office of priest for them.

There are biblical passages which are cited to teach unlimited redemption: Christ "tasted death for every man" (Heb. 2:9); Christ is the "propitiation not for our sins only, but for the sins of the whole world" (1 John 2:2); Christ "gave himself a ransom for all" (1 Tim. 2:6); the lamb of God "takes away the sins of the world" (John 1:29); "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son" (3:16-17). Respecting this class of passages, the following particulars are to be noticed.

First, Scripture must be explained in harmony with Scripture. Texts that speak of the universal reference of Christ's death must, therefore, be interpreted in such a way as not to exclude its special reference: "God is the Savior of all men, specially of those that believe" (1 Tim. 4:10); Christ “makes reconciliation for the sins of his people” (Heb. 2:17); “Christ is the Savior of his body, the church” (Eph. 5:23); Christ “has visited and redeemed his people” (Luke 1:68); Christ “gives his life a ransom for many” (Matt. 20:28); “Jesus shall save his people from their sins” (1:21; cf. Ps. 74:2; 111:9; Isa. 63:8; Matt. 26:28; Heb. 9:28).

Second, the word world in Scripture frequently denotes a part of the world viewed as a collective whole and having a distinctive character, as we speak of the scientific or the religious world:

> 1. Sometimes it is the world of believers, the church. Examples of this use are “the bread of God is he which gives life to the world [of believers]” (John 6:33, 51); Abraham is “the heir of the world [the redeemed]” (Rom. 4:13); “if the fall of them be the riches of the world” (11:12); “if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world” (11:15). In these texts, “church” could be substituted for “world.”
>
> 2. Sometimes the word world denotes the contrary of the church: “Men of the world” (Ps. 7:14); “the world knew him not” (John 1:10); “the world cannot hate you, but me it hates” (7:7); “I pray not for the world” (14:17, 22, 27; 15:18-19; 16:20, 33; 17:9, 14, 16, 25; 1 Cor. 2:12; 1 John 2:15-17; 3:1; 4:5; 5:4).
>
> 3. Sometimes the term world means all mankind, in distinction from the Jews: “This gospel shall be preached in the whole world” (Matt. 26:13); “the field is the world” (13:38); “God so loved the world” (John 3:16); “by wisdom the world knew not God” (1 Cor. 1:21); “reconciled the world unto himself (2 Cor. 5:19); “propitiation for the sins of the whole world” (1 John 2:2). These texts teach that redemption is intended for all races, classes, and ages of men.

Similarly the word all sometimes has a restricted signification, denoting all of a particular class: “As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive” (1 Cor. 15:22). The “all” in Adam is a larger aggregate than the “all” in Christ, because Scripture teaches that all men without exception are children of Adam and that not all without exception are believers in Christ:

“If one died for all, than all died [with that one]” (2 Cor. 5:14). The “all” here denotes the body of believers, because it is described as “the living” (hoi zontes;[141] v. 15). “As the judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so the free gift came upon all men unto justification” (Rom. 5:18). The “all” in one instance is described (v. 17) as “receiving abundance of grace,” but not in the other.[142]

In 1 Cor. 8:11 the phrase shall the weak brother perish for whom Christ died? (and also Heb. 6:4-10; 10:26-30) is a supposition for the sake of argument of something that does not and cannot happen (like 1 Cor. 13:1-3; Gal. 1:8). The influence and natural tendency of the conduct spoken of is to spiritual death. It is not said that the actual result will be the death of the “weak brother.” On the contrary, it is said that “God shall hold him up” (Rom. 14:4). In 2 Pet. 2:1 (“denying the Lord that bought them”), the “false teachers” are described according to their own profession, not as they are in the eye of God. They claim to have been bought by the blood of Christ, and yet by their damnable heresies nullify the atonement. Turretin explains the “purchase” in this case, as redemption from the errors of paganism. See verse 20: “Escaped the pollutions of the world.” Only the outward call is meant. Turretin defends this by the use in the passage of despote[143] instead of sotera’[144] and of agorazein[145] instead of lytrousthai.[146] In 2 Pet. 3:9 (“the Lord is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance”), the will is that of decree, and the reference is to believers only. The Greek shows this: me boulomenos tinas apolesthai[147] —”not purposing that any [of us] should perish.” The preceding clause, “long-suffering toward us (eis he’mas),”[148] shows that tinas[149] refers to God’s children. The true rendering of eis metanoian chdre’sai[150] is “should go on to repentance”— metanoian[151] here denoting the process of sanctification or renewing (Eph. 4:23), and choresai[152] a progressive motion or advance (as in Matt. 15:17; 19:12). The passage “what could have been done more unto my vineyard?” (Isa. 5:4) does not teach that God could not realize his desire that all men should “turn and live.” It is not the idea of power, but of patience and long-suffering, that is contained in this text. Calvin and Gesenius explain: “What more was there to be done, or was I bound to do?” (Alexander in loco).

Universal Offer of the Atonement

The question arises: If the atonement of Christ is not intended to be universally applied, why should it be universally offered?

The gospel offer is to be made to every man because . . .

1. It is the divine command (Matt. 16:5). God has forbidden his ministers to except any man in the offer.

2. No offer of the atonement is possible but a universal offer. In order to be offered at all, Christ's sacrifice must be offered indiscriminately. A limited offer of the atonement to the elect only would require a revelation from God informing the preacher who they are. As there is no such revelation and the herald is in ignorance on this point, he cannot offer the gospel to some and refuse it to others. In this state of things there is no alternative but to preach Christ to everybody or to nobody.

3. The atonement is sufficient in value to expiate the sin of all men indiscriminately; and this fact should be stated because it is a fact. There are no claims of justice not yet satisfied; there is no sin of man for which an infinite atonement has not been provided: "All things are now ready." Therefore the call to "come" is universal. It is plain that the offer of the atonement should be regulated by its intrinsic nature and sufficiency, not by the obstacles that prevent its efficacy. The extent to which a medicine is offered is not limited by the number of persons favorably disposed to buy it and use it. Its adaptation to disease is the sole consideration in selling it, and consequently it is offered to everybody.

4. God opposes no obstacle to the efficacy of the atonement in the instance of the nonelect. (a) He exerts no direct efficiency to prevent the nonelect from trusting in the atonement. The decree of reprobation is permissive. God leaves the nonelect to do as he likes, (b) There is no compulsion from the external circumstances in which the providence of God has placed the nonelect. On the contrary, the outward circumstances, especially in Christendom, favor instead of hindering trust in Christ's atonement. And so, in a less degree, do the outward circumstances in heathendom: "The goodness, forbearance, and long-suffering of God [tend to] lead to repentance" (Rom. 2:4; Acts 14:17; 17:26-30). (c) The special grace which God bestows upon the elect does not prevent the non-elect from believing; neither does it render faith any more difficult for him. The nonelect receives common grace, and common grace would incline the human will if it were not defeated by the human will. If the sinner should make no hostile opposition, common grace would be equivalent to saving grace:[153] "You stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, you do always resist the Holy Spirit" (Acts 7:51); "as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also withstand the truth" (2 Tim. 3:8). See Howe's remarks on common grace (Oracles 2.2.5).

5. The atonement of Christ is to be offered indiscriminately because God desires that every man would believe in it. "God," says Turretin (4.17.33), "delights in the conversion and eternal life of the sinner, as a thing pleasing in itself and congruous with his infinitely compassionate nature, and therefore demands from man as a duty due from him (tauquam officium debitum) to turn if he would live." Substitute in this passage "faith and repentance" for "conversion and eternal life," and it is equally true. It is the divine delight in faith and repentance and the divine desire for its exercise that warrants the offer of the benefits of Christ's atonement to the nonelect. Plainly, the offer of the atonement ought to be regulated by divine desire and not by the aversion of the nonelect. God in offering his own atonement should be guided by his own feeling and not by that of sinful man. Because the nonelect does not take delight in faith and repentance is surely no reason why God, who does take delight in it, should be debarred from saying to him, "Turn, turn, for why will you die?" May not God express his sincere feeling and desire to any except those who are in sympathy with him and have the same species of feeling? If a man has a kind and compassionate nature, it is unreasonable to require that he suppress its promptings in case he sees a proud and surly person who is unwilling to accept a gift. The benevolent nature is unlimited in its desire. It wishes well-being to everybody, and hence its offers are universal. They may be made to a churlish and ill-natured man and be rejected, but they are good and kind offers nevertheless, and they are nonetheless sincere, though they accomplish nothing. (See supplement 6.2.11.)

The universal offer of the benefits of Christ's atonement springs out of God's will of complacency: "I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his evil way and live" (Ezek. 33:11). God may properly call upon the nonelect to do a thing that God delights in, simply because he does delight in it. Divine desire is not altered by the divine decree of pretention. Though God decides not to overcome by special grace the obstinate aversion which resists common grace, yet his delight in faith and repentance remains the same. His desire for the sinner's faith and repentance is not diminished in the least by the resistance which it meets from the nonelect nor by the fact that for reasons sufficient he does not decide to overcome this resistance.

6. It is the nonelect himself, not God, who prevents the efficacy of the atonement. For the real reason of the inefficacy of Christ's blood is impenitence and unbelief. Consequently, the author of impenitence and unbelief is the author of limited redemption. God is not the cause of a sinner's impenitence and unbelief, merely because he does not overcome his impenitence and unbelief. If a man flings himself into the water and drowns, a spectator upon the bank cannot be called the cause of that man's death. Nonprevention is not causation. The efficient and responsible cause of the suicide is the suicide's free will. In like manner, the nonelect himself, by his impenitence and unbelief, is the responsible cause of the inefficacy of Christ's expiation. God is blameless in respect to the limitation of redemption; man is guilty in respect to it.[154] God is only the indirect and occasional cause of it; man is the immediate and efficient cause of it. This being the state of the case, there is nothing self-contradictory in the universal offer of the atonement upon the part of God. If any of the following suppositions were true, it would be fatal to the universal offer: (a) If at the time of offering Christ's atonement God was actively preventing the nonelect from believing, the offer would be inconsistent, (b) If at the time of offering it God were working upon the will of the nonelect to strengthen his aversion to the atonement, the offer would be inconsistent, (c) If God were the efficient author of that apostasy and sinfulness which enslaves the human will and renders it unable to believe in Christ without special grace, then the offer of the atonement unaccompanied with the offer of special grace would be inconsistent. But none of these suppositions are true.

7. The offer of the atonement is universal because, when God calls upon men universally to believe, he does not call upon them to believe that they are elected or that Christ died for them in particular. He calls upon them to believe that Christ died for sin, for sinners, for the world; that there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby they must be saved; that the blood of Christ cleanses from all sin; and that there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. The atonement is not offered to an individual either as an elect man or as a nonelect man; but as a man and a sinner, simply. Men are commanded to believe in the sufficiency of the atonement, not in its predestinated application to themselves as individuals. The belief that Christ died for the individual himself is the assurance of faith and is more than saving faith. It is the end, not the beginning of the process of salvation. God does not demand assurance of faith as the first act of faith: "Assurance of grace and salvation not being of the essence of faith, true believers may wait long before they obtain it" (Westminster Larger Catechism 81); "in whom, after you believed, you were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise" (Eph. 1:13).[155]

8. The atonement is to be offered to all because th e preacher is to hope and expec t from God th e best and not the worst for every man.[156] He is consequently to expect the election of his hearer, rather than his reprobation. The fact of the external call favors election, not reprobati on. The external ca ll embraces th e following particul ars: (a) hearing th e word, (b) re ligious educa tion by parents and friends , a nd (c) commo n grace, exper ienced in conviction of sin, fear of death and judgment, general anxiety, and dissat isfacti on with thi s life. Upo n suc h grounds as these, the individual is to be encouraged to believe th at God 's purpose is to elect him rather than to reprobat e him. If a person fears that he is of the nonelect , he sho uld be assured rather that he is mistaken in this fear than th at he is co rrect in it; because God has don e more for him th at tends to his sa lva tion than to his perdition.

9. The atonement is to be offere d to a ll men because even those who shall prove in th e day of judgment to be nonelect do yet receive ben efits a nd blessings from it. Turretin (16.14.11) mention s th e following ben efit s: (a) th e preaching of the gos pel, whereby paganism with its idolatry, supers tition, and wretch edness is abolished; (b) th e extremes of human dep ravity are restrained ; (c) many tem poral blessings a nd gifts of pro viden ce are bestowed (Rom. 2:4; Acts 14:17); (d) punishment is postponed a nd delayed (Acts 17:30; Rom. 3:25). Says Bat es (Eternal Judgment , 2):

The grace of the Redeemer is so far universal that upon his account the indulgent providence of God invited the heathen to repentance. His renewed benefits that sweetened their lives (Rom. 2:4) and his powerful patience in forbearing so long to cut them off, when their impurities were so provoking, was a testimony of his inclination to clemency upon their reformation (Acts 14:17). And for their abusing his favors and resisting the methods of his goodness, they will be inexcusable to themselves, and their condemnation righteous to their own conscience. (See supplement 6.2.12.)

The reasons for the universal offer of the atonement, thus far, have had reference to God's relation to the offer. They go to show that the act upon his part is neither self-contradictory nor insincere. But there is another class of reasons that have reference to man's relation to the offer. And these we now proceed to mention:

1. The atonement is to be offered to every man because it is the duty of every man to trust in it. The atonement is in this particular like the Decalogue. The moral law is to be preached to every man because it is every man's duty to obey it. The question whether every man will obey it has nothing to do with the universal proclamation of the law. It is a fact that the law will have been preached in vain to many persons, but this is no reason why it should not have been preached to them. They were under obligation to obey it, and this justified its proclamation to them. Still more than this, the moral law should be preached to every man even though no man is able to keep it perfectly in his own strength. The slavery of the human will to sin is no reason why the primary and original duty which the human will owes to God should not be stated and enjoined, because this slavery has been produced by man, not by God. In like manner faith in Christ's atonement should be required as a duty from every man, notwithstanding the fact that "no man can come unto Christ except the Father draw him" (John 6:44); that "faith is not of ourselves, but is the gift of God" (Eph. 2:8); and that Christ is "the author and finisher of faith" (Heb. 12:2). Man's inability without the grace of God to penitently trust in Christ's atonement, being self-caused like his inability to perfectly keep the moral law without the same grace, still leaves his duty in the case binding upon him. The purpose of God to bestow grace is not the measure of man's duty. Neither is the power that man has as fallen the measure of man's duty. Only the power that man had as unfallen and by creation is the measure of it.

2. The offer of Christ's atonement for sin should be universal because it is the most impressive mode of preaching the law. In exhibiting the nature of Christ's sacrifice and its sufficiency to atone for all sin, and especially in showing the necessity of it in order to the remission of any sin whatever, the spirituality and extent of the divine law are presented more powerfully than they can be in any other manner. The offer of the atonement is consequently a direct means of producing a sense of guilt and condemnation, without which faith in Christ is impossible.

3. The offer of the atonement to an unbeliever is adapted to disclose the aversion and obstinacy of his own will. This method of forgiving sin displeases him. It is humbling. If he were invited to make a personal atonement, this would fall in with his inclination. But to do no atoning work at all and simply to trust in the atoning work of another is the most unwelcome act that human pride can be summoned to perform. Belief in vicarious atonement is distasteful and repulsive to the natural man because he is a proud man. When, therefore, a man is informed that there is no forgiveness of sin but through Christ’s atonement, that this atonement is ample for the forgiveness of every man, and that nothing but unbelief will prevent any man’s forgiveness, his attention is immediately directed to his own disinclination to trust in this atonement and aversion to this method of forgiveness. But this experience is highly useful. It causes him to know his helplessness, even in respect to so fundamental an act as faith. The consequence is that he betakes himself to God in prayer that he may be inclined and enabled to believe (Westminster Larger Catechism 59, 67).

SUPPLEMENTS

6.2.1 (see p. 693). The attempt is sometimes made to illustrate vicarious suHering in grace by what is denominated "vicarious suffering in nature: But the analogy is defective. The two things are diferent in kind, not merely in degree. A mother's suHering for her child is not substitutionary and has no reference to retributive justice . The following points of diHerence are evidence : vicarious ness in nature (a) is not expiatory, that is , satisfactory of law; (b) does not release another from the obligation to suHer penalty ; (c) is sharing suHering with another (the mother suHers with her 754 child;

there are two suHerers); and (d) is helping another to bear suHering (the mother assists her child to endure). Vicariousness in grace (a) is expiatory. that is, satisfactory of law; (b) releases anothe r from the obligation to penal suHering ; (c) does not share suHering with another , but endures the whole of it (Christ does not suHer together with the sinner , but "treads the winepress alone "); and (d) does not assist the sinner to bear suHering, but suHers in his place. When Christians "bear one anothe r's burdens, such "vicariousness" as this does not release one of them from bearing burdens It is community and help in enduring a common burden. Neither is suffering because of another—as when poverty and disease are inherited by children from their parents—the same as suffering for another—that is, in his stead for judicial purposes.

6.2.2 (see p. 697). Calvin teaches that forgiveness is the noninfliction of penalty upon the transgressor. He says (3.4 30): “What would Christ have done for us if punishment for sins were still inflicted upon us? For when we say that he bore all our sins in his own body on the tree, we intend only that he sustained the punishment which was due to our sins. This is more significantly expressed by Isaiah, when he says that the ‘chastisement or correction of our peace was upon him.’ Now what is the correction (correctio) of our peace but the punishment due to sins and which we must have suffered before we could be reconciled to God, if he had not become our substitute? Thus we see clearly that Christ bore the punishment of sin that he might deliver his people from it The passages cited above expressly signify that God receives us into favor on this condition, that in forgiving our guilt he remits all the punishment that we had deserved. And whenever David or the other prophets implore the pardon of their sins, they at the same time deprecate the punishment, and to this they are impelled by an apprehension of divine judgment. Again, when they promise mercy from the Lord, they almost always professedly speak of punishments and the remission of them.”

To the same effect Leighton (Lord’s Prayer) remarks: “Sin as it is called a debt is taken for the guiltiness of sin. which is to owe the suffering of punishment or an obligement to the curse which the law has pronounced against sin: and because this results immediately from sin, therefore sin is often put for the engagement to punishment; so the apostle’s phrase (1 Cor.

15:56) may be taken. So, then, the debt of sin being the tie to punishment which follows upon it, the forgiving of sin can be no other than the acquitting of a man from that curse, setting him free from his debt or his engagement to suffer."

To a superficial glance the position that forgiveness of sin is the remission to the sinner of its penalty by means of its infliction upon Christ as the sinner's substitute seems to favor selfishness and a mechanical view of pardon. The person, it is objected, merely desires deliverance from judicial suffering, and when a vicarious satisfaction of justice is offered to him, he coldly accepts it without any real sorrow for his transgression. It is only a mercantile transaction, like that of the exchange and market generally, with no spiritual affection and gratitude toward God the suffering Redeemer. But this objection supposes that the sinner has no true conception of sin as related to law and justice and no personal interest in the vindication of their claims by penal satisfaction For if he perceived that the inmost quality of sin is its guilt or desert of penalty, his sorrow over its commission would manifest itself in the desire that it might be punished and in a willingness to undergo the punishment personally, if this would meet the case. The penalty of sin is the righteous retribution of infinite holiness. This is a spiritual evil, and in praying for its remission or release from obligation to endure it, because it has been endured for him by his divine substitute, the penitent sinner has first of all in view the character of God and the nature of justice, and not his own self-interest as shown in a mere wish to escape pain. If he recognizes first of all the punitive demands of righteousness and holiness and is so desirous that they should be satisfied that he would willing meet them by his own suffering, if this were possible, this is the highest proof of the sincerity of his sorrow over his disobedience. When the sinner, in the scriptural phrase, "accepts the punishment of his iniquity" (Lev. 26:41). he acknowledges its desert of penalty, and then pardon is for him both "the merciful and the just" (Rom. 3:26: 1 John 1:19) release of penalty by means of the vicarious endurance of it by his incarnate and suffering Savior. This objection to the Old Testament idea of pardon arises from adopting different ideas of sin and |ustice from those of the Old Testament. If sin is not guilt or obligation to punishment and if the satisfaction of justice is not inexorably necessary, then mercy is not the vicarious endurance of punishment for the sinner and pardon is not the remission of penalty.

This subject has obtained from Pearson as clear and concise a statement as can be found in theological literature. It is given in his exposition of article 10 of the Apostles' Creed. Well would it have been if all parties and classes in the English church had adopted respecting the guilt of sin and its remission by means of Christ's vicarious satisfaction for it the explanation of the Bishop of Chester, of whom Burnet {History of His Own Times) remarks that "he was in all respects the greatest divine of his age: a man of great learning, strong reason, and of a clear judgment His book on the creed is among the best that our church has produced." His explanation is as follows: "The second particular to be considered is the obligation of sin, which must be presupposed to the solution or remission of it. Now every sin does cause a guilt, and every sinner, by being such, becomes a guilty person; which guilt consists in a debt or obligation to suffer a punishment proportionable to the iniquity of the sin. This obligation to suffer penalty for sin is distinct from the commission of sin. The commission of sin ceases with the act, but the obligation to suffer for it never ceases He who but once committed adultery, at that one time sins and at no time after can be said to commit that particular sin; but the guilt or obligation to suffer punishment for it remains on him still, and he may be said forever to be guilty of adultery, because he is forever liable to the wrath of God and obligated to suffer the punishment due to adultery. This obligation to punishment, which remains after the act of sin, is that reatus peccati of which the schools, and before them the fathers, spoke The nature of this reatus is excellently declared by St. Augustine, when delivering the distinction between actual and original sin: In the case of those persons who are born again in Christ, when they receive an entire remission of all their sins, it is necessary, of course, that the guilt [obligation to punishment] also of the still indwelling concupiscence should be remitted, in order that it should not be imputed to them for sin. For even as in the case of those actual sins which cannot be themselves permanent, since they pass away as soon as they are committed, the guilt or obligation to suffer penalty yet is permanent and if not remitted will remain forevermore; so when concupiscence [original sin] is remitted, the guilt or obligation to suffer penalty is also taken away. For not to have sin means this, namely, not to be deemed guilty of sin. that is. bound to suffer punishment for it' (Augustine. On Marriage 1.26). This debt or obligation to punishment our blessed Savior thus taught to his disciples: Whosoever is angry with his brother without cause shall be liable (obnoxious or bound over) to the judgment; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be liable (obnoxious or bound over) to the council; but whosoever shall say, You fool, shall be liable (obnoxious or bound over) to hellfire' (Matt. 5:22). So says our Savior again: He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit has never forgiveness, but is in danger of (liable, obnoxious, or bound over to) eternal damnation' (Mark 3:28-29). From all this it appears that after the act of sin is committed and passed by, the guilt or obligation to suffer the affixed penalty resulting from that act remains; that is, the person who committed it continues still a debtor to the vindictive [retributive] justice of God and is bound to endure the punishment due unto it.

"What. now. is the forgiveness of sin, or in what does remission of sin consist? The forgiveness contains in it a reconciliation of an offended God. without which God cannot be conceived to remit, and a satisfaction unto a just God, without which God is not reconciled. The first of these is taught in the following: We are justified gratuitously by his grace through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ, whom God has set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood' (Rom. 3:24-25); we have an advocate with the Father, and he is the propitiation for our sins' (1 John 2:1); God loved us and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins' (4:10). This propitiation amounted to a reconciliation, that is, a kindness after wrath. We must conceive that God was angry with mankind before he determined to give our Savior; we cannot imagine that God. who is essentially just, should not abominate iniquity. The first affection, therefore, which we can conceive in him upon the lapse of man is wrath and indignation. God was most certainly holily angry with mankind before he determined to provide for them a Savior from this anger: 'God commends his love toward us in that while we were yet sinners [and his wrath against sin existed] Christ died for us'; 'when we were without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly [with whom justice was displeased]'; when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son' (Rom. 5:6, 8, 10). Though it be most true that God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son' (John 3:16), yet there is no incongruity in this, that a father should be offended with that son [as a sinner] whom he loves [as a son], and offended with him [in the one relation] at the very time that he loves him [in the other relation]. Notwithstanding, therefore, that God loved men whom he created, yet he was offended with them when they sinned and gave his Son to suffer for their sin in their stead, that through that Son's suffering he might be reconciled to them. This reconciliation [of the holy justice] of God is clearly delivered in the Scriptures as wrought by Christ: 'God has reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ' (2 Cor. 5:18); 'we were reconciled unto God by the death of his Son' (Rom. 5:10); 'by him reconciling all things unto himself (Col. 1:20). In vain is it objected that the Scripture says our Savior reconciled man to God, but nowhere teaches that he reconciled God to man; for, in the language of Scripture, to reconcile a man to God' means to reconcile God to man, that is, to cause him who before was angry and offended with a person to be gracious and propitious to him. As the princes of the Philistines spoke of David, 'Wherewith should he reconcile himself unto the master? should it not be with the heads of these men?' (1 Sam. 29:4). Wherewith shall he reconcile Saul, who is highly offended with him; wherewith shall he make him gracious and favorable, but by betraying these men unto him? As our Savior advises, 'If you bring your gift before the altar and there remember that your brother has aught against you, leave there your gift before the altar and go your way, first be reconciled to your brother' (Matt. 5:23-24); that is, reconcile your brother to yourself, whom you have injured; render him by your submission [and compensation] favorable unto you, who has something against you and is offended at you. As the apostle advises the wife that departs from her husband to remain unmarried or to be reconciled to her husband' (1 Cor. 7:11), that is, to appease and get the favor of her husband. In the like manner we are said to be reconciled unto God when God is reconciled, appeased, and become gracious and favorable unto us; and Christ is said to reconcile us unto God when he has moved and obtained of God [as holy and sin hating] to be reconciled unto us; when he has appeased his holy displeasure and restored us unto his favor.

"Nor is it any wonder God should be thus reconciled to sinners by the death of Christ, who 'while we were yet sinners died for us,' because the punishment which Christ who was our surety endured was a full satisfaction to the justice of God: The Son of Man came to give his life a ransom for many' (Matt. 20:28). Now a ransom is a price given to redeem such as are in any way in captivity; anything laid down by way of compensation to take off a bond or obligation, whereby he who before was bound becomes free. All sinners were obligated to undergo such punishments as are proportionate to their sins and were by that obligation captivated and in bonds, and Christ did give his life a ransom for them, and that a proper ransom, if that his life were of any price and given as such. For a ransom is properly something of value given by way of redemption to purchase that which is detained or given for the releasing of that which is enthralled. But it is most evident that the life of Christ was laid down as a price; neither is it more certain that he died than that he bought us: You are bought with a price' (1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23). It is the Lord who bought us' (2 Pet. 2:1). The price which he paid was his blood; for 'we are not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ'(1 Pet. 1:18-19). Now as itwas the blood of Christ, so it was a price given by way of compensation; and as that blood was precious, so was it a full and perfect satisfaction. For as the gravity of the offense and iniquity of the sin is augmented and increases according to the dignity of the person offended and injured by it, so the value, price, and dignity of that which is given by way of compensation is raised according to the dignity of the person making the satisfaction. God is of infinite majesty against whom we have sinned; and Christ is of the same divinity, who gave his life a ransom for sinners; for God has purchased his church with his own blood' (Acts 20:28). Although therefore God be said to remit our sins, by which we were bound and captivated to his justice, yet he is never said to remit the price, without which we had never been ransomed and redeemed; neither can he be said to have remitted it, because he did strictly require and receive it [from his beloved Son, from whom he did not remove the cup of agony].

"If, then, we consider together on the side of man the nature and obligation of sin and on the side of Christ the satisfaction made and the reconciliation wrought, we shall easily perceive how God forgives sins and in what remission of them consists. Man being in all conditions [evangelized or unevangelized] under some law [written or unwritten] of God, who has sovereign power and dominion over him. and therefore owing absolute obedience to that law, whensoever in any way he transgresses that law or deviates from that rule, he becomes thereby a sinner and contracts a guilt which is an obligation to endure a punishment proportionable to his offense; and God, who is a lawgiver and sovereign, becoming now the party wronged and offended, has a most just right to punish man as an offender. But Christ, taking upon him the nature of man and offering himself a sacrifice for man's sin, gives that unto God for and instead of the eternal death of man, which is more valuable and acceptable to God than that death could be, and so makes a sufficient compensation and full satisfaction for the sins of man; which God accepting becomes reconciled unto us and for the punishment which Christ endured takes off our obligation to eternal punishment. Thus man, who by sinning violated the law of God and by that violation offended God and was thereby obligated to undergo the punishment due unto the sin and to be inflicted by the wrath of God, is by the price of the most precious blood of Christ given and accepted in full compensation and satisfaction for the punishment that was due, restored unto the favor of God, who being thus satisfied and upon such satisfaction reconciled is both 'faithful and just' [faithful to his promise of mercy and just to his righteousness and holiness] (1 John 1:9) to take off all obligation to punishment from the sinner; and in this act consists the forgiveness of sins."

6.2.3 (see p. 711). The punishment for suicide, as affixed by Plato (Laws 873), is remarkably like that of the Christian church: "What shall he suffer who slays him who of all men is said to be nearest and dearest to him? I mean the suicide, who deprives himself by violence of his appointed share of life, not because the law of the state compels him nor yet under the compulsion of some painful and inevitable fortune which has come upon him nor because he has had to suffer from irremediable and intolerable shame, but who from indolence or cowardice imposes upon himself an unjust penalty. For him what ceremonies there are to be of purification and burial God knows, and about these the next of kin should inquire of the interpreters and of the laws and do according to their injunctions. Those who meet their death in this way should be buried alone, and none shall be laid by their side; they shall be buried ingloriously in the borders of the twelve portions of the land, in such places as are uncultivated and nameless, and no column or name shall mark the place of their interment."

6.2.4(see p 713). Calvin teaches that whenever the believer suffers pain from any cause or source whatever he is not suffering punishment for purposes of law and justice, but corrective chastisement for purposes of self-discipline and spiritual improvement In 3.4.31-32 he says: “Since it highly concerns us to understand the design of those chastisements with which God corrects our sins, and how greatly they differ from the examples of his indignation pursuing the impious and reprobate, I conceive it will not be unseasonable to give a summary account of them. For the sake of perspicuity let us call one vengeance or vindictive judgment and the other chastisement or disciplinary judgment. In vindictive judgment God is to be contemplated as taking vengeance on his enemies, so as to exert his [judicial) wrath against them. We consider it, therefore, strictly speaking, to be the vengeance of God when the punishment he inflicts is attended with indignation. In discipli-nary judgment he is not so severe as to be angry; nor does he punish in order to destroy or precipitate into perdition. Wherefore it is not properly punishment or vengeance, but correction and admonition. The former is the act of a judge, the latter of a father. For a judge, when he punishes an offender, attends to the crime itself and inflicts punishment according to the nature and aggra-vations of it. When a father corrects his child [even] with severity, he does it not to take vengeance or satisfaction of justice, but rather to teach him and render him more cautious for the future. Wherever there is vindictive punishment there is also a manifestation of the [judicial] curse and wrath of God. which he always withholds from believers. Chastisement, on the contrary, is, as the Scriptures teach, both a blessing of God and a testimony of his love.”

6.2.5(see p. 718). Edwards (Excellency of Christ) thus speaks of the relation ot Christ’s vicarious sufferings to divine justice and of their being also a manifestation of pity and compassion to the sinner: “Christ never in any act gave so great a manifestation of love to God and at the same time never so manifested his [compassionate] love toward those who were enemies to God as in the act of suffering and dying. The blood of Christ that was sweat out and tell in great drops to the ground in his agony was shed from love to God’s enemies and his own. Never did Christ so eminently show his regard to God’s honor as in offering up himself a victim to revenging [avenging or retributive] justice to vindicate God’s honor; and yet in this, above all, he manifested his [pitying] love to them that dishonored God so as to bring such guilt upon themselves that nothing less than his blood could atone for it. Revenging justice then spent all its force upon him on account of our guilt that was laid upon him; he was not spared at all; and this was the way and means by which Christ stood up for the honor of God's justice. In this the diverse excellences that meet in the person of Christ appeared, namely, his infinite regard for divine justice and such compassionate love to those that had exposed themselves to it as induced him thus to yield himself a sacrifice to it."

6.2.6(see p. 722). Paley (sermons on Heb. 9:26 and Rom. 6:1) thus remarks upon the impossibility of man's meriting heaven and of his need of obtaining it through the death of Christ: "Souls which are really laboring and endeavoring after salvation, and with sincerity, are every hour made deeply sensible of the deficiency and imperfection of their endeavors Had they no ground, therefore, for hope, but merit, that is to say, could they look for nothing more than they snould strictly deserve, their prospect would be very unhappy. I see not how they could look for heaven at all. They may form a conception of a virtue and obedience which might seem to be entitled to a high reward; but when they come to review their own performances and to compare them with that conception; when they see how short they have proved of what they ought to have been and how weak and broken were their best offices; they will be the first to confess that it is infinitely for their comfort that they have some other resource than their own righteousness. Their acts of piety and devotion toward God are defective in prin-ciple and debased by the mixture of impure motives They are intermittent, cold, and languid. That heavenly mindedness which ought to be inseparable from religious exercises does not accompany theirs, at least not constantly. Their thankfulness is never what it ought to be. or anything like it. Formality is apt continually to steal upon them in their worship. No man reviews his services toward God but he perceives in them much to be forgiven, much to be excused. That such imperfect services, therefore, should be allowed and accepted is an act of abounding grace and goodness in God who accepts them: and we are taught in Scripture that this much needed grace and goodness abounds toward us through Jesus Christ and particularly through his sufferings and death.

“We shall better see the truth of this if we consider well what salvation is. It is nothing else than, after this life is ended, being placed in a state of happiness ineffably great, both in degree and duration; a state, concerning which the following things are said: The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed.’ ‘God has in store for us such things as pass man’s understanding.’ It is not simply escaping punishment, simply being excused or forgiven, simply a little compensation for the little good we do, but it is infinitely more. Heaven is infinitely greater than the small reward which natural religion leads the moral pagan to expect What do the Scriptures call it? Glory, honor, immortality, eternal life.’ Will anyone contend that salvation in this sense and to this extent; that heaven, namely, eternal life, glory, honor, immortality; that a happiness such as there is no way of describing it but by saying that it surpasses human comprehension; will anyone contend that this is no more than what human virtue deserves, which in its own proper nature and by its own merit it is entitled to look forward to and to receive? The greatest excellence that man ever attained has no such pretensions The best good action that man ever performed has no claim to this extent or anything like it. It is out of all calculation and comparison and proportion, above and more than any human works can possibly deserve

“To what, then, are we to ascribe it, that such imperfect endeavors after holiness should procure and that they will in fact procure to those who sincerely exert them, such an immense blessing as glory, honor, immortality, eternal life?’ The Scriptures attribute it to the free will, the free gift, the love and mercy of God. This alone is the source and fountain and cause of salvation, the origin from which it springs and from which all our hopes of attaining it are derived. The cause is not in ourselves nor in anything we do or can do, but in God, in his goodwill and pleasure. It is in the graciousness of his original offer of mercy. Therefore, whatever shall have moved and excited and conciliated that goodwill and pleasure so as to have procured that offer to be made, or shall have formed any part or portion of the motive from which it was made, may most truly and properly be said to be efficacious in human salvation. And this efficacy is in Scripture attributed to the death of Christ. It is attributed in a variety of ways of expression, but this is the substance of them all. He is a sacrifice, an offering to God, a propitiation, the precious sacrifice foreordained, the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, the Lamb which takes away the sin of the world; we are washed in his blood, we are justified by his blood, we are saved from wrath through him, he has once suffered for sins the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. All these terms, and many more that are used, assert in substance the same thing, namely, the efficacy of the death of Christ in the procuring of human salvation; and human salvation we have seen is not simply escaping punishment, but obtaining glory, honor, immortality, and a blessedness such as there is no way of describing it but by saying that it surpasses human comprehension."

Edwards (Justification by Faith Alone) teaches the same truth with Paley. but in more technical terms and in closer connection with systematic theology: "The opponents of the doctrine of the imputation of Christ's active righteousness suppose that there is an absurdity in it. They say that to suppose that God imputes Christ's obedience to us is to suppose that God is mistaken and thinks that we performed that obedience which Christ performed. But why cannot that righteousness be reckoned to our account and be accepted for us without any such absurdity? Why is there any more absurdity in supposing that Christ's obedience of the law is imputed to us than that his penal satisfaction of the law is imputed? If Christ has suffered the penalty of the law for us and in our stead, then it will follow that his suffering that penalty is imputed to us, that is. is accepted for us and in our stead and is reckoned to our account as though we had suffered it. But why may not his obeying the law of God be as rationally reckoned to our account as his suffering the penalty of the law? Why may not a price to bring into debt [by earning a title to life] be as rationally transferred from one person's account to another as a price to pay a debt [by atoning for guilt]? There is the very same need of Christ's obeying the law in our stead in order to the reward, as of his suffering the penalty in our stead in order to our escaping the penalty; and the same reason why one should be accepted on our account as the other. One was as requisite to answer the law's demands as the other. The same law that fixes the curse of God as the penalty for not continuing in all things written in the law to do them has as much fixed the doing these things as the antecedent of living by them. There is. therefore, exactly the same need, from the law, of perfect obedience being fulfilled in order to our obtaining the law's reward, namely, heaven, as there is of death's being suffered in order to our escaping the law's punishment, namely, hell; or the same necessity, by the law, of perfect obedience preceding life, as there is of disobedience being succeeded by death."

6.2.7(see p. 726). The expiation of sin is distinguishable from the pardon of it. The former, conceivably, might take place and the latter not. When Christ died on Calvary, the whole mass, so to speak, of human sin was expiated merely by that death; but the whole mass was not pardoned merely by that death. The claims of law and justice for the sins of the whole world were satisfied by the "offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. 10:10); but the sins of every individual man were not forgiven and "blotted out" by this transaction. Still another transaction was requisite in order to this, namely, the work of the Holy Spirit in the heart of the sinner working faith in this expiatory offering and the declara-tive act of God saying "your sin is forgiven you." The Son of God. after he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, "sat down on the right hand of God" (10:12); but if the redeeming work of the Trinity had stopped at this point, not a soul of mankind would have been pardoned and justified, yet the expiatory value of the "one sacrifice" would have been just the same.

6.2.8(see p. 729). The standing objection of the Socinian to the vicarious satisfaction of justice—that it presents God in the aspect of implacability and unpaternal severity toward the sinner—falls away when it is considered that vicarious satisfaction in distinction from personal is the satisfaction of one divine attribute by another divine attribute, of divine justice by divine mercy. In and by Christ's sufferings and death. God's mercy meets the righteous and necessary demands of God's justice and thereby releases the sinner from his own obligation to do this. Calvin (3.20.45) directs attention to this feature in redemption: "Sins are called debts in the Lord's prayer because we owe the penalty of them: a debt we are altogether incapable of discharging, unless we are released by this remission [through Christ's satisfaction of justice], which is a pardon flowing from God's gratuitous mercy when he freely cancels these debts without any payment from us, being satisfied by his own mercy in Christ, who has once given himself for our redemption. Those, therefore, who rely on God's being satisfied with their own merits or the merits of others and persuade themselves that remission of sins is purchased by these satisfactions, have no interest in this gratuitous forgiveness. In this way they do not implore God s mercy, but appeal to his justice."

6.2.9 (see p. 743). The Arminians did not carefully distinguish, as the elder Calvinists did. between atonement and redemption. Barrow, who is Arminian. has four sermons on "the doctrine of universal redemption asserted and explained." He employs the term Savior in his first sermon on 1 Tim. 4:10 in "the large acceptationof conferring any kind of good. Whence God is 'the Savior of allmen' as the universal preserver and upholder of all things, as inthe psalm: 'You, Lord, preserve man and beast' (Ps. 36:6). If our Lord be the Savior of all those to whom God s truth is declared and his mercy offered; or if he be the Savior of all the members of the visible church; particularly, if he be the Savior of those who among these, rejecting the overtures and means of grace or by disobedience abusing them, shall in the event fail of being saved, then he is the Savior of all men." According to this loose use of the term, Christ is the Savior of those to whom salvation is offered but not secured by regenerating grace and who are eternally lost. Turretin (14.14) explains "Savior" in the first part of this text in the sense of preserver quoting Ps 36:6 and Acts 17:28 and citing Chrysostom, Oecumenius, Ambrose, and Aquinas in support of this. This explanation is favored by the phraseology we trust in the living God, who is the Savior of all men, specially of those that believe. The "living God" refers more naturally to the Trinity than to the incarnate second person, showing that in the first part of the proposition the apostle has in mind the general providential relations of God to man and in the second part his special redemptive and actually saving relations. Turretin would not, with Barrow, denominate Christ "the Savior of all those to whom God's truth is declared and his mercy offered and who by disobedience abusing them fail of being saved."

6.2.10(see p. 744). It is surprising that the denial that faith is the effect and not the cause of election and the new birth should have so much currency in the face of the numerous and explicit teachings of Scripture. Besides the passages quoted on p. 744, consider the following description by St. Paul (Eph. 1:19-20) of divine omnipotence exhibited in election to faith and regeneration: "The eyes of your understanding are enlightened that you may know what is the exceeding greatness of God's power to us-ward who believe according to the working of his mighty power which he wrought in [and by] Christ, when he raised him from the dead and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality and authority and dominion." Again, in his sacerdotal prayer (John 17:2), our Lord represents the whole result of his mediatorial work as dependent upon election: "You have given your Son power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as you have given him." He also emphasizes the discrimination between the elect and nonelect by saying (John 17:9): "I pray for them, I pray not for the world, but for them which you have given me." The Redeemer does not say that he never prayed for the whole sinful world of mankind; for he did this whenever he uttered the supplication "your kingdom come; your will be done on earth, as it is in heaven"; but on that particular occasion he confines his supplications to a part of the world, namely, the elect.

6.2.11(see p. 751). It is important to show that the fault is man's, not God's, when common grace fails of success, because it evinces that although common grace is not the highest grade of mercy, it is nevertheless a grade of it. It is the exercise of com passion when nothing but justice and retribution are due. Instead of offering pardon and exerting a certain degree of restraining and softening influence upon the transgressor, which is described in Rom. 2:4, God might make no such offer to him and leave him to the wholly unrestrained workings of his free will. Common grace, in this way. has a real value which is not nullified by anything in its own nature but by the enmity and resistance of the sinful will. But in bringing out this fact, it is important not to nullify the distinction between common and special grace by combining com-mon grace with the sinner's cooperation, whereby common is converted into special and regenerating grace by the sinner's agency In addition to the remark on p. 751 n. 153, the following statement guards the subject still more: Again, to say that common grace would succeed if it were not resisted by the sinner is not the same as saying that common grace would succeed if it were yielded to by him. "To give up the contest" is one definition of "yield." Not contesting at all is wholly different from ceasing to contest by yielding In the former case there is no resistance by the man; in the latter, there is a resistance which is put a stop to by him. This latter is never done except as the divine Spirit inclines and enables him.

Owen {Dominion of Sin and Grace in Won\s 14.411 [ed. Russell]) thus describes the sinner's action under common grace, showing both his voluntary resistance of it and his guilt in frustrating it: "Men who live in sin do voluntarily wrest themselves from under the rule of the law of God and give themselves up to be slaves unto this tyrant. Could sin lay any just claim to this dominion, had it any title to plead, it were some alleviation of guilt in them that give themselves up to it. But men reject the righteous rule of God's law and choose this foreign and unjust yoke. Hence it follows that all men have a right in themselves to cast off the rule of sin and to vindicate themselves into liberty. They may. when they will, plead the right and title of the law of God unto the rule of their souls, to the utter exclusion of all pleas and pretenses of sin for its power. They have a right to say unto it. Get you hence, what have I to do any more with idols? All men, I say. have the right in themselves because of the natural allegiance they owe to the law of God; but by reason of their own act they have lost the power of themselves to execute this right and actually to cast off the yoke of sin. This is the work of grace. Sin's dominion is broke only by grace.

"But you will say then, Unto what end serves this right, if they have not the power in themselves to put it in execution? and how can it be charged as an aggravation of their sin that they do not use the right which they have, seeing they have not power so to do? Will you blame a man that has a right to an estate if he do not recover it when he has no means so to do?

"I answer briefly three things. No man living neglects the use of this right to cast off the yoke and dominion of sin because he cannot of himself make use of it. but merely because he will not. [Owen means that the "cannot" has the element of "will not" in it; it is not isolated and abstract inability, but voluntary inability] He does voluntarily choose to continue under the power of sin and looks on everything as his enemy that would deliver him: 'The carnal mind is enmity against God, it is not subject unto his law nor can it be' (Rom. 8:7). When the law comes at any time to claim its right and rule over the soul, a man under the power of sin looks on it as an enemy that has come to disturb his peace and fortifies his mind against it; and when the gospel comes and tenders the way and means for the soul's delivery, offering its aid and assistance to this end. this also is looked on as any enemy and is rejected, and all its offers, unto that end (see Prov 1:20-25; John 3:19). This, then, is the condition of even/one that abides under the dominion of sin: he chooses so to do; he continues in that state of sin by an act of his own will; he avows an enmity unto everything which would give him deliverance; and this will be a sore aggravation of his condemnation at the last day.

“God may justly require that of any which it is in the power of the grace of the gospel to enable them to perform and comply with; for this is tendered unto them in the preaching of it every day. And although we know not the ways and means of the effectual communication of grace unto the souls of men, yet this is certain, that [common] grace is so tendered in the preaching of the gospel that none go without it, none are destitute of its aids and assistances but those alone who by a free act of their own wills do refuse and reject it. This is that which the whole case depends upon. You will not come unto me, that you may have life’; and this all unbelievers have or may have experience of in themselves. They may know on a due examination of themselves that they do voluntarily refuse the assistance of the [common] grace which is offered for their deliverance; therefore is their destruction of themselves.

“There is a time when men lose even the right [to cast off the yoke of sin] also. He who gave up himself to have his ear bored lost all his claim unto future liberty; he was not to go out at the year of Jubilee So there is a time when God judicially gives up men to the rule of sin, to abide under it forever; so that they lose all right to liberty. Thus he dealt with many of the idolatrous Gentiles of old (Rom. 1:24, 26, 28) and so continues to deal with the like profligate sinners; so he acts toward the generality of the antichristian [infidel] world (2 Thess. 2:11-12) and with many despisers of the gospel (Isa. 6:9-10). When it comes to this, men are cast at law [outlawed] and have lost all right and title unto liberty from the dominion of sin. They may repine sometimes at the service of sin or the consequences of it in shame and pain, in the shameful distempers that will pursue many in their uncleanness; yet God having given them up judicially unto sin, they have not so much as a right to put up one prayer or petition for deliverance; nor will they do so, but are bound in the fetters either of presumption and indif-ference or of dreadful despair. See their work and ways described in Rom. 2:5-6.

“[Though God alone knows whom he has judicially abandoned and no man has the right to declare a fellowman to be thus cast away, yet] the signs or symptoms of the approach of such an irrecoverable condition are (1) a long continuance in the practice of any known sin. The long-suffering of God for a time waits tor repentance (1 Pet. 3:20; 2 Pet. 3:9). But there is a time when it does only endure ‘vessels of wrath fitted for destruction’ (Rom 9:22), which is commonly after long practice of known sin. (2) When convictions have been suppressed and warnings despised. God does not usually deal thus with men until they have rejected the means of their deliverance. (3) When men contract the guilt of such sins as seem to entrench on the unpardonable sin against the Holy Spirit; such as proud, contemptuous, malicious reproaches of the ways of God, of holiness, of the spirit of Christ and his gospel. (4) A voluntary relinquishment of the means of grace and conversion unto God. which men have heretofore enjoyed. (5) The resolved choice of wicked, profane, unclean, scoffing society.”

The Synod of Dort (“Of Divine Predestination”) directs attention to the responsibility and guilt of man in frustrating common grace: “The promise of the gospel is that whosoever believes in Christ crucified shall not perish but have everlasting life. This promise, together with the command to believe, ought to be declared and published to all nations and to all persons promiscuously and without distinction to whom God out of his good pleasure sends the gospel. And whereas many who are [outwardly] called by the gospel do not repent or believe in Christ but perish in unbelief, this is not owing to any defect or insufficiency in the sacrifice offered by Christ upon the cross, but is wholly to be imputed to themselves The death of Christ is of infinite worth and value, abundantly sufficient to expiate the sins of the whole world.”

Bates (On Death, chap. 6) in the same manner describes man’s resistance of common grace: “Suppose life be continued, yet sinners that delay repentance can have no rational hopes that they shall sincerely repent in time to come. For (1) saving repentance is the gift of God; and is it likely that those who have been insensible to the loud and earnest calls of the word, inflexible to the gracious methods of God’s providence leading them to repentance, should at last obtain converting grace? The gales of the Spirit are very transient and blow when he pleases: and can it be expected that those who have willfully and often resisted him should by an exuberant favor receive afterward more powerful grace to overrule their stubborn wills and make them obedient? To expect divine grace and the powerful workings of the Spirit after long resisting his holy excitations is both unreasonable and unre-vealed. It is written as with a sunbeam that God will graciously pardon repenting sinners that reform their lives; but it is nowhere promised that he will give saving repentance to those who securely continue in sin upon a corrupt confidence that they will repent at last. Our Savior threatens to him who neglects the improving of grace that is offered that that which he has shall be taken away'; yet men unwilling at present to forsake their sins of pleasure and profit vainly hope they shall obtain grace hereafter without any promise from God and against the tenor of his threatenings. God has threatened that his Spirit shall not always strive with rebellious sinners,' and then their state is remediless. This may be the case of many in this life who are insensible of their misery. As consumptive persons decline by degrees, lose their appetite, color, and strength, till at last they are hopeless, so the withdrawings of the Spirit are gradual, his motions are not so strong nor frequent, and upon the continued provocations of the disobedient he finally leaves them under the most fearful doom: He that is filthy, let him be filthy still; he that is unrighteous, let him be unrighteous still.' (2) Supposing the Holy Spirit be not totally withdrawn, yet by every day's continuance in sin the heart is more hardened against the impressions of grace, more averse from returning to God, and repentance is more difficult and hazardous. (3) It is uncertain whether God will at last hear the prayers of such as resist and insult his Spirit in the common operations of his grace. We are commanded to seek the Lord while he may be found and call upon him while he is near.' The limitation implies that if the season be neglected he will hide his face forever. Now in cases of great moment and hazard what diligence, what caution should be used."

Westminster Confession 5.6.6 sums up the subject of God's withdrawing common grace after the sinner's resistance and abuse of it as follows: "As for those wicked and ungodly men whom God as a righteous judge, for former sins, does blind and harden (Rom. 1:24, 26. 28; 11:7-8), from them he not only withholds his grace whereby they might have been enlightened in their understandings and wrought upon in their hearts (Deut. 29:4); but sometimes also withdraws the gifts which they had (Matt. 13:12) and exposes them to such objects as their corruption makes occasion of sin (2 Kings 8:12-13) and withal gives them over to their own lusts, the temptations of the world, and the power of Satan (Ps. 81:11—12; 2 Thess. 8:15, 32). whereby it comes to pass that they harden themselves even under those means which God uses for the softening of others (Exod. 8:15, 32; 2 Cor. 2:15-16)."

6.2.12 (seep. 753). Augustine distinguishes the common from the effectual call in the following passages: "God calls many predestinated children of his to make them members of his only predestinated Son, not with that calling with which they were called who would not come to the marriage, since with that calling were called also the Jews, to whom Christ crucified is an offense, and the Gentiles, to whom Christ crucified is foolishness; but with that calling he calls the predestinated which the apostle distinguished when he said that he preached Christ, the wisdom of God and the power of God to them that were called, Jews as well as Greeks. And it was this calling he meant when he said. Not of works, but of him that calls, it was said unto Rebecca, that the elder shall serve the younger.' Did he say. Not of works, but of him that believes ? Rather, he actually took this [namely, faith] away from man that he might give the whole to God. Therefore he said. 'But of him that calls'; not with any sort of calling whatever, but with that calling wherewith a man is made a believer" (Predestination 32). "The vessels of mercy were not so called as not to be elected, in respect of which it is said, 'Many are called, but few are elected'; but because they were called according to God's purpose they are of a certainty also elected by the election of grace, as it is denominated, not of any precedent merits of theirs, because grace is all the merit they have" (Rebuke and Grace 13). "Whoever are elected are without doubt also called; but not whoever are called are also elected Those are elected who are called according to God's purpose and who are also predestinated and foreknown" (Rebuke and Grace 14).

Regeneration

In Westminster Shorter Catechism QQ. 30-31 the application of redemption is attributed to a particular work of God denominated effectual calling: “The Spirit applies to us the redemption purchased by Christ, by working faith in us, and thereby uniting us to Christ in our effectual calling.” This effectual calling is defined to be “the work of God’s Spirit, whereby convincing us of our sin and misery, enlightening our minds in the knowledge of Christ, and renewing [Westminster Larger Catechism 67 adds: ‘and powerfully determining’] our wills, he does persuade and enable us to embrace Jesus Christ freely offered to us in the gospel.” According to this definition the effectual call produces (a) conviction of conscience, (b) illumination of the understanding, (c) renovation of the will, and (d) faith in Christ’s atonement. Everything in redemption runs back, ultimately, to God: “His divine power has given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness” (2 Pet. 1:3).

But such effects in the soul as conviction, illumination, renovation, and faith imply a great change within it. These are fruits and evidences of that spiritual transformation which in Scripture is denominated “new birth,” “new creation,” “resurrection from the dead,” “death to sin and life to righteousness,” “passage from darkness to light.” Consequently, effectual calling includes and implies regeneration. Hence it is said in Westminster Confession 13.1 that “they who are effectually called and regenerated, having a new heart and a new spirit created in them, are farther sanctified.” In Westminster Confession 10.2 effectual calling is made to include regeneration, because man is said to be “altogether passive, until he is enabled to answer the call.”[1]

Various Uses of the Term Regeneration

The term regeneration has been used in a wide and in a restricted sense. It may signify the whole process of salvation, including the preparatory work of conviction and the concluding work of sanctifica-tion. Or it may denote only the imparting of spiritual life in the new birth, excluding the preparatory and concluding processes. The Romish church regards regeneration as comprehending everything in the transition from a state of condemnation on earth to a state of salvation in heaven and confounds justification with sanctification. The Lutheran doctrine, stated in the apology for the Augsburg Confession and in the Formula of Concord, employs regeneration in the wide meaning, but distinguishes carefully between justification and sanctification. In the Reformed church, the term regeneration was also employed in the wide signification. Like the Lutheran, while carefully distinguishing between justification and sanctification, the Reformed theologian brought under the term regeneration everything that pertains to the development as well as to the origination of the new spiritual life. Regeneration thus included not only the new birth, but all that issues from it. It comprised the converting acts of faith and repentance and also the whole struggle with indwelling sin in progressive sanctification. Thus Calvin (3.3.9) remarks: “I apprehend repentance (poenitentiam) to be regeneration (regenerationem), the end of which is the restoration of the divine image within us. In this regeneration, we are restored by the grace of Christ to the righteousness of God from which we fell in Adam. And this restora-tion is not accomplished in a single moment or day or year; but by continual, even tardy, advances the Lord destroys the carnal corruptions of his elect.” Here, regeneration is employed to denote not merely the instantaneous act of imparting life to the spiritually dead, but also the processes of conversion and sanctification that result from it. (See supplement 6.3.1.)

This wide use of the term passed into English theology. The divines of the seventeenth century very generally do not distinguish between regeneration and conversion, but employ the two as synonyms. Owen does this continually (On the Spirit 3.5), and Charnock likewise (Attributes, Practical Atheism). The Westminster Creed does not use the term regeneration. Instead of it, it employs the term vocation or effectual calling. This comprises the entire work of the Holy Spirit in the application of redemption. Under it belongs everything pertaining to the process of salvation, from the first step of conviction of sin to the act of saving faith in Jesus Christ (cf. Fisher, On the Catechism, 31-32).

The wide and somewhat vague use of the term regeneration was suggested by a few scriptural texts. The apostle gives the injunction: “Put off the old man," "put on the new man," and "be renewed (ana-neousthaif)[2] in the spirit of your minds" (Eph. 4:22-25). He exhorts Christians to "be transformed by the renewing (anakaindseif)[3] of their mind" (Rom. 12:2). In 2 Cor. 4:16 he says that the "inward man is renewed (anakainountai)[4] day by day." In these instances, as the use of ananeody[5] and anakainoo[6] instead of gennao[7] shows, the notion of molding or forming, rather than that of regenerating, is in St. Paul's mind. He is addressing those in whom the principle of the new life has been implanted— who have been born again— and now urges them to the exercise and nurture of the new life. Similarly, the prophet Ezekiel (18:31), addressing the house of Israel, the church of God, says: "Make you a new heart and a new spirit." Here, the return from backsliding and the reformation and culture of the spiritual life, not the actual regeneration of the soul, are what is demanded. Neither of these two texts refers to regeneration in the restricted signification of the term. God does not, in either of them, command man to quicken himself, to create life from the dead, to command the light to shine out of darkness, to call things that be not as though they were (2 Cor. 4:6; Rom. 4:17). In them both he exhorts regenerate but backsliding man, as he does the church at Ephesus, to "repent and do the first works" (Rev. 2:5). In the New Testament the renewing of regeneration is denoted by ktizein[8], gennao[9], zoopoiein;,[10] and that of sanctification by ananeousthai[11] (Eph. 4:23), anakainoun-tai[12] (2 Cor. 4:16), and anakaindsis[13] (Rom. 12:2). (See supplement 6.3.2.)

But this wide use of the term regeneration led to confusion of ideas and views. As there are two distinct words in the language, regeneration and conversion, there are also two distinct notions denoted by them. Consequently, there arose gradually a stricter use of the term regeneration and its discrimination from conversion. Turretin (15.4.13) defines two kinds of conversion, as the term was employed in his day. The first is "habitual" or "passive" conversion. It is the production of a habit or disposition in the soul: "Habitual or passive conversion occurs through the infusion of supernatural habits by the Holy Spirit."[14] The second kind is "actual" or "active" conversion. It is the acting out in faith and repentance of this implanted habit or disposition: "Actual or active conversion occurs through the exercise of those good habits in which the acts of faith and repentance are both granted by God and called forth from man."[15] After thus defining, Turretin remarks that the first kind of conversion is better denominated "regeneration" because it has reference to that new birth by which man is renewed in the image of his maker; and the second kind of conversion is better denominated "conversion" because it includes the operation and agency of man himself. De Moor on Marck (23.2), after distinguishing between conversio activa and pas-siva, says that the latter is synonymous with vocation.

We shall adopt this distinction between regeneration and conversion. Regeneration, accordingly, is an act; conversion is an activity or a process. Regeneration is the origination of life; conversion is the evolution and manifestation of life. Regeneration is wholly an act of God; conversion is wholly an activity of man. Regeneration is a cause; conversion is an effect. Regeneration is instantaneous; conversion is continuous.

The doctrine of regeneration was taught by Christ to Nicodemus: "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. That which is born of the Spirit is spirit" (John 3:3, 6); "the sons of God are born not of the will of man, but of God" (1:13). It had previously been taught in the Old Testament: "I will put a new spirit within you; and I will take the stony heart out of your flesh and will give you a heart of flesh" (Ezek. 11:19); "a new heart will I give you" (36:26); "I will put my law in their inward parts and write it in their hearts" (Jer. 31:33). The vision of dry bones (Ezek. 37) taught the doctrine symbolically. Moses taught the doctrine in Deut. 30:6: "The Lord your God will circumcise your heart and the heart of your seed to love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul" (cf. Ps. 51:10).

Characteristics of Regeneration

Respecting regeneration, the following characteristics are to be noted. First, regeneration is solely the work of God. The terms employed in Scripture prove this: "creating anew" (Eph. 4:24), "fathering" (James 1:18), "quickening" (John 5:21; Eph. 2:5), "calling out of darkness into light" (1 Pet. 2:9), "commanding the light to shine out of darkness" (2 Cor. 4:6), "alive from the dead" (Rom. 6:13), "new creature" (2 Cor. 5:17), "born again" (John 3:3-7), "God's workmanship" (Eph. 2:10). These terms denote a work of omnipotent power. The origination of life is impossible to the creature. He can receive life; he can nurture life; and he can use and exert life. But he cannot create life.

Second, regeneration as the creative and life-giving act of God produces an effect on the human understanding. It is illumination: "enlightening the mind" (Westminster Larger Catechism 67); "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, has shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. 4:6; 1 Cor. 2:12-13); "the eyes of your understanding being enlightened" (Eph. 1:18; Phil. 1:9; Col. 3:10; 1 John 4:7; 5:20; 17:3; Ps. 19:7-8; 43:3-4). The distinguishing peculiarity of the knowledge produced by regeneration is that it is experimental. By this is meant that the cognition is that of immediate consciousness. This is the highest and clearest form of cognition. When, for example, the truth that God is merciful is stated in language, the natural man understands the language grammatically and logically, but nothing more. He has no accompanying consciousness of God's mercy. In common phrase, he does not feel that God is merciful. But a knowledge that is destitute of inward consciousness is an inferior species. It is a blind man's knowledge of color. The blind man understands the phraseology by which the color is described. It conveys logical and self-consistent notions to his understanding, but it is unattended with sensation. Such a knowledge of color is inadequate, in reality is ignorance, compared with that of a man possessed of vision. It is the knowledge of a sensuous object without any sensation. It is quasi knowledge, such as Christ refers to when he says of the natural man: "Seeing he sees not; and hearing he hears not."

Illumination or instruction by the Holy Spirit implies then the production of an experimental consciousness of religious truth. In this respect, it differs from human teaching. This is alluded to in John 6:63: "The words I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life," that is, they are spiritual life. Vital and conscious knowledge of religious truth is the effect of the operation of the Holy Spirit in the human understanding. One man can teach religious truth by grammatical propositions to another, but he cannot illumine his mind in respect to it. He can tell a man that God is holy, is love, that sin is hateful and virtue is lovely; but he cannot impart the consciousness that God is holy, that God is love, that sin is hateful, that virtue is lovely. The production of an experience upon such subjects is the prerogative of God.

Hence all the unexperimental knowledge of the natural man upon religious subjects is denominated “ignorance” in Scripture. Said Christ to the Jews, “You neither know me nor my Father” (John 8:19); to his disciples he said, “It is given to you to know the mysteries of the king dom of heaven” (Matt. 13:11); “this is life eternal to know you, the only true God and Jesus Christ whom you have sent” (John 17:3); “no man knows the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him” (Matt. 11:27). The books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes are filled with the praise of a kind of knowledge which they represent sinful man to be destitute of and which is the gift of God. Christ the great high priest “has compassion upon the ignorant” (Heb. 5:2). Scoffers are “willingly ignorant” (2 Pet. 3:5). Unbelieving Jews were “ignorant of God’s righteousness” (Rom. 10:3). Before regeneration, men fashion themselves “according to their lusts in ignorance” (1 Pet. 1:14). The sinful condition of the pagan world is called a “time of ignorance” which God in his forbearance temporarily overlooked” (Acts 17:30). Sin is often denominated folly. The psalmist mourning over the remainders of sin exclaims: “So foolish was I, and ignorant” (Ps. 73:32).

St. Paul explains the difference between the knowledge of the natural man and that of the regenerate in 1 Cor. 2:14: “The natural man receives not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him.” “There is a wide difference,” says Owen (Holy Spirit 3.3), “between the mind’s receiving doctrines notionally and its receiving the things taught in them really. The first, a natural man can do. It is done by all who, by the use of outward means, do know the doctrine of Scripture in distinction from human ignorance and error. Hence men unregen-erate are said ‘to know the way of righteousness’ (2 Pet. 2:21).” This true and real reception of divine truth, according to Owen, denotes (a) an apprehension that these “spiritual things” agree with the divine attributes and express them; the doctrine of gratuitous justification, for example, when received by the regenerate mind is perceived to accord with all the attributes of God and thus to be a manifestation of the glory of God; and (b) an apprehension that the particular “spiritual thing” is suited to the end proposed; the death of Christ, for example, is adapted in every way to meet the demands of God’s holy nature and of man’s sinful nature. It is not “foolishness,” but wisdom, or an adaptation of means to ends and is so perceived and understood by the spiritual man, but not by the natural. That there is this power of illuminating the understanding is proved by the fact that good men pray that it may be exercised: “Give me understanding, and I shall keep your law” (Ps. 119:34); “teach me your statutes” (119:68).

Third, regeneration with respect to the human will is “renewal.” Westminster Larger Catechism Q. 67 describes one part of effectual calling as the “renewing and powerfully determining” of the will. Biblical texts that prove this are the following: “I will put a new spirit within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of their flesh and will give them a heart of flesh” (Ezek. 11:19; 36:26-27); “renew a right spirit within me” (Ps. 51:10); “may the God of peace make you perfect to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight” (Heb. 13:21); “it is not of him that wills, but of God that show mercy” (Rom. 9:16); “God works in you to will” (Phil. 2:13); “your people shall be willing in the day of your power” (Ps. 110:3); “the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God” (2 Thess. 3:5). Those texts, also, which describe regeneration as a “quickening” prove that the will is renewed.

Recurring to the distinction which we have made between “inclination” and “volition” or “choice,” regeneration is to be defined as the origination of a new inclination by the Holy Spirit, not as the exertion of a new volition or making a new choice by the sinner.[16] Keeping this distinction in mind, we say that in regeneration God inclines man to holiness and disinclines him to sin. This change of the disposition of the will is attributable solely to the Holy Spirit. The sinner discovers, on making the attempt, that he is unable to reverse his determination to self and the creature. He cannot start a contrary disposition of his will. He is unable to incline himself to God as the chief end of his existence. He can choose the antecedents or preparatives to inclining, but cannot incline. By a volition he can read his Bible. This is a preparative or antecedent to supreme love of God, but it is not supreme love and cannot produce it. By volitions he can listen to preaching and can refrain from vicious actions. These also are preparatives or antecedents to a holy inclination of the will, but are not this inclination itself and cannot produce it. It is a fact of consciousness that while the sinner can put forth single volitions or particular choices that are favorable to a new voluntary disposition because they evince the need of it, he cannot begin the new disposition itself. He cannot incline himself by any volition whatsoever. “The will,” says Edwards (Will 3.4), “in the time of a leading act or inclination that is opposite to the command of God, is not able to exert itself to the contrary. The sinful inclination is unable to change itself; and for this plain reason that it is unable to incline to change itself.” To employ a phrase of Edwards, the unregenerate is “unable to be willing” in the direction of holiness. The reason and ground of this inability has been explained in anthropology. The inability is voluntary in the sense that it is the consequence of an act of self-determination, and this act was the sin in Adam by which the human will became sinfully inclined.

By the operation of the Holy Spirit in regeneration, the man is enabled to incline to holiness instead of sin. In the scriptural phraseology, he is “made willing” (Ps. 110:3). God “works in him to will” (Phil. 2:13). In the phraseology of Westminster Larger Catechism 67, he is “powerfully determined.” By renewing the sinful and self-enslaved will, the Holy Spirit empowers it to self-determine or incline to God as the chief good and the supreme end. This new self-determination expels and takes the place of the old sinful self-determination. From this new self-determination or inclination or disposition or principle, holy volitions or choices proceed, and from the holy choices, holy actions.

That God the Spirit possesses the power to originate an inclination to holiness in the human will is proved by the biblical representations. David frequently asks God to exert this power: “Incline my heart unto your testimonies” (Ps. 119:36); “make me to go in the path of your commandments” (119:35); “turn away my eyes from beholding vanity” (119:37); “create in me a clean heart” (51:10); “open my lips, and my mouth shall show forth your praise” (51:15); “we are the clay, and you our potter” (Isa. 64:8); “the Lord opened the heart of Lydia, that she attended to the things which were spoken by Paul” (Acts 16:14). The assurance of Christ that the Holy Spirit shall be given to everyone that asks implies the power of the Spirit to incline the human will.

While the operation of the Holy Spirit upon the human will is inexplicable (John 3:8), yet certain particulars are clear, (a) The influence of the Spirit is distinguishable from that of the truth, from that of man upon man, and from that of any instrument or means whatever. His energy acts directly upon the human soul itself. It is the influence of spirit upon a spirit, of one of the trinitarian persons upon a human person. Neither the truth nor a fellowman can thus operate directly upon the essence of the soul itself. It is in this respect that theologians have defined the influence of the Holy Spirit upon the human will to be "phys-ical."[17] The physis[18] or essence of the Holy Spirit operates upon the physis[19] of the human spirit. In regeneration, there is immediate contact between God and man. Spiritual essence touches spiritual essence. Yet there is no mingling or confusion of substance. God and man are two distinct and different beings, yet in regeneration they approach closer to each other than they do either in creation or providence. This fact is supported by the metaphors which describe the intimacy of the union between the believer and Christ. The one is the head, and the other is a member of the same body. Christ is the very life of the regenerate soul. In two instances the church is called "Christ": "To your seed, which is Christ" (Gal. 3:16; 1 Cor. 12:12). Christ is "formed in the believer" (Gal. 4:19). It is also supported by the biblical statements respecting the working of the Holy Spirit in the soul: "The Spirit makes intercession" (Rom. 8:26-27). The operation of the Spirit is so intimate that his working cannot in consciousness be distinguished from that of the soul itself. The believer is a "temple" of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 6:19). That the influence of the Holy Spirit is directly upon the human spirit and is independent even of the word itself is further proved by the fact that it is exerted in the case of infants without any employment of the truth. John the Baptist was "filled with the Holy Spirit even from his mother's womb" (Luke 1:15).[20] (b) By reason of this peculiarity in the operation of the Holy Spirit, it does not force the human will. It is purely spiritual agency exerted upon a spiritual being. If matter could operate by contact and directly upon mind, the consequence would be compulsion. The two things are heterogeneous. But when God operates directly upon man, the two beings are homogeneous. It is a Scholastic maxim that "whatever is received, is received after the manner of the recipient."[21] Sensuous organs alone are adapted to receive sensuous impressions from objects of sense; the immaterial spirit alone is adapted to receive an impression from the eternal Spirit. Man's body cannot experience spiritual influences, and his soul cannot be affected by matter, (c) The oper-ation of the Holy Spirit is in the will; that of the truth, and of man upon man, is on the will. The more interior an influence is the farther is it from being compulsory. It is better able to work in accordance with the nature and constitution of that within which it works. If it were operating ab extra,[22] it would be more apt to work across or against the constitutional structure: "It is a characteristic of God to move the will, especially by inclining it from within"[23] (Aquinas, Summa 1.105.4). (See supplement 6.3.3.)

Fourth, man is passive in regeneration. He cannot actively originate spiritual life. His relation to regeneration is that of a recipient. This is a part of the meaning of "passivity" in this connection. In that particular instant when the divine and holy life is implanted, the soul of man contributes no energy of efficiency of any kind. Being dead in sin, it cannot produce life to righteousness. A corpse cannot originate animal life. Lazarus was passive at that punctum temporis[24] when his body was reanimated. The same is true of the soul of man in respect to regeneration. But since regeneration is instantaneous, the sinner's passivity is instan-taneous also. Man is passive only for a moment, during the twinkling of an eye. God's regenerating act is like the sounding of the last trumpet. The resurrection of dead bodies is instantaneous, and the regeneration of dead souls is so likewise. The doctrine that the sinner is passive in regeneration does not imply that the passivity extends over a great length or even any length of time in his existence. On the contrary, it is only a punctum temporis[25] in his history. Up to that point of time, he is active: active in enmity to God. After that point of time he is active: active in submission to God. The carnal mind is enmity; the spiritual mind is love. Enmity and love are activities of the soul. Between the carnal mind and the spiritual mind, there is nothing but the instant of regeneration. In this instant when the new life is imparted, the activity is solely that of God the Holy Spirit.

Fifth, man cannot cooperate in regeneration. This follows logically from the fact that he is passive in regeneration. A dead man cannot assist in his own resurrection. It also follows from the fact that cooperation implies some agreement between the parties. God and the sinner must harmonize before they can work together. Two forces cannot cooperate unless they are coordinate and coincident forces. But up to the instant of regeneration, man is hostile to God: “The carnal mind is enmity toward God” (Rom. 8:7). Enmity cannot cooperate with love. (See supplement 6.3.4.)

Upon the Semipelagian, the Tridentine, and the Arminian theory of depravity, there may be cooperation, but not upon the Augustinian and Calvinistic. According to the former theories, there are slight remainders of holiness in the natural man which, though feeble, yet afford a point of contact and an element of force in his regeneration. Calvin (3.24.13) attributes synergism to Chrysostom and also to Bernard and Lombard (2.2.6):

> Lombard, in order to establish the position that the human will performs its part in regeneration, informs us that two sorts of grace are necessary. One he calls operative, by which we efficaciously will what is good; the other cooperative, which attends as auxiliary to a goodwill. This division I dislike, because, while he attributes an efficacious desire of what is good to the grace of God, he insinuates that man has of his own nature antecedent though ineffectual desires after what is good; as Bernard assertsthat a goodwill is the work of God, but yet allows that man is self-impelled to desire such a goodwill. But this is very remote from the meaning of Augustine, from whom, however, Lombard claims to have borrowed this i distinction.

Synergism is enunciated in the canons of the Council of Trent (6.4). Regeneration is explained as taking place by some cooperation of the human will with the divine. The will is said to be “excited and assisted” by divine grace. Similarly, Limborch (Theology 4.14.21) says that “grace is not the solitary, yet it is the primary cause of salvation; for the cooperation of free will is due to grace as a primary cause; for unless the free will had been excited (excitatum) by prevenient grace, it would not be able to cooperate with grace.” These are not the terms which the Scriptures employ. To excite and assist sinful man is not the same as to quicken and renew him. To excite the human will is to stimulate it, not to impart life. Excitement supposes some vitality which is in low tone and requires a tonic. Assistance implies that the will already has some force in the right direction which only needs to be added to. This is very different from the view presented in Ezek. 37:14: “I will put my spirit in you, and you shall live.” If there be some spiritual life in the natural man, he can cooperate in regeneration. But if he is “dead in trespasses and sins” (Eph. 2:11) he cannot. The truth upon this subject is well stated in Westminster Confession 10.2: “This effectual call is of God’s free and special grace alone, not from anything at all foreseen in man, who is altogether passive therein, until being quickened and renewed by the Holy Spirit, he is thereby enabled to answer the call and to embrace the grace offered and conveyed in it.” According to this statement, man is passive until he is quickened, after which divine act he is actively holy.

It is said by some that the sinful will has the power to cease self-determination to evil, though it has not the power to self-determine or incline to good. It can stop resistance to God, though it can do nothing more. But this would involve a cessation of all action in the will, both sinful and holy action, at the instant of regeneration, and this would make the will characterless at this instant. But in anthropology (pp. 496, 502, and 584-85) we have shown that the will cannot be inactive or destitute of an inclination, either good or evil. The will must be incessantly inclined in order to be a will, as the understanding must be incessantly intelligent in order to be an understanding. Consequently, the cessation of sinful inclination must be caused by the origination of holy inclination. Sin does not first stop, and then holiness come into the place of sin; but holiness positively expels sin. Darkness does not first cease, and then light enter; but light drives out darkness. Sin goes out, as Chalmers phrases it, by “the expulsion power of a new affection.” Consequently, the regeneration of the will is the only way to stop the evil inclination of the will. Again, it is said that there is receptivity for holiness in the fallen will, though there is no energy to produce it. But receptivity is more than capacity. It is a faint desire or inclination. Hence St. Paul says that “the natural man receives not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him” (1 Cor. 2:14). There is repulsion, not recipiency, in the natural man. “The carnal mind (phronema)[26] is enmity against God” (Rom. 8:7). When Christ (Luke 18:42) said to the blind man “receive your sight,” there was no receptivity in the eye, no favoring condition of the organ, that facilitated the restoration of sight. The causing of vision was wholly miraculous. Simultaneously with the words receive your sight, there was the exertion of creative power upon the sightless eye, enabling it to the act of vision. (See supplement 6.3.5.)

Sixth, regeneration is a work of God in the human soul that is below consciousness. There is no internal sensation caused by it. No man was ever conscious of that instantaneous act of the Holy Spirit by which he was made a new creature in Christ Jesus. And since the work is that of God alone, there is no necessity that man should be conscious of it. This fact places the infant and the adult upon the same footing and makes infant regeneration as possible as that of adults. Infant regeneration is taught in Scripture: “He shall be filled with the Holy Spirit even from his mother’s womb” (Luke 1:15); “suffer little children to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of God” (18:15-16); “the promise is unto your children” (Acts 2:39); “now are your children holy” (1 Cor. 7:14). Infant regeneration is also taught symbolically (a) by infant circumcision in the Old Testament and (b) by infant baptism in the New Testament.

Seventh, regeneration is not effected by the use of means, in the strict signification of the term means. The Holy Spirit employs means in conviction, in conversion, and in sanctification, but not in regeneration. The appointed means of grace are the word, the sacraments, and prayer. None of these means are used in the instant of regeneration; first, because regeneration is instantaneous and there is not time to use them; second, because regeneration is a direct operation of the Holy Spirit upon the human spirit. It is the action of Spirit upon spirit, of a divine person upon a human person, whereby spiritual life is imparted. Nothing, therefore, of the nature of means or instruments can come between the Holy Spirit and the soul that is to be made alive. God did not employ an instrument or means when he infused physical life into the body of Adam. There were only two factors: the dust of the ground and the creative power of God which vivified that dust. Divine omnipotence and dead matter were brought into direct contact, with nothing intervening. The dust was not a means or instrument by which God originated life. So in regeneration there are only two factors: the human soul destitute of spiritual life and the Holy Spirit who quickens it. The dead soul is not an instrument by which spiritual life is originated, but the subject in which it is originated.

When Christ restored sight to the blind man, he did it by creative energy alone, without the use of means or instruments. The light of day was not a means. It contributed nothing to the result. Nor was the blind eye a means of originating vision. When Christ anointed the eyes of the blind man with clay mixed with spittle, the act was symbolical, probably; but certainly the spittle was not a means employed by him to work the miracle. In like manner, the word and truth of God, the most important of all the means of grace, is not a means of regeneration, as distinct from conviction, conversion, and sanctification. This is evident when it is remembered that it is the office of a means or instrument to excite or stimulate an already existing principle of life. Physical food is a means of physical growth; but it supposes physical vitality. If the body is dead, bread cannot be a means or instrument. Intellectual truth is a means of intellectual growth; but it supposes intellectual vitality. If the mind be idiotic, secular knowledge cannot be a means or instrument. Spiritual truth is a means of spiritual growth, in case there be spiritual vitality. But if the mind be dead to righteousness, spiritual truth cannot be a means or instrument. Truth certainly cannot be a means unless it is apprehended. But “the natural man receives not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned” (1 Cor. 2:14).

That regeneration is not effected by the use of means will appear from considering those cases in which means are employed. First, the word and truth of God are means of conviction, because there is in the human conscience a kind of vitality that responds to the truth as convicting and condemning. The apostasy did not kill the conscience stone-dead. If it had, no fallen man could feel remorse. Adam’s fall has benumbed and stupefied the conscience, but there is still sufficient vitality left in it for it to be a distressing witness to man. Consequently, the Holy Spirit employs truth as a means of exciting and stimulating the human conscience, not of regenerating it in the strict sense of the term. The conscience is not “made alive from the dead” in the sense that the will is. It has not lost all sensibility to moral truth. It possesses some vitality that only needs to be stimulated and toned up. This is done in conviction and by the use of truth as an instrument. Second, the word and truth of God are means of conversion, because regeneration has preceded and has imparted spiritual life to the soul.[27] There is now a spiritual vitality that can respond to the truth. The understanding having been enlightened by regeneration, when the particular truth that the blood of Christ cleanses from all sin is presented, it is apprehended. This truth is now spiritually understood and is no longer "foolishness" to the mind. And the will having been renewed and "powerfully determined" or inclined, this same cardinal truth is believed savingly. The doctrine of vicarious atonement thus becomes a means of faith in Christ, and faith in Christ works by sorrow for sin and love of holiness. Faith and repentance are converting acts. They are the substance of conversion and are brought about by the use of the appropriate means: by the presentation of evangelical truth to a soul in which the Holy Spirit has operated with regenerating grace. Third, the word and truth of God are means of sanctification, upon the same principle. Regeneration and conversion precede sanctification. By regeneration, spiritual life is originated; by conversion, spiritual life is put in action and manifested. Of course, then, the means of sanctification find a spiritual vitality in the soul, to which they are correlated. The Holy Spirit employs the word, sacraments, prayer, afflictions, and all the discipline of life as instruments by which he excites and induces the renewed man to struggle with indwelling sin and to endure unto the end.

But when we consider regeneration itself and look into the soul for a principle of life and power to be correlated to means or instruments of regeneration, we do not find any. The unenlightened understanding is unable to apprehend, and the unregenerate will is unable to believe. Vital force is lacking in these two principal faculties. What is needed at this point is life and force itself. Consequently, the author of spiritual life himself must operate directly, without the use of means or instruments, and outright give spiritual life and power from the dead, that is, ex nihilo. The new life is not implanted because man perceives the truth, but he perceives the truth because the new life is implanted. A man is not regenerated because he has first believed in Christ, but he believes in Christ because he has been regenerated. He is not regenerated because he first repents, but he repents because he has been regenerated.[28]

Eighth, regeneration is the cause of conversion. The Holy Spirit acts in regeneration, and as a consequence the human spirit acts in conversion. And as the act of regeneration is not divisible between God and man, neither is the act of conversion. The converting activity of the regenerate soul moves in two principal directions: (a) faith, which is the converting or turning of the soul to Christ as the Redeemer from sin, and (b) repentance, which is the converting or turning of the soul to God as the supreme good. Regeneration is instantaneous, conversion is continuous. Faith is gradual and unceasing, and so is repentance; but regeneration is effected completely and once for all. (See supplement 6.3.6.)

In connection with the doctrine that God is the sole author of regeneration, several particulars are to be noticed. The reason for expecting the regeneration of men is found in God's promise to bestow regeneration, not in man's power to produce it. In his discourse on the day of Pentecost, Peter assigns as a reason for "repenting and being baptized for the remission of sins" the fact that God "has promised remission to as many as he had called" (Acts 2:38-39). He expected to see men repent under his preaching because "God had exalted Jesus to be a prince and a Savior to give repentance" (5:31) and because "God also to the Gentiles had granted repentance unto life" (11:18). Similarly, Paul exhorts Timothy to "be gentle unto all men, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves, if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth" (2 Tim. 2:24). The preacher should confidently expect faith and repentance to follow from his preaching, because of God's purpose and promise to bestow regenerating grace in connection with preaching. In order to this expectation, it is not necessary that he should know who are the particular persons whom God has elected. It is enough to know that God has made an immense election, that he has formed a purpose to regenerate "a multitude which no man can number, out of all nations and kindreds and peoples and tongues" (Rev. 7:9). A second ground of hope and expectation that sinners will be regenerated is the fact that under the gospel dispensation God's regenerating grace is being continually exerted. The Holy Spirit actually accompanies the faithful preacher of the word. The prophets "preached the gospel unto you with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven" (1 Pet. 1:12). The Holy Spirit as a regenerating spirit is actually poured out among mankind. There is not a moment in which he does not regenerate many souls. Men are being born spiritually all the time, as men are being born physically all the time. A third reason for the expectation that sinners will be regenerated is the fact that God has promised to pour out the regenerating Spirit in answer to the prayers of the church. The church can obtain the Holy Spirit for the sinful world: “Bring all the tithes into the storehouse and prove me, says the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing” (Mai. 3:10); “if you being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him” (Luke 11:13). The outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost was an answer to the prayer of the church.

Man’s Agency in Regeneration

The question here arises: What is man’s relation to regeneration? The answer is that his agency is not in regeneration itself, but in the work of conviction which is preparatory or antecedent to regeneration.

The term preparative as used by the Augustinian and Calvinist is very different from its use by the Semipelagian and Arminian. The former means by it conviction of sin, guilt, and helplessness. The latter employs it in the sense of a preparative disposition or a favoring state of heart. This is referred to in Westminster Confession 9.3: “A natural man is not able to convert himself or prepare himself thereto.” The tenth of the Thirty-nine Articles also excludes the Semipelagian “preparatives” to regeneration: “We have no power to do good works acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us that we may have a goodwill and working with us when we have that goodwill.” In Semi-pelagian use, a “preparative” denotes some faint desires and beginnings of holiness in the natural man upon which the Holy Spirit, according to the synergistic theory of regeneration, joins. Having this sense of the term in view, Witsius (Covenants 3.6.27) says: “Let none think it absurd that we now speak of means of regeneration, when but a little before (3.6.10, 12) we rejected all preparatives for it.” Owen, on the other hand, denies “means” and asserts “preparatives” of regeneration. Yet Owen and Witsius agree in doctrine. In the Calvinistic system, a “preparative” to regeneration or a “means” of it is anything that demonstrates man’s total lack of holy desire and his need of regeneration. It is consequently not a part of regeneration, but something prior and antecedent to it. There is a work performed in the soul previous to the instantaneous act of regeneration, as there is a work performed in the body previous to the instantaneous act of death. A man loses physical life in an instant, but he has been some time in coming to this instant. So man gains spiritual life in an instant, though he may have had days and months of a foregoing experience of conviction and sense of spiritual death. This is the ordinary divine method, except in the case of infants.

John the Baptist was sent to preach the law in order "to make ready a people prepared for the Lord" (Luke 1:17). Conviction of sin, in this instance, was an antecedent or preparative to the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit, but no part of regeneration itself. There is a grace of God that goes before regenerating grace and makes the soul ready for it. It is common or prevenient grace. Man's work in respect to regener-ation is connected with this. Moved and assisted by common or pre- venient grace, the natural man is to perform the following duties in order to be convicted of sin and know his need of the new birth:

1. Reading and hearing the divine word: "Faith comes by hearing" (Rom. 10:17); "who has ears to hear, let him hear" (Matt. 13:9); "the Spirit of God makes the reading, but especially the preaching of the word, an effectual means of enlightening, convincing, and humbling sinners, of driving them out of themselves and drawing them unto Christ" (Westminster Larger Catechism 155).

2. Serious application of the mind and examination of the truth in order to understand and feel its force: "Take heed how you hear: for whosoever has to him shall be given" (Luke 8:18). Says Owen (Holy Spirit, 2), "Should men be as intent in their endeavors after knowledge in spiritual things as they are to skill in crafts, sciences, and other mysteries of secular life, it would be much otherwise with them." The use of these means of conviction under common grace produces (a) illumination in regard to the requirements of the law and failure to meet them (this is not the spiritual illumi-nation of the regenerate mind in 1

Cor. 2:14, but the legal illumination referred to in 2 Cor. 7:10; (b) conviction and distress of conscience;[29] and (c) reformation of the outward life.

3. Prayer for the gift of the Holy Spirit both as a convicting and a regenerating spirit, which is commanded by Christ in Luke 11:9, 13: “I say unto you, Ask and it shall be given you. If you being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him.” That prayer for regenerating grace is a duty and a privilege for the unregenerate man is proved (a) by the fact that the Holy Spirit is promised generally under the gospel, as a regenerating spirit: “I will take you from among the heathen and gather you out of all countries, and I will put my Spirit within you. A new heart will I give you” (Ezek. 36:24, 27); “it shall come to pass that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy. And whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be delivered” (Joel 2:28-32). This is quoted by Peter on the day of Pentecost. In accordance with these Scriptures, Westminster Confession 7.3 teaches that “God promises to give unto all those who are ordained to life his Holy Spirit, to make them willing and able to believe.” All men are to “call upon the name of the Lord” for the gift of the Holy Spirit thus promised, because no man has the right to assert that he is of the nonelect or to affirm this of another man. As Christ’s atonement is offered indiscriminately, so the Holy Spirit is offered indiscriminately; and this warrants every man in asking for what is offered. Prayer for regenerating grace is also proved (b) By the fact that a man must obtain the gift of the Holy Spirit as a regenerating spirit before he can obtain it as a converting and sanctifying spirit. The Holy Spirit is not given as a converting and a sanctifying spirit until he has been given as a regenerating spirit. Regeneration is the very first saving work in the order, and this therefore is the very first blessing to be asked for: “Make the tree good, and his fruit good” (Matt. 12:33); “except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God” (John 3:3). No man has any warrant or encouragement to pray > either for conversion or for sanctification before he has prayed for regeneration. Whoever, therefore, forbids an unregenerate man to pray for regenerating grace forbids him to pray for any and all grace. In prohibiting him from asking God to create within him a clean heart, he prohibits him altogether from asking for the Holy Spirit. Prayer for regenerating grace is also proved (c) by the fact that the church is commanded to pray for the outpouring of the Spirit upon unregenerate sinners in order to their regeneration. It is not supposable that God would command the church to pray for a blessing upon sinners which sinners are forbidden to ask for themselves.

To recapitulate, then, we say that the sinner's agency in respect to regeneration is in the antecedent work of conviction, not in the act of regeneration itself. The Holy Spirit does not ordinarily regenerate a man until he is a convicted man, until, in the use of the means of conviction £ under common grace, he has become conscious of his need of regenerating grace. To the person who inquires: "How am I to obtain the new birth, and what particular thing am I to do respecting it?" the answer is: "Find out that you need it and that your self-enslaved will cannot originate it. And when you have found this out, cry unto God the Holy Spirit, 'Create in me a clean heart, and renew within me a right spirit. " And this prayer must not cease until the answer comes, as Christ teaches in the parable of the widow and the unjust judge (Luke 18:1-8). When men are convicted of sin and utter helplessness, they are "a people prepared for the Lord" (1:17). A sense of guilt and danger is a "preparative" to deliverance from it. A convicted man is a fit subject for the new birth, but an unconvicted man is not. A person who denies that he is a guilty sinner before God or that sin deserves endless retribution or who has no fears of retribution is not "prepared" for the regenerating work of the Spirit. It is true that the Holy Spirit, "who is free to work with means, without means, above means, and against means" (Westminster Confession 5.2), can convict a sinner without his cooperation if he pleases. An utterly careless and thoughtless person is sometimes by the power of God the Spirit suddenly filled with remorse and terror on account of his sins. And sometimes a convicted person does his utmost to repress conviction and get rid of moral anxiety, and the divine Spirit will not permit him to succeed. But this is not to be counted upon. The sinner is commanded to cooperate with the Holy Spirit in the work of conviction. “Quench not the Spirit” (1 Thess. 5:19) is enjoined upon him as well as upon the believer. He must endeavor to deepen, not to dissipate the sense of sin which has been produced in his conscience, or he is liable to be entirely deserted by the Spirit and left to his own will and be filled with his own devices. The sinner cannot cooperate in the work of regeneration, but he can in the work of conviction. This “preparative” of conviction does not make the sinner deserving of regeneration. God is not obliged to overcome the sinner’s self-determination to sin because the sinner knows that he cannot overcome it himself. The sinner’s helplessness does not make him meritorious of salvation, because it is self-produced; but it does make him a suitable subject for the exercise of God’s unmerited compassion in regenerating grace.

One thing is important, therefore, in giving advice to an unregenerate person, namely, to remind him of the danger of legality and self-righteousness. He must not suppose that by the use of the means of conviction—reading and hearing the word of God, avoiding all associations and practices that dissipate seriousness and quench conviction, and prayer that God would apply the truth to his conscience—he is doing a meritorious work that obliges God to the regenerating act. He must not imagine that “by doing his own part,” as it is sometimes said, he can necessitate God to do his. This would make regeneration a debt, not grace. It would make it depend upon the sinner’s action and not, as St. Paul says, upon God’s “purpose according to election” (Rom. 9:11). The sinner must not require beforehand an infallible certainty that he will be regenerated as the condition of his using the means of common grace in conviction. He must not say to the Most High: “I will do my part, provided you will do yours.” He must proceed upon a probability, remembering all the while that he merits not and has no claim to the new birth. After his best endeavors, he must look up as the leper did, saying, “Lord, if you will, you can make me clean.” He must do as the preacher does in regard to the regeneration of his hearers. The preacher does not say to the Lord, “I will preach your word, on condition that you will regenerate everyone to whom I preach.” But he does as Paul bade Timothy: “In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God perad-venture will give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth” (2 Tim. 2:25). And as the preacher has ample encouragement to preach, because of the general promise that God's "word shall not return to him void," so every convicted sinner has ample encouragement to look up for God's grace in Christ for the new heart and right spirit which come only from this source and which are promised generally under the gospel dispensation. (See supplement 6.3.7.)

The language of Edwards (Pressing into the Kingdom in Works 4.392) accords with the scriptural representations:

> Though God has not bound himself to anything that a person does while destitute of faith and out of Christ, there is great probability that in a way of hearkening to this counsel you will live; and that by pressing onward and persevering, you will at last, as it were by violence, take the kingdom of heaven. Those of you who have not only heard the directions given, but shall, through God's merciful assistance, practice according to them, are those that probably will overcome.

Of the same tenor is the following from Davies (Sermons 1.50 [ed. Barnes]; cf. Owen, Works 2.272-73 [ed. Russell]):

> Men say to us, "You teach us that faith is the gift of God and that we cannot believe of ourselves, why then do you exhort us to it? How can we be concerned to endeavor that which it is impossible for us to do?" I answer to this, I grant that the premises are true; and God forbid that I should so much as intimate that faith is the spontaneous growth of corrupt nature or that you can come to Christ without the Father's drawing you; but the conclusions you draw from these premises are very erroneous. I exhort and persuade you to believe in Jesus Christ because it is while such means [as preaching the gospel] are used with sinners, and by the use of them, that it pleases God to enable them to comply or to work faith in them. I would therefore use those means which God is pleased to bless to this end. I exhort you to believe, in order to set you upon the trial [to believe]; for it is putting it to trial, and that only, which can fully convince you of your own inability to believe; and till you are convinced of this, you can never expect strength from God. I exhort you to believe, because sinful and > enfeebled as you are, you are capable of using various preparatives to faith. You may attend upon prayer, preaching, and all the outward means of grace with natural seriousness; you may endeavor to get acquainted with your own helpless condition and as it were place yourself in the way of divine mercy; and though all these means cannot of themselves produce faith in you, yet it is only in the use of these means that you are to expect divine grace to work it in you; never was it yet produced in one soul while lying br supine, lazy, and inactive.

The speculative difficulties connected with the doctrine of regeneration arise from the fact that men put their questions and make objections from the viewpoint and position of the unconvicted sinner. They deny that they are helpless sinners; or they deny that sin deserves endless punishment; or they deny that sin requires vicarious atonement in order to its remission. A mind that is speculatively in this state is not “prepared” for regenerating grace. These are not the antecedents of regeneration. Such opinions as these must be given up, and scriptural views must be adopted, before the Holy Spirit will create the new heart. Or even if there be no heterodoxy, yet if the orthodox truth be held in unrighteousness; if the person does not reflect upon the truth and makes no effort to know his guilt and danger, but lives on in thoughtlessness and pleasure; this state of things must be changed. By a serious application to his own case of the law of God, the person must become an anxious inquirer, as a “preparative” to regeneration. The questions about man’s relation to regeneration will give no serious trouble to any convicted man, to anyone who honestly acknowledges that he is a guilty and helpless sinner and seeks deliverance from the guilt and bondage of sin. The questions will then answer themselves.

It is objected that the prayer of the unregenerate is sinful. This proves too much, because it would preclude any action whatever by the unregenerate man. The hearing of the word by the unregenerate is sinful. But the unregenerate is not forbidden to hear, upon this ground. The thinking of the wicked, like his plowing, is sin. All the acts of the unregenerate are sinful, because none of them spring from supreme love to God, yet some of them are better preparatives for or antecedents to God’s work of regeneration than others. Attendance upon public worship is better adapted to advance a man in the knowledge of his spiritual needs than attendance upon the theater. Prayer is better adapted than prayer-lessness to bring a blessing to the soul. “Behold he prays” was mentioned as a hopeful indication in the case of Saul of Tarsus. “An act,” says Owen, “may be good as to the matter of it, though sinful as to the form: for example, hearing the word by the unregenerate. And an act may be bad both as to the matter and the form: for example, pleasure seeking on the Sabbath by the unregenerate. The former act is to be preferred, rather than the latter. The former act is positively commanded of God; the latter is positively forbidden.” Westminster Confession 16.7 teaches that “works done by unregenerate men, although for the matter of them they may be things which God commands, yet because they do not proceed from faith are sinful and cannot please God. And yet, their neglect of them is more sinful and displeasing unto God [than their performance of them].” If the presence of sin in the soul is a reason why an unre generate man may not pray for regenerating grace, then it is a reason why the regenerate man may not pray for sanctifying grace. A regenerate man’s prayer is mixed with sin. If, then, a person may not pray until he is regenerated, neither may he pray until he is perfectly sanctified. If the existence of sin is a reason for not praying in one case, it is in the other.

It is objected, second, that only the prayer of faith is infallibly granted. But this is no reason why a prayer that will probably be granted should not be offered. Prayer for sanctification supposes previous regeneration. This is the prayer of faith and is heard in every instance. But it does not follow that the prayer for regeneration, which God is able to answer and which he encourages convicted sinners to hope that he will answer, should not be put up, because infallible certainty is not connected with the answer. Probability of an answer is good reason for asking for regenerating grace. The fact that the prayer of the unregenerate does not deserve an answer does not prove that God will not answer it. The prayer of the regenerate does not deserve an answer on the ground of merit.

The first reason why prayer for sanctification is infallibly certain to be granted, while that for regeneration is not, is that God has bound himself by a promise in the former case, but not in the latter. The former is connected with a covenant; the latter is not. God has promised to sanctify every believer without exception who asks for sanctification; but he has not promised to regenerate every convicted sinner without exception who asks for regeneration. Regeneration is according to the purpose of God in election; and election does not depend upon any act of the creature, be it prayer or any other act. Consequently, the convicted sinner's prayer cannot infallibly secure regeneration, as the believer's prayer can sanctification. Whenever regenerating grace is implored, the sovereignty of God in its bestowment must be recognized. The words of St. Paul apply here: "If God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth" (2 Tim. 2:25). The words of the prophets also: "Let every man cry mightily unto God; who can tell if God will turn and repent, that we perish not?" (Jon. 3:9); "rend your heart, and turn unto the Lord your God, for he is gracious and merciful. Who knows if he will return and repent and leave a blessing behind him?" (Joel 2:13-14). The words of the leper must always be a part of the prayer for regenerating grace: "If you will, you can make me clean" (Mark 1:40). When it is said that "whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord, shall be saved" (Joel 2:32; Acts 2:21; Rom. 10:13), the prayer of the convicted may be meant, and the general fact is that it will be answered.[30] Or the prayer of the regenerate for sanctification may be meant. Whosoever shall believingly and penitently call on the name of the Lord shall be saved.

A second reason why the answer to prayer for regeneration is optional and sovereign, while that for sanctification is not, is that in the latter instance it is a means to the end, while in the former it is not. The prayer for sanctification is a part of the process of sanctification, but the prayer for regeneration is not a part of regeneration. Prayer as a divinely appointed means infallibly secures its end; but prayer as an appointed antecedent and not a means is accompanied with probability, not absolute certainty.

Because God has not bound himself by a covenant to hear the prayer of every convicted sinner without exception, it by no means follows that he does not hear such a prayer and that it is useless for such a person to pray. He has heard the cry of multitudes of this class. It is his general rule under the gospel economy to hear this cry. The highest probability of success, therefore, attends the prayer of an anxious and convicted person for regenerating grace. And this is ample encouragement for him to call upon the merciful and mighty God for what he needs, namely, a heart of flesh in place of the stony heart. It is not true that God never granted the prayer of an unregenerate man. Such men in peril have called upon God to spare their lives and have been heard. This is taught in Ps. 107:10-14. Convicted men, from a sense of danger and the fear of the wrath to come, have prayed for the salvation of their souls from perdition, and God has saved them. In such cases, God has granted the petition, not because it was a holy one or because it merited to be granted, but because the blessing was needed and because of his mercy to sinners in Christ. Calvin (3.20.15) mentions the prayers of Jotham (Judg. 9:20) and of Samson (16:28) as instances in which "the Lord complied with some prayers, which, nevertheless, did not arise from a calm or well-regulated heart. Whence it appears that prayers not conformable to the rules of the divine word are nevertheless efficacious."

But in addition to the fact that the prayer of a convicted sinner may have an effect upon God and be answered favorably, it also has an effect on the person himself and prepares for the regenerating act of God. No man can study the divine word and receive legal illumination from it without having some sense of danger awakened and giving utterance to it in prayer. Even if the prayer be only the cry of fear and is not accompanied with filial trust and humble submission, it is of use. The prayer, by its very defects, prepares for the new birth by showing the person his need of it. The person in distress asks for a new heart. The answer does not come immediately. The heart is displeased, is perhaps made more bitter and rebellious. By this experience, the Holy Spirit discloses to the unregenerate man more and more of the enmity of the carnal mind and the impotence of the self-enslaved will. This goes toward preparing him for the instantaneous act of regeneration.

"It is," says Owen (Holy Spirit 4.3), "in no way inconsistent that faith should be required previously unto the receiving of the Spirit as a spirit of sanctification; though it be not so as he is the author of regeneration." And the reason he assigns is that in the instance of sanctification prayer is a means; while in the instance of regeneration prayer is not a means but a preparative. He discusses the point in the following manner:

> May a person who is yet unregenerate pray for the Spirit of regeneration to effect that work in him? For whereas as such he is promised only to the elect, such a person not knowing his election seems to have no founda tion to make such a request upon. Answer: (1) Election is no qualification on our part which we may consider and plead in our supplications, but is only the secret purpose on the part of God of what himself will do and is known to us only by its effects. (2) Persons convinced of sin and a state of sin mav and oueht to Drav that God. bv the effectual communications of his Spirit unto them, would deliver them from that condition. This is one way whereby we "flee from the wrath to come." (3) The especial object of their supplications herein is sovereign grace, goodness, and mercy as dis closed in and by Jesus Christ. Such persons cannot indeed plead any espe cial promise as made unto them. But they may plead for the grace and mercy declared in the promises as indefinitely proposed unto sinners. It may be that they can proceed no further in their expectations but unto that of the prophet, "Who knows if God will come and give a blessing?" (Joel 2:14). Yet is this a sufficient ground and encouragement to keep them waiting at the throne of grace. So Paul, after he had received his vision from heaven, continued in great distress of mind praying until he received the Holy Spirit (Acts 9:9, 17). (4) Persons under such convictions have really sometimes the seeds of regeneration communicated unto them, and then as they ought to so they will continue in their supplications for the increase and manifestation of it.[31]

When our Lord (John 14:17) asserts that "the world cannot receive the Holy Spirit because it sees him not neither knows him," the reference is to the Holy Spirit as the spirit of sanctification. Christ is speaking of him as the "Comforter" who augments and strengthens already existing spiritual life. But if the "world," that is, the unregenerate, are incapable of receiving the Holy Spirit in his regenerating office, they cannot be regenerated.

There is the highest encouragement in the word of God to pray for the regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit. It is a duty enjoined upon all men without exception, like that of hearing the word: “If you, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him” (Luke 11:14); “you, Lord, are plenteous in mercy unto all them that call upon you” (Ps. 86:5); “the Lord is nigh to all them that call upon him” (145:18); “the Lord is rich unto all that call upon him” (Rom. 10:12); “seek the Lord while he may be found, call upon him while he is near” (Isa. 55:6); “I will that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands without wrath and doubting” (1 Tim. 2:8); “behold he prays” (Acts 9:11); “you that hear prayer, unto you shall all flesh come” (Ps. 65:2). These and other similar texts relate to spiritual gifts. They invite and command men universally and indiscriminately to ask God for the Holy Spirit in any of his operations, as the first and best of his gifts: “Prayer, being one special part of religious worship, is required by God of all men” (Westminster Confession 21.3).[32]

While regeneration is a sovereign act of God according to election, it is an encouraging fact both for the sinner and the preacher of the word that God’s regenerating grace is commonly bestowed where the preparatory work is performed. This is the rule under the gospel dispensation. He who reads and meditates upon the word of God is ordinarily enlightened by the Holy Spirit, perhaps in the very act of reading or hearing or meditating: “While Peter yet spoke these words, the Holy Spirit fell on all them which heard the word” (Acts 10:44). He who asks for regenerating grace may be regenerated perhaps in the act of praying. God has appointed certain human acts whereby to make ready the heart of man for the divine act. Without attentive reading and hearing of the word and prayer, the soul is not a fit subject for regenerating grace. By “fitness” is not meant holiness or even the faintest desire for holiness, but a conviction of guilt and danger, a sense of sin and utter impotence to everything spiritually good. Such an experience as this “breaks up the fallow ground,” to employ the scriptural metaphor (Jer. 4:3; Hos. 10:12). When the Holy Spirit finds this preparation, then he usually intervenes with his quickening agency. The effect of prevenient grace in conviction is commonly followed by special grace in regeneration; the fact of the outward call is a reason both for the sinner and the minister of the word for expecting the inward call. Yet regeneration, after all the preparation that has been made by conviction and legal illumination, depends upon the sovereign will of God: “The wind blows where it lists, so is everyone that is born of the Spirit" (John 3:8). Regeneration rests upon God's elec-tion and not upon man's preparative acts, upon special grace and not upon common grace.

It follows, consequently, that the unregenerate man should be extremely careful how he deals with common grace. If he suppresses conviction of sin and thus nullifies common grace, then God may withdraw all grace. This was the case with some of the Jews: "For they, being [willingly] ignorant of God's righteousness and going about to establish their own righteousness, did not submit themselves to the righteousness of God. And because of unbelief were broken off' (Rom. 10:3; 11:20). The same is true of some nominal Christians. God has sovereignty and liberty in respect to regenerating grace. When a person has stifled conviction, God sometimes leaves him to his self-will forever. Yet observation shows that the Holy Spirit suffers long and is very patient and forbearing with convicted men, that he does not hastily leave them, even when they disobey his admonitions, but continues to strive with them and finally brings them to faith and repentance. (See supplement 6.3.8.)

Upon this general fact in the economy of redemption—that the right use of common grace is followed by regenerating grace—both the sinner and the preacher should act. In this respect, both are like other men. The farmer has no stronger motive than that of probable success for sowing grain; the merchant, for sending out ships; the manufacturer, for erecting factories. Salvation is in the highest degree probable for any person who earnestly and diligently uses common grace and the means of common grace. It is to be confidently expected that a convicted man will be made a new man in Christ Jesus. Every lost man ought to be thankful for such an encouraging probability. But to insist beforehand upon infallible certainty—and especially a certainty that is to depend upon his own action—is both folly and sin. It is folly to suppose that so weak and fickle a faculty as the human will can make anything an infallible certainty. And it is sin to attempt to divide the glory of regenerating the human soul between the Holy Spirit and the soul itself. (See supplement 6.3.9.)

Third, it is objected that to pray for regeneration is to delay faith and repentance. The sinner is commanded immediately to believe on Christ and turn from his sin with godly sorrow; but praying for regeneration is dallying with the use of means. It is an excuse for procrastination. To this it is to be replied: That prayer for regeneration is a prayer that God the Holy Spirit would work instantaneously upon the heart and would immediately renew and incline the will. There would be force in this objection if the sinner were taught that there are means of regeneration and were exhorted to supplicate God to regenerate him at some future time through his own use of these means. But he who truly prays for regenerating grace despairs of all agency in the use of means and precludes all procrastination by entreating an immediate and instantaneous act on the part of God by which he shall, this very instant, be delivered from the death and bondage of sin and be brought into the life and liberty of the gospel. He implores "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, to shine in his heart, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. 4:6). He asks the Son of God, "who quickens whom he will" (John 5:21), to enliven his spirit now "dead in trespasses and sins" (Eph. 2:1). Consequently, prayer for regenerating grace is an evidence that the convicted person has come to know that the word, sacraments, and prayer—all the means of grace— are inadequate to reanimate the soul and make it alive to righteousness. It is not until he has discovered that legal conviction, legal illumination, resolutions to reform, external reformation, reading and hearing the word, and prayer itself cannot change the heart that he leaves all these behind him and begs God immediately and instantaneously to do this needed work in his soul. The prayer for regenerating grace is, in truth, the most energetic and pressing act that the sinner can perform. It is the farthest removed of any from procrastination. It is an immediate act on the part of the sinner, and it entreats God to do an instantaneous work within him.

In this manner, prayer for the instantaneous gift of regenerating grace harmonizes with the gospel call to immediate faith and repentance. Faith and repentance naturally and necessarily result from regeneration. Whoever is regenerated will believe and repent.[33] To pray therefore for instantaneous regeneration is, virtually, to pray for instantaneous faith and repentance, and vice versa. He who prays "help my unbelief; take away the stony heart, and give the heart of flesh" prays that God would "renew and powerfully determine the will," which is the definition of regeneration. At the same time, prayer for regenerating grace must not be substituted for the act of faith and repentance. The direction is “believe on the Lord Jesus Christ.” This is the biblical answer to the question: What must I do to be saved? But when the convicted person discovers that the act of faith is hindered and prevented by the blind-ness of his understanding and the bondage of his will to sin and asks if he may implore the “enlightening and quickening energy of the Holy Spirit to persuade and enable him to embrace Jesus Christ, freely offered in the gospel” (Westminster Shorter Catechism Q. 31), he is to be answered in the affirmative. In imploring the regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit, he is “striving to enter in at the strait gate”; he is endeavoring to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. The act of faith in the blood of Christ, in its own nature, is simple and easy: “My yoke is easy, and my burden is light” (Matt. 11:30). But considered in reference to the pride and self-righteousness of the natural heart, faith is impossible without regeneration. Hence the frequent statement in Calvinistic creeds that man needs to be persuaded and enabled to this act.[34] (See supplement 6.3.10.)

SUPPLEMENTS

6.3.1 (see p. 762). The two uses of “regeneration.” in a wide and narrow sense, by the Reformers and seventeenth-century divines are different from those in the patristic church, which grew out of the patristic view of the sacraments. Augustine, for example, employs the term to denote both the apparently and professedly regenerate and the really such The former are members of the visible church, but not of the invisible; the latter belong to the invisible church also. The former may therefore fall away, the latter may not. He remarks as follows in Perseverance 21: “Of two (professedly] pious (piis) men, why to one should be given perseverance unto the end and to the other it should not be given is an unsearchable judgment of God. Yet to believers it ought to be a most certain fact that the former is of the predestinated, the latter is not. For if they had been of us.’ says one of the predestinated who had drunk this secret from the breast of the Lord, certainly they would have continued with us.” Again, in Rebuke and Grace 18, he says: “It is greatly to be wondered at that to some of his own children, whom he has regenerated in Christ and to whom he has given faith, hope, and love, God does not give perseverance also, when to the children of another [i.e., of Satan] he forgives their wickedness and by the bestowal of his grace makes them his own children Moreover, it is not less marvelous that some of the children of his friends, that is. of regenerated and good believers, departing this life as infants without baptism, although he cer-tainly might provide the grace of this layer [of baptism] if he so willed, he yet alienates from his kingdom into which he introduces their parents; and some children of his enemies he causes to come into the hands of Christians and by means of this laver introduces into the kingdom from which their parents are aliens. Of both of which things we may exclaim. How unsearchable are the judgments of God."

From the above extracts it will be seen that Augustine held (1) that baptism is indispensable to regeneration. (2) that there are some nonelect dying infants, and (3) that some whom he calls "regenerate" may not persevere. On the first point he differs from Calvin; on the second he agrees with him; on the third he seemingly differs, but not really, because he employs "regeneration" in two senses, while Calvin employs it only to denote the really renewed. By the "regenerate" who are not elected and do not persevere. Augustine means those adults who have been baptized and are members of the visible church, but not of the invisible. In his day baptism was denominated "regeneration " By the "regenerate" who are elected and persevere he means those adults who are members of the invisible church as well as the visible. Employing the term in this double sense. Augustine, unlike Calvin and the Reformed creeds, holds to a genuine "regeneration" that springs from election and predestination and to a spurious "regeneration" that does not The omission to notice the two uses of the word has led to the assertion by most Roman Catholic and some Protestant writers that Augustine's doctrine of election and predestination differs from thai of Calvin Both alike affirm thai Ihe truly regenerate are predestinated to perseverance and never fall away: "Let it not disturb us that to some of his [professed] children God does not give this perseverance But this is far from being so. however, in the case of those who are predestinated and called according to the promise. For the former, while they live piously [i.e., reputably in church communion] are [popularly] called Ihe children of God; but because they are afterward to live wickedly [i.e.. incon-sistently with church communion] and to die in wickedness, the foreknowledge of God does not call them God's children" (Rebuke and Grace 20). "Some of the children of perdition, who have not received the gift of perseverance to the end. begin [apparently] to live in the faith that works by love and live for some time faithfully and righteously and afterward fall away and are not taken from this life before this happens to them Unless this had happened to some, men would not have that wholesome fear [of falling] by which the sin of presumption and self-security is kept down" (Rebuke and Grace 40; cf. 9,11-12,14.16). Augustine maintains that all of the elect and predestinated are the subjects of true and spiritual regeneration and never fall away: "Says St. Paul, 'We know that God works all things for good to them that are called according to his purpose; because those whom he foreknew he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son. Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified.' Of these no one perishes, because all are elected And they are elected because they were called according to the purpose: the purpose, however, of God, not their own" (Rebuke and Grace 14).

Owen (Saints' Perseverance, preface), after abundant citations from Augustine's treatises Predestination and Perseverance otthe Saints in proof that he held that the elect and predestinated will infallibly persevere, remarks that "there are in Augustine and those that agreed with him sundry expressions commonly urged by the adversaries of the doctrine of the saints' perseverance, which grant that many who were 'saints,' believing' and regenerate,' fall away and perish forever. The reader will find them gathered to his hand in Vossius. Grotius, and Goodwin. The seeming contradiction in Augustine and his followers—Prosper, Hilary, and Fulgentius—will easily admit a reconciliation if they are allowed to be interpreters of their own meaning. What weight in those days was laid upon participation in the sacramental symbols of grace and what expressions are commonly used concerning those who had obtained that privilege is known to all. Hence all baptized persons continuing in the profession of the faith and communion of the church they called, counted, and esteemed regenerate and justified and spoke so of them; such as these they affirm might fall away into everlasting destruction; yet what their judgment was concerning their present state, even when they termed them regenerate' and believers, in respect to the sacraments and a visible profession of faith, Augustine clearly delivers his thoughts, especially in his treatise on Rebuke and Grace. ‘They were not,’ says he, chap. 20. children, even when they were in the profession and name of children. Not because they deliberately simulated righteousness, but because they did not continue in it.’ This righteousness he esteemed not to be merely feigned and hypocritical, but rather such as might truly entitle them to the state and condition of the children of God in the sense above expressed. These are the persons which Augustine and those of the same judgment with him do grant may fall away; such, namely, as upon account of their baptismal entrance into the church, their [outwardly] pious and devout lives, their profession of the faith of the gospel, they called and accounted regenerate’ believers, whom yet they tell you, upon a thorough search into the nature and causes of holiness, grace, and walking with God. would be found not to be truly and really in that state and condition in which they were esteemed to be; of which they thought this a sufficient proof, that they did not persevere; which evinces that their judgment was that all who are truly, really, and in the sight of God believers, engrafted into Christ, and adopted into his family should certainly persevere.”

The necessity of baptism by the church, in order to salvation, is the principal point of difference between Augustine and Calvin and explains the sacramentarianism. together with the double sense of regeneration, which are found in the system of the former but not in that of the latter. The following passages expressit: “Take the case of any infant you please. If he is already in Christ, why is he baptized? If, however, he is baptized that he may be with Christ, it certainly follows that he who is not baptized is not with Christ: and because he is not ‘with’ Christ he is ‘against’ Christ” (Forgiveness and Baptism 1.55). Augustine did not hold the Romish doctrine that the mere application of water in the name of the Trinity regenerates the soul. His view of regeneration was spiritual; that it is the effect only of the direct operation of the Holy Spirit. But he believed that God has inseparably connected the gift of the Spirit to regenerate with the ordinance of baptism administered to infants within his church. “From the infant newly born to the old man bent with age, as there is none shut out from baptism, so there is none in baptism who does not die to sin. But [baptized] infants die only to original sin; those who are older [when baptized] die also to all the sins which their evil lives have added to the sin which they inherited from Adam” (Enchiridion 43). “As in a certain manner the sacrament of Christ's body is Christ's body and the sacrament of Christ's blood is Christ's blood, in the same manner the sacrament of faith is faith. Now, believing is nothing else than having faith; and accordingly, when, on behalf of an infant as yet incapable of exercising faith, the answer is given [by his sponsor] that he believes, this answer means that he has faith because of the sacrament of faith and that he converts to God because of the sacrament of conversion. Therefore an infant, although he is not yet a believer in the sense of having that faith which includes the consenting will of those who exercise it, nevertheless becomes a believer through the sacrament of faith" (Letter 98.9-10 to Boniface, A D. 408). "He that believes and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believes not shall be damned. Now who is unaware that in the case of infants being baptized is to believe, and not being baptized is not to believe" (Forgiveness and Baptism 1.40). Augustine, in these passages, defines a sacrament as "that which has some point of real resemblance to the thing of which it is a sacrament." It is a symbol or sign resembling the thing signified. The sponsors answer that "the infant believes," has "some point of resemblance" to actual faith, and this is the "sacrament of faith." His answer, also, that the infant "turns to God," Augustine calls "the sacrament of conversion." In thus making baptism and the promises of the sponsors the indispensable condition of the regen-eration of the infant by the Holy Spirit, Augustine prepared for the materialistic view of grace formulated at Trent. His own highly spiritual conception of the Holy Spirit's agency in regeneration as immediate and irresistible would logically exclude such a necessary dependence on an outward sign and ceremony. Calvin, a thousand years later, saw the inconsistency of the two things and modified Augustinianism by making salvation depend, as Augustine did, upon the new birth, but not by making, as Augustine did, the new birth to depend upon the baptism of the church. Baptism he held to be the appointed sign and seal of regeneration and is to be administered whenever it is possible because of the divine command; but when impossible its omission does not preclude regeneration by the Holy Spirit. Augustine's view leads to the position that salvation outside of the visible church is impossible; Calvin's view makes salvation outside of it a possibility.

The following extracts from Augustine are of the same tenor with those above cited: “If infants were hurt by no malady of original sin, how is it that they are carried to the physician Christ for the express purpose of receiving the sacrament of eternal salvation by the pious anxiety of those who run to him? Why rather is it not said to them by the church: Take hence these innocents; they that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick’; Christ came not to call the righteous but the sinners’? There never has been heard, there never is heard, there never will be heard in the church such a fiction concerning Christ” (Forgiveness and Baptism 1.23). “Our Lord himself, wishing to remove from the minds of wrong believers that vague and indefinite middle condition which some would attribute to unbaptized infants, as if by reason of innocence they were included in eternal life and yet because of their unbaptized state were not with Christ in his kingdom, uttered that definite sentence of his which shuts their mouths: ‘He that is not with me is against me’“ (Forgiveness and Baptism 1.55).

6.3.2 (see p. 763). Edwards (Works 1.141) explains the exhorta-tions “make you a new heart” and “be renewed in the spirit of your minds” as referring to the sanctification of believers: “It is objected that the apostle sometimes exhorts those to whom he writes to put off the old man’ and ‘put on the new man’ and to be renewed in the spirit of their minds,’ as exhorting them to seek conversion. I answer that the meaning is manifestly only this: that they should mortify the remains of corruption or of the old man and turn more and more from sin unto God. Then he exhorts the Ephesians to be ‘renewed in the spirit of their mind’ (Eph. 4:22-23), whom yet he had before in the same epistle abundantly represented as savingly renewed already.”

6.3.3 (see p. 768). Owen (Holy Spirit 3.5) describes the total oper-ation of the Holy Spirit in adult regeneration as twofold: (1) moral suasion and (2) internal physical operation: “The Holy Spirit in the regeneration or conversion of all that are adult does make use of motives, arguments, reasons, and considerations proposed unto the mind by the preaching and reading of the word, which are adapted to influence the will and affections. There are none ordinarily converted who are not able to give some account by what considerations they were prevailed upon thereunto. But the whole of the work of the Holy Spirit in our conversion does not consist of this moral suasion. There is also a real physical work, whereby he infuses a gracious principle of spiritual life into all that are effectually converted and really regenerated and without which there is no deliverance from the state of sin and death. That the entire operation of the Holy Spirit in conversion does not consist in the presentation of motives and arguments, the ensuing reasons do sufficiently evince: (1) If the Holy Spirit works no otherwise on men in their regeneration or conversion but by proposing and urging upon them reasons, arguments, and motives, then after his whole work, and notwithstanding it, the will of man remains absolutely indifferent whether it will admit them or not, or whether it will convert itself unto God in view of them or not For the whole of this work consists in proposing objects unto the will, with respect to which it is left undetermined whether it will choose and close with them or not. And this is what some plead for. For they say that in all men, at least all to whom the gospel is preached, there is such grace present with them that they are able to comply with the word if they please and so to believe, repent, or do any act of obedience unto God. And if they will, they can refuse and continue in sin. This view ascribes the glory of our regeneration to an act of our own will and not to the grace of God. It also leaves it absolutely uncertain, notwithstanding the purpose of God and the purchase of Christ, whether anyone in the world will be converted. And, finally, it is contrary to many express testimonies of Scripture wherein actual conversion to God is ascribed to his internal operation : God works in us to will and to do' (Phil. 2:13). The act therefore itself of willing in our conversion is of God's operation; and although we ourselves will, yet it is he who causes us to will by working in us to will. (2) Moral persuasion, however advanced or improved and supposed to be effectual, yet confers no new supernatural strength unto the soul. For when the Spirit of God works by reasons, motives, arguments, and objective considerations and no otherwise, he is able only to excite and draw out the strength which we have, delivering the mind and affections from prejudices and other moral impediments; real aid and internal spiritual strength neither is nor can be conferred thereby. And he who will acknowledge that there is any such internal spiritual strength communicated unto us must also acknowledge that there is another work of the Spirit of God in us and upon us than can be effected by these persuasions." Owen fortifies his positions by extracts from Augustine's antipelagian writings, in which this same distinction is made in opposition to the views of Coelestius and Pelagius^ who resolved the whole work of the Spirit into moral suasion.[35] He also cites from the Semipelagian fathers and Schoolmen, who indeed ascribed more to the inward operation of the Spirit than did the Pelagians, but when it came to the question whether the determination of the will to holiness in conversion is wholly or only partly the effect of divine grace, affirmed the latter.

6.3.4 (see p. 768). The agency of God and man in regeneration is different from that in sanctification. In the first instance there is the creative and enlivening energy of the Holy Spirit in the human spirit. In such agency there is no division of the work between the divine and the human. Man does not cooperate with God in it. The entire quickening and creating anew is the act of God alone The proper phraseology for it is actuating, enabling, and inclining. In the second instance, that of sanctification. there is a union of the divine with the human energy and a division of the work between the two. The now regenerate will cooperates with the Holy Spirit. It “works out its salvation with fear and trembling, because God works also within it to will and to do” (Phil. 2:12-13). The proper phraseology for this is helping, assisting, and stimulating. When the Holy Spirit actuates and inclines the human will, he does the whole. But when he helps, excites, and assists it, he does a part. In actuating, enabling, and inclining, the parties are not coordinate, each working on its own basis and contributing a divine and a human factor to the common result, but one is subordinate and the other controlling. In regeneration God moves upon the human soul prior, in the order of nature, and the soul then moves in conversion (not regeneration) as a consequence. The agency of each, in this instance, is total and undivided, not partial and shared with the other. God quickens, actuates, enables, and inclines the human will without the will’s assisting or helping in this because as ungenerate it sinfully resists; and the will, as the effect of this divine agency, converts, in the acts of faith and repentance, without God’s sharing in this converting activity. As man does not participate and share in the regenerating and inclining of the will, so God does not participate and share in the believing and repenting of the will. God is the sole author of regeneration, and man is the sole actor in conversion, namely, in faith and repentance. Thus there is no cooperation between the divine and the human in either regeneration or conversion. God alone regenerates as the cause. There are not two causes of regeneration, one divine and one human. Man alone converts, that is, believes and repents as the effect of regeneration. There are not two faiths and repentances— one in God and the other in man. But in sanctification the case is different. Here the growth and increase of the principle of holiness is an effect of the union and cooperation of the agency of the Holy Spirit with that of the regenerate will.

The neglect to distinguish between creating anew, enabling, actuating, and inclining the human will and helping, assisting, and stimulating it has led to much error. Synergism in regeneration results from overlooking this distinction. What is true of sanctification alone is transferred to regeneration.

6.3.5 (see p. 770). If the affections, as in the elder Calvinism, are regarded as modes of the inclination of the will, we may speak also of the expulsive power of a new inclination. The regeneration of the will is the origination de novo[36] of a new inclination to God as the ultimate end. and this expels the old inclination, inherited from Adam, to self and the creature. This expulsion, however, leaves some remainders of the old inclination, which act like thi old inclination in every respect, excepting their degree. They hav< the same spontaneousness and self-motion, only less strength They do not wholly dominate the man as the old inclination, or “ok Adam’ as St. Paul calls it, did. And they grow weaker, as the “ol< Adam” does not in the unregenerate. The regenerate man die! more and more to sin and lives more and more to holiness. Th< “new man” or new inclination is the stronger man within the hous< and has bound the “strong man” who still remains in it and keep; up a conflict that is severe and exhausting, but is a losing battli and a defeat in the end.

Now it is to be observed that in this process of progressivi sanctification there is the freedom of self-determination, but not o optional choice. These remainders of original sin or of sinful incli nation are a self-motion that antagonizes the self-motion of the nev inclination. One self-determination is opposed to another. The twi are “the flesh, which lusts against the spirit, and are contrary th< one to the other, so that you cannot do the things that you would (Gal. 5:17). These remainders of sinful self-determination canno be removed by a power to the contrary inherent in themselves, bu must be expelled by the superior energy of the new inclination t(holiness. Sin must be driven out by holiness, not convert itself int< holiness. This would be the casting out of Satan by Satan, whicl our Lord asserts to be a contradiction and impossibility. There ii no evolution of holiness out of sin or transmutation of sin into holi ness by the exercise of a power of contrary choice

6.3.6 (see p. 772). Since regeneration precedes conversion in th< order of nature, not of time, it precedes justification in the sami order, because faith precedes justification, and faith is one of th< acts of conversion. An unbeliever is not justified: “A man is justi tied by faith, without the deeds of the law” (Rom. 4:28). But it doe: not follow from this that regeneration is the cause or ground of jus tification, as Domer asserts in objection to this statement (Chris lian Doctrine4.206). One thing may be antecedent to another, anr, yet not the cause of it: posf hoc, non ergo propter hoc[37] The caus(or ground of justification is wholly objective, namely, the sacrifice and satisfaction of Christ. Nothing subjective (and both faith am repentance are subjective acts) enters into the cause or ground o justification. A sinner is not justified, that is. pardoned and accepts as righteous, because he is regenerated. The divine life implanta in regeneration cannot satisfy justice for sin nor merit eternal lif< for the sinner, both of which are requisite in order to justification But the sinner cannot appropriate Christ’s objective satisfaction bu by the act of faith in it, and he cannot exercise this faith if the Hoi] Spirit does not incline and enable him to it. And this inclining an< enabling is one consequence of the new birth and new life in th(soul: “Whosoever believes is born of God” (1 John 5:1).

6.3.7 (see p. 776). Howe (Redeemer’s Tears) thus speaks of th< sinner’s agency in respect to regeneration: “Here, perhaps, sinner; will inquire, Is there anything, then, to be done by us, whereupor the grace of God may be expected certainly to follow? To which answer: (1) That it is certain that nothing can be done by us t< deserve it or for the merit of which we may expect it to follow. I were not grace if we had obliged or brought it under bonds to u; by our deserts. (2) What if nothing can be done by us, upon whicf it may be certainly expected to follow? Is a certainty of perishinj better than a high probability of being saved? (3) Such as live unde the gospel have reason to apprehend it highly probable that the) may obtain that grace which is necessary to their salvation, if the; be not wanting to themselves. (4) For there is generally affordec to such that which is wont to be called common grace. Now, thougf this grace is not yet certainly saving, yet it tends to that which is so And none have cause to despair but that, being duly improved anc complied with, it may end in it. Let the consciences of men living under the gospel testify in the case. Appeal, sinner, to your own conscience: have you never felt anything of conviction by the word of God? Had you never any thought injected of turning to God, of reforming your life, of making your peace with God? Have no desires ever been raised in you, no fears? Have you never had any tastes and relishes of pleasure (Heb. 6:4-5) in the things of God? Whence have these come? What! from yourself, who is not sufficient to think anything as of yourself, i.e., any good or right thought. All must be from that good Spirit that has been striving with you and might still have been so unto a blessed issue for your soul, if you had not neglected and disobeyed it.

“And do not go about to excuse yourself by saying that all others have done so too, at one time or another; and if that therefore be the rule and measure, that they that content against the strivings and motions of God’s Spirit must be finally deserted and given up to perish, who then can be saved? Think not of pleading so for your neglecting and despising the grace and spirit of God. It is true that herein the great God shows his sovereignty; when all that enjoy the same advantages for salvation deserve by their slighting them to be forsaken alike, he gives instances and makes examples of just severity and of the victorious power of grace, as seems him good. But our present design is not to justify your condemnation, but to procure your salvation; and therefore to admonish and instruct you, that though you are not sure, because some others that have slighted and despised the grace and Spirit of God are, notwithstanding, conquered and saved thereby, it shall therefore fare as well with you, yet you have reason to be confident and hopeful it will be well and happy for you, if now you despise and slight them not.”

6.3.8 (see p. 781). In saying that if the unregenerate “suppresses conviction of sin and nullifies common grace, then God may withdraw all grace,” conditional preterition does not logically follow. God may do this, but it is not infallibly certain that he will. He is sovereign to do as he pleases. He does not invariably condition his preterition upon the sinner’s action, invariably refusing regenerating grace to all who nullify common grace and invariably bestowing it upon all who according to the Arminian view do not nullify it. God does not pass by one of two persons in the bestow-ment of saving grace because of original sin or of actual transgression (Rom. 9:11) or of foreseen perseverance in sin or of foreseen resistance of common grace, for these are all of them characteristic of both persons alike and would be a reason for passing by both of them. Westminster Larger Catechism 68 declares that the nonelect "may be and often are outwardly called by the ministry of the word and have some common operations of the Spirit and for their willful neglect and contempt of the grace offered to them, being justly left in their unbelief, do never come to Jesus Christ." This is a statement of the possibility and probability, not of the decreed certainty in the case. As the right use of common grace makes it probable but not infallibly certain that saving grace will follow (see pp. 776-77). so the abuse of common grace makes it probable but not infallibly certain that saving grace will not follow. The catechism says that the nonelect "may be and often are justly left because of their neglect of common grace"; but it does not say that they are always and invariably left because of this neglect. If it did, it would teach conditional preterition.

6.3.9 (see p. 781). Respecting the encouragement which the sinner has to seek salvation because of the probability, in distinction from the infallible certainty, that the right use of common grace will be followed by saving grace, Howe (Blessedness of the Righteous, chap. 17) thus remarks: "Why should you imagine so sad an issue as that after your utmost endeavors grace should be withheld and leave you to perish, because God has not bound himself by promise to you. What promise have the ravens to be heard when they cry? Experience tells the world that God's unpromised mercies freely flow everywhere. The whole earth is full of his goodness. God promises sinners, indefinitely, pardon and eternal life, for the sake of Christ, on condition that they believe on him. He gives of his good pleasure that grace whereby he draws any to Christ, without promise directly made to them. His discovery of his purpose to give such grace, indefinitely, amounts not to a promise claimable by any; for if it be said to be an absolute promise to particular persons, who are they? whose duty is it to believe it made to him? God [in common grace] binds himself to do what he promises [namely, to save on condition of faith]; but has he anywhere bound himself to do no more? Did he promise you your being, or that you should live to this day? Did he promise you the bread that sustains you or the daily comforts of your life? Yea, what is nearer the present purpose, did he promise you a station under the gospel or that you should ever hear the name of Christ? If ever his Spirit have in any degree moved upon your heart and inclined you at all seriously to consider your eternal concernments, did he beforehand make you any promise of that? A promise would give you a full certainty of the issue, if it were absolute and unconditional; if conditional, as soon as you perform the condition. But can you act upon no lower rate than a foregoing certainty, a preassurance of the event? My friend, consider a little, that it is hope, built with those that are rational upon rational probability, with some oftentimes without hope at all, which is the great engine that moves the world, that keeps all sorts of men in action. Does the husbandman foreknow when he plows and sows that the crop will answer his cost and pains? Do you foreknow when you eat, it shall refresh you? when you take physic, that it shall recover your health and save your life? The Lord knows that in these cases men can be confident and active enough without a promise of infallible success. Will you not. upon the probability and hope you have before you, do as much for your soul?”

6.3.10 (see p. 782). Ursinus (Christian ReligionQ. 74) thus replies to the objection that infants should not be baptized because belief is the requisite to baptism and infants cannot believe: “We deny the proposition which denies that infants do believe; for infants of believers regenerated by the Holy Spirit have an inclination to believe, or do believe by inclination; for faith is in infants potentially and by disposition, albeit faith be not in them actually as in those who are of age and understanding. And as unregenerate infants who are without the church have no actual impiety and wickedness, but an inclination only to wickedness, so godly infants who are in the church have not actual piety and godliness, but an inclination only to godliness; not by nature, indeed, but by the grace of the covenant. Infants have the Holy Spirit and are regenerated by him, as John was filled with the Holy Spirit when as yet he was in the womb; and it was said to Jeremiah, Before you came out of the womb I sanctified you.’ If infants have the Holy Spirit, then, doubtless, he works in them regeneration, good inclinations, new motions, and all other things which are necessary unto salvation; as Peter says, Who can forbid water from them who have received the Holy Spirit as well as we?' Wherefore Christ numbered little children among believers: He who offends one of these little ones which believe in me.' Wherefore infants do not profane baptism, as the Anabaptists slander us."

In answer to the objection that if infants are to be baptized they should also partake of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, Ursinus Q. 74 replies: "Unto baptism, regeneration by the Holy Spirit and faith or an inclination to faith and repentance suffices; but in the supper conditions are added and required which hinder the use thereof to be granted unto infants. For in Scripture it is required (1) that they who use the sign show forth the death of the Lord and (2) that they try themselves whether they have faith and repentance or no. And seeing the age of infants cannot do these things, it is manifest that infants are for good cause excluded from the supper but not from baptism."

Conversion

Conversion is that action of man which results from regeneration.[1] As the etymology implies, it is turning toward (converto) a certain point and away from a certain point. Conversion consists of two acts: faith and repentance. Faith is turning to Christ as the ground of justification and away from self as the ground. Repentance is turning to God as the chief end of existence and away from the creature as the chief end. Faith and repentance are converting acts; the first having principal reference to justification, the second to sanctification; the first to the guilt of sin, the second to its corruption.

Westminster Confession 14.2 defines faith in Jesus Christ as "a saving grace, whereby we receive and rest upon him for salvation." There is a difference between belief (assensus) and faith (Jiducia). The first is assent to testimony; the last is assent to testimony and also trust in the person who gives the testimony: "Justifying faith not only assents to the truth of the promise, but receives and rests upon Christ for pardon" (Westminster Larger Catechism 72). There may be belief without faith. A man may credit the statements made by Jesus Christ and yet not rest in him for salvation. Faith is a "saving grace," but belief is not. All who are not skeptics believe the testimony of Christ and his apostles, but not all who are not skeptics have faith. Faith is accompanied with love; belief is not: "The devils believe and tremble." The natural man believes that God is merciful, but does not trust in his mercy.

This distinction is marked in the New Testament, by the use of the prepositions connected with the verb or noun. Pisteud[2] when used in reference to Christ is accompanied with en,[3] eis,[4] and epi[5] because the object is to denote rest and reliance upon his person. Paul said to the jailer, "Believe on (pisteuson epi)[6] the Lord Jesus Christ, and you shall be saved." He did not bid him merely to believe that the statements which he had heard from Paul respecting Christ were correct. He bade him do much more than this, namely, receive and rest on Christ himself as a living and personal Redeemer. Had he asked only for the assent of the mind to testimony, he would have said: “Believe the Lord Jesus Christ.” (See supplement 6.4.1.)

The same use of the prepositions is sometimes associated with the term gospel because of its connection with Christ: “Repent and believe (pisteuete en)[7] the gospel” (Mark 1:15). Even when there is no preposition, pisteuo[8] sometimes denotes trust: “Christ did not commit himself(ouk episteuen heauton)”[9] (John 2:24); “who will commit (tis pisteusei)[10] to your trust the true riches?” (Luke 16:11); “unto them were committed (episteuthesan)[11] the oracles” (Rom. 3:2); “the gospel of circumcision was committed to me” (Gal. 2:7); “I know whom I have believed (ho pepisteuka)[12] or trusted in (2 Tim. 1:12). An instance of mere belief in testimony is found in Mark 11:31: “Why did you not believe him (diati ouk episteusate auto)?”[13]

This fiducial or confiding nature of faith is taught in the phrases looking to Christ, receiving Christ, eating his flesh, and drinking his blood. The definition which makes faith merely belief in testimony converts Christ into a witness only. He is this, but much more: a prince and savior; a prophet, priest, and king; a person not to be believed merely, but to be believed in and on.

Faith is an effect of which regeneration is the cause. This is taught in the following: “Whosoever believes that Jesus is the Christ is born of God” (1 John 5:1); “unto you it is given, in behalf of Christ, to believe on him” (Phil. 1:29); “we pray that God would fulfill [in you] all the good pleasure of his goodness and the work of faith with power” (2 Thess. 1:11); “that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God” (1 Cor. 2:5); “no man can come to me except the Father which has sent me draw him; no man can come unto me, except it were given him of my Father” (John 6:44, 65); “by him, do you believe in God, that raised him up from the dead and gave him glory; that your faith and hope might be in God” (1 Pet. 1:21). The order and connection between regeneration and faith is taught by our Lord. After announcing the doctrine of regeneration to Nicodemus in John 3:3 (“except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God”), he then in 3:14-18 proceeds to speak of his own atonement for sin and of man's trust in it: "The Son of Man must be lifted up, that whosoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life." That great change which Christ denominates being "born again" manifests itself first of all in an act of reliance upon Christ's blood of atonement. Saving faith in the person and work of the Redeemer follows regeneration and always presupposes it.

The following particulars are to be noted.

Evangelical faith is an act of man. The active nature of faith in Christ is indicated in the scriptural phraseology, which describes it as "coming to Christ" (Matt. 11:28), "looking to Christ" (John 1:29), "receiving Christ" (3:11), and "following Christ" (8:12). The object of the Epistle of James is to teach that faith is an active principle. "Dead faith" the epistle defines to be "faith without works," that is, pretended faith that does not work. The hypocrite merely "says" that he has faith (James 2:14).

Evangelical faith is an act of both the understanding and the will. It is complex, involving a spiritual perception of Christ and an affectionate love of him. (a) That faith is an intelligent act is proved by the following: "They shall be all taught by God. Every man, therefore, that has heard and has learned of the Father, comes unto me" (John 6:44—45; 2 Cor. 3:14; 4:4); God gives "the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Christ" (Eph. 1:17-18); "you have an unction from the Holy One, and you know all things" (1 John 2:20). (b) That faith is an affectionate and voluntary act is proved by the following: "Faith works by love" (Gal. 5:6); "peace be to the brethren, and love, with faith from God the Father" (Eph. 6:23; 3:17; 4:16; 5:2; Col. 2:2; 1 Thess. 3:12; 5:8; 1 Tim. 1:14); "hold fast the form of sound words, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. 1:13).

Evangelical faith is the particular act that unites the soul to Christ. For this reason, it stands first in the order of the acts that result from regeneration: "The Holy Spirit applies to us the redemption purchased by Christ, by working faith in us and thereby uniting us to Christ in our effectual calling" (Westminster Shorter Catechism Q. 30). Penitence for sin, love of holiness, hope, long-suffering, patience, temperance, etc., are none of them acts by which Christ's atonement for sin is laid hold of and made personal. Trusting faith is the special exercise of the soul by which this is done, and hence faith is the first thing commanded: “Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and you shall be saved” (Acts 16:13); “this is the work of God, that vou believe on him whom he has sent” (John 6:29).[14]

The union with Christ by faith is not natural and substantial, like that between Adam and his posterity. Nor is it moral or social, like that between individuals in a corporation or state. Its characteristics are the following, (a) It is a spiritual union because of its author, the Holy Spirit: “He that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit” (1 Cor. 6:17); “by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body” (12:13); “hereby we know that he abides in us, by the Spirit which he has given us” (1 John 3:24; 4:13). (b) It is a vital union because it involves a divine and spiritual life derived from Christ: “Because I live, you shall live also” (John 14:19); “he that believes in me though he were dead, yet shall he live” (11:25); “I live; yet not I, but Christ lives in me” (Gal. 2:20). (c) It is an eternal union: “They shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand” (John 10:28); “who shall separate us from the love of Christ?” (Rom. 8:35-39; 1 Thess. 4:14, 17). (d) It is a mystical, that is, mysterious union: The elect are “mystically joined to Christ” (Westminster Larger Catechism 67); “this is a great mystery; I speak concerning Christ and the church” (Eph. 5:32). The spiritual union between Christ and his people is individual, not specific. It does not rest upon unity of race and nature. It results from regeneration, not from creation. Consequently, it is not universal, but particular.[15]; Upon this spiritual and mystical union reststhe federal and legal union between Christ and his people. Because they are spiritually, vitally, eternally, and mystically one with him, his merit is imputable to them, and their demerit is imputable to him. The imputation of Christ’s righteousness supposes a union with him. It could not be imputed to an unbeliever, because he is not united to Christ by faith.

Saving faith terminates on Christ as its object and upon Christ in all three of his offices: prophet, priest, and king. Since, however, guilt is a prominent fact in man’s condition, the priestly office is prominent in relation to faith as described in Scripture. Under the levitical economy, faith was indispensable. The typical sacrifice must be offered trusting in the promise of God concerning the Messiah. Merely to bring and slay a lamb, as an opus operatum,[16] was not sufficient. There must be filial reverence for the divine command and confidence in the divine promise of mercy through the coming Redeemer.

The second effect of regeneration is repentance. The word metanoia[17] denotes a change of the mind (nous).[18] But "mind" is employed in the sense of disposition, will, or inclination, as in Rom. 7:25: "With the mind (noi),[19] I myself serve the law of God." It is an instance in which nous[20] is put for kardia[21] (see pp. 516-17). The word metamelomai[22] is sometimes employed to denote the genuine sorrow that accompanies repentance: "Afterward he repented and went" (Matt. 21:29); "though I made you sorry, I do not repent though I did repent" (2 Cor. 7:8); "and you, when you had seen it, repented not afterward that you might believe him" (Matt. 21:32); "the Lord swore and will not repent" (Heb. 7:21). In Matt. 27:3 it denotes the impenitent remorse of Judas. But metanoia[23] not metameleia[24] is the technical term in the New Testament for repentance. The difference between penitence and remorse is described in 2 Cor. 7:9-10. Penitence is "godly sorrow" and is one of the elements in repentance.

The definition of repentance in Westminster Confession 15.2 comprises the following particulars: (a) "a sense not only of the danger, but of the odiousness of sin"; (b) "the apprehension of God's mercy in Christ"; (c) "grief for and turning from sin";[25] (d) "the purpose and endeavor to walk in God's commandments": "Then shall you remember your own evil ways and shall loathe yourselves in your own sight for your iniquities" (Ezek. 36:31); "against you, you only, have I sinned; that you might be justified when you speak and clear when you judge" (Ps. 51:4); "that you sorrowed after a godly sort what carefulness it wrought in you, yea what indignation, what fear, what vehement desire, what zeal" (2 Cor. 7:11; Ezek. 18:30-31; Joel 2:12-13; Amos 5:15; Ps. 119:128); "I have heard Ephraim bemoaning himself thus: You have chastised me as a bullockunaccustomed to the yoke; turn unto me, and I shall be turned; for you are the Lord my God" (Jer. 31:18-19).

Though faith and repentance are inseparable and simultaneous, yet in the order of nature, faith precedes repentance: "They shall look on me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him as one mourns for his only son" (Zech. 12:10); "a great number believed and turned unto the Lord" (Acts 11:22). This order is evinced by the following particulars:

1. Faith is the means, and repentance is the end. Faith leads to repentance, not repentance to faith. The Scriptures present God's mercy in redemption as the motive to repentance: "Turn, O backsliding children, says the Lord; for I am married unto you" (Jer. 3:14); "turn unto the Lord vour God, for he is gracious and merciful" (Joel 2:13).

2. Repentance involves turning to God; but there can be no turning but through Christ: "No man comes unto the Father but by me" (John 14:6); "I am the door" (10:9).

3. If repentance precedes faith, then it stands between the sinner and Christ. The sinner cannot go to Christ "just as he is," but must first make certain that he has repented.

4. If repentance precedes faith, then none but the penitent man is invited to believe in Christ. This contradicts Rom. 5:6: "Christ died for the ungodly." Impenitent sinners are commanded to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ in order to the remission of their sins.

5. The doctrine that repentance precedes faith tends to make repentance legal, that is, a reason why Christ should accept the sinner.

6. God out of Christ and irrespective of faith in Christ is a consuming fire (Deut. 4:24; Heb. 12:29). It is impossible to have godly sorrow with this view of God. Only remorse and terror are possible. In such passages as Mark 1:15 ("repent and believe the gospel") and Acts 20:21 ("testifying repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ") the end is mentioned first and the means last. In a proposition, a term may have a position verbally which it has not logically. In Jer. 31:34 sanctification is mentioned before pardon: "They shall all know me, for I will forgive their iniquity."[26]

6.4.1 (see p. 787). The fundamental position of faith as the effect the following: “Origen (tractate in Matt. 16) expressly denies the • and evidence of regeneration, as the act that unites the soul with words to be spoken of Peter: If you shall think that the whole Christ, as the instrumental cause of justification, and as the church was built on Peter alone, what shall we say of John and antecedent of repentance is indicated by our Lord’s words to Peter: each of the apostles? Shall we dare to say that the gates of hell “Upon this rock I will build my church” (Matt. 16:18) That the rock shall not prevail against Peter alone? Hilary (Concerning Ihe Trin- spoken of was the faith, not the person of Peter, was a commonity 2) says: This is the only immovable foundation; this is the rock explanation of the fathers Owen (Person of Christ, preface) cites of faith confessed by Peter, You are the Son of the living God.’And Epiphanius (Heresies 39) declares, Upon this rock of assured faith (epi te petra taute tes asphalous pisteos)[27] I will build my church.’ One or two more out of Augustine shall close these testimonies (Sermon concerning Ihe Words of the Lord 13): ‘Upon this rock which you have confessed, upon this rock which you have known, saying, You are Christ, the Son of the living God, I will build my church, that is, on me myself, the Son of the living God, I will build my church. I will build you upon myself, and not myself on you ‘ And he more fully declares his mind in tractate 124 on John: The church in this world is shaken with divers temptations, as with floods and tempests, yet falls not because it is built on the rock (petra) from which Peter took his name. For the rock is not called petra from Peter, but Peter is so called from petra the rock; as Christ is not so called from Christian, but Christian from Christ. Therefore, said the Lord, Upon this rock will I build my church; because Peter had said, You are Christ, the Son of the living God. Upon this rock which you have confessed will I build my church. For Christ himself was the rock on which foundation Peter himself was built. For other foundation can no man lay. save that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ.’“

Peter’s confession of faith in Christ is the model for all believers and is represented by Christ as the “rock” upon which his church is built (Matt. 16:18). Peter himself so understood the declaration of his Lord. He says, “It is contained in Scripture. Behold I lay in Zion a chief cornerstone, elect, precious, and the stone which the builders disallowed is made the head of the corner" (1 Pet. 2:6-7). Leighton thus expounds this passage: "Jesus Christ is the alone rock upon which his church is built, not Peter (if we will believe Peter himself, who here teaches us that Christ is the chief cornerstone of his church), much less his pretended successors." Nothing can be more incredible than the Romish invention that Christ is a cornerstone that rests upon the person of one of his disciples as the ledge (petra)[28] or lower foundation.

images Justification

Preliminary Considerations

Justification is one of the most important doctrines in the Christian system. It supposes faith, and faith supposes regeneration: “Whosoever believes that Jesus is the Christ is born of God” (1 John 5:1); “I will put my law in their inward parts and write it in their hearts; for I will for-give their iniquity and will remember their sin no more” (Jer. 31:33-34). This order is given in Westminster Larger Catechism Q. 67: The “mind being enlightened” and “the will being renewed,” the person is “enabled to accept Christ as offered in the gospel.” Faith unites with Christ, and union with Christ results in justification. This is defined in Westmin-ster Shorter Catechism Q. 33 to be “an act of God’s free grace wherein he pardons all our sins and accepts us as righteous in his sight, only for the righteousness of Christ imputed to us and received by faith”; “through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins; and by him, all that believe are justified from all things from which you could not be justified by the law of Moses” (Acts 13:38-39); “all have sinned and have come short of the glory of God, being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus” (Rom. 3:23-24); “to him that works not but believes on him that justifies the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness” (4:5, 6-8; 5:17-19; 8:30); “of God are you in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom and righ-teousness and sanctification and redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30; 2 Cor. 5:19, 21; Eph. 1:7; 2:8; Phil. 3:9; Jer. 23:6); “the just [justified] shall live by his faith” (Heb. 2:4).

The justification of a sinner is different from that of a righteous person. The former is unmerited; the latter is merited. The former is without good works; the latter is because of good works. The former is pardon of sin and accepting one as righteous when he is not; the latter is pronouncing one righteous because he is so. The former is complex; the latter is simple.

The justification of the “ungodly” (Rom. 4:5; 5:6) includes both pardon and acceptance. Either alone would be an incomplete justification of the ungodly. In the case of a sinner, the law requires satisfaction for past disobedience and also perfect obedience. When a criminal has suf-fered the penalty affixed to his crime, he has done a part, but not all that the law requires of him. He still owes a perfect obedience to the law in addition to the endurance of the penalty. The law does not say to the transgressor: “If you will suffer the penalty, you need not render the obedience.” But it says: “You must both suffer the penalty and render the obedience.” Sin is under a double obligation; holiness is under only a single one. A guilty man owes both penalty and obedience; a holy angel owes only obedience.

Consequently, the justification of a sinner must not only deliver him from the penalty due to disobedience, but provide for him an equivalent to personal obedience. Whoever justifies the ungodly must lay a ground both for his delivery from hell and his entrance into heaven. In order to place a transgressor in a situation in which he is dikaios[1] or right in every respect before the law, it is necessary to fulfill the law for him, both as penalty and precept. Hence the justification of a sinner comprises not only pardon, but a title to the reward of the righteous. The former is specially related to Christ’s passive righteousness, the latter to his active. Christ’s expiatory suffering delivers the believing sinner from the punishment which the law threatens, and Christ’s perfect obedience establishes for him a right to the reward which the law promises. The right and title in both cases rest upon Christ’s vicarious agency. Because his divine substitute has suffered for him, the believer obtains release from a punishment which he merits; and because his divine substitute has obeyed for him, the believer obtains a reward which he does not merit.

The meaning of the term justify must be determined by its Scripture use and connection, and not by the etymology merely. It may have two meanings, like “glorify” and “sanctify.” To “glorify God” and to “glorify the body” are different significations of the word. The one signifies to declare to be glorious, the other to make glorious. The clause sanctify the Lord God in your hearts employs the term sanctify differently from the clause you are sanctified. Similarly justify might mean “make just” (justum facere) as well as “pronounce just.” But in Scripture, it never means sanctify or make inwardly holy.

In the New Testament, the verb dikaiooō[2] signifies (a) to pronounce or declare to be just: “And the publicans justified God” (Luke 7:29); “that you might be justified in your sayings” (Rom. 3:4); and (b) to acquit from condemnation: “Justified from all things from which you could not be justified by the law of Moses” (Acts 13:39; Rom. 4:5-7; 5:1, 9; 8:30-33; 1 Cor. 6:11; Gal. 2:16; 3:11). That dikaioō[3] does not mean sanctifying or making just is proved by its antithesis to “condemning” (Deut. 25:1; Prov. 17:15; Isa. 5:23; 2 Chron. 18:6-7) and by its equivalents “imputing righteousness” and “covering sin” (Rom. 4:3, 6-8; 2 Cor. 5:19, 21).[4]

In order to be justified or pronounced righteous, a person must possess a righteousness (dikaiosynē)[5] upon the ground of which the verdict is pronounced. There are two kinds of righteousness upon the ground of which a person might be justified before divine law:

> 1. Legal righteousness or that of the covenant of works. This is perfect personal conformity to the law: “Moses describes the righteousness which is of the law, that the man which [perfectly] does those things shall live by them” (Rom. 10:5). A holy being is justified by this kind of righteousness. A sinner cannot be pronounced righteous upon the ground of legal righteousness or perfect obedience because he has not rendered it: “By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified” (3:20); “there is none righteous, no, not one” (3:10, 23; Acts 13:39; Gal. 2:16). The impossibility of man’s being justified by legal righteousness is relative, not absolute. If he had rendered perfect obedience, he would be pronounced just upon this ground: “The doers of the law shall be justified” (Rom. 2:13).
>
> 2. Gratuitous or evangelical righteousness or that of the covenant of grace. This is technically denominated “the righteousness of God” (Matt. 6:33; Rom. 1:17; 3:5, 21-22, 25-26; 10:3; 2 Cor. 5:21; Phil. 3:9; 2 Pet. 1:1). The Old Testament teaches it: “The Lord our righ-teousness” (Jer. 23:6; 33:16). It is so denominated to distinguish it from the ordinary ethical or legal righteousness which is the righteousness of man. In Rom. 10:3 this latter is called idian dikaiosynēn[6] and in Phil. 3:9 emen dikaiosynēn[7] .’ If > man should per-fectly obey the law, the righteousness would be the result of his own agency. It would be “his own righteousness.” But the “righteousness of God” is the result of God’s agency solely. Hence it is described (Rom. 4:6) as choris ergon (i.e., anthrōpou).[8] Man is not the author of it, in any sense whatever.

The “righteousness of God” is the active and passive obedience of incarnate God. It is Christ’s vicarious suffering of the penalty and vicarious obedience of the precept of the law which man has transgressed. It is Christ’s atoning for man’s sin and acquiring a title for him to eternal life. It is “gratuitous” righteousness, because it is something given to man outright, without any compensation or equivalent being required from him in return: “Ho, everyone that thirsts, come to the waters, and he that has no money; come, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price” (Isa. 55:1); “being justified gratuitously (dōrean)[9] by his grace” (Rom. 3:24). Since this evangelical “righ-teousness of God” is not inherent and personal to man, like the legal or ethical “righteousness of the law,” it has to be imputed to him: “David describes the blessedness of the man to whom God imputes righteousness” (Rom. 4:6, 9-10). Christ’s atoning death for sin is not the sinner’s atoning death for sin, but God imputes it to him, that is, he calls or reckons it his. Christ’s perfect obedience which merits eternal life is not the sinner’s perfect obedience, but God imputes it to him; he calls or reckons it his: “Abraham believed God, and it was counted (elogiotheē)[10] to him for righteousness. Now to him that works not, but believes on him that justifies the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness” (Gen. 15:6; Rom. 4:3, 5); “Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness” (James 2:23).

We have observed that in order that a person may be pronounced just, there must be a reason or ground for the verdict. Justification cannot be groundless and without a reason. The “righteousness of God” is the ground or basis upon which a believing sinner is pronounced to be righteous. Because Christ has suffered the penalty for him, he is pronounced righteous before the law in respect to its penalty and is enti-tied to release from punishment. Because Christ has perfectly obeyed the law for him, he is pronounced righteous before the law in respect to its precept and is entitled to the reward promised to perfect obedience. To pardon a believer and accept him as if he had rendered the sinless obedience which entitles to eternal reward is to impute “the righ-teousness of God” to him.

Justification: Its Characteristics and Results

The following particulars in connection with the justification of a sinner are to be noted. First, faith is the instrumental, not the procuring or meritorious cause of his justification: “God justifies, not by imputing faith itself, the act of believing, but by imputing the obedience and satisfaction of Christ” (Westminster Confession 11.1). The reasons are …

> 1. Because faith is an internal act or work of man. If the sinner’s act of faith merited the pardon of his sin and earned for him a title to life, he would be pronounced righteous because of his own righteousness and not because of God’s righteousness. Faith is denom-inated a work: “This is the work of God, that you believe” (John 6:29). It is the activity of the man, like hope and charity, and can no more be meritorious of reward or atoning for disobedience than these acts can be: “In a right conception, fides est opus; [11] if I believe a thing because I am commanded, this is opus;[12] (Selden, Table Talk).
>
> 2. Because, as an inward act of the believer, faith is the gift of God, being wrought within him by the Holy Spirit (Eph. 2:8; Phil. 1:29). But a divine gift cannot be used as if it were a human product and made the ground of pardon and eternal reward. A debt to God cannot be paid by man out of God’s purse, though it can be so paid by God himself.
>
> 3. Because the believer’s faith is an imperfect act. As such, it cannot be either atoning or meritorious.
>
> 4. Because faith is not of the nature of suffering and consequently cannot be of the nature of an atonement. The believing sinner is “justified by faith” only instrumentally, as he “lives by eating” only instrumentally. Eating is the particular act by which he > receives and appropriates food. Strictly speaking, he lives by bread alone, not by eating or the act of masticating. And, strictly speaking, the sinner is justified by Christ's sacrifice alone, not by his act of believing in it.

Second, the justification of a sinner is solely by Christ's satisfaction: "No man may look at his own graces as a part of his legal righteousness, in conjunction with Christ's righteousness as the other part. We must go wholly out of ourselves and deny and disclaim all such righteousness of our own" (Baxter, Spiritual Peace and Comfort 1.273 [ed. Bacon]). Justification does not depend partly upon the merit of Christ's work and partly upon that of the believer. The Tridentine theory is heretical at this point because it makes the believer's justification to rest upon Christ's satisfaction in combination with inward sanctification and outward works. Scripture explicitly teaches that justification is by faith alone—not by faith and works combined: "A man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law" (Rom. 3:28). Paul's "faith alone" in this passage must not be confounded with James's "faith that is alone" (James 2:17). The latter is spurious faith that produces no works, or "dead" faith.[13]

Third, the justification of a sinner is instantaneous and complete. It is a single act of God which sets the believer in a justified state or condition: "There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8:1); "who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? who is he that condemns?" (8:33-34); "he that hears my word and believes on him that sent me has everlasting life and shall not come into condemnation" (John 5:24).

Fourth, the justification of a sinner is an all comprehending act of God. All the sins of a believer—past, present, and future—are pardoned when he is justified. The sum total of his sin, all of which is before the divine eye at the instant when God pronounces him a justified person, is blotted out or covered over by one act of God. Consequently, there is no repetition in the divine mind of the act of justification, as there is no repetition of the atoning death of Christ upon which it rests: "Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, that he should offer himself often; for then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world; but now once in the end of the world has he appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself; and as he was once offered to bear the sins of many, unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time, without sin unto salvation. For by one offering he has perfected forever them that are sanctified" (Heb. 9:24-28; 10:14). (See supplement 6.5.1.)

While, however, there is no repetition of the divine act of justification, yet the consequences of it in the soul of the believer are consecutive. In the believer's experience, God is continually forgiving his sins. Divine mercy "is constantly absolving us by a perpetual remission of our sins" (Calvin 3.14.10). The one eternal act of justification is executed successively in time, as the divine decree is: "God does from all eternity decree to justify all the elect; nevertheless, they are not [consciously] justified, until the Holy Spirit does in due time actually apply Christ unto them" (Westminster Confession 11.4).

When a justified man commits sin, though his sin deserves eternal death, yet he is not exposed to eternal death as an unbeliever is and as he himself was prior to justification. But he experiences the withdrawal of divine favor and God's paternal chastisement. This may be very severe and painful and perhaps, sometimes, in the believer's experience may be almost equal to the distress of the unpardoned. David's experience during his backsliding was fearful in the extreme: "The sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell got hold of me" (Ps. 116:3); "day and night your hand was heavy upon me: my moisture is turned into the drought of summer" (32:4); "all your waves and your billows are gone over me" (42:7). Here in this life, the believer oftentimes suffermore than the unbeliever does. God deals with the former as with a son and causes him great mental distress for his soul's good; he deals with the latter as with a bastard and not a son (Heb. 12:8). Lazarus in this life suffered more than Dives did. At the same time, the true believer, under all this experience, is really and in the eye of God a justified and forgiven man. The believer himself may be in great doubt upon this point and sometimes may be on the brink of despair; but he is not cast off by God. David himself, after those dreadful passages in his experience, is enabled to hope in divine pity. He never falls into the absolute despair of the lost: "You have given commandment to save me" (Ps. 71:3); "why are you cast down, O my soul? hope in God; for I shall yet praise him for the help of his countenance" (42:5).

Some writers, in this reference, distinguish between "actual" and "declarative" justification. Cunningham and Buchanan make this distinction. Actual justification is the act in the divine mind; declarative jus-tification is the announcement of the divine act in the consciousness of the believer. The believer's experience has its fluctuations and varieties; but the act of God is one and immutable. A person may be actually justified, with little or even no confident and joyful sense of it, in some chapters of his experience. Yet a justified man will not absolutely lose the hope of justification and have the experience of blaspheming despair.

Fifth, the justification of a sinner includes a title to eternal life, as well as deliverance from condemnation. This is denoted by the clause accepting as righteous in the Westminster definition. Eternal life, as a reward, rests upon perfect obedience of the law. Had man rendered this obedience, he could claim the reward. He has not rendered it and hence cannot claim it. Yet he must get a title to it, or he can never enjoy it. The rewards of eternity must rest upon some good basis and reason. They cannot be bestowed groundlessly. Christ the God-man has perfectly obeyed the law; God gratuitously (dōrean,[14] chōris ergōn)[15] imputes this obedience to the believer; and the believer now has a right and title to the eternal life and blessedness founded upon Christ's theanthropic obedience. This is the second part of justification, the first part being the right and title to exemption from the penalty of the law, founded upon Christ's atoning sacrifice. Justification thus includes the imputation of Christ's obedience as well as of his suffering, of both his active and his passive righteousness.

Piscator, Tillotson, Wesley, and Emmons denied the imputation of Christ's active obedience, contending that justification is "pardon" alone, without "acceptance," or a title to life. They maintain that after the pardon of the believer's sin, on the ground of Christ's passive obedience, sanctification by the Holy Spirit ensues, and this earns the title to eternal life. The objections to this theory are the following: (a) The obedience of the believer is imperfect, but eternal life is the recompense of perfect obedience. The believer cannot claim such an immense reward for such an inferior service, (b) Even if after his regeneration the believer's obedience were perfect and sinless, he has been disobedient previously; but eternal life is promised only to a perfect obedience from the beginning of man's existence to the end of it. For these two reasons, the believer cannot establish a valid title to an infinite and eternal reward upon the ground of his imperfect and halting service of God here in this life. He must therefore foundit upon the perfect obedience of his Redeemer and expect entrance inti heaven because his substitute has obeyed for him, even as he expects ti escape retribution because his substitute has suffered for him. The rea son why the believer must press forward after perfect sanctification is tha he may be fit for heaven, not that he may merit heaven. Sinless petfec tion in the next life is not the ground and reason of the believer's futur reward, but the necessary condition of his future blessedness. If there b remaining sin, there must be, so far, unhappiness.

Passages of Scripture that prove the imputation of Christ's active obe dience are the following: "Through the obedience of one shall many b made righteous" (Rom. 5:19); "Christ is made unto us wisdom and righ teousness and sanctification" (1 Cor. 1:30); "he made him to be sin for us that we might be made the righteousness of God in him" (2 Cor. 5:21] This "righteousness" is complete and therefore includes a title to tb reward of righteousness: "You are complete in him" (Col. 2:10); "he ha made us accepted in the beloved" (Eph. 1:6); "in whom we have boldness and access with confidence" (3:12). The boldness and confidence impl that there is no deficiency in the justification effected for the believer b Christ. But if he were resting his title to eternal life upon his own char acter and works, he could be neither bold nor confident in the day of judg ment (1 John 4:17): "Whosoever believes shall not perish [this is pardon" but shall have eternal life [this is acceptance as righteous]" (John 3:16).

It is objected that the believer is represented as being rewarded fo his works and in proportion to his works in the last day. The reply is first, the reward of the last day is gracious, resulting from a covenan and promise on the part of God. It is the recompense of a parent to ; child, not the payment of a debtor to a creditor. God is not under ai absolute indebtedness to the believer founded on an independent agenc of the believer, but only a relative obligation established by himself an< depending upon his assistance and support in the performance of thi service. This is proved by the fact that the reward of a Christian is callec an “inheritance” (Matt. 55:34; Acts 20:32; Gal. 3:18; Eph. 5:5; Col. 1:12) The believer’s reward is like a child’s portion under his father’s will. Thi is not wages and recompense in the strict sense; and yet it is relative! a reward for filial obedience. If an angel under the legal covenant fail to keep the law in a single instance, he gets no reward; a redeemed mai under the evangelical covenant, though he often fails, yet gets his reward God graciously compensates the believer in Christ, because he is father! and compassionate toward his child and not because the reward ha been completely earned and is strictly due upon the principle of abstrac justice. Says Calvin (3.17.8-9):

> Where remission of sins has been previously received, the good works which follow are estimated by God far beyond their intrinsic merit; for all their imperfections are covered by the perfection of Christ, and all their blemishes are removed by his purity. Now if anyone urge as an objection to the righteousness of faith that there is a righteousness of works, I will ask him whether a man is to be reputed righteous on account of one or two holy actions, while in all the other actions of his life he is a transgressor of the law. This would be too absurd to be pretended. I will then ask him if a man is to be reputed righteous on account of many good works, while he is found guilty of any instance of transgression. This, likewise, my opponent will not presume to maintain in opposition to the law which pronounces a curse upon those who do not fulfill every one of its precepts. I will then further inquire if there is any work of man which doesnot deserve the charge of impurity or imperfection. Thus he will be compelled to concede that there is not an absolutely good work to be found in man that deserves the name of righteousness in the strict sense.

Eternal life is called a “gift” in Rom. 6:23, while eternal death is called “wages.” Again, the address of the judge in the last day to those who receive the reward of obedience is “come you blessed.” The reward is also a blessing. This would not be the language of a debtor who is discharging strict indebtedness to his creditors. The redeemed, also, when receiving their reward disclaim absolute merit: “When saw we you hungry and fed you? Or thirsty and gave you drink?”

Second, the object in considering the works of men in the final judgment is to evince the genuineness of faith in Christ and discriminate true from false believers, not to show that man’s works merit pardon and eternal life. Those who have done good works are described as humble and surprised that they receive such an immense recompense for their poor service; while those who have not done good works are described as self-righteous and proud and surprised that they are punished and not rewarded: “Many shall say unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in your name? and then will I profess unto them, I never knew you” (Matt. 7:22); “then those on the left hand shall answer him, saying, Lord when saw we you hungry or athirst or a stranger or naked or sick or in prison and did not minister unto you?” (25:44). The parable of the laborers, all of whom receive the same wages though hired at different hours, proves that the rewards of the last day are not regulated by the exact value of the obedience rendered. Since the reward is the consequence of a promise and not of an original obligation on the part of God, God may do as he will with his own. He never pays less than he has promised, thereby becoming himself a debtor. The lord in the parable did not. But he may pay more than is due. (See supplement 6.5.2.)

An error of the perfectionist, at this point, is to be noticed. It is confounding imputed sanctification with inherent sanctification. Imputed sanctification is mentioned in 1 Cor. 1:30: “Christ was, of God, made unto us sanctification.” Inherent sanctification is inward holiness, as in 6:11: “You are sanctified.” In the former sense, a believer’s “sanctification” is instantaneous and perfect; but not in the latter. When God imputes Christ’s active obedience to the believer, Christ is “made sanctification” to him. It is a complete sanctification that is imputed, and his title to life founded upon it is perfect; but his inward sanctification or cleansing from indwelling sin is still imperfect. Sanctification as imputed is a part of justification; but sanctification as infused and inherent is the antithesis to justification. The perfectionist overlooks this distinction.

Sixth, justification is a means to an end. Men are justified in order that they may be sanctified; not sanctified in order that they may be justified. Redemption does not stop with justification: “Whom he justified, them he also glorified” (Rom. 8:30); “neither do I condemn you [i.e., I pardon you]; go and sin no more” (John 8:11). Pardon is in order to future resistance and victory over sin. The sense of forgiveness is accompanied with a hatred of sin and hunger after righteousness. If the latter be wanting, the former is spurious. An unpardoned man could not be sanctified because remorse and fear of retribution would prevent struggle with sin. David prays first for forgiveness in order that he may obey in future: “Purge [atone] me with hyssop; hide your face from my sins; then will I teach transgressors your ways” (Ps. 51:7, 13).

SUPPLEMENTS

6.5.1 (seep 797). Edwards (Justification by Faith in Won\s 4.104) thus explains the comprehensive nature of justification and its connection with perseverance of faith: “Although the sinner is actually and finally justified on the first act of faith, yet the persever-ance of faith even then comes into consideration as one thing upon which the fitness of acceptance to life depends. God, in the act of justification which is passed on a sinner’s first believing, has respect to perseverance as being virtually contained in that first act of faith; and it is looked upon and taken by him that justifies as being as it were a property in that faith that then is. God has respect to the believer’s continuance in faith, and he is justified by that, as though it already were, because by divine establishment it shall follow; and it being by divine constitution connected with that first faith as much as if it were a property in it, it is then considered as such, and so justification is not suspended; but were it not for this it would be needful that it should be suspended till the sinner had actually persevered in faith.

“And that it is so, that God in that act of final justification that he passes at the sinner’s conversion has respect to perseverance in faith and future acts of faith as being virtually implied in that first act is further manifest by this, namely, that in a sinner’s justification at his conversion there is virtually contained a forgiveness as to eternal and deserved punishment not only of all past sins but also of all future infirmities and acts of sin that they shall be guilty of; because that first justification is decisive and final. And yet pardon, in the order of nature, properly follows the crime and also follows those acts of repentance and faith that respect the crime pardoned, as is manifest both from reason and Scripture. David, in the beginning of Ps. 32, speaks of the forgiveness of sins that were doubtless committed long after he was first godly as being con sequent on those sins and on his repentance and faith with respect to them; and yet this forgiveness is spoken of by the apostle in Rom 4 as an instance of justification by faith. Probably the sin David there speaks of is the same that he committed in the matter of Uriah, and so the pardon the same with that release from death or eternal punishment which the prophet Nathan speaks of in 2 Sam. 12:13: The Lord also has put away your sin; you shall not die.' Not only does the manifestation of this pardon follow the sin in order of time, but the pardon itself in the order of nature follows David's repentance and faith with respect to this sin; for it is spoken of in the 32d psalm as depending on it.

"But inasmuch as a sinner in his first justification is forever jus-tified and freed from all obligation to eternal punishment, it hence of necessity follows that future faith and repentance are beheld in that justification as virtually contained in that first faith and repentance; because repentance of those future sins and faith in a Redeemer with respect to them or. at least the continuance of that habit and principle in the heart that has such an actual repentance and faith in its nature and tendency, is now made sure by God's promise If remission of sins committed after conversion, in the order of nature, follows that faith and repentance that is after them, then it follows that future sins are respected in the first justification no otherwise than as future faith and repentance are respected in it. And future faith and repentance are looked upon by him that justifies as virtually implied in the first repentance and faith in the same manner as justification from future sins is virtually implied in the first justification, which is the thing that was to be proved."

6.5.2 (see p. 800). Concerning the reward promised to works in the instance of the believer. Calvin (3.18.3), remarks that this rests upon the evangelical promise of the gospel, not the legal promise of the law: "The grand promise keep my statutes and judgments; which if a man do he shall live in them' (Lev. 18:5) the apostle maintains to be of no value to us if we rest upon it and that it will be no more beneficial to us than if it had never been given, because it is inapplicable to the holiest of God s servants, who are all far from fulfilling the law and are encompassed with a multitude of transgressions. But when these are superseded by the evangelical promises which proclaim the gratuitous remission of sins, the consequence is that not only our persons, but also our works, are accepted by God; and not accepted only, but followed by those blessings which were due by the covenant [of works] to the observance of the law. I grant, therefore, that the works of believers are rewarded by those things which the Lord has promised in his law to the followers of righteousness and holiness; but in this recompense it is always necessary to consider the cause which conciliates such favor to those works. This we perceive to be threefold: The first is that God averting his eyes from the actions of his servants, which are invariably more deserving of censure than of praise, receives and embraces them in Christ and by the intervention of faith alone reconciles them to himself without the assistance of works. The second is that in his paternal benignity and indulgence he overlooks the intrinsic unworthiness of these works and exalts them to such honor that he esteems them of some degree of value. The third cause is that he pardons these works as he receives them, not imputing the imperfection with which they are all so defiled that they might otherwise be accounted rather sins than virtues."

Again, in 3.18.1 he explains the relation of the believer's good works to his justification as follows: "The declaration that God will render to everyone according it his works is easily explained For that phrase indicates the order of events rather than the cause of them. It is beyond all doubt that the Lord proceeds to the consummation of our salvation by these gradations of mercy: 'Whom he has predestinated them he calls; whom he has called he justifies; and whom he has justified he finally glorifies' (Rom. 8:30). Though he receives his children into eternal life of his mere mercy, yet since he conducts them to the possession of it through a course of good works that he may fulfill his work in them in the order he has appointed, we need not wonder if they are said to be rewarded according to their works, by which they are prepared to receive the crown of immortality. And for this reason they are properly said to work out their own salvation.' while, devoting themselves to good works, they aspire to eternal life. Whence it appears that the word work is not opposed to grace, but refers to human endeavors; and therefore it does not follow either that believers are the authors of their own salvation or that salvation proceeds from their works. By their good works they prove themselves to be the genuine children of God, by their resemblance to their heavenly Father in righteousness and holiness."

Augustine's (Grace and Free Will 19-20) explanation is the following: "How is eternal life both a reward for service and a free gift of grace? This is no small question which must be solved by the Lord's gift. If eternal life is rendered to good works, as the Scripture most openly declares. 'Then he shall reward every man according to his works,' how can eternal life be a matter of grace, seeing that grace is not rendered to works, but is given gratuitously as the apostle himself tells us, 'To him that works is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt ? This question is not possible of solution unless we understand that even those good works of ours which are recompensed with eternal life are a part of the grace of God, because of what is said by the Lord Jesus, Without me you can do nothing' (John 15:5); and by the Apostle Paul, By grace are you saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works lest any man should boast.' Not of works' is spoken here of the works which you suppose have their originin yourself alone; but you have to think of works for which God has molded you. For of these the apostle says, 'We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works.' We are framed, therefore, that is formed and created, in the good works which' we have not ourselves prepared, but which God has before ordained that we should walk in them.' It follows, then, dearly beloved, that as your good life is nothing else than God's grace, so the eternal life which is the recompense of a good life is also the grace of God; moreover, the eternal life is given gratuitously, even as the good life is given gratuitously to which the eternal life is given. But that good life to which eternal life is given is solely and simply grace [not reward]; while this eternal life which is given to it is its [gracious] reward; grace is for grace, as a [relative] remuneration for righteousness, in order that it may be true, because it is true, that God 'shall reward every man according to his works.'"

Ursinus (Christian Religion Q. 52) thus explains Christ's ref-erence to the works of the believer in the day of judgment: "It is objected that unto every man shall be given according to his works: therefore judgment shall be given to all, not according to the gospel, but according to the doctrine of the law. Answer: In this sense it shall be given unto the elect according to their works; not that their works are merits, but in that they are the effects of faith. Wherefore, then, unto the elect shall be given according to their works; that is, they shall be judged according to the effects of faith; and to be judged according to faith is to be judged according to the gospel. Now Christ shall rather judge according to works as the effects of faith than according to faith as their cause (1) because he will have it known to others why he so judges, lest the ungodly and condemned persons might ob|ect that he gives us eternal life unjustly. He will prove by our works the fruits of our faith, that our faith was sincere and true and therefore we are such as those to whom life is due according to the promise. Wherefore he will show them our works and will bring them forth as testimonies to refute them that we have in this life applied unto us Christ's merit. (2) That we may have comfort in this life, that we shall hereafter, according to our works, stand at his right hand."

Santification

The term sanctify (hagiazein)[1] is employed in Scripture in two senses: (a) to consecrate or set apart to a sacred service or use: “Whom the Father has sanctified and sent” (John 10:36); “the temple that sanctifies the gold” (Matt. 23:17); and (b) to purify and make holy: “But you are washed, you are sanctified” (1 Cor. 6:11; Heb. 13:12); “sanctify them through your truth” (John 17:17). The latter is the sense in which it is taken when the doctrine of sanctification is discussed. Westminster Shorter Catechism Q. 35 defines as follows: “Sanctification is the work of God’s free grace, whereby we are renewed in the whole man after the image of God and are enabled more and more to die unto sin and live unto righteousness”; “God has chosen us that we should be holy” (Eph. 1:4); “you are washed, you are sanctified by the Spirit of our God” (1 Cor. 6:11); “God has chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit” (2 Thess. 2:13); “the very God of peace sanctify you wholly” (1 Thess. 5:23).

Sanctification results from the continuation of the agency of the Holy Spirit after the act of regeneration (a) in strengthening and augmenting existing graces: faith, hope, charity, etc.; and (b) in exciting them to exercise, through reading and hearing the word, the sacraments, prayer, providences, afflictions, and chastisements. Hence it is often called “renewing” (Ps. 51:10; 2 Cor. 4:16; Eph. 4:23; Col. 3:10; Rom. 12:2; Titus 3:5). “Renewing” or renovation in this use of the term is not synonymous with “regeneration.” When St. Paul exhorts the Ephesians (4:23) to “be renewed in the spirit of their mind,” he is not exhorting them to regenerate themselves, but to sanctify themselves. So also with the exhortation to “the house of Israel”: “Make you a new heart” (Ezek. 18:31).

Sanctification includes the entire man: “The very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless” (1 Thess. 5:23).[2] Sanctification affects (a) the higher rational and spiritual part of man’s nature, the pneuma[3] because this has been corrupted by the fall (Titus 1:15; Rom. 1:28; Eph. 4:18); (b) the inferior intelligence, the psychē[4] and (c) the body, sōma.[5] As apostasy began in the pneuma[6] and affected the other parts of human nature, so sanctification begins in the pneuma[7] and passes throughout the soul and body. A man can control his physical appetites in proportion as he has a vivid spiritual perception of God and divine things. The intuition in the pneuma[8] restrains the appetites of the psychē[9] and sōma.[10] If spiri-tual perception be dim, the bodily appetite is strong. That the higher nature, denominated pneuma[11] or nous,[12] is depraved and needs to be sanctified is proved by Rom. 1:28; 12:2; Eph. 4:17; 2 Tim. 3:8; Titus 1:15; Mark 1:23; 1 Thess. 5:23.

Sanctification is gradual: “We are enabled more and more to die to sin.” It is the conflict with and victory over indwelling sin described in Rom. 7:14-8:28. Romans 7-8 speak of the struggle and groaning of the still partially enslaved will: “Even we ourselves who have the firstfruits of the Spirit groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. For we are saved by hope. Likewise the Spirit also helps our infirmities and makes intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered” (8:23-24, 26).

The means of sanctification are (a) internal, namely, faith (“faith works by love”; Gal. 5:6), hope (“hope makes not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts”; Rom. 5:5), joy (“in whom you rejoice with joy unspeakable, receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls”; 1 Pet. 1:8-9), and peace (“the peace of God shall keep your hearts and minds, through Christ Jesus”; Phil. 4:7). The exercise of any one of these Christian graces increases the holiness of the believer. The means of sanctification are also (b) external, namely, the Scriptures (“sanctify them through your truth”; John 17:17; “desire the sincere milk of the word, that you may grow thereby”; 1 Pet. 1:22-23; 2:2), prayer (“whatsoever you shall ask in my name I will do it”; John 14:13-14; Acts 2:42), providential discipline (“every branch in me that bears not fruit, he purges”; John 15:2; Rom. 5:3^4; Heb. 12:5-11), and the sacrament of the supper (“they continued steadfastly in the apostles’ doctrine and fellowship and in breaking of bread and in prayers”; Acts 2:42).

The believer cooperates with God the Spirit in the use of the means of sanctification. Sanctification is both a grace and a duty: “Watch, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong” (1 Cor. 16:13); “take the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit which is the word of God, praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit and watching thereunto with all perseverance" (Eph. 6:16, 18); "work out your own salvation, for it is God who works in you" (Phil. 2:12-13). Hence sanctification is the subject of a command: "Put off the old man, and be renewed in the spirit of your mind" (Eph. 4:22-23); "make you a new heart and a new spirit" (Ezek. 18:31). Regen-eration, being the sole work of God, is a grace but not a duty. It is nowhere enjoined upon man as a duty to regenerate himself. (See supplement 6.6.1.)

Sanctification though progressive is not complete in this life: "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves" (1 John 1:8, 10); "brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended, but I press toward the mark" (Phil. 3:12-14); "I know that in me, that is in my flesh, dwells no good thing. I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind" (Rom. 7:18, 23; Gal. 5:7). Sanctification is completed at death: "The souls of believers at their death are made perfect in holiness" (Westminster Shorter Catechism Q. 37). The heavenly Jerusalem contains "the spirits of just men made perfect" (Heb. 12:23); "we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is" (1 John3:2); "absent from the body and present with the Lord" (2 Cor. 5:8); "Christ loved the church that he might sanctify it and present it to himself a glorious church not having spot or wrinkle" (Eph. 5:27); "now we see through a glass darkly; but when that which is perfect is come, face to face" (1 Cor. 13:12); "the pure in heart shall see God" (Matt. 5:8); "blessed are the dead who die in the Lord" (Rev. 14:13). (See supplement 6.6.2.)

Sanctification once begun is never wholly lost. It fluctuates with the fidelity of the believer, but he never falls back into the stupor and death of the unregenerate state: "They whom God has sanctified by his Spirit shall constantly persevere to the end and be saved" (Westminster Larger Catechism 79); "my sheep shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand" (John 10:28-29); "the gifts and calling of God are without repentance" (Rom. 11:29); "he which has begun a good work in you will perform it unto the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 1:6); believers are "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation" (1 Pet. 1:5).

Exhortations to diligence and warnings against carelessness and failure are consistent with the certain perseverance of the believer because (a) while the certainty is objective in God, it may not be subjective in man. God knows that a particular man will certainly persevere, because he purposes that he shall, and he will realize his purpose by the operation of his Spirit within him; but the man does not know this unless he has assurance of faith. Many believers do not have this highest degree of faith and hence are more or less subject to doubts and fears. Exhortations to diligence and warnings against apostasy suit such an experience as this. But one who is assured of salvation by the witness of the Holy Spirit would not require to be warned against apostasy while in this state of assurance. Such exhortations and warnings are also con-sistent with the perseverance of the believer because (b) exhortations to struggle with sin and warnings against its insidious and dangerous nature are one of the means employed by the Holy Spirit to secure perseverance. The decree of election includes the means as well as the end. Now if success in the use of means is certain, there is the strongest motive to employ them; but if success is uncertain, then there is little motive to use them. St. Paul employs the certainty of success as a motive to struggle: “Fight the good fight of faith; lay hold on eternal life, whereunto you are called” (1 Tim. 6:12).

It must be remembered that salvation is certain, not because the person believes that he has once believed in the past, but because he now consciously believes. If from his present experience and daily life he has reason to think that he is truly a believing Christian, then he has reason to expect that he will continue to be one. Cromwell, according to the anecdote, committed an error in inferring his good estate because he believed that he was once a believer.[13]

That sanctification is never lost is proved also by its connection with justification. Justification naturally tends to sanctification: “Faith worksby love” (Gal. 5:6). Trust in Christ’s blood of atonement spontaneously impels to the resistance of sin; and if there be no struggle against sin, it is clear proof that there is no true trust in Christ’s sacrifice. Justification supplies the only efficient motive to obedience. Hence the obedience of the believer is called “new obedience” because of the new motive from which it springs, namely, the atoning love of the Redeemer. It is also denominated

“the obedience of Christ” (2 Cor. 10:5). Gratitude to Christ and love of him for the forgiveness that comes through his death are the springs of this evangelical obedience and sanctification. The strongest inducement for a Christian to obey the divine law is the fact that he has been graciously pardoned for having broken the law. He follows after sanctification because he has received justification. He obeys the law not in order to be forgiven, but because he has been forgiven: “The love of Christ constrains us not to live unto ourselves, but unto him which died for us” (2 Cor. 5:4). And the love meant is Christ’s redeeming love: “Having these promises [of forgiveness], let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit” (7:1). Because God has blotted out all his past sin, the believer has the most encouraging of all motives to resist all future sin. Had God not pardoned the past, it would be futile to struggle in future. In 2 Pet. 1:4 it is said that the “exceeding great and precious promises are given to us in order that by these we might be partakers of a divine nature, having escaped the corruption of the world through lust.” Sanctification does not justify; but justification sanctifies. And there being this close connection between the two, sanctification can no more be wholly lost than justification can be.

The necessary connection between sanctification and justification is taught by both Paul and James, between whose views there is a verbal but not a logical contradiction. Paul in Rom. 4:4-13 assumes that saving faith is living faith and produces works, but he says nothing particularly upon this latter point because his object is to contrast faith and works and because the opponent with whom he was disputing did not claim to be justified by faith of any kind, true or false, but by works altogether. James, on the other hand, not only assumes that saving faith is living faith and produces works, but speaks particularly and emphatically upon this latter point because he is not contrasting faith and works because he was contending with hypocrites who claimed that what they called “faith alone” and “faith only” and what James calls “dead faith” is a faith that would save the soul. Hooker {Justification) remarks that justification is spoken of by St. Paul in the narrow sense as exclusive of sanctification, but by St. James in the wide sense as inclusive of it. Paul means justification without its fruits; James means justification with its fruits. The former speaks of faith simply; the latter of working faith. Paul describes faith as the antithe-sis of works; James describes faith as producing works.[14] (See supplement 6.6.3.)

SUPPLEMENTS

6.6.1 (see p. 804). That the regenerate can cooperate with the Holy Spirit, but the unregenerate cannot, is illustrated by the act of prayer. There is no sincere prayer for a spiritual good except as it is prompted by the Holy Spirit. The foundation of prayer is a sense of want; of spiritual poverty and need: “The Spirit helps our infirmities; for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself makes intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered” (Rom. 8:26); “I will pour out upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and of supplications” (Zech. 12:10); “praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit” (Eph. 6:18). All desires expressed in prayer that are prompted solely by unregenerate human nature and without the impulse of the Holy Spirit are vitiated by selfishness Man does not precede God. but God precedes man. in every exercise that is holy and spiritual. Consequently, when our Lord says. “Ask and you shall receive [the Holy Spirit],” he does not mean that the sincere desire and prayer for this blessing arises in the heart prior to any agency of the Holy Spirit upon it; but that the person who feels this desire has already been the subject of the Spirit’s influence to this degree and is to express the desire and so cooperate with the Spirit. In other words. Christ presupposes regeneration as shown in holy and spiritual desires and prayers, when he says. “Ask and you shall receive; for everyone that [sincerely] asks receives.” This line of remark is applicable to all the other means of sanctification. The regenerate cooperates with the divine Spirit in all struggling with sin, all attendance upon reading and hearing of the word, all confession of sin, all partaking of the Lord’s Supper, etc., because the Spirit has gone before him and moved upon his heart The unregenerate cannot thus cooperate in these acts because the action of his heart and will is not spiritual, but selfish. His prayers and use of the means of sanctification are prompted by fear, not by love. Consequently, the divine Spirit first regenerates the sinful heart prior to any right cooperating action in it, and then the regenerate heart coworks with the Holy Spirit.

Says Augustine (Grace and Free W/7/33): “God operates without our assistance in order that we may will rightly, but when we will rightly he cooperates with us.” Says Owen (Sin and Grace in Works 14 459 [ed Russell)): “The work of first conversion [regeneration] is performed by an immediate act of divine power, without any active cooperation on our part. But this is not the law or rule of the communication or operation of actual grace for the subduing of sin (in the regenerate]. This is given in a way of concurrence with us in the discharge of our duties, and when we are sedulous in them we may be sure we shall not fail of divine assistance.”

6.6.2 . (see p. 805). Bates (OlDeath, chap. 3) describes the com-pletion of sanctification at death: “Death is to a believer a universal remedy against all the evils of this life. It frees him from all injuries and sufferings and from sin in all its degrees, from all inclinations and temptations to it. He that is dead ceases from sin (1 Pet. 4:1). Death is the passage from this wilderness to the true Canaan, the rest above There nothing can disturb the peace or corrupt the purity of the blessed. Beside the privative advantage, the freedom from all the effects of God’s displeasure, there is the highest positive good obtained by death: the spirits of just men are made perfect in heaven The soul is the glory of man, and grace is the glory of the soul, and both are then in their exaltation. All the faculties of the soul are raised to the highest degrees of natural and divine perfection. In this life grace renews the faculties, but does not elevate them to their highest pitch. It does not make a mean understanding pregnant nor a frail memory strong nor a slow tongue eloquent, but sanctifies them as they are. But when the soul is released from this dark body of earth, the understanding is clear and quick, the memory firm, the will and affections ardent and vigorous And they are enriched with divine light and love and power that makes them fit for the most noble and heavenly operations. The lineaments of God’s image on the soul are first drawn here, but at death it receives his last hand. All the celestial colors are added, to give utmost life and luster to it. Here we are advancing, but by death we arrive at perfection.”

Respecting the possibility of complete sanctification in this life, Augustine, in his treatise Nature and Grace 49, 70, thus remarks: “Pelagius contends that the point lies in the possibility of a man’s not sinning; on which subject it is unnecessary for us to take ground against him, for in truth I do not much care about expressing a definite opinion on the question whether in the present life there ever have been or now are or even can be any persons who have had or are having or to have the love of God so perfectly as to admit no addition to it; for nothing short of this amounts to a most true, full, and perfect righteousness. For my own part, I am unwilling to dispute the point whether a sinless state is possible in this life." In this treatise and in Man's Perfection in Righteousness, written about the same time (A D. 415), Augustine does not deny the possibility of sinless perfection in this life—only it is by divine grace and not by the natural will as Pelagius asserted. But in his treatise Against Two Letters of the Pelagians (4.27) he says: "Let us consider the third point of theirs which is shocking to every member of Christ, that there have been righteous men having absolutely no sin." This treatise was written about 420. In 418 the Council of Carthage condemned the tenet of perfection in this life, in which decision Augustine must have had a leading part. Respecting complete sanctification at death, Augustine (Nature and Grace 70) says: "Whether there ever has been or is or can be a man living so righteous a life in this world as to have no sin at all may be an open question among true and pious Christians; but whoever doubts the possibility of this sinless state after the present life is foolish."

6.6.3 (see p. 806). Augustine (Grace and Free Will 18) explains the difference between Paul and James as follows: "Unintelligent persons with regard to the Apostle Paul's statement that we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law' have thought him to mean that faith suffices to a man even if he lead a bad life and does no good works Impossible is it that such a person should be deemed a vessel of election' by that apostle, who. after declaring that 'in Christ Jesus neither circumcision avail anything nor uncircumcision,' adds immediately, 'but faith, which works by love ' It is such [working] faith which separates God's faithful from unclean demons; for even these believe and tremble.' as the Apostle James says; but they do not work well Therefore they have not the faith by which the justified man lives, the faith which works by love in suchwise that God recompenses it according to its works with eternal life. But inasmuch as we have even our good works from God, from whom likewise comes our faith and our love, therefore the same great teacher of the Gentiles has designated eternal life' as his gracious gift' [as well as his recompense]."

The creeds, both Lutheran and Reformed, teach that justifying faith is working faith. The Formula of Concord 3.8 declares that “we are not to imagine any such justifying faith as can exist and abide with a purpose of evil, to wit: of sinning and acting contrary to conscience. But after that man is justified by faith then that true and living faith works by love (Gal. 5:6), and good works always follow justifying faith and are most certainly found together with it, provided only it be a true and living faith. For true faith is never alone, but has always charity and hope in its train.” Smalcald Article 13 declares that “good works follows this faith, renovation, and remission of sins. Furthermore, we say that where good works do not follow, there the faith is false, not true.[15]

The Irish Articles maintain that justifying faith is working faith and not faith which does not work, in the following manner: “When we say that we are justified by faith only, we do not mean that the said justifying faith is alone in man without true repentance, hope, charity, and the fear of God, for such a faith is dead and cannot justify; neither do we mean that this, our act, to believe in Christ, or this, our faith in Christ, which is within us, does of itself justify us or deserve our justification unto us, for that were to account ourselves to be justified by the virtue or dignity of something that is within ourselves; but the true understanding and meaning thereof is that although we hear God’s word and believe it, although we have faith, hope, charity, repentance, and the fear of God within us and add never so many good works thereunto; yet we must renounce the merit of all our said virtues, of faith, hope, charity, and all other virtues and good deeds which we have done or shall do or can do as things that be far too weak and imperfect and insufficient to deserve remission of our sins and our justification, and therefore we must trust only in God’s mercy and the merits of his most dearly beloved Son, our only Redeemer, Savior, and Justifier, Jesus Christ. Nevertheless, because faith does directly send us to Christ for our justification and that by faith given us by God we embrace the promise of God’s mercy and the remission of our sins, which thing none other of our virtues or works does, therefore the Scripture used to say that faith without works, that only faith does justify us.”

The faith which Paul and James both alike mean by justifying faith is not a faith to which works do not naturally belong, but are subjoined to faith from the outside, being produced by another act of the will than that of faith. Works, in their view, are produced by the one single act of faith itself and thus are an integral element and part of faith itself The same mental action which produces the faith produces the works. The works are not a separate addition to faith, but an issue from it. They can no more be separated, even in thought, from faith, than vegetable fruit can be from vegetable life. We do not conceive of grapes as something that can be produced ab extra[16] by another force than that of the vine and then added to the vital force of the vine, but as the spontaneous, natural, and necessary product of the vine's vitality and making

Faith and works, then, are two aspects or phases of one and the same principle of divine life in the soul. This one principle, viewed as cause, is faith; viewed as effect, is works—just as vegetable vitality and vegetable fruit are two aspects of one and the same principle of physical life. This one principle viewed as cause is the vitality of the vine stock; viewed as effect is the cluster of grapes. "It is not possible," says Owen (Justification, chap. 2). "that there should be any exercise of this faith unto justification but where the mind is prepared, disposed, and determined unto universal obedience. And therefore it is denied that any faith, trust, or confidence which may be imagined so as to be absolutely separable from and have its whole nature consistent with the absence of all other graces is that faith which is the especial gift of God and which in the gospel is required of us in a way of duty."

The alleged difficulty of harmonizing Paul and James arises, then, from an erroneous view of the relation of good works to living faith. If both of these are regarded as constituting a unity that has two phases or aspects, so that works are faith in operation and faith is works potentially, there is no contradiction in saying with Paul that a man is "justified by faith" (Rom. 3:28) and with James, that a man is "justified by works" (James 2:24). But if faith and good works are not regarded as a unity but as two separable and separate things, one of which can exist without the other, then it is contradictory to say with Paul that a man is "justified by faith" and with James that he is "justified by works."

Christlieb (Modern Doubt, 530) thus explains the subject: “The difference between Paul and James lies in the language used by each; inasmuch as what Paul usually designates as being saved’ (sōzesthai;[17] e.g., Eph. 2:8) is expressed by James by the word dikaiousthai,[18] which Paul generally applies to the first part of redemption, namely, justification.”

After this statement of the inseparability of good works from faith it is important to observe carefully that the works which naturally issue from faith are not the cause or ground of justification any more than the act of faith itself is. A man’s sins are not remitted nor does he acquire a title to eternal life because of his own merit in believing, but because of Christ’s merits in suffering and obeying for him; and neither does he obtain these benefits because of the good works that are inseparable from living faith.

7 Means of Grace

Preliminary Considerations

The means of grace are means of sanctification. They suppose the existence of the principle of divine life in the soul: “The outward and ordinary means whereby Christ communicates to his church the benefits of his mediation are all his ordinances; especially the word, sacraments, and prayer; all of which are made effectual to the elect for their salvation” (Westminster Larger Catechism 154). The means of grace are administered within the visible church and to its members.[1] Consequently, church membership is requisite to obtaining the benefits of the means of grace and sanctification. Some of these benefits cannot be enjoyed at all outside of the visible church: those, namely, connected with the administra-tion of the sacraments and the fellowship and watch of Christians; and none of them can be enjoyed in their fullness by one who has not separated himself from the world by confessing Christ before men.[2]

Confession of faith and church fellowship is a means of sanctification. This is one of “the ordinances of Christ,” all of which, according to the Westminster statement, are means of grace. Christ commands his disciples to confess him before men: “Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven” (Matt. 10:32-33; cf. 16:16-18). The use of this means of spiritual growth is often enjoined in the epistles (Rom. 10:9-10; Heb. 10:25).

Man is a social being, and his religious like his secular welfare depends upon association with others like-minded. Confession of faith and church membership promote sanctification (a) by personal sympathy and (b) by the watch and discipline of fellow Christians. Those who cherish a hope that they are believers, yet make no public acknowledgment of their faith, omit an important means of grace and hinder their own sanctification. Moreover, such a neglect of an explicit ordinance of Christ casts doubt upon the reality of the supposed faith. There would be more ground for hope were this doubt removed by the confession of faith.

The word of God is a means of grace and sanctification in two aspects of it. (a) As law its purpose is to point out the duty which God requires of man as a subject of his government. The effect of the word in this form upon the believer is to produce self-knowledge and humility. The believer by the law is made acquainted with indwelling sin. Meekness and lowliness of heart are the effect of the word in this aspect of it. He is kept "poor in spirit." (b) As gospel its purpose is to disclose the fullness of Christ to meet this spiritual poverty. Preaching should combine the two in just proportions in order to the sanctification of believers.

The efficacy of the word is from the Holy Spirit applying it. The Spirit does not operate upon the truth, but upon the soul: "Why do you not understand my speech? even because you cannot hear my word. He that is of God hears God's word: you therefore hear them not because you are not of God" (John 18:43, 47); "the natural man cannot know the things of the Spirit because they are spiritually discerned" (1 Cor. 2:14). In using the word, the divine Spirit works directly upon the soul and produces two effects: (a) the understanding is enlightened and enabled to perceive the truth spiritually and (b) the will is renewed and inclined toward it. The aversion of the heart to truth is overcome. Some Lutheran divines represent the Holy Spirit as operating upon the truth so that the truth becomes an efficient by means of this superadded quality or power. The Reformed theologians regard the Holy Spirit as the sole efficient and the truth as only an instrument. (See supplement 6.7.1.)

The sacraments are means of grace and sanctification.[3] In the classical meaning, sacramentum was the oath of allegiance taken by the soldier. It was also the money pledged by contending parties in a litigated case. It implied obligation of some kind. The classical is not the biblical or the ecclesiastical signification. The Latin fathers employed sacramentum as the equivalent of mystērion[4] The sacrament was a "mystery." The Vulgate translates mystērion[5] in Eph. 1:9; 3:23; 5:32 by sacramentum. But as a mystery is exhibited or explained by a symbol, the sacramentum was also a symbolum (Calvin 4.14.2).

In the biblical and ecclesiastical use, a “sacrament” is a sign or symbol of a Christian mystery: of the mystery of regeneration in the case of baptism, of the mystery of vicarious atonement in the case of the Lord’s Supper. These two sacraments exhibit and certify, by sensible emblems, to the believing recipient these two mysterious facts in redemption. Westminster Larger Catechism Q. 162 so defines: “A sacrament is a holy ordinance instituted to signify, seal, and exhibit to believers the benefits of Christ’s mediation, to strengthen their faith, to oblige them to obedience, to cherish their love and communion one with another.”

Lord’s Supper

The following are the fundamental positions in the Reformed theory of the sacraments:[6]

1. They are means of grace, dependent like the other means upon the accompanying operation of the Holy Spirit and consequent faith in the soul of the recipient: “All the energy of operation belongs to the Spirit, and the sacraments are mere instruments which without his agency are vain and useless, but with it, are fraught with surprising efficacy” (Calvin 4.14.9); “the grace which is exhibited in or by the sacraments is not conferred by any power in them; neither does the efficacy of a sacrament depend upon the piety or intention of him that does administer it, but upon the work of the Spirit” (Westminster Confession 27.3); “I indeed baptize you with water, but he shall baptize with the Holy Spirit” (Matt. 3:11); “by one Spirit we are all baptized into one body” (1 Cor. 12:13); “let a man examine himself and so let him eat” (11:28); “neither is that circumcision which is outward” (Rom. 2:28); “the antitype whereunto, namely, baptism, does also now save us (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God), by the resurrection of Jesus Christ” (1 Pet. 3:21).
2. In the sacrament of the supper, the bread and wine are both symbols and memorials of Christ’s body. They both emblematize and remind of a particular fact, namely, Christ's atoning death. This is founded on Luke 22:19: "This is [i.e., represents][7] my body; this do in remembrance of me." The first clause describes the sacrament as symbolic; the second as mnemonic: "Our Lord Jesus instituted the sacrament called the Lord's Supper for the perpetual remembrance of the sacrifice of himself in his death and a commemoration of the one offering of himself upon the cross" (Westminster Confession 29.1.2).

3. The act of truly partaking of the Lord's Supper is mental and spiritual, not physical and carnal. Westminster Confession 29.7 teaches that the "worthy receiver spiritually receives and feeds upon Christ crucified" and denies that he "carnally and corporally receives or feeds upon him." It also denies that "the body and blood of Christ are corporally or carnally in, with, or under the bread and wine" and asserts that they are "really, but spiritually, present to the faith of believers, as the elements themselves are to their outward senses."

The points in this statement of most importance are that the believer, in worthily partaking of the Lord's Supper, consciously and confidently relies upon Christ's atoning sacrifice for the remission of his sins. This is meant by the phrase feed upon Christ crucified. The allusion is to Christ's words in John 6:53-56: "Except you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you have no life in you." The flesh and blood of Christ signify the expiatory death of Christ. To "drink Christ's blood" is to trust in Christ's atonement in a vital manner and with a vivid feeling of its expiatory efficacy. The Lord's Supper can have no meaning if his vicarious sacrifice is denied. (See supplement 6.7.2.)

The "presence" of Christ is not in the bread or the wine, but in the soul of the participant. Christ, says the Westminster Confession, is "present to the faith of believers," and faith is mental and spiritual. The statement of Hooker (Polity 5.67) upon this point is explicit and excellent:

> The real presence of Christ's most blessed body and blood is not to be sought for in the sacrament, but in the worthy receiver of the sacrament. I see not which way it should be gathered by the words of Christ, when and where the bread is his body or the cup his blood;

> but only in the very heart and soul of him which receives them. As for the sacraments, they really exhibit, but for aught we can gather out of that which is written of them, they are not really nor do they really contain in themselves that grace which with them or by them it pleases God to bestow.

Again he remarks (5.67):

> No side denies but that the soul of man is the receptacle of Christ's presence. Whereby the question is driven to a narrower issue, nor does anything rest doubtful but this, whether, when the sacrament is administered, Christ be whole [wholly] within man only or else his body and blood be also externally seated in the very consecrated elements themselves. Which opinion they that defend are driven either to consubstantiate and incorporate Christ with elements sacramental or to transubstantiate and change their substance into his; and so the one to hold him really, but invisibly, molded up with the substance of those elements, the other to hide him under the only visible show of bread and wine, the substance whereof, as they imagine, is abolished, and his succeeded in the same room.

With this statement of Hooker, Calvin (4.17.31) agrees:

> They are exceedingly deceived who cannot conceive of any presence of the flesh of Christ in the supper, except it be attached to the bread. For on this principle they leave nothing to the secret operation of the Spirit, which unites us to Christ. They suppose Christ not to be present unless he descends to us; as though we cannot equally enjoy his presence, if he elevates us to himself. The only question between us, therefore, respects the manner of this presence; because they place Christ in the bread, and we think it unlawful for us to bring him down from heaven. Let the reader judge on which side the truth lies. Only let us hear no more of that calumny that Christ is excluded from the sacrament unless he be concealed under the bread. For as this is a heavenly mystery, there is no necessity to bring Christ down to the earth in order to be united to us.[8]

This view of Hooker and Calvin respecting the solely spiritual presence of Christ in the supper was that of the founders of the English church and entered into their form of worship. In the Office for the Communion of the Sick in the Episcopal prayer book, it is said:

> If a man by reason of extremity of sickness or any other just impediment do not receive the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, the minister shall instruct him that if he do truly repent him of his sins and steadfastly believe that Jesus Christ has suffered death upon the cross for him and shed his blood for his redemption, earnestly remembering the benefits he has thereby and giving him hearty thanks therefor, he does eat and drink the body and blood of our Savior Christ profitably to his soul's health, although he do not receive the sacrament with his mouth.

The Romish theory of the sacraments is that they convey both regenerating and sanctifying grace by their own nature and efficiency: by the mere external muscular performance (ex opere operato) of the rite of baptism or of the supper the effect is produced in the soul. Bellarmine (Concerning the Sacraments 2.1) defines the theory thus: "The sacraments convey grace by the virtue of the sacramental action itself instituted by God for this end and not through the merit of either the agent or the receiver."

The Lutheran doctrine of the sacrament of the supper teaches (a) that its efficacy is conditioned upon faith in the recipient (in this it agrees with Reformed doctrine) and (b) that its efficacy is due to an intrinsic virtue, resulting from the presence of Christ's glorified body in and with the bread and wine. This copresence of Christ's glorified body in the emblems makes the sacrament efficacious to the believer. In this, the Lutheran differs from the Calvinistic doctrine. The latter finds the efficacy of the sacrament of the supper solely in the operation of the Holy Spirit in the heart of the believer: "The sacraments become effectual means of salvation, not by any power in themselves, but only by the working of the Holy Spirit" (Westminster Larger Catechism 161).

The Lutheran asserts that Christ is "spiritually present in the sacrament of the supper as to the manner, but corporeally present as to the substance." That is to say, the substance of Christ's spiritual and glorified body as it now exists in heaven, not of his material and unglori-fied body as it once existed on earth, is actually present in and with the sacramental emblems. Consequently, the spiritual and glorified body of Christ is present in the bread and wine, wherever and whenever the sacrament is administered. This requires the ubiquity of Christ's glorified body, whereby it can simultaneously be in heaven and on earth. But the glorified body of Christ, like that of his people, though a spiritual body, has form and is extended in space. The description of Christ's body after his resurrection and at his ascension proves this. But one and the same form cannot occupy two or more spaces at one and the same moment. Christ's glorified body can pass from space to space instantaneously, but cannot fill two spaces at the same instant. When Christ's body passed through the "doors being shut" (John 20:26) and stood among the disciples, his body was no longer on the outside of the doors and could not be.

Hooker (5.67) defines the Lutheran, the Romish, and the Reformed views of the supper as follows:

> There are but three expositions made of the words this is my body. The first: "This is in itself, before participation, really and truly the natural substance of my body, by reason of the coexistence which my omnipotent body has with the sanctified element of bread"—which is the Lutheran's interpretation. The second: "This is in itself, and before participation, the true and natural substance of my body, by force of that deity which with the words of consecration abolishes the substance of bread and substitutes in the place thereof my body"—which is the popish construction. The third: "This hallowed food, through concurrence of divine power, is, in verity and truth, unto faithful receivers, instrumentally a cause of that mystical participation, whereby as 1 make myself wholly theirs, so I give them in hand an actual possession of all such saving grace as my sacrificed body can yield, and their souls do presently need. This is to them and in them my body."

According to this statement of Hooker, which agrees with that of the Reformed creeds, there are but three generic theories of the sacraments: Reformed, Lutheran, and Romish. Some would find a fourth theory represented by Zwingli. This comes from a misapprehension of the views of the Swiss reformer. The difference between Zwingli and Calvin upon sacramentarian points has been exaggerated. Zwingli has been repre-sented as denying that the sacrament of the supper is a means of grace and that Christ is present in it. The following positions in his Confession of Faith[9] disprove this. He asserts that (1) the sacraments are things that are holy and should be venerated; (2) they present a testimony of the thing borne; (3) they stand in place of the things which they signify, since they represent what cannot in itself be directly perceived; (4) they signify lofty things: having value not for what they are materially, but for what they signify; as a bridal ring is not worth merely the gold of which it is made;[10] (5) they enlighten and instruct through the analogy between the symbol and the thing symbolized; (6) they bring aid and comfort to faith; and (7) they take the place of (vice) an oath. These posi-tions accord entirely with those in the First Helvetic Confession, which contains Calvin's view of the sacraments, and also with those presented in the Articles of Agreement between the churches of Zurich and Geneva. Hagenbach (§258) asserts that Zwingli taught that the sacrament is "both a symbol (signum) and a means of strengthening faith." Sigwart and Zeller, in their monographs upon Zwingli, take the same view. The writer of "Lord's Supper" in Kitto's Encyclopedia represents Zwingli as holding that the Lord's Supper, by presenting under sensible emblems the sufferings and death of Christ and bringing them to vivid remembrance, deepens penitence, stimulates faith, calls out love, and in this way is a means of sanctification equally with hearing the word or any other means of grace employed by the Holy Spirit.

Zwingli asserted as strongly as Calvin the spiritual presence of Christ in the sacrament, denying with him the carnal and corporeal presence, either in the form of transubstantiation or consubstantiation. "Christ," he says, "is spiritually present in the consciousness of the believer (fidei contemplatione).[11] In the recollection of his sufferings and death and by faith in these, his body is spiritually eaten. We trust in the dying flesh and blood of Christ, and this faith is called the eating of the body and blood of Christ" (Concerning the Eucharist; cf. Confession of Faith[12] 4.63-64 [ed. Niemeyer]). The corporeal presence of Christ he denied, appealing to the authority of Augustine, as follows: "Augustine said that the body of Christ must be in some heavenly place, according to the mode of a visible body. The body of Christ is therefore in no more places than our bodies"[13] (Confession of Faith 4.51 [ed. Niemeyer]).

Zwingli regarded the sacrament of the supper as a means of grace and sanctification, because of its didactic character, because by "evidently setting forth before the eyes Jesus Christ crucified" (Gal. 3:1) it teaches in a vivid and special manner the great truth of Christ's atonement and redemption and confirms the soul of the believer in it. It is anobject lesson. In this respect, the function of the sacrament is like that of the word. Gospel truth is taught by both alike. Both alike are employed by the Holy Spirit in enlightening, strengthening, and comforting the mind of the believer. This feature in Zwingli's view is sometimes cited to prove a radical difference between him and Calvin. But Calvin is even more explicit and positive on this point:

> The office of the sacraments is precisely the same as that of the word of God, which is to offer and present Christ to us and in him the treasures of heavenly grace; but they confer no advantage or profit without being received by faith. It is necessary to guard against being drawn into error from reading the extravagant language used by the fathers with a view to exalt the dignity of the sacraments; lest we should suppose there is some secret power annexed and attached to the sacraments, so that they communicate the grace of the Holy Spirit, just as wine is given in the cup; whereas the only office assigned to them is to testify and confirm his benevolence toward us; nor do they impart any benefit unless they are accompanied by the Holy Spirit to open our minds and hearts and render us capable of receiving this testimony. For the sacraments fulfill to us, on the part of God, the same office as messengers of joyful intelligence or earnests for the confirmation of covenants, on the part of men. (4.14.17)
>
> [God] nourishes our faith in a spiritual manner by the sacraments, which are instituted for the purpose of placing his promises before our eyes for our contemplation and of serving as pledges of them. (4.14.12)
>
> For this reason, Augustine calls a sacrament "a visible word"; because it represents the promises of God portrayed as in a picture > and places before our eyes an image of them. (4.14.5-6)

>
> Connected with the preaching of the gospel, another assistance and support of our faith is afforded us in the sacraments. (4.14.1)
>
> There is no true administration of the sacrament without the word. For whatever advantage accrues to us from the sacred supper requires the word; whether we are to be confirmed in faith, exercised in confession, or excited to duty, there is need of preaching. Nothing more preposterous, therefore, can be done with respect to the supper than to convert it into a mute action, as we have seen done under the tyranny of the pope. (4.17.39)
>
> The person who supposes that the sacraments confer any more upon him than that which is offered by the word of God, and which he receives by a true faith, is greatly deceived. Hence also it may be concluded that confidence of salvation does not depend on the participation of the sacrament, as though that constituted our justification, which we know to be placed in Christ Jesus alone, and is to be communicated to us no less by the preaching of the word than by the sealing of the sacraments, and that it may be completely enjoyed without this participation. (4.14.14) (See supplement 6.7.3.)

This view of the nature of the sacrament of the supper as didactic is also confirmed by considering the nature and purpose of a symbol. The purpose of a symbol is to teach a certain truth by a visible sign or token. The ocean is a symbol of God's immensity, and the sun of his glory. The "invisible things" or truths relating to God are emblematized and impressed by "the things that are made" (Rom. 1:20). The heavens area symbol of God because they declare the glory of God (Ps. 19:1). The cross is a symbol in all Christendom of the sacrifice of Christ. It teaches emblematically the truth that the Son of God died for man's sin. The ark, again, is a symbol of the church and teaches that men are safe within the kingdom of God. In the case of all these natural symbols, there is no efficacy in the symbol as such, but only in the truth taught by it. The ocean, the sun, the cross, the ark, make no spiritual impression as mere water, light, and wood. It is only the immensity and glory of God, as taught by the symbols of the ocean and the sun, that affect the mind. It is only the mercy of God, as suggested by the symbol of the cross and the ark, that produces the spiritual effect.

The bread and the wine of the Lord's Supper are specially and divinely appointed symbols, differing in this respect from all natural symbols. They are also seals as well as symbols, differing in this respect, also, from natural symbols. But as symbols they are didactic and teach that truth which is the heart of the Christian religion, namely, that the broken and bleeding body of Christ is the oblation for sin.[14] They are "holy signs and seals of the covenant of grace, immediately instituted by God to represent Christ and his benefits and to confirm our interest in him" (Westminster Confession 28.1). But in this instance, too, as in that of natural symbols, it is the truth taught by the symbols and not the symbols themselves that strengthens the faith of the participant, deepens his gratitude, enlivens his hope, and sanctifies his heart. As mere bread and wine, the symbols produce no spiritual effect in the soul of the believer. When the Holy Spirit enlightens the mind of the participant to perceive the gospel truth which these emblems "exhibit, signify, and seal," then and only then do they become means of sanctification. It is not because the glorified body of Christ is conjoined with them, as the Lutheran asserts, or because they are converted into the glorified body of Christ, as the Romanist asserts, that they are effectual. It is because of the spiritual presence of Christ in the soul of the participant and the spiritual perception of the truth signified and sealed by the emblems, as Calvin and Hooker say, that they are means of grace.[15]

Baptism

The sacrament of baptism is the sign and seal of regeneration. It is emblematic and didactic of this doctrine. Baptism is not a means of regeneration, as the Lord's Supper is of sanctification. It does not confer the Holy Spirit as a regenerating Spirit, but is the authentic token that the Holy Spirit has been or will be conferred, that regeneration has been or will be effected. This is taught in Rom. 4:11: Abraham “received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the faith which he had being yet uncir-cumcised.” Baptism is Christian circumcision (“the circumcision of Christ”; Col. 2:11) and takes the place of the Jewish circumcision, so that what is true of the latter is of the former. Paul, Cornelius, and theeunuch were regenerated before they were baptized. As circumcision was not absolutely necessary to salvation, neither is baptism. This is shown by the omission of it in Mark 16:16, when damnation is spoken of. (See supplement 6.7.4.)

Baptism, being the initiatory sacrament, is administered only once. While symbolical only of regeneration, it yet has a connection with sanctification. Being a divinely appointed sign, seal, and pledge of the new birth, it promotes the believer’s growth in holiness by encouragement and stimulus. It is like the official seal on a legal document. The presence of the seal inspires confidence in the genuineness of the title deed; the absence of the seal awakens doubts and fears. Nevertheless, it is the title deed, not the seal, that conveys the title.

Baptism is to be administered to believers and their children:[16] “The promise [of the gift of the Holy Spirit; v. 38] is unto you and your children” (Acts 2:38-39); “if the root be holy, so are the branches” (Rom. 11:16); “the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband: else were your children unclean: but now are they holy” (1 Cor. 7:14); “go teach [disciple] all nations, baptizing them” (Matt. 28:19). If the command had been “go teach all nations, circumcising them,” no one would have denied that infants were included in the command. Infants are called disciples in Acts 15:10: “Why tempt God to put a yoke [namely, circumcision] upon the neck of the disciples?” Accordingly, Westminster Confession 28.4 affirms that “the infants of one or both believing parents are to be baptized.”[17]

The baptism of the infant of a believer supposes the actual or prospective operation of the regenerating Spirit, in order to the efficacy of the rite. Infant baptism does not confer the regenerating Spirit, but is a sign that he either has been or will be conferred in accordance with the divine promise in the covenant of grace. The actual conferring of the Holy Spirit may be prior to baptism or in the act itself or subsequent to it. Hence baptism is the sign and seal of regeneration either in the past, in the present, or in the future. Westminster Confession 38.6 teaches that “the efficacy of baptism is not tied to that moment of time wherein it is administered”; in other words, the regenerating grace of the Spirit, signified and sealed by the rite, may be imparted when the infant is baptized or previously or at a future time. The baptism is administered in this reference and with this expectation: “Baptism is to be administered, to be a sign and seal of regeneration and engrafting into Christ, and that even to infants” (Westminster Larger Catechism 177). Under the old dispensation, the circumcision of the flesh was a sign and seal of the circumcision of the heart (Deut. 10:16; 30:6). “God,” says Calvin (4.16.5), “did not favor infants with circumcision without making them partakers of all those things which were then signified by circumcision.” Similarly, under the new dispensation, the baptism of the body of the infant is the sign and seal of the baptism of the soul by the Holy Spirit.

The infant of the believer receives the Holy Spirit as a regenerating Spirit, by virtue of the covenant between God and his people: “I will establish my covenant between me and you and your seed after you intheir generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto you and to your seed after you” (Gen. 17:7); “the promise [of the gift of the Holy Spirit; v. 38] is unto you and your children” (Acts 2:39). The infant of the believer, consequently, obtains the regenerating grace by virtue of his birth and descent from a believer in covenant with God and not by virtue of his baptism. God has promised the blessing of the Holy Spirit to those who are born of his people. The infant of a believer, by this promise, is born into the church, as the infant of a citizen is born into the state: “Children born within the pale of the visible church and dedicated to God in baptism are under the inspection and government of the church” (Directory for Worship, 9). They are church members by reason of their birth from believing parents; and it has been truly said that the question that confronts them at the period of discretion is not “will you join the visible church?” but “will you go out of it?” Church membership by birth from believers is an appointment of God under both the old and the new economies, in the Jewish and the Christian church.

Baptism is the infallible sign of regeneration when the infant dies in infancy. All baptized infants dying before the age of self-consciousness are regenerated without exception. Baptism is the probable sign of regeneration, when the infant lives to years of discretion. It is possible that the baptized child of believing parents may prove, in the day of judgment, not to have been regenerated, but not probable. The history of the church and daily observation show it to be the general fact that infant church members become adult church members. Yet exceptions are possible. A baptized infant on reaching years of discretion may to human view appear not to have been regenerated, as a baptized convert may. The fact of unregeneracy, however, must be proved before it can be acted upon. A citizen of the state must be presumed to be such until the contrary appears by his renunciation of citizenship and self-expatriation. Until he takes this course, he must be regarded as a citizen. So a baptized child, in adult years, may renounce his baptism and church membership, become an infidel, and join the synagogue of Satan; but until he does this, he must be regarded as a member of the church of Christ. Such instances are exceedingly rare, both in church and state. The possible exceptions to the general fact that baptism is the sign of regeneration are not more numerous in the case of baptized infants than of baptized converts. Says Hodge (Theology 3.590):

> It is not every baptized child who is saved; nor are all those who are baptized in infancy made partakers of salvation. But baptism signs, seals, and actually conveys its benefits to all its subjects, whether infants or adults, who keep the covenant of which it is a sign. It does not follow that the benefits of redemption may not be conferred on infants at the time of their baptism. That is in the hands of God. What is to hinder the imputation to them of the righteousness of Christ or their receiving the renewing of the Holy Spirit, so that their whole nature may be developed in a state of reconciliation with God. Doubtless this often occurs; but whether it does or not, their baptism stands good; it assures them of salvation if they do not renounce their baptismal covenant. (See supplement 6.7.5.)

The reason why there is not an infallible connection between infant baptism and regeneration, when the infant lives to years of discretion, so that all baptized children of true believers are regenerated without a single exception, is the fact that the covenant is not observed on the human side with absolute perfection. Should the believer keep the promise on his part with entire completeness, God would be bound to fulfill the promise on his pail. But the believer’s fulfillment of the terms of the covenant, in respect to faith in God’s promise, to prayer, to the nurture and education of the child, though filial and spiritual, is yet imperfect. God is, therefore, not absolutely indebted to the believer, by reason of the believer's action, in respect to the regeneration of the child. Consequently, he may exercise a sovereignty, if he so please, in the bestow-ment of regenerating grace, even in the case of a believer's child. We have seen (p. 776) that the regeneration of an unbaptized adult, depending as it does upon election, cannot be made infallibly certain by the use of common grace, though it may be made highly probable by it. In like manner, the regeneration of a baptized child, depending also upon election, may be made highly probable by the imperfect faith and fidelity of the parents, yet not infallibly and necessarily certain.

The mode of baptism which is by far the most common in the history of the Christian church is sprinkling or pouring. From the time of Christ to the present, a vastly greater number have been sprinkled than have been immersed. At the present day, sprinkling is the rule throughout Christendom, and immersion the exception. The former mode is Catholic; the latter is denominational.

Sprinkling was the common mode of baptism in the Old Testament, and this fact furnishes the strongest presumption that it was the mode of Christ and his apostles. As the apostolic polity confessedly grew out of the Jewish synagogue, it is equally certain that the apostolic ceremonial and ritual grew out of the Jewish. Polity and ritual are indissol-ubly associated. Baptizing under the old economy was an important rite and would certainly influence the mode under the New. The Old Testament baptism, therefore, is of the utmost consequence in settling the dispute respecting the mode of baptism and its subjects. The following particulars are to be noted.

First, sacramental baptism by the levitical priest was always administered by sprinkling, never by immersion, (a) The whole congregation at Sinai were baptized by sprinkling (Exod. 24:6-8; Heb. 9:19-20). (b) The Levites when consecrated to office were baptized by sprinkling: "Thus shall you do unto them to cleanse them: sprinkle water of purifying upon them" (Num. 8:7). (c) Lepers and defiled persons when restored to the congregation were baptized by sprinkling (Lev. 14:4-7; 49-53; Num. 19:18-19; 31:19, 22-23; Luke 5:14). (d) Gentiles when admitted to the Jewish church were baptized by sprinkling (Num. 31:12, 19). These baptisms could be performed only by a priest or by some "clean person" appointed to act for him: "A clean person shall sprinkle water upon the unclean" (19:18-19). The baptism in these instances was sacramental, that is, had reference to guilt and expiatory cleansing. Hence the blood of a sacrificial victim was sprinkled upon the congregation at Sinai and upon the Levites and restored lepers. No individual could baptize himself with this sacramental and expiatory baptism. It was a priestly act and required the priest or his appointed agent.

Second, baptism by Jehovah in both the old economy and the new is by sprinkling or pouring. The Jehovah of the Old Testament is the Christ of the New and is the great high priest. He baptizes with the Holy Spirit: "He shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire" (Matt. 3:11). This baptism is never by immersion: "He shall sprinkle many nations" (Isa. 52:15); "then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and you shall beclean; a new heart will I give you" (Ezek. 36:25); "let us draw near to God, having our hearts sprinkled (rherantismenoi)[18] from an evil conscience" (Heb. 10:22); "the blood of sprinkling (rhantismou)[19] that speaks better things than the blood of Abel" (12:24); "elect unto sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 1:2); "until the Spirit be poured upon us from on high" (Isa. 32:15; Joel 2:28); "I will pour out my Spirit unto you" (Prov. 1:23).

Third, ceremonial baptisms or washings were administered by sprinkling or pouring, not by immersion. These baptisms had reference not to the guilt of sin, but its pollution. Sometimes they were administered by the person himself and sometimes by the priest. When a man ceremonially washed his hands, this was called a "baptism": "When the Pharisee saw it, he marveled that he had not first washed (ebaptisthē[20] before dinner" (Luke 11:38); "when they come from the market, except they wash (baptisōntai[21] in A, D, F, Textus Receptus, Tischendorf; rhantisōntai[22] in B, C, Lachmann, Hort), they eat not; and many other things there be which they have received to hold, as the washings (baptismous)[23] of cups, pots, and brazen vessels and of tables" (Mark 7:4). The ceremonial "baptism" of the hands was performed by having a servant pour water upon them; and the ceremonial "baptism" of cups, pots, vessels, and tables was by sprinkling or pouring, as in Num. 19:18: "A clean person shall sprinkle water upon the tent and upon all the vessels of the unclean person."[24]

Now, since sprinkling or pouring was the invariable mode of baptism under the old economy, it is probable in the very highest degree that John the Baptist employed this mode. Baptism was a priestly act, as is implied in the inquiry: "Why do you baptize, if you be not the Christ nor Elijah nor that prophet?" (John 1:25). John was a priest of the family of Aaron (Luke 1:5) and naturally administered the rite by sprinkling or pouring, as the Jewish priest had administered it from time immemo-rial. There is not a scintilla of proof that he introduced immersion. And this same mode would naturally be adopted by the apostles when our Lord substituted baptism for circumcision and transferred the rite from the old dispensation to the new, from the Jewish to the Christian church. Peter associates "preaching peace by Jesus Christ" with "the baptism which John preached" (Acts 10:36-37).[25] (See supplement 6.7.6.)

The principal supports of the mode by immersion are (a) the custom in the patristic church of immersing in the laver of the baptistery and (b) the classical meaning of baptō[26] and baptiō.[27]

Concerning the first argument, it is to be noticed, first, that the baptistery dates from a period when Christianity had become powerful andable to erect churches with all the appointments of an imposing ritual. The apostolic church could not do this. The baptistery and laver are as late as the fourth century. Furthermore, the first baptismal fonts were too small for immersing. The fresco in the catacombs of St. Calixtus (A.D. 200 according to Rossi) represents the rite administered by pouring from the vessel upon the person standing upright. The "Teaching of the Apostles" (A.D. 160) says that baptism may be performed by pouring. Second, a more profuse application of water than that of sprinkling or pouring belongs to a period in the history of the church when baptism was held to be regeneration itself. If water be efficacious when applied by the officiating minister, then immersion would be deemed more efficacious than sprinkling. Immersion grew with the growth of the sacramentarian theory of baptism and the doctrine of baptismal regeneration.

Respecting the classical meaning of baptō[28] and baptizō,[29] it is to be observed that these words had no technical or ritual signification in classical Greek. They were never used to denote a pagan rite. There were purifying rites in the Greek and Roman worship, but they were not called "baptisms." The Greeks denominated their purifying rite katharsis,[30] and the Romans theirs lustratio. Sprinkling was the mode in both. The nouns baptismos,[31] baptisma,[32] and baptistēs[33] are not in the classical vocabu-lary. They were coined by Jews and Christians from baptizō[34] in order to denote the rite of purification in the Jewish and Christian churches. Consequently, it is the secondary technical use in the Jewish and Christian Scriptures, not the primary untechnical meaning in the Greek classics, which must be considered in determining the mode of baptism.[35]

The classical meaning of baptō[36] and baptizō[37] is to dip into water, to sink under water, to dye or tinge in a fluid. The classical meaning favors baptism by immersion, as the classical meaning of sacramentum proves that the Christian sacrament is an oath. But in Hebraistic and New Testament Greek, baptō[38] and baptizō[39] are employed in a secondary ceremonial signification to denote a Jewish and Christian rite. Consequently, their meaning in the Septuagint and New Testament must be determined by their ritual and historical use, not by their classical. The word pagans (pagani), etymologically and classically, denoted persons living in the villages ipagi) outside of the large towns and cities. Classically, pagans were "villagers." As Christianity spread first among the inhabitants of the cities, the villagers were the unevangelized; and thus "pagan" came to mean "heathen" instead of "villager." Similarly, baptō[40] and bap-tizō[41]' which in heathenism denoted any unceremonial, nonritual immersion into water, when adopted by Judaism and Christianity, came tohave the secondary signification of a ceremonial sprinkling or effusion of water. And he who argues that baptism means immersion in the Scriptures because in the classics the primary meaning of baptō[42] and baptizō[43] is "to immerse" commits the same error with him who should argue that a pagan is a villager because this was the original signification of paganus or that the Christian sacramentum is an oath and not a symbol because this is its meaning in Livy and Tacitus.

The word baptizō[44] is employed in the Septuagint to signify a ritual purification performed by applying water to a person or thing so as to wet it more or less, but not all over and entirely.[45] The passages that have been quoted (pp. 819-20) prove indisputably that the mode in which the baptismal water of ritual purification was applied under the levitical law was sprinkling or pouring. There was no immersion of the body in the sacramental baptism for guilt or in the ceremonial baptism for pollution. And the spiritual baptism of the Holy Spirit is pouring, not immersing. There is no good reason for supposing that the New Testament use of baptizō[46] is different from that of the Septuagint.

Historically, there is the highest probability that John the Baptist and Christ's apostles employed the old mode and did not invent a new one like immersion, so different from the mode in both Jewish and Gentile lustrations. Furthermore, the circumstances and customs of the Jews necessitated sprinkling or effusion. It is morally certain that such baptisms as those of Pentecost (Acts 2:41), of the eunuch (8:36), of Cornelius and his family (10:47), and of the jailer (16:33) were not administered by immersion. In the narrative of the baptism of the eunuch, it is said that "the way that goes down from Jerusalem to Gaza is desert" (8:26). The whole region is sandy and dry, with only here and there a small spring of water. In the account of the baptism of Cornelius and "all his house" (10:2), the phraseology implies that the baptismal water was brought into the room: "Can any man forbid the water (to hydōr)[47] that these should not be baptized?" (10:47). This phraseology would be unnatural if the water in question were in a river, pond, or reservoir—but natural if it were in a vessel. No one would "forbid" the Hudson or Connecticut River. It is improbable that within the precincts of the jail there was either a stream or reservoir of water sufficient for immersing in the dead of night "the jailer and all his." The immersion of three thousand in Jerusalem on one day, at Pentecost (2:41), would have required the use of the public reservoirs of the city, which the Jewish authorities would have been as little likely to have allowed as the common council of New York City would in a similar case.[48]

Christ certainly had reference to the Old Testament baptism and to John's baptism when he said to Nicodemus: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (John 3:5). Christian baptism in the name of the Trinity had not yet been insti-tuted. Nicodemus was a Pharisee, and our Lord wished to rid him of all self-righteousness by teaching him that he must confess sin with "publicans and sinners" and submit to the old and common Jewish rite that was emblematic of forgiveness and cleansing. Though he was "a ruler of the Jews" and "a master of Israel," he must take the same attitude with the multitude who "were baptized in Jordan, confessing their sins" (Matt. 3:5). "All the people that heard John and the publicans justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John. But the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptized of him" (Luke 7:29-30). This is our Lord's account of John's baptism and of the state of mind in those who submitted to it and those who rejected it. John's baptism was like that of Peter's on the day of Pentecost: "a baptism of repentance for the remission of sins" (Luke 3:3; Acts 2:38; 19:4). And the remission in both cases alike was through Christ, “the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world” (John 1:29). John directed his disciples to Christ, exactly as the apostles did theirs: “John looking upon Jesus, as he walked, says, Behold the Lamb of God” (1:36); “then said Paul, John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Jesus Christ” (Acts 19:4). The apostles were baptized with John’s baptism and were not rebaptized by Christ. Apollos “knew only the baptism of John” (18:25) and was not rebaptized.[49]

Immersion has been supported by the equivocal rendering of the verb synthaptō[50] in Rom. 6:4 and Col. 2:12. In Rom. 6:4 the rendering is “buried by baptism”; in Col. 2:12 “buried in baptism.” The English word bury is applicable either to burial in earth or in water; but the Greek word synthaptō[51] is applicable only to burial in earth. No one would render it “to immerse.” The English word bury can suggest immersion, but the Greek cannot. Consequently, when a person unacquainted with the original reads in the English version of a “burial in baptism” or “by baptism,” a burial in water is the only idea that enters his mind; an idea which the Greek positively excludes. For when a dead body is “buried” in a tomb as our Lord was, it comes into no contact with water and is carefully protected from it. Had synthaptō[52] been translated literally by “entombed” instead of “buried,” this text never would have been quoted, as it so frequently has been, to prove that Christian baptism is immersion. Christ’s entombment or burial in Joseph’s sepulcher has not the slightest connection with his baptism at the Jordan and throws no light upon the mode in which he was baptized; and, consequently, it throwsno light upon the mode in which his disciples were. Matthew Henry (on Rom. 6:4) remarks as follows:

> Why this “burying in baptism” should so much as allude to any custom of dipping under water in baptism, any more than our “baptismal crucifixion” and death should have any such reference, I confess I cannot see. It is plain that it is not the sign, but the thing signified in baptism, that the apostle here calls “being buried with Christ”; and the expression of “burying” alludes to Christ’s burial [in a tomb]. As Christ was buried [in a tomb] that he might rise again to a new and more heavenly life, so we are, in baptism, buried [in a tomb], that is, cut off from the life of sin that we may rise again to a new life of faith and love.

SUPPLEMENTS

(seep. 810). The Lutheran Formula of Concord 5 makes the following excellent statement of the law and the gospel as means of grace:

1. We believe, teach, and confess that the distinction of the law and the gospel, as a most excellently clear light, is to be retained with special diligence in the church of God, in order that the word of God, agreeably to the admonition of St. Paul, may be rightly divided.
2. We believe, teach, and confess that the law is properly a doctrine divinely revealed, which teaches what is just and acceptable to God and which also denounces whatever is sinful and contrary to the divine will.
3. Wherefore, whatever is found in the Holy Scriptures which convicts of sin, this properly belongs to the preaching of the law.
4. The gospel, on the other hand, we judge to be properly the doctrine which teaches what a man ought to believe who has not satisfied the law of God and therefore is condemned by the same, to wit: that it behooves him to believe that Jesus Christ has expiated all his sins and made satisfaction for them and has obtained remission of sins, a righteousness which avails before God, and eternal life, without the intervention of any merit of the sinner.
5. But inasmuch as the word gospeiis not always used in Holy Scripture in one and the same signification, we believe, teach, and confess that if the term gospel is understood to denote the whole doctrine of Christ which he set forth in his ministry, as also did his apostles (in which signification the word is used in Mark 1:15 and Acts 20:21), it is rightly said and taught that the gospel is a preaching of both repen-tance and remission of sins.
6. But when the law and the gospel are compared together, as in John 1:17, where Moses is described as the teacher of the law and Christ of the gospel, we believe, teach, and confess that the gospel is not a preaching of repentance and con-victing of sin, but that it is properly nothing else than a most joyful message and preaching full of consolation, not convicting or terrifying, since it comforts the conscience against the terrors of the law and bids it look at the merits of Christ alone and, by a most sweet preaching of the grace and favor of God, obtained through the merits of Christ, lifts it up again.
7. But as respects the revelation of sin. the case stands thus: That veil of Moses of which St. Paul speaks (2 Cor. 3:13-16) is drawn over all men's eyes so long as they hear only the preaching of the law and nothing of Christ. And so they do not by the law come to know their sins truly and humbly, but either become hypocrites swelling with an opinion of their own righteousness, like the Pharisees of old, or despair in their sins, as did the traitor Judas. For this cause Christ took it upon himself to explain the law spiritually (Matt. 5:21-48; Rom. 7:14-24). and in this manner the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all sinners (1:18). in order that by perceiving the true meaning of the law it may be understood how great is that wrath. And thus, at length, sinners being remanded to the law, truly and rightly come to know their sins. But such a humble and penitent acknowledgment of sin. Moses alone never could have extorted from them. Although, therefore, this preaching of the passion and death of Christ the Son of God is full of severity and terror, inasmuch as it sets forth the wrath of God against sin, from whence men are at length brought nearer to the law of God, after the veil of Moses is taken away so that they may exactly perceive how great things God requires from us in his law. none of which we are able to perform, so that it behooves us to seek the whole of our righteousness in Christ alone.

8. Nevertheless, so long as the passion and death of Christ place before the eyes the wrath of God and terrify man, so long they are not properly the preaching of the gospel, but the teaching of the law and Moses, and are Christ's strange work, through which he proceeds to his proper office, which is to declare the grace of God. to console and vivify. These latter things are the peculiar function of evangelical preaching. We reject, therefore, as a false and perilous dogma the assertion that the gospel, as distinguished from the law, is properly a preaching of repentance, rebuking, accusing, and condemning sins, and that it is not solely a preaching of the grace of God. For in this way the gospel is transformed again into law, the merit of Christ and the Holy Scriptures are obscured, a true and solid consolation is wrested away from godly souls, and the way is opened to papal errors and superstitions.
9. We believe that the law is to be inculcated upon the regenerate also; that although they who truly believe in Christ and are sincerely converted to God are through Christ set free from the curse and constraint of the law, they are not on that account without law, inasmuch as the Son of God redeemed them for the very reason that they might meditate on the law day and night and continually exercise themselves in the keeping thereof (Ps. 1:2; 119:1-2). For not even our first parents, even before the fall, lived wholly without law, which was certainly at that time graven on theirhearts, because the Lord had created them after his own image (Gen. 1:26-27; 2:16-17; 3:3).
10. We therefore believe, teach, and confess that the preaching of the law should be sedulously urged upon those who truly believe in Christ, are truly converted to God, and are regenerated and justified by faith. For, although they are regenerate and renewed in the spirit of their mind, yet this regeneration and renewal is not absolutely complete, but only begun And they that believe have continually to struggle with their flesh, that is, with corrupt nature, which inheres in us even till death (Gal. 5:17; Rom. 7:21. 23). And on account of the old Adam, which still remains fixed in the intellect and will of man and in all his powers, there is need that the law of God should always shine before man, that he may not frame anything in matters of religion under an impulse of self-devised devotion, and may not choose out ways of honoring God not instituted by the word of God Also, lest the old Adam should act according to his own bent, but that he may rather be constrained against his own will not only by the admonitions and threats of the law. but also by chastisements and afflictions, in order that he may render obedience to the Spirit and give himself up captive to the same (1 Cor. 9:27; Rom. 6:12; Gal. 6:14; Ps. 119:1-2; Heb. 12:1; 13:21)."

6.7.2 (seep 811). Augustine (Tractates in John 26.1 |ed. Migne]), expounding the words except you eat the flesh of the Son ol Man and drink his blood, you have no life in you. says: "The Lord, when he was about to give the Holy Spirit, said that he is the bread that came down from heaven, exhorting them to believe in him. For to believe in him is to eat the living bread. He who believes, eats: he is nourished invisibly, because he is invisibly born again."[53] Again (26.18) he finds a definition of "eating flesh" and "drinking blood." by St. John himself (6:56). in the declaration "he that eats my flesh and drinks my blood dwells in me, and I in him." "Therefore, this is what it means to eat that food and to drink that drink: to abide in Christ and to have him abiding within. But he who does not abide in Christ through this, and in whom Christ does not abide, beyond doubt neither eats [spiritually] his flesh nor drinks his blood [even though he literally eats (premat dentibus). carnally and visibly, the sacrament of Christ's body and blood]. "[54] The words in brackets are not Augustine's, but the Benedictine editor's

This view of Augustine that "believing is eating" and that "eating Christ's flesh and blood" is not to be understood literally but metaphorically for trusting in his vicarious atonement passed into the creeds very widely and into theological literature. Zwingli (Exposition of the Faith) declares that "in the Lord's Supper that natural and substantial body of Christ, in which he suffered here and in which he now sits at the right hand of the Father in heaven, is not eaten naturally and in its essence, but spiritually only To eat spiritually' the body of Christ is nothing other than to trust in the mercy and goodness of God through Christ with our spirit and mind. To eat the body of Christ sacramentally, when we wish to speak properly, is, when connected with the sacrament, to eat the body of Christ in mind and in spirit.[55] The Confession of the Ministers of the church of Zurich, as quoted by Hodge (Theology 3.628), declares that "although the things of which the service of the sacrament is a memorial are not visible or present after a visible or cor-poral manner, nevertheless believing apprehension and the assurance of faith renders them present, in one sense, to the soul of the believer. He has truly eaten the bread of Christ who believes on Christ, very God and very man, crucified for us, on whom to believe is to eat and to eat is to believe " The Heidelberg Catechism in answer to Q. 76 ("what is it to eat of the crucified body and drink the shed blood of Christ?") states: "It is not only to embrace with a believing heart all the sufferings and death of Christ and thereby to obtain the pardon of sin and life eternal, but also besides that to become more and more united to his sacred body by the Holy Spirit, who dwells both in Christ and in us; so that we, though Christ is in heaven and we on earth, are notwithstanding flesh of his flesh and bone of his bone ; and live and are governed forever by one spirit as members of the same body are by one soul." The Second Helvetic Confession describes two kinds of eating: "Eating is not of one kind. There is corporeal eating, in which food is received into the mouth by a man. is chewed with the teeth and swallowed into the stomach. The Capernaites in times past thought that the flesh of the Lord ought to be eaten in this way. but they are refuted by him in John 6. And there is a spiritual eating of Christ's body—not. indeed, as if we thought that the food was changed into spirit, but in which the body and blood of the Lord are communicated to us spiritually, while retaining their own essence and property. These certainly are not communicated to us in a corporeal but in a spiritual way, through the Holy Spirit, who evidently applies and confers on us those things which are bestowed through the body and blood of the Lord given on our behalf in death, that is. the very remission of sins, liberation, and eternal life, so that Christ might live in us and we in him. From all these [statements] it becomes clear that by spiritual food' we hardly mean imaginary food' (whatever that might be: nescio quem). but the very body of the Lord given for us, which nevertheless is received by the faithful spiritually through faith, not corporeally In this matter we follow completely the doctrine of the Savior Christ the Lord himself, saying in John 6:63: The flesh (undoubtedly corporeal eating) profits nothing; it is the spirit who gives life. The words which I speak to your are spirit and life.' Moreover, this spiritual food and drink occurs even outside of the Lord's Supper, whenever and wherever a man should believe in Christ Perhaps the following statement of Augustine applies: Why do you provide for your teeth and stomach? Believe and you have eaten. '"[56] Belgic Confession 33 declares that "God has ordained the sacraments in order to seal unto us his promises and to be pledges of his goodwill and grace toward us and also to nourish and strengthen our faith"; and that he "has added them to the wordof the gospel in order the better to represent to our outward senses both that which he teaches by his written word and that which he works inwardly in our hearts." This view, like that ot Calvin, closely associates the sacraments with the written word and makes their influence mental and didactic like that of the word, not material and corporeal. Belgic Confession 35 thus defines "eating Christ": "For the support of the spiritual and heavenly life which believers have, God has sent a living bread which descended from heaven, namely, Jesus Christ, which nourishes and strengthens the spiritual life of believers when it is eaten, that is to say, when it is applied and received by faith in the mind (esprit).” It further declares that “what is eaten and drunk by us is the proper and natural body and the proper blood of Christ [i.e., his real and actual sacrifice for sin); but the manner of our partaking of the same is not by the mouth, but by the Spirit through faith.” The Thirty-nine Articles teach that “the body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the sup-per only after a heavenly and spiritual manner; and the means whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the supper is faith.” The Irish Articles in almost the same terms say that “the body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Lord’s Supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner; and the means whereby the body of Christ is thus received and eaten is faith.” Westminster Confession 29.8.7 says that “worthy partakers of the supper inwardly by faith receive and feed upon Christ crucified.” On pp. 811-16 we have presented Zwingli’s, Calvin’s, and Hooker’s doctrines of the Lord’s Supper and shown their agreement with each other and with the Reformed creeds. They all deny the cor-poreal and local presence of Christ’s body and blood in the bread and wine, together with the literal eating of Christ’s flesh and blood by the mouth, and maintain that the words this is my body ate metaphorical and that the believer eats and drinks the flesh and blood of Christ by trusting in his vicarious sacrifice for sin, being enlightened and enabled to this act of faith by the Holy Spirit.

It is noteworthy that Lutheranism, in some of its earlier creed statements, substantially adopted this spiritual view of the supper, though subsequently departing from it in its development of the doctrine of consubstantiation. Luther’s Shorter Catechism presents it in the following questions and answers: “What is the use of such eating and drinking? It is shown to us in the words given and shed tor you for the forgiveness of sins; that is to say, through these words, the forgiveness of sins, life, and salvation are given to us in the sacrament; for where there is forgiveness of sins there is also life and salvation. How can corporeal eating and drinking do such great things? Eating and drinking, indeed, do not do them, but the words which stand here: Given and shed for you for the forgiveness of sins.’ Which words, besides the corporeal eating and drinking, are the main point in the sacrament; and he who believes these words has that which they say and mean, namely, forgiveness of sins. Who. then, receives this sacrament worthily? He is truly worthy and well prepared who has faith in these words given and shed for you for the forgiveness of sins. But he who does not believe these words, or doubts, is unworthy and unfit; for the words for you require truly believing hearts.” In these answers faith in Christ’s atonement is declared to be the meaning of eating and drinking his flesh and blood. But the position that Christ’s spiritual body is literally and locally present in and with the material bread and wine and is literally eaten by the mouth when these are eaten, notwithstanding all endeavors to guard and spiritualize it, finally neutralized the earlier affinity with the Reformed doctrine of the supper and ended in antagonism and separation. The Saxon Visitation Articles mention as a “false and erroneous doctrine of the Calvinists” that “the body of Christ is in the bread and wine as a typified body, which is only signified and prefigured by the bread and wine” and that “the body is received by faith alone, which raises itself to heaven and not by the mouth.”

6.7.3 (see p. 815). If, as Calvin asserts, “the office of the sacraments is precisely the same as that of the word of God, which is to offer and present Christ to us,” and if, as Augustine declares, “a sacrament is a visible word because it presents the promises of God as in a picture and places before our eyes an image of them,” the question arises. How then does the sacrament of the supper differ from the other didactic means of grace—such as the preaching and hearing of the word, prayer, and meditation? The answer is, generally, that it consists in teaching the cardinal doctrine of Christ’s sacrifice and satisfaction in a special and peculiar manner. Owen mentions several points of difference. In the seventh of his Sacramental Discourses he remarks: “In the ordinance of the supper there is a real exhibition and tender of Christ [as the sacrifice for sin] unto every believing soul. The exhibition and tender of Christ in this ordinance is distinct from the tender of Christ in the promise of the gospel, in that, in the gospel promise, the person of the Father is principally looked upon as proposing and tendering Christ unto us. But in the ordinance of the supper Christ tenders himself: This is my body,' says he; 'do this in remembrance of me.' He makes an immediate tender of himself [as the oblation for sin] unto a believing soul and calls our faith unto a respect to his grace, to his love, to his readiness to unite and spir-itually to incorporate with us. Again it is a tender of Christ and an exhibition of Christ, under an especial consideration [or aspect]; not in general [as in the Scriptures generally], but under this consideration [or aspect], as he is a new and fresh sacrifice in the great work of reconciling, making peace with God, making an end of sin, doing all that was done between God and sinners that they might be at peace." Owen here represents the office of the sacrament of the supper as the same in kind with that of the ministry of the word. It is didactic of divine truth, like that. But it differs in being confined to a particular truth instead of ranging over the whole field of revelation. And. again, it differs from the ordinary teaching by the word in that the instruction is by means of sensuous and visible emblems and not by articulate language only. Owen mentions a second point of difference in his tenth Sacramental Discourse; "Christ is present with us in an especial manner in the sacrament of the supper. One of the greatest engines that ever the devil made use of to overthrow the faith of the church was by forging such a presence of Christ as is not truly in this ordinance to drive us off from looking after that presence which is true. It is not a corporeal presence; there are arguments of sense, reason, and faith that overthrow that. But I will remind you of two texts wherewith it is inconsistent. The first is John 16:7: 'It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you.' The corporeal presence of Christ and the evangelical presence of the Holy Spirit as the Comforter are inconsistent with each other. But, say the Romish priests, Christ so went away as to his presence, as to come again with his bodily presence [in the sacrament]. No. says Peter in Acts 3:21: The heavens must receive him till the time of the restitution of all things.' We must not, there-tore, look for a bodily presence of Christ until the time of the restitution. Christ is [spiritually] present in the sacrament…

1. By representation through sensible emblems. He represents himself as the food of our souls; and he represents himself as the sacrifice for our sins. There are three ways whereby God represents Christ to the faith of believers: one is by the word of the gospel as written; the second by the ministry of the gospel and preaching the word; and the third is by this sacrament, wherein we represent the Lord's death to the faith of our own souls.
2. By exhibition through emblems. The bread and wine exhibit what they do not themselves contain The bread does not contain the body or flesh of Christ: the cup does not contain the blood of Christ; but they exhibit them We must not think that the Lord Jesus Christ deludes our souls with empty shows and [fictitious] appearances It is himself as literally broken and crucified that he exhibits unto us.
3. By obsignation. In the sacrament of the supper, he seals the covenant. Therefore the cup is called 'the new covenant in the blood of Christ.'"

In the second of his Sacramental Discourses Owen mentions another characteristic of the sacrament of the supper, namely, an especial and peculiar communion with Christ. This communion, he says, differs from the other forms of communion with the Lord Jesus, in four particulars: "(1) It is commemorative: Do this in remembrance of me'; (2) it is professional: it has a peculiar profession attending it: You show forth the Lord's death till he come': you make a profession and manifestation of it; (3) It is peculiarly eucharistic: there is a special thanksgiving that ought to attend this ordinance; it is called the cup of blessing or thanksgiving' (eulogia)'[57] (4) it is a federal ordinance wherein God confirms the covenant of grace unto us and wherein he calls upon us to make a recognition of the covenant to God."

6.7.4 (see p. 817). That baptism is not a means of regeneration but only the sign and seal of it is evident from its relation to faith It presupposes faith, and faith presupposes regeneration. Philip said to the eunuch, "If you believe with all your heart you may be baptized" (Acts 8:37). No faith, no baptism. Christ's command for the church in all time is "he that [first] believes and is baptized [in profession and sign of his faith] shall be saved" (Mark 16:16). The Apostle Peter declares that "baptism saves us by the resurrection of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 3:21) Not by its own efficacy, therefore, but as the emblem of what has been done by Christ's redemption, whose "resunection" is one of the constituent factors in it. And in order to preclude the notion that the mere application of water has any spiritual effect like that of regenerating the soul, the apostle explains that baptism does not "save by the putting away of the filth of the flesh," but by "the answer of a good conscience toward God." The "answer of a good conscience" is its pacification through the atonement of Christ for sin, to which baptism has reference.

For, as St. Paul says, "As many of us as were baptized with ref-erence to (eis)[58] Jesus Christ were baptized with reference to (e/s)[59] his [atoning] death."

6.7.5 (see p. 818). Baxter (Directions for Spiritual Peace) thus speaks of the salvation of infants: "Grace is not natural to us or conveyed by generation. Yet grace is given to our children as well as to us. That it may be so and is so with some, all will grant who believe that infants may be and are saved; and that it is so with the infants of believers I have fully proved in my book on baptism; but mark what grace I mean. The grace of remission of original sin. the children of all true believers have at least a high probability of. if not a full certainty; their parent accepting it for himself and them and dedicating them to Christ and engaging them in his covenant, so that he takes them for his people and they take him for their Lord and Savior. And for the grace of inward renewing of their nature or disposition, it is a secret to us, utterly unknown whether God use to do it in infants or no." According to this. Baxter regarded the election and salvation of infants as individual only All dying infants are not elected and saved.

6.7.6 (see p. 820). Mosheim (Commentaries 1.5) thus remarks upon "the rite of baptism, by which our Savior ordained that his followers should be received into the kingdom of heaven or the new covenant": "My opinion on this subject entirely corresponds with theirs who consider this ceremony as having been adopted by the Jews long before the time of our Savior and used by them in the initiating of strangers who had embraced their religion. The account given in John 1 of the embassy sent by the supreme council of the Jews to John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, supports this view. For the rite itself of baptizing with water those who have confessed their sins and promised an amendment of life does not seem to have been regarded by the elders of the Jews as a novelty or as a practice of an unusual kind. The only point on which they require information of John is from whence he derived his authority to perform this solemn and sacred ceremony. The thing itself occasioned them no surprise, since daily use had rendered it familiar to them: what attracted their attention was that a private individual should take upon him to perform it, contrary to the established usage of the nation.

"An inference of still greater moment may also be drawn from this message sent by the Jewish council to John, which will supply the reason why our Savior adopted this ancient Jewish practice of baptizing proselytes with water; for the concluding ques-tion put by the messengers evidently implies an expectation in the Jews of that age that the Messiah for whom they looked would baptize men with water: If you be not that Christ nor Elijah nor that prophet, why do you then baptize?' An opinion, it appears, prevailed among the Jews that Elijah, whose coming was to precede that of the Messiah, and also the Messiah himself, would initiate their disciples by a sacred ablution'; and it was necessary, therefore, in order to avoid giving the Jews any pretext for doubt respecting Christ's authority that both John and himself should accommodate themselves to this popular opinion."

PART 7

Eschatology

Intermediate or Disembodied State

Summary of the Doctrine

Eschatology (eschaton logos)[1] is that division in dogmatics which treats the intermediate or disembodied state, Christ's second advent, the resurrection, the final judgment, heaven, and hell. Revelation does not give minute details upon these subjects, yet the principal features are strongly drawn and salient.

The doctrine of the intermediate state has had considerable variety of construction, owing to the mixing of mythological elements with the biblical. The representations of Christ in the parable of Dives and Lazarus have furnished the basis of the doctrine. The most general statement is that the penitent, represented by Lazarus, is happy and that the impenitent, represented by Dives, is miserable.

The doctrine taught in Scripture that the body is not raised until the day of judgment implies that the condition of all men between death and resurrection is a disembodied one. This doctrine has been greatly misconceived, and the misconception has introduced grave errors into eschatology. Inasmuch as the body, though not necessary to personal consciousness, is yet necessary in order to the entire completeness of the person, it came to be supposed in the patristic church that the intermediate state is a dubious and unfixed state, that the resurrection adds very considerably both to the holiness and happiness of the redeemed and to the sinfulness and misery of the lost. This made the intermediate or disembodied state to be imperfectly holy and happy for the saved and imperfectly sinful and miserable for the lost. According to Hagenbach (§142), the majority of the fathers between 250 and 730 "believed that men do not receive their full reward till after the resurrection." Jeremy Taylor (Liberty of Prophesying §8) asserts that the Latin fathers held that "the saints, though happy, do not enjoy the beatific vision before the resurrection." Even so respectable an authority as Ambrose, the spiritual father of Augustine, taught that the soul "while separated from the body is held in an ambiguous condition (anibigito suspenditur)."[2]

The incompleteness arising from the absence of the body was more and more exaggerated in the patristic church, until it finally resulted in the doctrine of a purgatory for the redeemed, adopted formally by the papal church, according to which, the believer between death and resurrection goes through a painful process in hades which cleanses him from remaining corruption and fits him for paradise. The corresponding exaggeration in the other direction, in respect to the condition of the lost in the disembodied state, is found mostly in the modern church. The modern restorationist has converted the intermediate state into one of probation and redemption for that part of the human family who are not saved in this life.

The Protestant reformers, following closely the scriptural delineations, which represent the redeemed at death as entirely holy and happy in paradise and the lost at death as totally sinful and miserable in hades, rejected altogether the patristic and medieval exaggeration of the corporeal incompleteness of the intermediate state. They affirmed perfect happiness at death for the saved and utter misery for the lost. The first publication of Calvin was a refutation of the doctrine of the sleep of the soul between death and the resurrection. The limbus[3] and purgatory were energetically combated by all classes of Protestants. “I know not,” says Calvin (2.16.9), “how it came to pass that any should imagine a subterraneous cavern, to which they have given the name of limbus[4] But this fable, although it is maintained by great authors and even in the present age is by many seriously defended as a truth is after all nothing but a fable.”

The doctrine of the intermediate or disembodied state, as it was generally received in the Reformed (Calvinistic) churches, is contained in the following statements in the Westminster standards:

> The souls of believers are, at their death, made perfect in holiness, and do immediately pass into glory [Westminster Larger Catechism 86 and West-minster Confession 1 say: into the highest heavens]; and their bodies, being still united to Christ, do rest in their graves till the resurrection. At the resurrection, believers, being raised up in glory, shall be openly acknowledged and acquitted in the day of judgment and made perfectly blessed > in full enjoying of God to all eternity. (Westminster Shorter Catechism QQ. 37-38)

According to this statement, there is no essential difference between paradise and heaven. Westminster Larger Catechism 86 asserts that “the souls of the wicked are, at death, cast into hell, and their bodies kept in their graves till the resurrection and judgment of the great day.” Westminster Larger Catechism 89 and Westminster Confession 1 say that “at the day of judgment, the wicked shall be cast into hell, to be punished forever.” According to this, there is no essential difference between hades and hell.

The substance of the Reformed view, then, is that the intermediate state for the saved is heaven without the body and the final state for the saved is heaven with the body, that the intermediate state for the lost is hell without the body and the final state for the lost is hell with the body. In the Reformed or Calvinistic eschatology, there is no intermediate hades between heaven and hell, which the good and evil inhabit in common. When this earthly existence is ended, the only specific places andstates are heaven and hell. Paradise is a part of heaven; hades is a part of hell. A pagan underworld containing both paradise and hades, both the happy and the miserable, like the pagan idol, is “nothing in the world.” There is no such place.

Pagan Influences on the Doctrine of Hades

This view of hades did not continue to prevail universally in the Protestant churches. After the creeds of Protestantism had been constructed, in which the biblical doctrine of hades is generally adopted, the mythological view began again to be introduced. Influential writers like Lowth and Herder gave it currency in Great Britain and Germany. “A popular notion,” says Lowth {Hebrew Poetry, lect. 8), “prevailed among the Hebrews, as well as among other nations, that the life which succeeded the present was to be passed beneath the earth; and to this notion the sacred prophets were obliged to allude, occasionally, if they wished to be understood by the people, on this subject.” Says Herder (Hebrew Poetry 2.21 [trans. Marsh]), “no metaphorical separation of the body and soul was yet known among the Hebrews, as well as among other nations, and the dead were conceived as still living in the grave, but in a shadowy, obscure, and powerless condition." The theory passed to the lexicographers, and many of the lexicons formally defined hades as the underworld. It then went rapidly into commentaries and popular expositions of Scripture.

The pagan conception of hades is wide and comprehensive; the biblical is narrow and exclusive. The former includes all men; the latter only wicked men. The Greeks and Romans meant by hades neither the grave in which the dead body is laid nor the exclusive place of retribution, but a netherworld in which all departed souls reside. There was one hades[5] for all, consisting of two subterranean divisions: Elysium and Tartarus.[6] In proportion as the later Jews came to be influenced by the Greek and Roman mythology, the Septuagint hades, which is narrow and definite because confined to the evil, became wide and indefinite because it was made to include both the good and evil. In Scripture, hades is descriptive of moral character. Whoever goes to hades is ipso facto a wicked man and like Dives goes to punishment and misery. In mythology, hades is nondescriptive of moral character. He who goes to hades is not ipso facto a wicked person. He may be either good or evil, may go either to happiness or misery. This mythological indefiniteness, when injected into the definiteness of the inspired representation of hades, takes off the solemn and terrible aspect which it has for the sinner in Scripture and paves the way for the assertion that when the sinner goes to hades he does not go to punishment and misery.

This mythological influence upon the eschatology of the later Jews is seen in Josephus. He describes Samuel as being called up from hades(Antiquities 6.14.2). Yet in another place (Jewish War 3.8.5), he says that "the souls of the good at death obtain a most holy place in heaven, while the souls of the wicked are received by the darkest place in hades." Here is the same vacillation between the biblical and the mythological view which appears in many of the Christian fathers. The mythological influence increased, until the doctrine of purgatory itself came into the Jewish apocryphal literature. Purgatory is taught in 2 Maccabees 12:45: Manasses in his prayer asks God not "to condemn him into the lower parts of the earth." The synagogue according to Charnock (Discourse 2) believed in a purgatory.[7]

That class of commentators, lexicographers, and theologians who contend that hades denotes an underworld and deny that it means either hell or the grave appeals to pagan and rabbinic authorities in proof. This assumes that there is no essential difference between the hades of Scripture and that of the nations; that the inspired mind took the same general view with the uninspired of the state of souls after death; that Moses, Samuel, David, and Isaiah together with Christ and his apostles agreed in their eschatology with Homer, Plato, Virgil, the Egyptian "Ritual of the Dead," and the Babylonian tablets. A close adherence to the text and context of Scripture shows, we think, that this assumption is unfounded. Upon such an unknown subject as the future state, the appeal must be made to revelation alone. Because the Assyrians, Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans believed that all human spirits at death go to one and the same underworld, it does not follow that it is a fact or that the circle of inspired men who wrote the Scriptures believed and taught it. And because the Jewish rabbis came to adopt the mythological eschatology, it does not follow that the biblical eschatology is to be interpreted by their opinions.[8]

Revealed religion may be properly illustrated by ethnical religion when the latter agrees with the former, not when it conflicts with it. When mythology is an echo, even broken and imperfect, of Scripture, it may be used to explain inspired doctrine, but not when it is a contradiction. The meaning of hades must therefore be explained by the connection of thought in the Scriptures themselves and not by the imagination of uninspired man peering into the darkness beyond the grave and endeavoring to picture the abode of departed spirits. The mythological eschatology is a picturesque and fanciful conjecture respecting the unseen world. The biblical eschatology is the description of it by an eyewitness, namely, God speaking through prophets, apostles, and Jesus Christ.

The pagan conception passed also into the Christian church. It is found in the writings of many of the fathers, but not in any of the primitive creeds:

> The idea of a hades (ie'67),[9] known to both [the later] Hebrews and Greeks, was transferred to Christianity, and the assumption that the real happiness or the final misery of the departed does not begin till after the general judgment and the resurrection of the body appeared to necessitate the belief in an intermediate state, in which the soul was supposed to remain, from the moment of its separation from the body to the last catastrophe. Tertullian, however, held that the martyrs went at once to paradise, the abode of the blessed, and thought that in this they enjoyed an advantage over other Christians, while Cyprian does not seem to know about any intermediate state whatever. (Hagenbach, History of Doctrine §77)[10]

According to this hellenized conception of the intermediate state, at death all souls go down to hades: in inferna loca[11] or ad inferos homines.[12] This is utterly unbiblical. It is connected with the heathen doctrine of the infernal divinities and the infernal tribunal of Minos and Rhadaman-thus. The God of revelation does not have either his abode or his judgment seat in hades. From Christ's account of the last judgment, no one would infer that it takes place in an underworld. In both the Old and New Testaments, the good dwell with God, and God's dwelling place is never represented as "below," but "on high." Paradise is the third heaven (2 Cor. 12:1, 4), and none of the heavens are in the underworld. Elijah "went up by a whirlwind into heaven" (2 Kings 2:11). The saints remaining on earth at the advent go up "to meet the Lord [and the saints that have been with him] in the air" (1 Thess. 4:17; cf. 2 Thess. 4:14; Eph. 4:8; John 17:24; Acts 7:25; Luke 23:42-43,46; Prov. 15:24). David expects to be "received to glory." Christ describes the soul of a believer at death as ascending to paradise: "The beggar died and was carried by the angels to Abraham's bosom. The rich man also died and was buried. And in hades he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and sees Abraham afar off and Lazarus in his bosom" (Luke 16:22-23). According to this description, Abraham's bosom and hades are as opposite and disconnected as the zenith and the nadir. To say that Abraham's bosom is a part of hades is to say that the heavens are a compartment of the earth. St. Matthew(8:11) teaches that Abraham's bosom is in heaven: "Many shall recline (anaklithesontai)[13] with Abraham in the kingdom of heaven." Paradise is separated from hades by a "great chasm"

(Luke 16:26). The word chasma[14] denotes space either lateral or vertical, but more commonly the latter. Schleusner says: “It is especially used concerning space which is extended from a higher to a lower place.”[15] Hades is in infernis;”[16] Abraham’s bosom or paradise is in superis;[17] and heaven proper is in excelsis or summis.[18]

If paradise is a section of hades, then Christ descended to paradise, and saints at death go down to paradise and at the last day are brought up from paradise. This difficulty is not met by resorting to the later Jewish distinction between a supernal and an infernal paradise. The paradise spoken of by Christ in Luke 24:33 is evidently the same that St. Paul speaks of in 2 Cor. 12:3-4, which he calls “the third heaven.”

It is sometimes said that there is no “above” or “below” in the spiritual world, and therefore the special representation in the parable of Dives and Lazarus must not be insisted upon. This, certainly, should not be urged by those who contend for an underworld. Paradise and hades, like heaven and hell, are both in the universe of God. But wherever in this universe they may be, it is the biblical representation (unlike the mythological) that they do not constitute one system or one sphere of being any more than heaven and hell do. They are so contrary and opposite as to exclude each other and to constitute two separate places or worlds; so that he who goes to the one does not go to the other.[19] This contrariety and exclusiveness is metaphorically expressed by space vertical, not by space lateral. Things on the same plane are alike. Those on different planes are not. If paradise is above and hades is beneath, hades will be regarded as hell and be dreaded. But if paradise and hades are both alike beneath and paradise is a part of hades, then hades will not be regarded as hell (as some affirm it is not) and will not be dreaded. Hades will be merely a temporary residence of the human soul where the punishment of sin is imperfect and its removal possible and probable. (See supplement 7.1.1.)

A portion of the fathers, notwithstanding the increasing prevalence of the mythological view, deny that paradise is a compartment of hades. In some instances, it must be acknowledged, they are not wholly consistent with themselves, in so doing. According to Archbishop Ussher (Works 3.281), “the first who assigned a resting place in hell [hades] to the fathers of the Old Testament was Marcion the gnostic." This was combated, he says, by Origen, in his second Dialogue against Marcion. In his comment on Ps. 9:18, Origen remarks that "as paradise is the residence of the just, so hades is the place of punishment (kolaste'rion)[20] for sinners." The locating of paradise in hades is opposed by Tertullian (Against Marcion 4.34) in the following terms: "Hades (inferi) is one thing, in my opinion, and Abraham's bosom is another. Christ, in the parable of Dives, teaches that a great deep is interposed between the two regions. Neither could the rich man have 'lifted up' his eyes, and that too 'afar off,' unless it had been to places above him and very far above him, by reason of the immense distance between that height and that depth." Similarly, Chrysostom in his Homilies on Dives and Lazarus, as quoted by Ussher, asks and answers: "Why did not Lazarus see the rich man, as well as the rich man is said to see Lazarus? Because he that is in the light does not see him who stands in the dark; but he that is in the dark sees him that is in the light." Augustine in his exposition of Ps. 6 calls attention to the fact that "Dives looked up, to see Lazarus." Again, he says, in his letter to Euodius, "It is not to be believed that the bosom of Abraham is a part of hades (aliqua pars inferorum).[21] How Abraham, into whose bosom the beggar was received, could have been in the torments of hades, I do not understand. Let them explain who can." Again, he remarks (On the Literal Meaning of Genesis 12.33-34): "I confess, I have not yet found that the place where the souls of just men rest is hades (inferos). If a good conscience may figuratively be called paradise, how much more may that bosom of Abraham, where there is no temptation and great rest after the griefs of this life, be called paradise." To the same effect says Gregory of Nyssa (In pascha): "This should be investigated by the studious, namely, how, at one and the same time, Christ could be in these three places: in the heart of the earth, in paradise with the thief, and in the 'hand' of the Father. For no one will say that paradise is in the places under the earth (en hypochthoniois)[22] or the places under the earth in paradise; or that those infernal places (ta hypochtho-niaf[23] are called the 'hand' of the Father." Cyril of Alexandria in his On the Departure of the Soul remarks: "The innocent are above, the guilty below. The innocent are in heaven, the guilty in the abyss. The innocent are in God's hand, the guilty in the devil's."[24] Ussher asserts that the following fathers agree with Augustine in the opinion that paradise is not in hades: Chrysostom, Basil, Cyril Alexandrinus, Gregory Nazianzus, Bede, Titus of Bostra, and others.[25] (See supplement 7.1.2.)

These patristic statements respecting the supernal locality of paradise agree with Scripture: “The way of life is above to the wise, that he may depart from sheol beneath” (Prov. 15:24). When Samuel is represented as “coming up from the earth” (1 Sam. 28:7-20), it is because the body reanimated rises from the grave.[26] This does not prove that the soul had been in an underworld any more than the statement of St. John (12:17) that Christ “called Lazarus out of his grave” proves it. Paradise is unquestionably the abode of the saved; and the saved are with Christ. The common residence of both is described as on high: “When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive” (Eph. 4:8); “Father, I will that they also whom you have given me be with me where I am, that they may see my glow” (John 17:24); “those which sleep in Jesus, God will bring with him [down from paradise, not up from hades]” (2 Thess. 4:14). At the second advent, “we which are alive and remain shall be caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air” (1 Thess. 4:17). Stephen “looked up into heaven and saw Jesus standing on the right hand of God” (Acts 7:55). Christ said to the Pharisees, “You are from beneath, I am from above” (John 8:23). Satan and his angels are “cast down to Tartarus” (2 Pet. 2:4). The penitent thief says to Christ: “Lord, remember me when you come into your kingdom.” Christ replies: “This day shall you be with me in paradise” (Luke 23:42-43). This implies that paradise is the same as Christ’s kingdom; and Christ’s kingdom is not an infernal one. Christ “cried with a loud voice, Father into your hands I commend my spirit, and having said this, he gave up the ghost” (23:46). The “hands” of the Father, here meant, are in heaven above, not in “sheol beneath.” These teachings of Scripture and their interpretation by a portion of the fathers evince that paradise is a section of heaven, not of hades, and are irreconcilable with the doctrine of an underworld containing both the good and the evil.

Christ’s Alleged Descent into Hell

Another stimulant, besides that of mythology, to the growth of the doctrine that the intermediate state for all souls in the underworld of hades was the introduction into the Apostles’ Creed of the spurious clause he descended into hades. Biblical exegesis is inevitably influenced by the great ecumenical creeds. When the doctrine of the descent to hades was interpolated into the oldest of the Christian creeds, it became necessary to find support for it in Scripture. The texts that can, with any success, be used for this purpose, are few, compared with the large number that prove the undisputed events in the life of Christ. This compelled a strained interpretation of such passages as Matt. 12:40; Acts 2:27; Rom. 10:7; 1 Pet. 3:18-20; 4:6 and largely affected the whole subject of eschatology as presented in the Scriptures.

The Apostles' Creed in its original form read as follows: "Suffered under Pontius Pilate; was crucified, dead, and buried; the third day he rose again from the dead." This is also the form in the two creeds of Nice (325) and Constantinople (381): a certain proof that these great ecumenical councils did not regard the descensus as one of the articles of the catholic faith. The first appearance of the clause he descended into hades is in the latter half of the fourth century in the creed of the church of Aquileia. Pearson, by citations, shows that the creeds, both ecclesiastical and individual, prior to this time do not contain it. Burnet (Thirty-nine Articles, art. 3) asserts the same. Refinus, the presbyter of Aquileia, says that the intention of the Aquileian alteration of the creed was not to add a new doctrine, but to explain an old one; and therefore the Aquileian creed omitted the clause was crucified, dead, and buried and substituted for it the new clause descendit in inferna[27] Refinus also adds that "although the preceding Roman and oriental editions of the creed had not the words he descended into hades, yet they had the sense of them in the words he was crucified, dead, and buried" (Pearson, On the Creed, art. 5). The early history of the clause, therefore, clearly showsthat the hades to which Christ was said to have descended was simply the grave in which he was buried.[28]

Subsequently, the clause went into other creeds. The Athanasian Creed (600) follows that of Aquileia in inserting the "descent" and omitting the "burial." It reads: "Who suffered for our salvation descended into hades, rose again the third day from the dead." Those of Toledo, in 633 and 693, likewise contain it. It is almost invariably found in the medieval and modern forms of the Apostles' Creed, but without the omission, as at first, of the clause was crucified, dead, and buried: two doc-trines thus being constructed in place of a single one as at first. If, then, the text of the Apostles' Creed shall be subjected, like that of the New Testament, to a revision in accordance with the text of the first four centuries, the descensus ad inferos[29] must be rejected as an interpolation. (See supplement 7.1.3.)

While the tenet of Christ's local descent into hades has no support from Scripture or any of the first ecumenical creeds, it has support, as has already been observed, from patristic authority.[30] Says Pearson (On the Creed, art. 5):

> The ancient fathers differed much respecting the condition of the dead and the nature of the place into which the souls, before our Savior's death, were gathered; some looking on that name which we now translate hell, hades, or infernus as the common receptacle of the souls of all men, both the just and unjust, while others thought that hades or infernus was never taken in the Scriptures for any place of happiness; and therefore they did not conceive the souls of the patriarchs or the prophets did pass into any such infernal place.

This difference of opinion appears in Augustine, who wavered in his views upon the subject of hades, as Bellarmine concedes. Pearson (On the Creed, art. 5) remarks of him that "he began to doubt concerning the reason ordinarily given for Christ's descent into hell, namely, to bring up the patriarchs and prophets thence, upon this ground, that he thought the word infernus (hade's)[31] was never taken in Scripture in a good sense to denote the abode of the righteous."[32] Pearson cites, in proof, the passages already quoted from Augustine's epistle and Commentary on Genesis. On the other hand, in City of God 20.15, Augustine hesitatingly accepts the doctrine that the Old Testament saints were in limbo and were delivered by Christ's descent into their abode: "It does not seem absurd to believe that the ancient saints who believed in Christ and his future coming were kept in places far removed, indeed, from the torments of the wicked, but yet in hades (apud inferos), until Christ's blood and his descent into these places delivered them." Yet in his exposition of the Apostles' Creed (On Faith and the Creed), Augustine makes no allusion to the clause he descended into hades. And the same silence appears in the On the Creed, attributed to him. After expounding the clausesrespecting Christ's passion, crucifixion, and burial, he then explains those concerning his resurrection and ascent into heaven. This proves that when he wrote this exposition, the dogma was not an acknowledged part of the catholic faith.[33] Still later, Peter Chrysologus, archbishop of Ravenna, and Maximus of Turin, explain the Apostles' Creed and make no exposition of the descent to hades. The difference of opinion among the fathers of the first four centuries, together with the absence of scriptural support for it, is the reason why descensus ad inferos was not earlier inserted into the Apostles' Creed. It required the development of the doctrine of purgatory and of the medieval eschatology generally in order to get it formally into the doctrinal system of both the Eastern and Western churches.[34] (See supplement 7.1.4.)

The personal and local descent of Christ into hades—whether to deliver the Old Testament saints from limbo or to preach judicially, announcing condemnation to the sinners there, or evangelically, offering salvation to them—if a fact, would have been one of the great cardinal facts connected with the incarnation. It would fall into the same class with the nativity, the baptism, the passion, the crucifixion, the resurrection, and the ascension. Much less important facts than these are recorded. St. Matthew speaks of the descent of Christ into Egypt, but not of his descent into hades. Such an act of the Redeemer as going down into an infernal world of spirits would certainly have been mentioned by one of the inspired biographers of Christ. The total silence of the four gospels is fatal to the tenet. St. Paul, in his recapitulation of the principal events of our Lord's life, evidently knows nothing of the descent into hades: "1 delivered unto you that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins and that he was buried and that he rose again the third day" (1 Cor. 15:3-4). The remark of Bishop Burnet (Thirty-nine Articles, art. 3) is sound:

> Many of the fathers thought that Christ's body went locally into hell and preached to some of the spirits there in prison; that there he triumphed over Satan and spoiled him and earned some souls with him into glory. But the account that the Scriptures give of the exaltation of Christ begins it always at his resurrection. Nor can it be imagined that so memorable a transaction as this would > have been passed over by the first three evangelists and least of all by St. John, who, coming after the rest and designing to supply what was wanting in them and intending particularly to magnify the glory of Christ, could not have passed over so wonderful an instance of it. The passage in St. Peter seems to relate to the preaching to the Gentile world by virtue of that inspiration that was derived from Christ.[35];

Scriptural View of the Intermediate State

The early patristic and Reformed view of the intermediate state agrees with the Scriptures, as the following particulars prove.

Both the Old and New Testaments represent the intermediate state of the soul to be a disembodied state: “Jacob yielded up the ghost and was gathered unto his people” (Gen. 49:33); “oh that I had given up the ghost” (Job 10:18; 11:20; 14:20); “she has given up the ghost” (Jer. 15:9); “there is no man that has power over the spirit to retain the spirit; neither has he power in the day of death” (Eccles. 8:8); “then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return to God who gave it” (12:7); “Jesus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the spirit” (Matt. 27:50); “when Jesus had cried with a loud voice he said, Father, into your hands I commend my spirit; and having said this, he gave up the spirit” (Luke 23:46); “Stephen called upon God, saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit” (Acts 7:59); “we are willing rather to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord” (2 Cor. 5:8); “I knew a man in Christ about four years ago, whether in the body or out of the body, I cannot tell” (12:2); “we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven: if so be that being clothed ‘we shall not be found naked’“ (5:2-3); “knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ has showed me” (2 Pet. 1:14); “I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus” (Rev. 20:4); “I saw under the altar the souls of them thatwere slain for the word of God” (6:9). In accordance with this, the prayer for the burial of the dead in the Episcopal order begins as follows: “Forasmuch as it has pleased almighty God, in his wise providence, to take out of this world the soul of our deceased brother, we therefore commit his body to the ground.” And God is addressed as the one “with whom do live the spirits of those who depart hence in the Lord and with whom the souls of the faithful, after they are delivered from the burden of the flesh, are in joy and felicity.”

Belief in the immortality of the soul and its separate existence from the body after death was characteristic of the old economy, as well as the new. It was also a pagan belief. Plato elaborately argues for the difference, as to substance, between the body and the soul and asserts the independent existence of the latter. He knows nothing of the resurrection of the body and says that when men are judged in the next life, “they shall be entirely stripped before they are judged, for they shall be judged when they are dead; and the judge too shall be naked, that is to say, dead; he with his naked soul shall pierce into the other naked soul, as soon as each man dies” (Gorgias 523).

That the independent and separate existence of the soul after death was a belief of the Hebrews is proved by the prohibition of necromancy in Deut. 18:10-12. The “gathering” of the patriarchs “to their fathers” implies the belief. Death did not bring them into association with nonentities. Jehovah calls himself “the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob,” and this supposes the immortality and continued existence of their spirits; for, as Christ (Luke 20:28) argues in reference to this very point, “God is not the God of the dead, but of the living”—not of the unconscious, but the conscious. Our Lord affirms that the future existence of the soul is so clearly taught by “Moses and the prophets” that if a man is not convinced by them, neither would he be “though one should rise from the dead” (Luke 16:29).

Some, like Warburton, have denied that the immortality of the soul is taught in the Old Testament because there is no direct proposition to this effect and no proof of the doctrine offered. But this doctrine, like that of divine existence, is nowhere formally demonstrated because it is everywhere assumed. Most of the Old Testament is nonsense upon the supposition that the soul dies with the body and that the sacred writers knew nothing of a future life. For illustration, David says, “My soul pants after you.” He could not possibly have uttered these words if he had expected death to be the extinction of his consciousness. The human soul cannot long for a spiritual communion with God that is to last only seventy years and then cease forever. Every spiritual desire and aspiration has in it the element of infinity and endlessness. No human being can say to God, “You are my God, the strength of my heart, and my portion for threescore years and ten, and then my God and portion no more forever.” When God promised Abraham that in him should “all the families of the earth be blessed” (Gen. 12:3), and Abraham “believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness” (15:6), this promise of a Redeemer and this faith in it both alike involve a future existence beyond this transitory one. God never would have made such a promise to a creature who was to die with the body, and such a creature could not have trusted in it. In like manner, Adam could not have believed the protevangelium,[36] knowing that death was to be the extinction of hisbeing. All the messianic matter of the Old Testament is absurd on the supposition that the soul is mortal. To redeem from sin a being whose consciousness expires at death is superfluous. David prays to God, “Take not the word of truth out of my mouth; so shall I keep your law continually forever and ever” (Ps. 119:43-44). Every prayer to God in the Old Testament implies the immortality of the person praying: “My flesh fails, but God is the strength of my heart forever” (63:2); “trust in the Lord forever, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength” (Isa. 26:4). The nothingness of this life only leads the psalmist to confide all the more in God and to expect the next life: “Behold, you have made my days as a handbreadth; and my age is as nothing before you: verily, every man at his best state is altogether vanity. And now, Lord, what wait I for? my hope is in you” (Ps. 39:5, 7). As John Davies says of the soul in his poem on immortality:

> Water in conduit pipes can rise no higher > Than the well-head from whence it first doth spring:
> Then since to eternal God she doth aspire,
> She cannot be but an eternal thing.

That large class of texts which speak of a “covenant” which God has made with his people and of a “salvation” which he has provided for them have no consistency on the supposition that the Old Testament writers had no knowledge and expectation of a future blessed life. The following are examples: “I will establish my covenant between me and you and your seed after you, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto you and to your seed after you" (Gen. 17:7); "I have waited for your salvation, O Lord" (49:18); "I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God" (Exod. 6:7); "yea, he loved the people; all his saints are in your hand; happy are you, O Israel; who is like unto you, O people saved by the Lord?" (Deut. 33:3, 29); "though he slay me, yet will I trust in him" (Job 13:15); "for the Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king; he will save us" (Isa. 33:22); "are you not from everlasting, O Lord, my God, my Holy One? we shall not die?" (Hab. 1:12); "into your hand I commit my spirit; you have redeemed me, O Lord God of truth" (Ps. 31:5).

It is impossible to confine this "covenant" of God, this "love" of God, this "salvation" of God, this "trust" in God, and this "redemption" of God to this short life of threescore years and ten. Such a limitation empties them of their meaning and makes them worthless. The words of St. Paul apply in this case: "If in only this life we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable" (1 Cor. 15:19). Calvin (2.10.8) remarks that > these expressions, according to the common explanation of the prophets, comprehend life and salvation and consummate felicity. For it is not without reason that David frequently pronounces how "blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord and the people whom he has chosen for his own inheritance"; and that, not on account of any earthly felicity, but because he delivers from death, perpetually preserves and attends with everlasting mercy those whom he has taken for his people.

In the same reference, Augustine (Confessions 6.11.19) says: "Never would such and so great things be wrought for us by God, if with the death of the body the life of the soul came to an end." When God saidto Abraham, "You shall go to your fathers in peace" (Gen. 15:15), he meant spiritual and everlasting peace. It was infinitely more than a promise of an easy and quiet physical death. When Jacob on his deathbed says: "I have waited for your salvation, 0 Lord" (49:18), he was not thinking of deliverance from physical and temporal evil. What does a man care for this, in his dying hour?

The religious experience delineated in the Old Testament cannot be constructed or made intelligible upon the theory that the doctrine of immortality was unknown or disbelieved. The absolute trust in God, the unquestioning confidence in his goodness and truth, the implicit submission to his will, the fearless obedience of his commands whatever they might be, whether to exterminate the Canaanites or slay the beloved child, and the hopeful serenity with which they met death and the untried future, would have been impossible had the belief of Enoch, Abraham, Moses, Samuel, and the prophets concerning a future existence been like that of Hume, Gibbon, Voltaire, and Mirabeau.

Another reason why the Old Testament contains no formal argument in proof of immortality and a spiritual world beyond this is because the intercourse with that world on the part of the Old Testament saints and inspired prophets was so immediate and constant. God was not only present to their believing minds and hearts, in his paternal and gracious character, but, in addition to this, he was frequently manifesting himself in theophanies and visions. We should not expect that a person who was continually communing with God would construct arguments to prove his existence or that one who was brought into contact with the unseen and spiritual world by supernatural phenomena and messages from it would take pains to demonstrate that there is such a world. The Old Testament saints "endured as seeing the invisible."[37]

The Scriptures teach that the intermediate state for the believer is one of blessedness. The disembodied spirit of the penitent thief goes with the disembodied Redeemer directly into paradise: "Today shall you be with me in paradise" (Luke 23:43). Paradise has the following marks:

> 1. It is the third heaven: "I knew a man caught up to the third heaven. He was caught up into paradise and heard unspeakable words which it is not lawful for a man to utter" (2 Cor. 12:2, 4); "to him that overcomes will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the center of the paradise of God" (Rev. 2:7).
>
> 2. It is "Abraham's bosom": "The beggar died and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom" (Luke 16:22); "many shall come from the east and west and shall recline (anaklithesontai)[38] with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 8:11).

3. It is a place of reward and happiness: "Remember that you in your lifetime received your good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things: but now he is comforted" (Luke 16:25); "to be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord" (2 Cor. 5:8); "I am in a strait between two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better" (Phil. 1:23); "for me, to die is gain" (1:21); "Christ died for us that whether we wake or sleep we should live together with him" (1 Thess. 5:9-10); "they stoned Stephen, call-ing upon God and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit" (Acts 7:59). According to Luke 9:30-31 Moses and Elijah coming directly from the intermediate state "appear in glory" at the transfiguration.

The Old Testament, with less of local description yet with great positiveness and distinctness, teaches the happiness of believers after death: "Enoch walked with God; and he was not; for God took him" (Gen. 5:24); "let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his" (Num. 23:10); the dying Jacob confidently says, "I have waited for your salvation, O Lord" (Gen. 49:18); "my flesh shall rest in hope; for you will not leave my soul in hell; neither will you suffer your Holy One to see corruption; you will show me the path of life; in your presence is fullness of joy; at your right hand there are pleasures forevermore" (Ps. 16:9-11); "as for me, I shall behold your face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake with your likeness" (17:15); "God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave; for he shall receive me" (49:15); "you shall guide me with your counsel and afterward receive me to glory; whom have I in heaven but you? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside you; my flesh and my heart fails; but God is the strength of my heart and my portion forever" (73:24-26); "precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints" (116:15); "he will swallow up death in victory" (Isa. 25:8, quoted by St. Paul in 1 Cor. 15:54 to prove the resurrection of the body); "I will ransom them from the power of the grave: I will redeem them from death; O death, I will be your plagues; O grave, I will be your destruction" (Hos.

13:14, cited by St. Paul in 1 Cor. 15:55); “many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake to everlasting life; and they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever” (Dan. 12:2-3); “I know that my Redeemer lives and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth; and though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God; whom I shall see for myself and my eyes shall behold” (Job 19:25-27).[39] St. Paul teaches that the Old Testament saints, like those of the New, trusted in the divine promise of the resurrection: “I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise [of the resurrection], our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come. For which hope’s sake, King Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?” (Acts 26:6-8; cf. 23:6). “These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them and embraced them and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. For they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country. And, truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had oppor-tunity to have returned. But now they desire a better country, that is, a heavenly” (Heb. 11:13-16). These bright and hopeful anticipations of the Old Testament saints have nothing in common with the pagan world of shades, the gloomy Orcus, where all departed souls are congregated. (See supplement 7.1.5.)

The Scriptures teach that the intermediate state for the impenitent is one of misery. The disembodied spirit of Dives goes to hades, which has the following marks:

1. Hades is the place of retribution and woe: “In hades he lifted his eyes, being in torments. And Abraham said, Son, remember that you in your lifetime received your good things, and now you are tormented” (Luke 16:23, 25). Christ describes Dives as suffering a righteous punishment for his hard-hearted, luxurious, and impenitent life. He had no pity for the suffering poor and squandered all the “good things” received from his maker in a life of sensual enjoyment. The Redeemer of mankind also represents hades to be inexorably retributive. Dives asks for a slight mitigation of penal suffering, “a drop of water.” He is reminded that he is suffering what he justly deserves and is told that there is a “fixed gulf between hades and paradise. He then knows that his destiny is decided and his case hopeless and requests that his brethren may be warned by his example. After such a description of it as this, it is passing strange that hades should ever have been called an abode of the good.[40]

2. Hades is the contrary of heaven, and the contrary of heaven is hell: “You, Capernaum, which are exalted until heaven, shall be brought down to hades” (Matt. 11:23). This is explained by our Lord’s accompanying remark that it shall be more tolerable in the day of judgment for the land of Sodom than for Capernaum, showing that to “be brought down to hades” is the same as to be sentenced to hell.

3. Hades is Satan’s kingdom, antagonistic to that of Christ: “The gates of hades shall not prevail against my church” (Matt. 16:18). An underworld containing both the good and the evil would not be the kingdom of Satan. Satan’s kingdom is not so comprehensive as this. Nor would an underworld be the contrary of the church, because it includes paradise and its inhabitants.

4. Hades is the prison of Satan and the wicked. Christ said to St. John, “I have the keys of hades and of death” (Rev. 1:18) and describes himself as “he that opens and no man shuts, and shuts and no man opens” (3:7). As the Supreme Judge, Jesus Christ opens and shuts the place of future punishment upon those whom he sentences: “I saw an angel come down from heaven having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand, and he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years and cast him into the bottomless pit and shut him up” (20:1 -3). All modifications of the imprisonment and suffering in hades are determined by Christ: “I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened, and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in those books; and death and hades gave up the deadwhich were in them, and they were judged every man according to their works; and death and hades were cast into the lake of fire" (20:12-14). This indicates the difference between the intermediate and the final state for the wicked. On the day of judgment, at the command of incarnate God, hades, the intermediate state for the wicked, surrenders its inhabitants that they may be reem-bodied and receive the final sentence, and it then becomes gehenna, the final state for them. Hell without the body becomes hell with the body.[41]'

5. Hades is inseparably connected with spiritual and eternal death: "I have the keys of hades and of death" (Rev. 1:18); "death and hades gave up the dead which were in them" (20:13); "I saw a pale horse; and his name that sat upon him was Death, and hades followed him" (6:6). Hades here stands for its inhabitants, who are under the power of ("follow") the "second death" spoken of in 2:11; 20:6, 14; 21:8. This is spiritual and eternal death and must not be confounded with the first death, which is that of the body only. This latter, St. Paul (1 Cor. 15:26) says, was "destroyed" by the blessed resurrection of the body, in the case of the saints but not of the wicked (see p. 857). The "second death" is denned as the "being cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. 20:14). This "death" is never "destroyed"; because those who are "cast into the lake of fire and brimstone with the devil that deceived him shall be tormented day and night forever and ever" (20:10).

6. Hades is not a state of probation. Dives asks for an alleviation of penal suffering and is solemnly refused by the eternal arbiter. And the reason assigned for the refusal is that his suffering is required by justice. But a state of existence in which there is not the slightest abatement of punishment cannot be a state of probation. Our Lord, in this parable, represents hades to be as immutably retributive as the modern hell. There is no relaxation of penalty in the former, any more than in the latter. Abraham informs Dives that it is absolutely impossible to get from hades to paradise: "Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed, so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can > they pass to us that would come from thence." After this distinct statement of Abraham, Dives knows that the case of a man is hopeless when he reaches hades: "Then, said he, I pray you, therefore, father, that you would send Lazarus to my father's house: for I have five brethren; that he may testify unto them, lest they also come to this place of torment" (Luke 16:27). The implication is that if they do come to it, there is no salvation possible for them. Abraham corroborates this by affirming that he who is not converted upon earth will not be converted in hades: "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead" (16:31).

In the nine New Testament passages which have been cited in this discussion, the connection shows that hades denotes the place of retribution and misery. There are three other instances in the received text (two in the uncial) in which the word is employed and denotes the grave:Acts 2:27, 31; 1 Cor. 15:55. In 1 Cor. 15:55, K, A, B, C, D, Lachmann, Ti-schendorf, Hort, and Revised Version read thanate.[42]

In Acts 2:27 it is said: "You will not leave my soul in hades, neither will you suffer your Holy One to see corruption." The soul, here, is put for the body, as when we say, "The ship sank with a hundred souls." The same metonymy is found frequently in the Old Testament: "There shall none be defiled for a dead body [Hebrew: for a soul]" (Lev. 21:1); "you shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead [Hebrew: for a soul]" (19:28); "he shall come at no dead body [Hebrew: dead soul]" (Num. 6:6; cf. Lev. 5:2; 22:4; Num. 18:11, 13; Hag. 2:13; see p. 857 n. 51 for Pearson's proof of this metonymy).

That soul is put metonymically for body and that hades means the grave in Ps. 16:10 is proved by the following considerations: (a) St. Peter says that "David being a prophet spoke of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hades neither did his flesh see corruption" (Acts 2:31). But there is no resurrection of the soul in the ordinary literal use of the word. The use here, therefore, must be metonymical. Soul, as in the Old Testament passages cited above, must therefore stand for body, (b) Christ's resurrection could not be a deliverance of both soul and body from hades, because both of them together could not be in hades. Whichever signification of hades be adopted, only one of the two could be in hades, and consequently only one of the two could be delivered from hades. If hades be the underworld, then only Christ's soul was in hades, not his body. If hades be the grave, then only Christ's body was in hades, not his soul. Accordingly, if hades be the underworld, then "not to leave Christ's soul in hades" was to take his soul out of the underworld. But to call this a resurrection of his body, as St. Peter does in 2:31, is absurd. If hades be the grave, then "not to leave Christ's soul in hades" was to take his body out of the grave. To call this a resurrection of his body is rational. The choice must be made between the two explanations, because to take both the soul and body of Christ out of hades is an impossibility, (c) The connection shows that "to leave Christ's soul in hades" is the same thing as "to suffer the Holy One to see corruption." David's reasoning, as stated by St. Peter in Acts 2:25-27, implies this. David "foresaw the Lord," that is, the Messiah. Respecting this Messiah, David argues that "his flesh shall rest in hope" because his "soul shall not be left in hades nor he be suffered to see corruption." Now, unless "soul" is here put for "flesh" and hades means the grave, there is a non sequitur in David's reasoning. That Christ's soul was not left in an underworld would be no reason why his body should rest in hope and not see corruption.

Again, St. Peter's own reasoning (Acts 2:22-27) proves the same thing. After saying that "God had raised up Jesus of Nazareth, having loosed the pangs of death," he shows that this event of Christ's resurrection was promised, by quoting the words of David, "You will not leave my soul in hades, neither will you suffer your Holy One to see corruption." That is to say, the promise "not to leave Christ's soul in hades" was fulfilled by "raising up Jesus of Nazareth and loosing the pains of death." And yet again, St. Paul's quotation in 13:35 of this passage from David shows that he understood soul to be put for body and hades to mean the grave, because he entirely omits the clause you will not leave my soul in hades, evidently regarding the clause you will not suffer your Holy One to see corruption as stating the whole fact in the case, namely, the resurrection of Christ's body from the grave. In 2:31 the uncials, Lachmann, Ti-schendorf, Hort, and Revised Version omit he psyche autou."[43]

Meaning of the Word Sheol

The Old Testament term for the future abode of the wicked and the place of future punishment is sheol (se'ol).[44] This word, which is translated by hades (hade's)[45] in the Septuagint, has two significations: (a) the place of future retribution and (b) the grave.

Before presenting the proof of this position, we call attention to the fact that it agrees with the explanation of sheol and hades common in the early patristic and Reformation churches and disagrees with that of the later patristic, the medieval, and a part of the modern Protestant church. It agrees also with the interpretation generally given to these words in the versions of the Scriptures made since the Reformation in the various languages of the world.[46]

That sheol in the Old Testament signifies the place of future punishment is proved by the following considerations.

First, it is denounced against sin and sinners and not against the righteous. It is a place to which the wicked are sent, in distinction from the good: "The wicked in a moment go down to sheol" (Job 21:13); "the wicked shall be turned into sheol, and all the nations that forget God" (Ps. 9:17); "her steps take hold on sheol" (Prov. 5:5); "her house is the way to sheol, going down to the chambers of death" (7:27); "her guests are in the depths of sheol" (9:18); "you shall beat your child with a rod and shall deliver his soul from sheol" (23:14); "a fire is kindled in my anger, and it shall burn to the lowest sheol" (Deut. 32:22); "if I ascend up into heaven, you are there; if I make my bed in sheol [the contrary of heaven], behold you are there" (Ps. 139:8); "the way of life is above to the wise, that he may depart from sheol beneath" (Prov. 15:24); "sheol is naked before him, and destruction [Revised Version: Abaddon] has no covering" (Job 26:6); "sheol and destruction [Revised Version: Abaddon] are before the Lord" (Prov. 15:11); "sheol and destruction [Revised Version: Abaddon] are never satisfied" (27:20). If in these last three passages the revised rendering be adopted, it is still more evident that sheoldenotes hell; for Abaddon is the Hebrew for Apollyon, who is said to be "the angel and king of the bottomless pit" (Rev. 9:11).

There can be no rational doubt that in this class of Old Testament texts the wicked and sensual are warned of a future evil and danger. The danger is that they shall be sent to sheol. The connection of thought requires, therefore, that sheol in such passages have the same meaning as the modern hell, and like this have an exclusive reference to the wicked. Otherwise, it is not a warning. To give it a meaning that makes it the common residence of the good and evil is to destroy its force as a divine menace. If sheol be merely a promiscuous underworld for all souls, then to be "turned into sheol" is no more a menace for the sinner than for the saint and consequently a menace for neither. In order to be of the nature of an alarm for the wicked, sheol must be something that pertains to them alone. If it is shared with the good, its power to terrify is gone. If the good man goes to sheol, the wicked man will not be afraid to go with him. It is no answer to this to say that sheol contains two divisions, hades and paradise, and that the wicked go to the former. This is not in the biblical text or in its connection. The sensual and wicked who are threatened with sheol as the punishment of their wickedness are not threatened with a part of sheol, but with the whole of it. Sheol is one, undivided, and homogeneous in the inspired representation. The subdivision of it into heterogeneous compartments is a conception imported into the Bible from the Greek and Roman classics. The Old Testament knows nothing of a sheol that is partly an evil and partly a good. The biblical sheol is always an evil and nothing but an evil. When the human body goes down to sheol in the sense of the "grave," this is an evil. And when the human soul goes down to sheol in the sense of "hell and retribution," this is an evil. Both are threatened as the penalty of sin to the wicked, but never to the righteous.

Consequently, in the class of passages of which we are speaking, "going down to sheol" denotes something more dreadful than going down to the grave or than entering the so-called underworld of departed spirits. To say that "the wicked shall be turned into sheol" implies that the righteous shall not be; just as to say that "they who obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ shall be punished with everlasting destruction" (2 Thess. 1:8-9) implies that those who do obey it shall not be. To say that the "steps" of the prostitute "take hold on sheol" is the same as to say that "whoremongers shall have their part in the lake which burns with fire and brimstone" (Rev. 21:8). To "deliver the soul of a child from sheol" by parental discipline is not to deliver him either from the grave or from a spirit world, but from the future misery that awaits the morally undisciplined and rebellious. In mentioning sheol in such a con-nection, the inspired writer is not mentioning a region that is common alike to the righteous and the wicked. This would defeat his purpose to warn the latter.[47] Sheol when denounced to the wicked must be as peculiar to them and as much confined to them as when "the lake of fire and brimstone" is denounced to them. All such Old Testament passages teach that those who go to sheol suffer from the wrath of God as the eternal judge who punishes iniquity. Thus, "the wicked is snared in the work ofhis own hands; the wicked shall be turned into sheol, and all the nations that forget God" (Ps. 9:16-17) is as much of the nature of a divine menace against sin as "in the day you eat thereof, you shall surely die" (Gen. 2:17). And the interpretation which eliminates the idea of endless pun-ishment from the former, to be consistent, should eliminate it from the latter. (See supplement 7.1.6.)

Accordingly, these texts must be read in connection with and be explained by that large class of texts in the Old Testament which represent God as a judge and assert a future judgment and even a future resurrection for this purpose: "Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. 18:25); "to me belongs vengeance and recompense; their feet shall slide in due time" (Deut. 32:35); "Enoch the seventh from Adam prophesied of these, saying, Behold the Lord comes with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment upon all and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed" (Jude 14-15); "the wicked is reserved to the day of destruction; they shall be brought forth to the day of wrath" (Job 21:30); "the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment; the way of the ungodly shall perish" (Ps. 1:5-6); "verily, he is a God that judges in the earth" (58:11); "who knows the power of your anger? even according to your fear, so is your wrath" (90:11); "O Lord God, to whom vengeance belongs, show yourself; lift up yourself, you judge of the earth: render a reward to the proud" (94:1-2); "there is a way that seems right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death" (Prov. 16:25); "God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time for every purpose and every work" (Eccles. 3:17); "walk in the ways of your heart and in the sight of your eyes; but know that for all these things God will bring you into judgment" (11:9); "God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil" (12:14); "the sinners in Zion are afraid; fearfulness has surprised the hypocrites; who among us shall dwell with devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?" (Isa. 33:14); of "the men that have transgressed against God," it is said that their "worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched" (66:24); "I beheld till the thrones were cast down and the ancient of days did sit; his throne was like the fiery flame and his wheels like burning fire; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him; the judgment was set, and the books were opened" (Dan. 7:9-10); "many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (12:2); "the Lord has sworn by the excellency of Jacob, Surely I never will forget any of their works" (Amos 8:7); "they shall be mine, says the Lord of hosts, in the day when I make up my jewels" (Mai. 3:17).

A final judgment, unquestionably, supposes a place where the sentence is executed. If there is a day of doom, there is a world of doom. Consequently, these Old Testament passages respecting the final judgment throw a strong light upon the meaning of sheol and make it certain in the highest degree that it denotes the world where the penalty resulting from the verdict of the Supreme Judge is to be experienced by the transgressor. The "wicked" when sentenced at the last judgment are "turned into sheol," as "idolaters and all liars" when sentenced "have their part in the lake which burns with fire and brimstone" (Rev. 21:8).

A second proof that sheol signifies the place of future punishment in the Old Testament is the fact that there is no other proper name for it in the whole volume: for Tophet is metaphorical and rarely employed. If sheol is not the place where the wrath of God falls upon the transgressor, there is no place mentioned where it does. But it is utterly improbable that a final sentence would be announced so clearly as it is under the old dispensation and yet the place of its execution be undesignated. In modern theology, judgment and hell are correlates, each implying the other, each standing or falling with the other. In the Old Testament theology, judgment and sheol sustain the same relations. The proof that sheol does not signify hell would, virtually, be the proof that the doctrine of hell is not contained in the Old Testament; and this would imperil the doctrine of the final judgment. Universalism receives very strong support from all versions and commentaries which take the idea of retribution out of the term sheol, because no texts that contain the word can be cited to prove either a future sentence or a future suffering. They only prove that there is a world of disembodied spirits, whose moral character and condition cannot be inferred from anything in the signification of sheol, because the good are in sheol and the wicked are in sheol. When it is merely said of a deceased person that he is in the world of spirits, it is impossible to decide whether he is holy or sinful, happy or miserable.

A third proof that sheol in these passages denotes the dark abode of the wicked and the state of future suffering is found in those Old Testament texts which speak of the contrary bright abode of the righteous and of their state of blessedness. According to the view we are combating, paradise is in sheol and constitutes a part of it. But there is too great a contrast between the two abodes of the good and evil to allow their being brought under one and the same gloomy and terrifying term sheol. When “the Lord put a word in Balaam’s mouth,” Balaam said, “Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his” (Num. 23:5, 10). The psalmist describes this “last end of the righteous” in the following terms: “My flesh shall rest in hope; you will show me the path of life; in your presence is fullness of joy; at your right hand, there are pleasures forevermore” (Ps. 16:11); “as for me, I will behold your face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake with your likeness” (17:15); “God will redeem my soul from the power of sheol; for he shall receive me” (49:15); “you shall guide me with your counsel and afterward receive me to glory; whom have I in heaven but you?” (73:24). In like manner, Isa. 25:8 says respecting the righteous that “the Lord God will swallow up death in victory and will wipe away tears from all faces.” and Solomon asserts that “the righteous has hope in his death” (Prov. 14:32). These descriptions of the blessedness of the righteous when they die have nothing in common with the Old Testament conception of sheol and cannot possibly be made to agree with it. The “anger” of God “burns to the lowest sheol,” which implies that it burns through the whole of sheol, from top to bottom. The wicked are “turned” into sheol and “in a moment go down” to sheol; but the good are not “turned” into “glory,” nor do they “in a moment go down” to “the right hand of God.” The “presence” of God, the “right hand” of God, the “glory” to which the psalmist is to be received, and the “heaven” which he longs for are certainly not in the dreadful sheol. They do not constitute one of its compartments. If between death and the resurrection the disembodied spirit of the psalmist is in “heaven,” at the “right hand” of God, in his “presence,” and beholding his “glory,” it is not in a dismal underworld. There is not a passage in the Old Testament that asserts or in any way suggests that the light of the divine countenance and the blessedness of communion with God are enjoyed in sheol. Sheol in the Old Testament is gloom and only gloom—and gloomy continually. Will anyone seriously contend that in the passage “Enoch walked with God and he was not for God took him,” it would harmonize with the idea of “walking with God” and with the Old Testament conception of sheol to supply the ellipsis by saying that “God took him to sheol?” Was sheol that “better country, that is, a heavenly,” which the Old Testament saints “desired,” and to attain which they “were tortured, not accepting deliverance?” (Heb. 11:16, 35).

A fourth proof that sheol is the place of future retribution is its inseparable connection with spiritual and eternal death. The Old Testament, like the New, designates the punishment of the wicked by the term death. And spiritual death is implied as well as physical. Such is the meaning in Gen. 2:17. The death there threatened is the very same thanatos[48] to which St. Paul refers in Rom. 5:12 and which “passed upon all men” by reason of the transgression in Eden. Spiritual death is clearly taught in the following: “I have set before you this day life and good and death and evil” (Deut. 30:15); “I set before you the way of life and the way of death” (Jer. 21:8); “I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live” (Ezek. 18:32; 33:11); “all they that hate me love death” (Prov. 8:36). Spiritual death is also taught by implication in those Old Testament passages which speak of spiritual life as its contrary: “As righteousness tends to life, so he that pursues evil pursues it to his own death” (11:19); “whoso finds me finds life” (8:35); “he is in the way of life that keeps instruction” (10:17); “you will show me the path of life” (Ps. 16:11); “with you is the fountain of life” (36:9); “there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life forevermore” (133:3).

Sheol is as inseparably associated with spiritual death and perdition in the Old Testament as hades is in the New Testament and as hell is in the common phraseology of the Christian church: “Sheol is naked before him, and destruction has no covering” (Job 26:6); “sheol and destruction are before the Lord” (Prov. 15:11); “sheol and destruction are never full” (27:20); “her house is the way to sheol, going down to the chambers of death” (7:27); “her house inclines unto death, and her paths unto the dead” (2:18); “her feet go down to death; her steps take hold on sheol” (5:5). The sense of these passages is not exhausted by saying that licentiousness leads to physical disease and death. The “death” here threatened is the same that St. Paul speaks of when he says that “they which commit such things are worthy of death” (Rom. 1:32) and that “the end of those things is death” (6:21). Eternal death and sheol are as inseparably joined in Prov. 5:5 as eternal death and hades are in Rev. 20:14. But if sheol be taken in the mythological sense of an underworld or spirit world, there is no inseparable connection between it and “death,” either physical or spiritual. Physical death has no power in the spirit world over a disembodied spirit. And spiritual death is separable from sheol in the case of the good. If the good go down to sheol, they do not go down to eternal death.

That sheol in one class of Old Testament passages denotes the grave, to which all men, the good and evil alike, go down, is clear from the following citations. Before proceeding, however, to this citation, it is to beremarked that this double signification of hell and the grave is explained by the connection between physical death and eternal retribution. The death of the body is one of the consequences of sin and an integral part of the total penalty. To go down to the grave is to pay the first installment of the transgressor’s debt to justice. It is, therefore, the metonymy inn of a part for the whole when the grave is denominated sheol. As in English death may mean either physical or spiritual death so in Hebrew sheol may mean either the grave or hell.

When sheol signifies the “grave,” it is only the body that goes down to sheol. But as the body is naturally put for the whole person, the man is said to go down to the grave when his body alone is laid in it. Christ “called Lazarus out of his grave” (John 12:17). This does not mean that the soul of Lazarus was in that grave. When a sick person says, “I am going down to the grave," no one understands him to mean that his spirit is descending into a place under the earth. And when the aged Jacob says, "I will go down into sheol, unto my [dead] son mourning" (Gen. 37:35), no one should understand him to teach the descent of his dis-embodied spirit into a subterranean world: "The spirit of man goes upward, and the spirit of the beast goes downward" (Eccles. 3:21). The soul of the animal dies with the body; that of the man does not. The statement that "the Son of Man shall be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Matt. 12:40) refers to the burial of his body, not to the residence of his soul.[49] When Christ said to the penitent thief, "Today shall you be with me in paradise," he did not mean that his human soul and that of the penitent should be in "the heart of the earth," but in the heavenly paradise. Christ is represented as dwelling in heaven between his ascension and his second advent: "Him must the heavens receive, till the time of the restitution of all things" (Acts 3:21); "the Lord shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God" (1 Thess. 4:16); "our conversation is in heaven, from which we look for our Savior the Lord Jesus" (Phil. 3:20). But the souls of the redeemed during this same intermediate period are represented as being with Christ: "Father, I will that they whom you have given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory which you have given me" (John 17:24); "we desire rather to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord" (2 Cor. 5:8). When, therefore, the human body goes down to sheol, it goes down to the grave and is unaccompanied with the soul.

The following are a few out of many examples of this signification of sheol: "The Lord kills and makes alive: he brings down to sheol and brings up" (1 Sam. 2:6); "your servants shall bring down the gray hairs of your servant our father with sorrow to sheol" (Gen. 44:31);[50] "O thatyou would hide me in sheol" (Job 14:13); "sheol is my house; I have said to corruption, You are my father: to the worm, you are my mother and my sister" (Job 17:13-14); "our bones are scattered at the mouth of sheol" (Ps. 141:7); Korah and his company "went down alive into sheol, and they perished from the congregation" (Num. 16:33); "in sheol, who shall give you thanks?" (Ps. 6:5); "there is no wisdom in sheol where you go" (Eccles. 9:10); "I will ransom them from the power of sheol; O sheol, I will be your destruction" (Hos. 13:14); "my life draws nigh unto sheol" (Ps.

88:3); “what man is he that lives and shall not see death? shall he deliver his soul from the hand of sheol?” (89:48). “The English version,” says Stuart, “renders sheol by grave in thirty instances out of sixty-four and might have so rendered it in more.”

Sheol in the sense of the grave is invested with gloomy associations for the good as well as the wicked, and this under the Christian dispensation as well as under the Jewish. The old economy and the new are much alike in this respect. The modern Christian believer shrinks from the grave like the ancient Jewish believer. He needs as much grace in order to die tranquilly as did Moses and David. It is true that “Christ has brought immortality to light in the gospel,” has poured upon the grave the bright light of his own resurrection, a far brighter light than the patriarchal and Jewish church enjoyed; yet man’s faith is as weak and wavering as ever and requires the support of God.

Accordingly, sheol in the sense of the grave is represented as something out of which the righteous are to be delivered by a resurrection of the body to glory, but the bodies of the wicked are to be left under its power: “Like sheep, the wicked are laid in sheol; death shall feed onthem; but God will redeem my soul [me = my body] from the power of sheol” (Ps. 49:14-15); “you will not leave my soul [me = my body] in sheol; neither will you suffer your Holy One to see corruption” (16:10).[51] This passage, while messianic, has also its reference to David and all believers: “I will ransom them from the power of sheol. O death, I will be your plagues; O sheol, I will be your destruction” (Hos. 13:14). St. Paul quotes this (1 Cor. 15:55) in proof of the blessed resurrection of the bodies of believers—showing that sheol here is the grave where the body is laid and from which it is raised.

The bodies of the wicked, on the contrary, are not delivered from the power of sheol or the grave by a blessed and glorious resurrection, but are still kept under its dominion by a “resurrection to shame and everlasting contempt” (Dan. 12:2). Though the wicked are raised from the dead, yet this is no triumph for them over death and the grave. Their resurrection bodies are not “celestial” and “glorified,” like those of the redeemed, but are suited to the nature of their evil and malignant souls: “Like sheep they are laid in sheol; death shall feed upon them” (Ps. 49:14). Respecting sinful

Judah and the enemies of Jehovah, the prophet says, “Sheol has enlarged herself and opened her mouth without measure, and their glory shall descend unto it” (Isa. 5:14). Of the fallen Babylonian monarch, it is said, “Sheol from beneath is moved for you to meet you at your coming. Your pomp is brought down to sheol: the worm is spread under you, and the worms cover you” (14:9, 11). To convert this bold personification of the “grave” and the “worm” which devour the bodies of God’s adversaries into an actual underworld where the spirits of all the dead, the friends as well as the enemies of God, are gathered is not only to convert rhetoric into logic, but to substitute the mythological for the biblical view of the future life. Says Alexander (on Isa. 14:9):

> Some interpreters proceed upon the supposition that in this passage we have before us not a mere prosopopoeia or poetical creation of the highest order, but a chapter from the popular belief of the Jews, as to the locality, contents, and transactions of the unseen world. Thus Gesenius, in his lexicon and commentary, gives a minute topographical description of sheol as the Hebrews believed it to exist. With equal truth a diligent compiler might construct a map of hell as conceived by the English Puritans from the descriptive portions of the Paradise Lost.

The clear perception and sound sense of Calvin penetrate more unerringly into the purpose of the sacred writer. “The prophet,” he says (Isa. 14:9), “makes a fictitious representation, that when this tyrant shall die and go down to the grave, the dead will go forth to meet him and honor him.” Theodoret (14:9) explains in the same way. He remarks on the words hell from beneath is moved for you, to meet you that “it is the custom of Scripture sometimes to employ a figure in order to state a thing more clearly. In this place the prophet introduces death as endowed with mind and reason, and expostulating with the king of Babylon.”

From this examination of texts, it appears that sheol in the Old Testament has the same two significations that hades has in the New. The only difference is that in the Old Testament, sheol less often in proportion to the whole number of instances denotes “hell” and more often the “grave” than hades does in the New Testament. And this, for the reason that the doctrine of future retribution was more fully revealed and developed by Christ and his apostles than it was by Moses and the prophets.

If after this study of the biblical data, there still be doubt whether sheol and hades denote sometimes the place of retribution for the wicked and sometimes the grave, and not an underworld or spirit world common to both the good and evil, let the reader substitute either spirit world or underworld in the following passages and say if the connection of thought or even common sense is preserved: “The wicked in a moment go down to the spirit world”; “the wicked shall be turned into the spirit world, and all the nations that forget God”; “her steps take hold on the spirit world”; “her guests are in the depths of the spirit world”; “you shall beat your child with a rod and shall deliver his soul from the spirit world”; “the way of life is above to the wise, that he may depart from the spirit world beneath”; “in the spirit world, who shall give you thanks?”; “there is no wisdom in the spirit world, whither you go”; “I will ransom them from the power of the spirit world; O spirit world I will be your destruction”; “like sheep the wicked are laid in the spirit world; death shall feed upon them; but God will redeem my soul from the power of the spirit world”; “the gates of the spirit world shall not prevail against the church”; “you, Capernaum, which are exalted unto heaven shall be brought down to the spirit world”; “death and the spirit world were cast into the lake of fire”; “I saw a pale horse, and his name that sat upon him was Death, and the spirit world followed him.”

SUPPLEMENTS

7.1.1 (see p. 836). Tertullian (Apologetic 48) represents gehenna as the contrary of paradise: “We Christians are ridiculed when we preach a punitive deity, because the pagan poets and philoso-phers also teach the same If we threaten gehenna. which is a subterranean storehouse of secret fire for punishment, we are immediately laughed to scorn For this is the heathen river Phlegethon. And if we mention paradise, a place of divine felicity destined to receive the spirits of the holy, separated from the common globe by a wall of fire, the Elysian fields have previously engaged the belief of men. But whence come. I ask you. these notions of the poets and philosophers so similar to ours, unless from our mysteries (sacraments)?”‘

7.1.2 (see p. 837) Irenaeus (Against Heresies 1.27.3), like Origen, mentions as one of the heresies of Marcion “that Cain, the Sodomites, the Egyptians, and others like them, and in fine all the nations who walked in all sorts of abominations, were saved by the Lord on his descending into hades.” He also, when enunciating “the faith which the church has received from the apostles,” makes no mention of the descent into hades (Against Heresies 1.10.1). This is conclusive evidence that in the last quarter of the second century this tenet was not regarded as one of the cardinal doctrines of Christianity So well-informed and influential a bishop would not have omitted it when stating the creed of the church, had it been as generally accepted as the doctrines of the Trinity incarnation, crucifixion, resurrection, ascension, etc.

7.1.3 (see p. 839). Jeremy Taylor (Liberty ol Prophesying, 1) acknowledges the spuriousness of the clause concerning the descent into hell: “For taking out the article of Christ’s descent into hell, which was not in the old creed [i.e., Apostles’ Creed], as appears in some of the copies I before referred to in Tertullian, Rufinus. and Irenaeus; and indeed was omitted in all the confessions of the Eastern churches, in the church of Rome, and in the Nicene Creed which by adoption came to be the creed of the Catholic church, ail other articles are such as directly constitute the parts and work of our redemption, such as clearly derive the honor to Christ and enable him with the capacities of our Savior and Lord.’

7.1.4 (see p. 840). Augustine’s view of the intermediate state is somewhat vacillating, although on the whole more in accord with the Protestant than the papal doctrine In his letter to Evodius (Letter 164) he makes the following objection to Christ’s preaching to the spirits in prison: “This is felt by me to be difficult. If the Lord when he died preached in hell to spirits in prison, why were those who continued unbelieving while the ark was a preparing the only ones counted worthy of this favor, namely, the Lord’s descending into hell? For in the ages between the time of Noah and the passion of Christ there died many thousands of many nations whom he might have found in hell I do not, of course, speak of those who in that period of time had believed in God, as. for example, the prophets and patriarchs of Abraham’s line, or going farther back Noah himself and his house, who had been saved by water, excepting perhaps the one son who afterward was rejected, and. in addition to these, all others outside of the posterity of Jacob who were believers in God, such as Job. the citizens of Nineveh, and any others, whether mentioned in Scripture or existing unknown to us in the vast human family at any time. I speak only of those many thousands of men who, ignorant of God and devoted to the worship of devils or of idols, had passed out of this life from the time of Noah to the passion of Christ. How was it that Christ, finding these in hell, did not preach to them, but preached only to those who were unbelieving in the days of Noah when the ark was a preparing? Or if he preached at all, why has Peter mentioned only these and passed over the innumerable multitude of the others?"

The following extracts exhibit the uncertainty of his mind: "The saying of Scripture that 'the pains of hell were loosed' by the death of Christ may be understood to refer to himself; meaning that he so far loosed, that is, made ineffectual, the pains of hell that he himself was not held by them, especially since it is added that it was impossible for him to be held by them.' Or if anyone, objecting to this interpretation, asks the reason why Christ chose to descend into hell, where those [retributive] pains were which could not possibly hold him in whom the prince and captain of death found nothing which deserved hell punishment, the words the pains of hell were loosed may be understood as referring not to all but only to some whom he chose to deliver. As to the first man, the father of mankind, it is agreed by almost the entire church that the Lord loosed him from that prison; although the authority of the canonical Scriptures cannot be cited as speaking expressly in its support, though this seems to be the opinion which is more than any other borne out by the words in the Book of Wisdom (10:1-2): Wisdom preserved the first-formed father of the world that was created alone and brought him out of his fall and gave him power to rule all things.' Some add to this tradition that the same favor was bestowed on Abel. Seth. Noah and his house. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the other patriarchs and prophets: they also being loosed from those pains at the time when the Lord descended into hell. But for my part, I cannot see how Abraham, into whose bosom the pious beggar in the parable was received, can be understood to have been In these pains. Moreover, I have not been able to find anywhere in Scripture the term hell [hades] used in a good sense. And if this use of the term is nowhere found in the Scriptures, assuredly the bosom of Abraham.' that is. the abode of a safe and tranquil rest, is not to be believed to be a part of hell [hades]. Nay, from the words of the master, in which he represents Abraham as saying. Between us and you there is a great gulf (chaos) fixed,' it is sufficiently evident that the bosom of that glorious felicity was not any integral part of hell [hades]. For what is that great gulf (chaos) but a chasm (hiatus) completely separating those places between which it not only is. but is fixed. Therefore if Scripture, without mentioning hell [hades] and its pains, had simply said that Christ when he died went to the bosom of Abraham, would anyone have dared to say that he descended into hell ? But seeing that plain scriptural testimonies make mention of hell and its pains, no reason can be alleged for believing that the Savior went thither except that he might save some from its pains; but whether he saved all or only some whom he deemed worthy of this favor, I still query. That he was in hell (apud inferos) and conferred this favor upon [wicked] persons subjected to these retributive pains. I do not doubt: but I have not been able to find what benefit he conferred, when he descended into hell, upon those righteous persons who were in Abraham's bosom, from whom I do not perceive that he ever withdrew himself, so far as concerns the beatific presence of his divinity. For on the very day that he died he promised that the thief should be with him in paradise at the time when he was himself about to descend to loose the pains of hell.' Most certainly, therefore. Christ was simultaneously in paradise and the bosom of Abraham in his beatific wisdom and in hell [hades] in his condemning power; for since the Godhead is confined by no limits, where is it not present? At the same time, however, so far as regarded his created nature, in assuming which he became man while still continuing to be God; that is to say, so far as regarded his human soul; he was in hell— as is plainly declared by the words of Scripture. You will not leavemy soul in hell " (Letter 164.2, 5-8 to Evodius, A.O. 414). It is to be noticed that in these extracts Augustine uses the word hell to denote the abode of the lost alone. He does not understand it to mean a nonpenal underworld containing both the evil and the good. "Abraham's bosom," he says, is not within it; and the inhabitants of it, like "the pious beggar," do not suffer the pains of punitive torment. "Hell," for him, here means only the place of penal retribution; as it does also in the Septuagint, Vulgate. Luther's, and James's versions. At the same time it is to be observed thai in other places Augustine employs "hell" to denote the abode of the saints redeemed under the old dispensation. He describes them as being in “hell” and delivered therefrom by Christ’s descent for that purpose and asserts that those redeemed under the new dis-pensation do not go to “hell” and are not so delivered: “If it does not seem irrational to believe that the ancient saints who believed in Christ and his then future coming were kept in places far removed indeed from the torments of the wicked, yet in hell’ (apud inferos), until Christ’s blood and his descent into these places delivered them, then, certainly, good Christians, redeemed by that price already paid, are wholly ignorant of hell’ {inferos nesciunt) while they wait for the resurrection of their bodies and the reception of their eternal reward” (City of God 20.15). In saying that the Old Testament saints were in “hell” before the descent of Christ to deliver them, Augustine conflicts with his assertion in his letter to Evodius that he “has not been able to find anywhere in Scripture the term hell used in a good sense”—that is, to denote the place were the good dwell. The explanation is that the eschatology of the church was in an unsettled state and on the way to the doctrine of purgatory and Augustine sometimes clung to the earlier doctrine of the apostolic age, which, like Scripture, knows nothing of the descensus and sometimes followed the current of his time.

The following extracts from Augustine respecting Christ’s “preaching to the spirits in prison” and the possibility that those who die unbelieving may believe and repent in the middle state agree with the doctrine of Calvin and the Reformers: “If we accept the opinion that men who did not believe while they were in life can in hell (apud inferos) believe in Christ, who can endure the contradictions both of reason and faith which must follow? In the first place, if this were true, we should have no reason for mourning over those [as hopelessly lost] who have departed from the body without the grace of faith, and there would be no ground for being solicitous and urgent that men should accept the grace of God before they die, lest they should suffer eternal death. If. second, it be alleged that in hell those only believe to no purpose and in vain who refused to accept here on earth the gospel preached to them, but that believing will profit those who never despised a gospel which they never had it in their power to hear, another still more absurd consequence is involved, namely, that the gospel ought not to be preached at all here upon earth since all men shall certainly die and, in order to get any benefit from believing the gospel in hell, must not have incurred the guilt of rejecting it here on earth" (Letter 164.13 to Evodius). The opinion that men are not damnable for original sin and actual transgression, but only for rejecting the offer of mercy, has been revived by the present advocates of salvation in the middle state. The objection which Augustine here makes to it is the same which the advocate of modern missions makes, namely, that it takes away the principal motive for preaching the gospel to men in this life as the only "day of salvation": "Consider, I pray you, whether what the Apostle Peter says concerning spirits shut up in prison who were unbelieving in the days of Noah may not have been written without any reference to hell, but rather to the typical nature of those times as related to the present time. For that transaction had been typical of future events, so that those who do not believe the gospel in our age, when the church is being built up in all nations, may be understood to be like those who did not believe in that age while the ark was preparing; also, that those who have believed and are saved by baptism may be compared to those who at that time, being in the ark, were saved by water; wherefore he says, 'So baptism by a like figure saves you.' Let us therefore interpret the rest of the statements concerning them that believed not, so as to harmonize with the analogy of the figure, and refuse to entertain the thought that the gospel was once preached or is even to this hour being preached in hell in order to make men believe and be delivered from its pains, as if a church had been established there as well as on earth" (Letter 164.15) "Those who have inferred from the words he preached to the spirits in prison that Peter held the opinion that Christ preached to disembodied souls in hell seem to me to have been led to this view by imagining that the term spirits could not be used to designate souls which were at the time of the preaching still in the bodies of men and which, being shut up in the darkness of ignorance, were, so to speak, 'in prison'—a prison such as that from which the psalmist sought deliverance in the prayer. Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise your name.' Instances in which soul' and spirit' denote living persons on earth are Rom. 13:1; 1 John 4:1, 3" (Letter 164.16). "Let it not be regarded as an objection to the interpretation that the Apostle Peter says that Christ himself preached to the spirits shut up in the prison of sin, who were unbelieving in the days of Noah, that Christ had not yet come. Though he had not come bodily, yet from the beginning of the human race he came often to this earth whether to rebuke the wicked, as Cain, and before that, Adam and his wife, when they sinned; or to comfort the good or to admonish them; so that some should believe to their salvation, and others should refuse to believe to their condemnation; coming not in the flesh but in the spirit, speaking by suitable manifestations of himself to such persons and in such manner as seemed good to him" (Letter 164.17). "There cannot be any middle life between holiness and sin, nor any middle judicial sentence between reward and punishment" (On Free WHI3.66). Augustine is explicit respecting the finality and endlessness of the punishment of the unregenerate dead, but respecting the temporary chastisement of the regenerate dead in the middle state, and prayers for their deliverance, he was involved in the errors of his time and makes some statements which are justly cited by Roman Catholic theologians in support of the doctrine of purgatory. Concerning the first point, he says: "When the judge of quick and dead has said, Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire which is prepared for the devil and his angels, and these shall go away into the eternal punishment, it were excessively presumptuous to say that the punishment of any of those whom God has said shall go away into eternal punishment shall not be eternal and so bring either despair or doubt upon the corresponding promise of life eternal " (City olGod 21.24). Respecting the second point, the following extracts exhibit his views: "The church prays for the wicked as long as they live, but she does not pray for the unbelieving and godless who are dead. For some of the dead, indeed, the prayer of the church or of pious individuals is heard; but it is for those who, having been regenerated in Christ, did not spend their life so wickedly that they can be judged unworthy of such compassion nor so well that they can be considered to have no need of it. As, also, after the resurrection there will be some of the [regenerate] dead to whom, after they have endured the pains proper to the spirits of the dead, mercy shall be accorded, and acquittal from the punishment of the eternal fire. For were there not some whose sins, though not remitted in this life shall be remitted in that which is to come, it could not be truly said, They shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, neither in that which is to come " (City of God 21.24; A.D. 413-26). "Temporary punishments are suffered by some in this life only, by others after death, by others both now and tiien; but all of them before that last and strictest judgment" (City of God 21.13). "It is a matter that may be inquired into, and either ascertained or left doubtful, whether some believers shall pass through a kind of purgatorial fire and, in proportion as they have loved with more or lessdevotion the goods that perish, be less or more quickly delivered from it" [Enchiridion 69; A.O. 425). "It cannot be denied that the souls of the [regenerate] dead are benefited by the piety of their living friends, who offer the sacrifice of the mediator or give alms in the church on their behalf" (Enchiridion 110).

7.1.5 (see p 846) Tholuck thus evinces the heavenly blessedness of the Old Testament saints from the Old Testament: "The Psalms show that the Old Testament saints stood to God. in the relation of love, to a much greater extent than some suppose. Who can be untouched on hearing the words of David at the beginning of the psalm of thanksgiving which he sang toward the close of his life: 'I will love you, O Lord, my strength' (Ps. 18:1); you are my Lord, I have no good beyond you' (16:2). No Christian could describe in sweeter language the peace of reconciliation than we find it done in Ps. 16. 23. 26, 27, 71, 73, 103. How happy must have been their communion with God who say. How excellent is your loving-kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of your wings; they are abundantly satisfied with the fatness of your house, and you make them drink of the river of your pleasures' (36:8-9); blessed is the man whom you choose and cause to approach unto you, that he may dwell in your courts; he shall be satisfied with the goodness of your house, even of your holy temple' (65:5); your loving-kindness is better than life; when I remember you upon my bed and meditate on you in the night watches' (63:4, 7). It is always a mark of a strong and healthy divine life when the traces of God are recognized in surrounding nature. Do classical songs celebrate the traces of God in nature? The Psalms do this eminently (cf Ps. 8, 18,19,29,104,107,147). The Old Testament saints were remarkable for the depth and sincerity of their worship of God. There is no attribute,' says Herder, no perfection of God left unexpressed in the simplest and most powerful manner in the Psalms and the Prophets.' In fact we can hardly realize how much energy and freshness the Christian belief in and worship of God would lose were the lofty utterances of the Psalms concerning the divine excellence and glory withdrawn from the Christian church (see Ps. 33, 47, 65, 86, 90. 91. 97, 103. 104,139). The Old Testament saints did not merely fear the divine law. but loved it. The law is described as their delight, as sweeter than honey and the honeycomb; as the riches, the peculiar portion and possession of the righteous, as the song in the house of his pilgrimage (19:8-11; 119:54-57; 103:11). Is it possible to find an instance of more thorough absorption of the human will in the law of God than this? I delight to do your will. O my God; yea your law is within my heart' (40:9) We are therefore entitled to say that morality of the purest kind, as the effect of filial love and reverence of God, formed part of the obedience of the Old Testament saints. The depth of their convictions of sin on the one hand and their fervent sense of divine mercy and of intimacy and communion with God on the other constituted a religious experience not exceeded by anything of the kind in the patristic, medieval, and modern church" (On the Psalms, intro-duction, 4).

Baxter (Dying Thoughts, app.) thus argues in proof that the Old Testament saints at death went to paradise or heaven: "Sure it is not true that the souls of the fathers before Christ's coming did not enter into heaven, but lay in some inferior limbus.[52] For Moses and Elijah came from heaven; their shining glory showed that, and their discourse with Christ and the voice and glory that went with them. And it is not to be thought that they were separated from the rest of the souls of the faithful and. with Enoch, were in heaven by themselves alone and the rest elsewhere. Though it is said that God's house has many mansions, and there are various degrees of glory, yet the blessed are all fellow citizens of one society and children of one family of God And they that came from 7.1.6 (see p. 852). Calvin (2.16.8-10) says that "though it appears from the writings of the fathers that the article concerning the descent into heir was not always in common use in the churches, yet in discussing a system of doctrine it is necessary to introduce it as containing a mystery highly useful Indeed there are some of the fathers who do not omit it. Hence we may conjecture that it was inserted a little after the days of the apostles and was not immediately but gradually received in the churches. It was explained in different senses. Some are of opinion that the clause contains nothing new, but is only a repetition in other words of what had been said respecting Christ's burial, because the word here rendered hell' is frequently used in the Scriptures to signify the grave I admit the truth of this observation respecting the meaning of the word, that it is frequently to be understood of the grave'; but their opinion is opposed by two reasons, which induce me to dissent from them. For what carelessness it would betray, after a plain fact had been stated in the most explicit manner, to assert it a second time in an obscure statement calculated rather to perplex than to elucidate it. When two phrases expressive of the same thing are connected together, the latter ought to be an explanation of the former But what an explanation would this be if one were to express it thus: When Christ is said to have been buried, the meaning is that he descended into hell!' Besides, again, it is not probable that such a superfluous tautology could have found its way into this compendium in which the principal articles of faith are expressed with the utmost possible brevity. Others explain the clause to mean that Christ descended to the souls of the fathers who had died under the Old Testament dispensation, for the purpose of announcing to them the accomplishment of redemption and liberating them from the prison in which they were confined. To this purpose they pervert the passages Ps 107:16 and Zech. 9:11.1 freely confess, indeed, that Christ illuminated the souls of the Old Testament saints by the power of his Spirit, so that they might know that the grace which they had only tasted by hope was then exhibited to the whole world. And probably to this we may accommodate that passage in Peter, where he says that Christ went and preached unto the spirits who were keeping watch as in a tower.' This is generally rendered 'the spirits in prison,' but I conceive improperly. The context also gives us to understand that the faithful who had died before that time were partakers of the same grace with us. For the apostle amplifies the efficacy of the death of Christ from this consideration, that it penetrated even to the dead: For this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit' (1 Pet. 4:6).

"But laying aside all consideration of the creed, we have to seek for a more certain explanation of the descent of Christ into hell; and we find one in the divine word replete with singular consolation to the believer If Christ had merely died a corporeal death, no end would have been accomplished by it. It was requisite, also, that he should feel the severity of divine retribution in order to appease the wrath of God and satisfy his justice. Hence it was necessary for him to contend with the powers of hell and the horror of eternal death. We have already stated from the prophet that the punishment of our peace was upon him,' that 'he was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities.' the meaning of which is that he was made a substitute and surety for transgressors and even treated as a criminal himself and bore all the punishments which would have been inflicted upon them; only with this exception, that it was not possible that he should be [forever] held of the pains of death' (Acts 2:24). Therefore it is no wonder if he be said to have descended into hell, since he suffered that death which the righteous wrath of God inflicts on transgressors.

It is an inadequate objection to say that by this explanation the order of things is perverted, because it makes that subsequent to his burial which really preceded it. For those sufferings of Christ which were visible to men [in the garden and on the cross] are very properly followed by that invisible and mysterious infliction which he suffered from the hand of God; in order to assure us that not only the body of Christ was given as the price of our redemption, but that there was another and more excellent ransom, since he suffered in his soul a dreadful agony [equal to that] of a person condemned and irretrievably lost." (Christ's estate of humiliation and suffering did not end at his crucifixion but his resurrection. During the interval between these, he was, therefore, still suffering, "the just for the unjust.")

Selden (Table Talk) thus explains the term hell in the article on the descent: "There are two texts for Christ's descending into hell, the one Ps. 16:10; the other Acts 2:27,31. The Bible that was in use when the Thirty-nine Articles were made has hell'; but the Bible that was in Queen Elizabeth's time, when the articles were confirmed, reads it grave': and so it continued till the new translation in King James's time, when it is hell' again. By this we may gather that the Church of England declined, as much as they could, the article concerning the descent; otherwise they never would have altered the Bible.

This may be the interpretation of the clause he descended into hell. He may be dead and buried, then his soul ascended into heaven. Afterward he descended again into hell, that is, into the grave, to fetch his body and to rise again. To understand by 'hell' the grave is no tautology, because the creed first tells what Christ suffered: He was crucified, dead, and buried'; then it tells us what he did: He descended into hell, the third day he rose again, he ascended.' etc." Whitby explains like Selden (see p. 840 n. 33).

Christ's Second Advent 2

The teaching of Scripture is explicit that Jesus Christ shall come again from heaven to earth in a visible bodily form: "While the apos-tles looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel, who also said, You men of Galilee, why stand gazing up unto heaven? This same Jesus, who is taken from you into heaven, shall so come, in like manner as you have seen him go into heaven" (Acts 1:10-11). Christ himself, being solemnly adjured by the high priest to say whether he was "the Christ the Son of God," replies "You have said. Hereafter shall you see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven" (Matt. 26:63-64). St. John, seeing the event in ecstatic vision, says, "Behold, he comes with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him" (Rev. 1:7).

The passages of Scripture which must chiefly be relied upon in constructing the doctrine of the second advent are Matt. 25; 26:64; 1 Cor. 15; 2 Thess. 2; Rev. 20-21.

The doctrine which the church very early derived from the Scriptures respecting Christ's second coming is found in the statement of the Apos-tles' Creed: "The third day Christ rose from the dead; he ascended into heaven; and sits at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead." According to this statement, there is no corporeal advent of Christ upon earth after his resurrection, until he leaves his session with the Father and comes directly "from thence" to the last judgment.

The doctrinal statement in the Apostles' Creed, consequently, precludes a premillennial advent of Christ. According to this theory, there are two corporeal resurrections; the first, of the righteous alone, supposed to be taught in Rev. 20:4-5; the second, that of both the righteous and the wicked at the end of the world, taught in Matt. 25:31-46. There is an interval of a thousand years between the two, and during this period Christ reigns in corporeal presence upon the renovated earth.

Premillenarianism was the revival of the pseudo-Jewish doctrine of the messianic kingdom, as this had been formed in the later periods of Jewish history by a materializing exegesis of the Old Testament (see Neander, History 1.650-51). Its most flourishing period was between 150 and 250. Its prevalence in the church at that time has been much exaggerated. That it could not have been the catholic and received doctrine is proved by the fact that it forms no part of the Apostles' Creed, which belongs to this period, and hence by implication is rejected by it. "Chiliasm," says Neander (1.651), "never formed a part of the general creed of the church. It was diffused from one country [Phrygia] and from a single fountainhead." In the preceding period of the apostolic fathers, 100 to 150, it had scarcely any currency. There are no traces of it in Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp. In Barnabas,Hermas, and Papias it is found; but these are much less influential names than the former. The early apologists Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus do not advocate it. Alford (on Rev. 20:4-5) is greatly in error in saying that "the whole church for three hundred years from the apostles understood the two resurrections in the literal premillenarian sense."

Revelation 20:4-6 is the chief and nearly the sole support of the doctrine of two corporeal resurrections. In explaining it, reference must be had to other passages of Scripture, especially Matt. 25. Christ himself here gives an account of his own final advent, and he speaks of only one corporeal resurrection.

In order to harmonize Matt. 25 with Rev. 20:4-6, the term resurrection in the latter passage must have a tropical signification. And this is supported by the phraseology employed by St. John: "I saw the souls (psychas)[1] of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and they lived (eze'sanf[2] and reigned with Christ a thousand years. This is the first resurrection." The "living and reigning" is the "resurrection." Had St. John intended a literal resurrection, he would have said, "I saw the bodies of them that were beheaded"; and he would have employed the verb anistemi,[3] as is the case in the New Testament generally, and not the verb zo[4] or anazd.[5] The revelator, in vision, sees the martyrs and other witnesses for Christ as disembodied spirits dwelling in paradise and describes them not as rising, but as "living and reigning" with Christ for a thousand years. This "living and reigning" he calls "the first resurrection." They lived with Christ by their faith in him, and this spiritual life was a spiritual resurrection from "death in trespasses and sins" (Eph. 2:1). Having thus "risen with Christ" (Col. 3:1), they sought "those things which are above where Christ sits on the right hand of God," and as the reward of their eminent spirituality and devotion, even to martyrdom, reign in the heavenly paradise with Christ in his spiritual reign, during that remarkable period of the triumph of the gospel upon earth which is denominated the millen-nium. Special honor in heaven, granted to particular persons for extraordinary service and suffering in Christ's cause upon earth, is spoken of elsewhere. To the apostles our Lord says, "When the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory, you also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19:28). This certainly is to be interpreted metaphorically, not literally.

The tropical use of "resurrection" to denote regeneration is a char-acteristic of St. John, as well as of St. Paul. In John 5:25-29 our Lord speaks of two resurrections, the first of which is spiritual, and the second is corporeal: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming and now is when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live." The reference, here, is to the regeneration of the human soul, which is often called a resurrection, as the following passages show: "He that believes on me is passed from death unto life" (John 5:24); "he that believes in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and whosoever lives and believes in me shall never die" (11:25-26); "as Christ was raised from the dead, even so we also should walk in newness oflife" (Rom. 6:4); "arise from the dead, and Christ shall give you life" (Eph. 5:14); "if you be risen with Christ, seek those things that are above" (Col. 3:1); "when we were dead in sins, God quickened us and raised us up and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2:6); "entombed with him in baptism, wherein also you are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God" (Col. 2:12).

After speaking of regeneration as a spiritual resurrection, our Lord proceeds to speak of another resurrection which he describes as corporeal: "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming [he does not say: and now is], in the which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." This is the literal resurrection of the body; and this is the "second resurrection" in relation to the first tropical resurrection. The regeneration of the soul, according to St. Paul, results in the resur-rection of the body: “If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwells in you” (Rom. 8:11). It should be noticed that while Christ in John 5:25-29 directly mentions both resurrections, St. John in Rev. 20:5-6 directly mentions only one, namely, the “first resurrection.” He leaves the “second res-urrection,” namely, that of the body, to be inferred. That the “first resurrection” in 20:6 is spiritual is proved still further by the fact that those who have part in it are “blessed and holy” and not “under the power of the second death” and are “priests of God.” The literal resurrection is not necessarily connected with such characteristics, but the tropical is. (See supplement 7.2.1.)

In Rev. 20:5 it is said that “the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished.’[6] The remainder of the believing dead do not “live [and reign with Christ]” until the final consummation at the end of the world. The martyrs are honored above the nuiss of believers by a coreign with the Redeemer during the millennium. The church generally does not participate in the triumph of its head until after the millennium and final judgment.

Augustine (City of God 20.6-10) gives this explanation of the two resurrections. The binding of Satan, he says, is spiritual, and the reign of Christ on earth is also spiritual. The martyrs, as disembodied spirits, reign spiritually with their Lord. Augustine {City of God 20.7) mentions the opinion of some who believed that the saints will rise on the completion of six thousand years from the creation and will live upon the earth to celebrate the millennial Sabbath. “This opinion,” he adds, “would not be objectionable, if it were believed that the joys of the saints in that Sabbath shall be spiritual and consequent on the presence of God, for I myself, too, once held this opinion. But as they assert that those who then rise again shall enjoy the leisure of immoderate carnal banquets, furnished with an amount of meat and drink such as not only to shock the feeling of the temperate, but even to surpass the measure of credulity itself, such assertions can be believed only by the carnal. They who do believe them are called by the spiritual ‘Chiliasts’; which we may literally reproduce by the name of ‘Millenarians’“ (see Wordsworth on John 5:24-29).

S U P P L E M E N T

7.2.1 (seep. 865). Neither the phrase second resurrection nor the phrase first death are found in Scripture. They are inferences from the phrases first resurrection ana second death, which are found there; the former in Rev. 20:5-6; the latter in 2:11; 20:6, 14; 21:8. The inferred “first death” and the inferred “second resurrection” are both of them physical. The “first death” is destroyed by the resurrection of the body (1 Cor. 15:26,54-55; 1 Tim. 1:10; Heb. 2:14); the “second death” is indestructible (Rev. 20:14,10). The “second resurrection” is that of the body: and the “first resurrection” Is that of the soul in regeneration. One death and one resurrection are directly taught, and one death and one resurrection indirectly taught in Scripture. One of each is physical, and one of each is spiritual. But the order is different in each class. The first death is physical, and the second is spiritual: the first resurrection is spiritual, and the second physical.

Leighton (on 1 Pet. 2:2) explains the phrase newborn babes as denoting the new birth and says that “this new birth is the same that Sf. John calls the first resurrection and pronounces them blessed that partake of it: Blessed are they that have part in the first resurrection, the second death shall have no power over them’ (Rev. 20:6). This new life put us out of danger and fear of that eternal death. We are passed from death to life.’ says St. John (1 John 3:14). speaking of those that are born again.”

3 Resurrection

Historical Considerations

The doctrine of the resurrection of the body was from the first a cardinal and striking tenet of Christianity. The resurrection of Christ made it such. Perhaps no article of the new religion made greater impression, at first view, upon the pagan. When the philosophers of Athens "heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked, and others said, 'We will hear you again of this matter'" (Acts 17:32). The immortality of the soul and its disembodied existence were familiar to them. Socrates in Phae-drus 245 argues that "the soul is immortal, for that is immortal which is ever in motion; but that which is moved by another in ceasing to move ceases to live." And in Phaedo 114, after his description of the underworld, he adds, "I do not mean to affirm that the description which I have given of the soul and her mansions is exactly true—a man of sense ought hardly to say that. But I do say that, inasmuch as the soul is shown to be immortal, he may venture to think, not improperly or unworthily, that something of the kind is true." "As for your body," says Marcus Aurelius (Meditations 10), "it is but a vessel or case that compasses you about. It is but an instrument, like a carpenter's ax. Without the soul, which has power to use it, the instrument is of itself of no more use to us than the shuttle is of itself to the weaver or the pen to the writer or the whip to the coachman." (See supplement 7.3.1.)

The doctrine of the transmigration of the soul is wholly different from that of the resurrection. In this case, the soul goes into another body than its own: "The Egyptians believed in the transmigration of souls, so that the soul in a destined cycle wandered through the bodies of every species of animals, till it returned to a human body; not to the one it had formerly occupied, but to a new one" (Heeren, Egyptians, 2). According to Rawlinson (Egypt, 10), “the good soul, having just been freed from its infirmities by passing through the basin of purgatorial fire, reentered its former body, rose from the dead, and lived once more a human life upon earth. This process was reiterated, until a certain mystic cycle of years became complete, when finally the good soul attained the crowning joy of union with God and absorption into the divine essence.” The soul of the evil, according to Lenormant, goes through transmigrations until it is finally annihilated. “This latter point is not, perhaps, universally allowed,” says Rawlinson (1.318).

The early fathers maintained the doctrine of the resurrection of the body with great earnestness and unanimity against the objections of the skeptics, of whom Celsus was acute and scoffing in his attack. Most of them believed in the resurrection of the very same material body. Justin Martyr, according to Hagenbach, teaches that cripples will rise as cripples, but at the instant of resurrection, if believers, will be made physi-cally perfect. In this tract on the resurrection (§4), he argues that themiracles of Christ wrought upon the body prove the fact of its resurrection: “The same power that could say, Arise, take up your bed and walk, could say to the dead body, Come forth. If on earth Christ healed the sicknesses of the flesh and made the body whole, much more will he do this in the resurrection, so that the flesh shall rise perfect and entire.” The Alexandrine school, alone, adopted a spiritual theory of the resurrection. Origen went so far as to assert that a belief in the resur-rection of the body is not absolutely essential to the profession of Christianity, provided the immortality of the soul were maintained.

The patristic view of the resurrection passed into the Middle Ages with little modification, excepting that in connection with the materialism of Roman Christianity it naturally became more materialistic. The poetry of Dante and the painting of Angelo powerfully exhibit it. In the Protestant system, a real body, and one that preserves the personal identity, is affirmed; but the materialism of the papal and to some extent that of the patristic church is avoided by a more careful attention to St. Paul’s distinction between the natural body (soma psychikon)[1] and the spiritual body (soma pneumatikon).[2]

Respecting the probability of a resurrection of the body, it may be remarked that it is no more strange that the human body should exist a second time than that it has existed the first time. That a full-formed human body should be produced from a microscopic cell is as difficult to believe, upon the face of it, as that a spiritual resurrection body should be produced out of the natural earthly body. The marvels of embryology are, a priori, as incredible as those of the resurrection. The difference between the body that is laid in the grave and the body that is raised from the grave is not so gr eat as the difference between the minute embryonic ovum and the "human form divine" represented by the Antinous or the Apollo Belvidere. If the generation of the body were, up to his time, as rare an event as the resurrection of the body, it might be denied with equal plausibility. The question of St. Paul in Acts 26:8 applies here: "Why should it be thought a thing incredible that God should raise the dead?" The omnipotence that originated the body can of course reoriginate it. Even if the extreme view be adopted, that there must be the very same material particles in order to the identity of the body, this is not an impossibility for God. For as Pearson (On the Creed, art. 11) remarks: "Though the parts of the body of man be dissolved, yet they perish not, they lose not their own entity when they part with their relation to humanity; they are laid up in the secret places and lodged in the chambers of nature, and it is no more a contradiction that they should become the parts of the same body of man to which they did belong than that after his death they should become the parts of any other body, as we see they do." Only in this case, a particle of matter that had once been a constituent in two or more human bodies could not be a constituent of two or more resurrection bodies because this would involve the simultaneous presence of an atom in two or more places.

The resurrection of the body was taught in the Old Testament, and for this reason it was the common belief of the Jews in the time of Christ (John 11:24; Mark 6:16; 12:23). Passages that teach it are "your dead men shall live; together with my dead body shall they arise" (Isa. 26:19); "my flesh also shall rest in hope" (Ps. 16:9); "many that sleep in the dustof the earth shall awake" (Dan. 12:2). The parable of a spiritual resurrection implies a bodily resurrection (Ezek. 37:1-14). The majority of commentators find the resurrection in Job 19:23-27. The translation of Elijah and the reappearance of Samuel at Endor favor the doctrine of the resurrection of the body. The careful sepulcher of the body by Abra-ham and the Old Testament saints proves the expectation of the resurrection (Gen. 49:29). The Apocrypha teaches the resurrection (2 Maccabees 7:9, 23). (See supplement 7.3.2.)

Scriptural Teaching on the Resurrection

The principal points in the scriptural representation are the following.

Christ suddenly and unexpectedly descends from heaven accompanied by angels and reproduces the bodies of all the dead (Matt. 25:3-32; John 5:28-29; Acts 24:15; 1 Thess. 4:16). The generation living upon earth at the time of the resurrection will instantaneously be reembod-ied (1 Thess. 4:17 compared with 1 Cor. 15:51). In Westminster Confession 32.2 it is said that "such as are found alive shall not die, but be changed." The meaning is that they will not die gradually like men generally, not that they will altogether escape the penalty of death. All in Adam must die. Says Augustine (City of God 20.20), "Neither do we suppose that in the case of these saints, the sentence earth you are and unto earth shallyou return is null, though their bodies do not on dying fall to the earth, but both die and rise again at once, while caught up into the air. For not even the saints shall be quickened to immortality unless they first die, however briefly."

The body thus reproduced is a "spiritual body," for both the good and the evil (1 Cor. 15:44, 53). By soma pneumatikon[3] is meant a spiritlike body, that is, a body adapted to the future spiritual world. It is antithetic to the soma psychikon[4] or the "flesh and blood" spoken of in 1 Cor. 15:15, by which is meant the present earthly body suited to the present sensuous world. The body is not converted into spirit: "It is one thing for a body to become spiritual with respect to its qualities, by reason of its clarity, agility, subtlety, and so forth. But it is another thing to become spirit or to be changed into the nature of spirit"[5] (Turretin 13.19.19).

In denominating the present body psychikon[6]' and the future body pneumatikon ,[7] St. Paul distinguishes between psyche[8] and pneuma[9]; in the same way that he does in 1 Thess. 5:23 and Heb. 4:12. The latter denotes the higher side of the human soul (the "rational soul") and the former its lower side (the "animal soul"). Usually, the two are not distinguished in this way by either St. Paul or the other New Testament writers since they constitute one soul (psyche)[10] in distinction from the body (soma)[11] and are sometimes designated in their unity by pneuma[12]and sometimes by psyche.[13] Commonly, the sacred writers speak of man as constituted as "body and soul" or "body and spirit"—but not "body, soul, and spirit." But in 1 Cor. 15:44; 1 Thess. 5:23; and Heb. 4:12 St. Paul requires the distinction between the “animal” and the “rational” soul for the purposes of his discussion and accordingly makes it[14] (Shedd on Rom. 8:10). (See supplement 7.3.3.)

The soma psychikon[15] or “natural” body is marked by the qualities of the psyche[16] or “animal” soul, namely, by physical appetites and pas-sions, such as hunger, thirst, and sexual appetite. These are founded in “flesh and blood” or that material substance of which the present human body is composed. The resurrection or “spiritual” body, on the other hand, will be marked by the qualities of the pneuma[17] or “rational soul.” It will not be composed of flesh and blood, but of a substance which is more like pneuma”[18] than like psyche’,[19] more like the rational than the animal soul.

That the resurrection body of both the good and the evil will have the common characteristic of being destitute of fleshly appetites and passions and will be a “spiritual” in distinction from a “natural” body is proved by the following: “They neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God” (Matt. 22:30); “flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God” (1 Cor. 15:50); “they hunger no more, neither thirst any more” (Rev. 7:16).

But while alike in this particular, the spiritual body of the redeemed differs in several important respects from the spiritual body of the lost: “Some shall awake to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt” (Dan. 12:2); “all that are in the graves shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation” (John 5:28-29). (a) The spiritual body of the redeemed is a “celestial” body (1 Cor. 15:40); that of the lost is not. (b) It is a “glorified” body (1 Cor. 15:43; Phil. 3:21); that of the lost is not. (c) It is a “resplendent” body (“the righteous shall shine forth as the sun”; Matt. 13:43); that of the lost is not. The difference between the blessed and the miserable resurrection is also marked by exanastasis[20]’ instead of anastasis[21] (Phil. 3:11), by the phrase te’s ek nekron[22] (Luke 20:35), and by the assertion that there is an order in the resurrection from the dead: “Every man in his own order, they that are Christ’s at his coming” (1 Cor. 15:23; Cudworth, Intellectual System 3.315 [ed. Tegg]). (See supplement 7.3.4.)

The spiritual body is not wholly a new creation ex nihilo, as the Manicheans asserted, but is the old body transformed: “It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality" (1 Cor. 15:44, 53). When Christ raised Lazarus in Bethany, the body raised was iden-tical as to the very particles. It was not a spiritual body, because there was no transformation. It had been sown a natural body, and it was raised a natural body. This resurrected body of Lazarus will require to be changed before it can be the spiritual body of the final resurrection.

The resurrection body is an identical body. An identical body is one that is recognized by the person himself and by others. No more than this is required in order to bodily identity. A living man recognizes his present body as the same body that he had ten years ago; yet the material particles are not the same identically: "We shall rise again with the same bodies we have now as to the substance, but the quality will be different" (Calvin 3.25.8); "the dead shall be raised up with the self-same bodies and none other, although with different qualities" (Westminster Confession 33.2). In saying that the substance is the same but the quality is different, Calvin does not mean that all the qualities will be different. This would be incompatible with sameness of substance. But some of the qualities are changed. Calvin explains his statement in the following words: "Just as the very body of Christ which had been offered as a sacrifice was raised again, but with such new and superior qualities as though it had been altogether different." Certain qualities of the "natural" body will still belong to the "spiritual," such as extension, figure, etc. The difference will be in the secondary, rather than in the primary properties of the natural body.

That the spiritual body is recognized is proved by Luke 9:30-33: Moses and Elijah were recognized by Christ and pointed out to the disciples; "you shall see Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and all the prophets in the kingdom of God" (Luke 13:28; John 14:3; 20:16-17, 20); Christ prepares a place for his people and receives them individually: "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me" (2 Sam. 12:23); "Jacob was gathered unto his people" (Gen. 49:33); "Abraham died and was gathered to his people" (25:8). (See supplement 7.3.5.)

That the spiritual body does not consist of the very same particles of matter with the natural body, no more, no less, and no different, is proved by St. Paul's illustration in 1 Cor. 15:35-40: "You sow not that body that shall be; but God gives it a body as it has pleased him. All flesh is not the same flesh, but there is one flesh of men, another of fishes, and another of birds. There are also celestial bodies and bodies terrestrial." The ten or more grains of wheat that are produced by germination and growth from the single grain sown are not composed of exactly the same atoms of matter that constituted the seed kernel. There are many more atoms in them, which have been collected from the soil and the atmosphere. And yet there is the perpetuity, in each of these ten or more new grains, of something that existed in the single seed grain. The vegetable life in this latter has passed into the former and become the constructive principle in each of the ten or more grains. When Paul says that "that which you sow is not quickened except it die," he does not mean the death of everything in the seed kernel. Should the germ in the kernel die, there would be no quickening and no new individual grains. That which dies is the integument or covering of the germ. This dies and rots; but some part even of this reappears in the new grains of wheat. The growing plant is nourished by the decaying integument, similarly as the ovum is nourished by the yolk. Yet the particles of the decaying integument do not make up the total sum of the particles in the new grain. Still other particles have to be gathered by the transmitted vital principle from the soil and atmosphere in order to make out the whole amount required for the new individuals.

It should be carefully observed that St. Paul does not mean that the resurrection of the body is the same in every particular with the reproduction of grain by germination. It is only an illustration and not an explanation. In the case of germination, one grain becomes ten or twenty grains. But in the case of resurrection, one body becomes only one body. The transformation in the first instance is of one individual into many individuals; in the latter instance of one individual into one individual. The special point in the illustration is that the transforma-tion in the instance of the seed grain does not entirely destroy the old substance; so that there is some sameness of substance between the old and the new. But the sameness between the spiritual body and the natural body is much closer than that between the ten grains of new wheat and the one grain from which they were produced. It is evident that the apostle intended by the illustration to teach that while the res-urrection of the body is a supernatural and creative act, it is not such in the sense of originating all the materials from nothing. The resur-rection body is founded upon and constructed out of the previously existing earthly body.

Employing St. Paul's threefold distinction in 1 Thess. 5:23, man is a synthesis of pneuma,[23] psyche',[24] and soma.[25] The brute is a synthesis of only psyche'"[26] and soma.'[27] Man is composed of a rational soul, an animal soul, and a body; the brute is composed of an animal soul and a body. An animal soul has intelligence in its lower forms, but not reason or the power of intuitive perception in mathematics, morals, and religion. The difference between the rational soul and the animal soul is marked in Gen. 2:7 and 1:20-21, 24. In the first passage, a living soul (nepes hayyd)[28] is attributed to Adam, but it is inbreathed by God. In the latter passages, a living soul is attributed to the lower animals, but it is merely created, not inbreathed by God. The death of an animal is the death of both the body and the incomplex animal soul, not the separation of the latter from the former and the continued life of the latter. The death of a man is the separation of the complex rational-animal soul from the body or the departure of the pneuma-psychi"[29] from the soma,[30] the continued conscious existence of the former and the decomposition of the latter. The substance of the soma[31] is mortal and dissolves and "returns to dust as it was." The substance of the pneuma-psyche[32] is immortal and is not changed in the least by being separated from the soma.[33] In this pneuma-psyche'[34] or rational soul is the nucleus or, to use St. Paul's illustration from the grain of wheat, the germ of the resurrection body. The psyche[35] which is united with the pneuma[36] and constitutes one indivisible principle with it, is the inner reality of the body or the soma,'[37] standing for and representing it in the intervalbetween death and the resurrection.[38] Though the soma[39] is scattered to the four winds and like Wycliffe's ashes cast into the Avon and floated into the Severn and finally into the sea, yet the psyche'"[40] —the organic and constructing principle of the soma"[41] —is still united with the pneuma."[42] And in the instance of the believer, the pneuma-psyche"[43] is united with Christ; so that thus it may be said (Westminster Larger Catechism 86) that the believer's "body is still united to Christ" between death and the resurrection, although the material particles that composed it are "scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cuts and cleaves wood upon the earth" (Ps. 141:7). Says Poor (in Lange's Commentary on 1 Cor. 15:35^40; cf. a similar statement in Hodge, Theology 3.779):

> The rational soul, the pneuma-psyche,[44] is the true substance of the body: that which stands under the outward visibility of a corporeal form and imparts to it its reality. If this be so. it is easy to see that > when by death the materials of our present bodily structure are all dissolved and scattered abroad, this vital organic principle, through the supernatural agency of God at the sounding of the last trump, may gather to itself and assimilate new materials of a different nature from "flesh and blood" and build up a spiritual body suited to the new condition of things.

In the instance of the unbeliever, the pneuma-psyche [45] is not united to Christ by faith, and therefore it is not said that his "body is still united to Christ" between death and the resurrection. The rational soul of the unbeliever is preserved for "the resurrection of damnation" (John 5:29) by the omnipotence of God in the exercise of his providence merely, not of his redeeming grace.[46] (See supplement 7.3.6.)

SUPPLEMENTS

7.3.1 (see p. 867). Howe [Blessedness of the Righteous, chap. 9) notices the fact that Pythagoras, Plato, and the Neoplatonists not only held the soul to be of a different substance from the body and capable of existing and acting without it, but also 'that we are borne down by the body to the earth and are continually recalled by it from the contemplation of higher things and that the body must therefore be relinquished as much as possible even here and altogether in another life, that free and unencumbered we may discern truth and love goodness. " He then proceeds to argue in support of the diversity of nature between soul and body and the independence of the former, as follows: "If it be possible enough to form an unexceptionable notion of a spiritual being distinct and separable from any corporeal substance (which the learned Dr. More has sufficiently demonstrated in his treatise on the immortality of the soul) with its proper attributes and powers peculiar to itself, what can reasonably withhold me from asserting that, being separated from the body, it may as well operate alone (I mean exert such operations as are proper to such a spiritual being) as exist alone? What we find it here, in fact, in its present state, acting only with dependence on a body, will no more infer that it can act no otherwise, than its present existence in a body will that it can never exist out of it; neither of which inferences amounts tomore than the trifling exploded argument a non esse ad non posse,[47] that because a thing is not it cannot be, and would make as good sense as to say, such an one walks in his clothes, therefore out of them he cannot move a foot. Yea, and the very use itself which the soul now makes of corporeal organs and instruments plainly evidences that it does exert some action of its own wherein they assist it not. For it supposes an operation upon them antecedent to any operation by them. Nothing [material] can be my instrument which is not first the subject of my [mental] action; as when I use a pen I act upon it in order to my action by it; that is. I impress a motion upon it, in order whereunto I use not the pen or any other such material instrument; and though I cannot produce the designed effect, that is, leave such characters so and so figured, without it. my hand can yet. without it. perform its own action, proper to itself, and produce many nobler effects. When therefore the soul makes use of a bodily organ, its action upon it must needs at last be without the ministry of any organ, unless you multiply to it body upon body ad infinitum. And if possibly it perform not some meaner and grosser pieces of drudgery when out of the body, wherein it made use of its help and service when in the body, that is no more a disparagement or diminution than it is to the magistrate that law and decency permit him not to apprehend or execute a malefactor with his own hand. It may yet perform those opera-tions which are proper to itself, that is, such as are more noble and excellent and immediately conducive to its own felicity. Which sort of actions, as cognitation and dilection [thinking and loving], though because being done in the body there is conjunct with them an agitation of the spirits in the brain and heart [in modern phrase, a molecular motion of their particles], it yet seems to me more reasonable that as to these agitations the spirits [molecular motions] are rather subjects than instruments; that the whole essence of these mental acts of thinking and loving is antecedent to the motion of the bodily spirits [molecular motion]; [this is illustrated by the priority of the mental feeling of shame to the bodily flush that accompanies it: the felling is antecedent to the blush or molecular motion and causes it; not the blush antecedent to the felling and its cause]; and that this bodily motion is certainly but only incidentally consequent upon the thinking and loving merely by reason of the present but soluble union the soul has with the body. The purity and refinedness of these bodily spirits [molecular motions] does only remove what would hinder such mental acts as thinking and loving, rather than contribute positively thereunto. And so little is the alliance between a thought and any bodily or material thing, even those very finest spirits themselves, that I dare say that whoever sets himself closely and strictly to consider and debate the matter with his own faculties will find it much more easily apprehensible how the acts of intellection and volition may be performed without these corporeal spirits than by them.

“As therefore the doctrine of the soul’s activity out of its earthly body has favor and friendship enough from philosophers, so I doubt not but that upon the most strict and ready disquisition it would be as much befriended by philosophy itself. In the meantime it deserves to be considered with some regret that this doctrine should find the generality of learned pagans more forward advocates than some learned and worthy advocates of the Christian faith, which is only imputable to the undue measure and excess of an otherwise just zeal in these latter for the resurrection of the body, so far transporting them that they became willing to let go one truth that they might hold another the faster and to ransom this at the too dear and unnecessary expense of the former, accounting they could never make sure enough the resurrection of the body without making the soul’s dependence on it so absolute and necessary that it should be ableto do nothing but sleep in the meanwhile. Whereas it seems a great deal more inconceivable how such a being as the soul is, once quit of the entanglements and encumbrances of the body, should slee p at all . than how it should act without the body."

In a similar manner Baxter (Dying Thoughts) argues for the independence of the soul upon matter: “Why should my want of formal conceptions of the future state of separated souls and my strangeness to the manner of their subsistence and operations induce me to doubt of those general points which are evident and beyond all rational doubting? That souls are substances and not annihilated and essentially the same when they forsake the body as before. I doubt not. Otherwise, neither the Christian’s resurrection nor the Pythagorean s transmigration were a possible thing. For if the soul cease to be. it cannot pass into another body nor can it reenter into this. If God raise this body, then it must be by another soul. For the same soul to be annihilated and yet to begin again to be is a contradiction: tor the second beginning would be by creation, which makes a new soul and not the same that was before. It is the invisible things that are excellent, active, operative, and permanent. The visible things are of themselves but lifeless dross. It is the unseen part of plants and flowers which cause all their growth and beauty, their fruit and sweetness. Passive matter is but moved up and down by the invisible active powers, as chessmen are moved from place to place by the gamester s hands. What a loathsome corpse were the world without the invisible spirits and natures that animate, actuate, or move it. To doubt of the being or continuation of the most excellent, spiritual parts of creation, when we live in a world that is actuated by them and where everything demonstrates them, as their effects, is more foolish than to doubt of the being of those gross materials which we see."

In support of the independence of the soul of the body. Plato in Phaedo 64-65 remarks that "the philosopher is entirely concerned with the soul and not with the body, and would like, as far as he can, be quit of the body and turn to the soul." And this for the reason that "thought is best when the mind is gathered into herself and none of these bodily things trouble her—neither sounds nor sights nor pain nor any pleasure—when she has as little as possible to do with the body and has no bodily sense or feeling but is aspiring after true being. The philosopher despises the body: his soul runs away from the body and desires to be alone and by herself."

The doctrine of the immortality of the soul is even more deeply entrenched in the human constitution than that of the divine existence, for it is sometimes held when the latter is overlooked or even speculatively denied. The belief in the continued existence of their ancestors is found in the most degraded tribes and exerts more influence upon them than their belief in their fetishes. The worship of ancestors has a more prominent place in Confucianism than the worship of the deity. When the idea of God has become extremely dim in the savage, he still confidently believes that the souls of his ancestors are existing and wandering in another life. Such is the position of this truth in natural religion. And it is woven through and through the fabric of revealed religion. "Life and immortality are brought into sunlight by the gospel (photisantos zden kai aphthar-sian dia tou euangeliou)"[48] (2 Tim. 1:10).

But irrepressible and universal as it is. the doctrine of man's immortality is an astonishing one and difficult to entertain. For it means that every frail finite man is to be as long-enduring as the infinite and eternal God; that there will no more be an end to the existence of the man who died today than there will be of the deity who made him. God is denominated "the ancient of days." But every immortal spirit that ever dwelled in a human body will also be an "ancient of days " The little infant consigned to the grave yesterday will one day be millions and billions of years old. will one day have an antiquity with which the vastness of the geologicalages is nothing. For this is what immortality means and involves. We find it difficult to entertain the idea of an earthly life like that of Adam and Seth continuing for nearly a thousand years—a period longer than from Romulus to Augustus Caesar, than from Constantino to Charlemagne, than from Alfred to Victoria. But what is this in comparison with endless duration? The entire six thousand years of human history, which seem so long to the historical student and are crowded with an immensity of incident, are only a mote in the sunbeam, a drop in the ocean, compared with the biography of an immortal Yes. man must exist. He has no option Necessity is laid upon him He cannot extinguish himself. He cannot cease to be.

7.3.2 (see p. 869) Job 19:25-27 refers to the resurrection of the body in the Septuagint. Vulgate, Targum (partly), Clemens Romanus, Origen, Cyril Jerusalem. Ephraem. Epiphanius, Jerome. Augustine, Schoolmen, Luther's version. English version. Reformed creeds. Cocceius. Schultens. Michaelis. Rosenmuller. Pearson. Owen. J. P. Smith. Lee, Wordsworth (see "Job" in Lange's Commentary 19.460-65). Eichhorn. Knapp. Hoffman, and Noyes explain mebbesari[49] as "from out of my flesh" or "in my flesh": Conant explains "without my flesh."

7.3.3 (see p. 870). Augustine (Faith and Creed 10) adopts dichom-etry'[50] in the constitution of man: There are three things of which man consists, namely, spirit, soul, and body; which again are spoken of as two. because frequently the soul is named along with the spirit; for a certain rational part of the same, of which beasts are destitute, is called spirit: the principal part in us is the spirit; next, the life whereby we are united with the body is called the soul; finally, the body itself, as it is visible, is the last part in us."

7.3.4 (see p. 870). Augustine (Enchiridion 91-93) thus distin-guishes between the resurrection body of the redeemed and the lost: “The bodies of the saints shall rise again free from every defect and blemish, as from all corruption, weight, and impediment. For their ease of movement shall be as complete as their happiness. Whence their bodies have been called spiritual, though undoubtedly they shall be bodies and not spirits. For just as now the body is called animate, though it is a body and not a soul [anima], so then the body shall be called spiritual, though it shall be a body and not a spirit (1 Cor. 15:44) Hence, as far as regards the corruption which now weighs down the soul and the vices which urge the flesh to lust against the spirit.’ it shall not then be flesh, but body; for these are bodies which are called celestial. Wherefore it is said. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God’; and as if in explanation of this: Neither does corruption inherit interruption ‘ What the apostle first called flesh and blood’ he afterward calls corruption’; and what he first called ‘the kingdom of God’ he afterward calls ‘incorruption.’ But as far as regards the substance, even then it shall be flesh. For even after the resurrection the body of Christ was called flesh (Luke 24:39) The apostle, however, says: It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body’; because so perfect shall then be the harmony between flesh and spirit, the spirit keeping alive the subjugated flesh without any need of nourishment, that no part of our nature shall be in discord with another; but as we shall be free from enemies without, so we shall not have ourselves for enemies within.

“But as for those who. out of the mass of perdition caused by the first man’s sin, are not redeemed through the one mediator between God and man. they too shall rise again, each with his own body, but only to be punished with the devil and his angels. Now, whether they shall rise again with all their diseases and deformities of body, bringing with them the diseased and deformed limbs which they had here, it would be labor lost to inquire. For we need not weary ourselves in speculating about their appearance, which is a matter of uncertainty, when their eternal damnation is a matter of certainty. Nor need we inquire in what sense their body shall be incorruptible, if it be susceptible of pain; or in what sense corruptible, if it be free from the possibility of death. For there is no true life except where there is happiness in life, and no true incorruption except where health is unbroken by any pain When, however, the unhappy are not permitted to die, then, if I may so say, death itself dies not; and where pain without intermission afflicts the soul and never comes to an end, corruption itself is not ended This is called in Holy Scripture the second death’ (Rev. 2:11). And neither the first death, which takes place when the soul is compelled to leave the body, nor the second death, which takes places when the soul is not permitted to leave the suffering body, would have been inflicted on man had no one sinned And. of course, the mildest punishment of all will fall upon those who have added no actual transgressions to the original sin they brought with them; and as for the rest, who have added such actual transgressions, the punishment of each will be the more tolerable in the next world, according as his iniquity has been less in this world.”

7.3.5 (see p. 871). In order to personal identity there must be a rational soul The animal, because it has only an animal soul destitute of reason, cannot have the consciousness of personality and personal identity. A man or angel is conscious that his soul is the same entity today that it was yesterday or ten years ago Sameness of mental substance in every particular is requisite in order to personal identity. The very same identical soul, with identically the same properties, without loss or alteration of any of them that exist in old age existed in infancy and childhood. Again, in order to the personal identity of a man there must be a material body, because man as a person is a union of soul and body. Though the soul is the principal part of a man. it is not the whole of him Hence in the intermediate or disembodied state, though the most important part of the person exists, yet a perfectly complete person is lacking. This is the reason for the resurrection of the body. The body, however, does not require to be so strictly the same in every particular as the soul does. Some of its properties may be different; but none of the properties of the soul may be. There is only one kind of mental substance, but there is more than one kind of material substance Consequently, the body can be changed from a “natural” to a “spiritual” body and still be recognized as the same body The body of “flesh and blood” of this life may become the “spiritual body” of the next life and in union with the rational soul constitute the same person This spiritual body can have form, limbs, lineaments, and all the appearance of a human body and yet not all of the very same particles, no more, no less, and no different, go to the making of it. All those properties which in this life required food for their support, for example, may be exchanged for properties that do not require it. On the side, therefore, of the body, there is not so strict an identity of substance and properties as there is on the side of the soul.

The recognition of one disembodied spirit by another is more difficult of explanation than the recognition of one embodied spirit by another. Dives and Lazarus were both of them destitute of bodies, yet they knew one another. How does the human spirit recognize and know itself? Not by means of the body which it inhabits, but directly. A man is not assisted in knowing himself by calling to mind the features of his own face and the characteristics of his own body. His knowledge of himself is independent of these latter, being the immediate consciousness of himself, that is. of his spirit. Similarly, his knowledge of the mind or spirit of another man is not the result of his sensuous perception of the man s bodily form and features, but of his mental and spiritual traits; and the knowledge of these does not depend upon the knowledge of thephysical traits. He is not helped to the knowledge that another person is learned or benevolent because he is tall or short in stature.

7.3.6 (see p. 873). Hodge (Theology 3.775-79), remarks upon bodily identity as follows: “In the church it has often been assumed that sameness of substance is essential to the identity between our present and future bodies This idea has been pressed some-times to the utmost extreme. Augustine seems to have thought lhat all the matter which at any period entered into the organism of our present bodies would in some way be restored in the res-urrection Thomas Aquinas was more moderate. He taught that only those particles which entered into the composition of the body at death would enter into the composition of the resurrection body. Others assume that it is not necessary to the identity contended for that all the particles of the body at death should be included in the resurrection body It is enough that the new body should be formed exclusively out of particles belonging to the present body. But as the body after the resurrection is to be refined and ethereal, a tenth, a hundredth, or a ten-thousandth portion of these particles would suffice.

“Identity in living organisms is higher and more inscrutable than in works of art. The acorn and the oak are the same; but in what sense? Not in substance, not in form. The infant and the man are Ihe same through all the stages of life—boyhood, manhood, and old age; the substance of the body, however, is in a state of perpetual change. It is said this change is complete every seven years. Hence if a man live to be seventy years old. the substance of the body, during this period, has been entirely changed ten times. Here, then, is an identity independent of sameness of substance. Our future bodies, therefore, may be the same as those we now have, although not a particle that was in the one should be in the other. It may readily be admitted by those who adhere to the generally received doctrine that man consists of soul and body (and not of spirit, soul, and body); that the soul, besides its rational, voluntary, and moral faculties, has in it what may be called a principle of animal life. That is. that it has not only faculties that fit it for the higher exercises of a rational creature capable of fellowship with God. but also faculties which fit it for living in organic union with a material body. It may also be admitted that the soul, in this aspect, is the animating principle of the body, that by which all its functions are carried on. And it may further be admitted that the soul, in this aspect, is that which gives identity to the human body through all the changes of substance to which it is here subjected. And. finally, it may be admitted, such being the case, that the body which the soul is to have at the resurrection is as really and truly identical with lhat which it had on earth as the body of the man of mature life is the same which he had when he was an infant. All this may pass for what it is worth. What stands sure is what the Bible teaches: that our heavenly bodies are in some high, true, and real sense to be of the same nature as those which we now have. There are two negative statements in the Bible on this subject which imply a great deal. One is that in the resurrection men neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God’ The other is that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God.' Three things are implied in these passages: (1) that the bodies of men must be specially suited to the state of existence in which they are to live and act; (2) that our present bodies, consisting as they do of flesh and blood, are not adapted to our future state of being; and (3) that everything in the organization of our bodies designed to meet our present necessities will cease with the life that now is. If blood be no longer our life, we shall have no need of organs of respiration and nutrition. The following particulars, however, may be inferred with more or less confidence from what the Bible has revealed on this subject: (1) that our bodies after the resurrection will retain the human form; (2) that the future body will be a glorified likeness of what it was on earth; and (3) that we shall not only recognize our friends in heaven, but also know, without introduction, prophets,apostles, confessors, and martyrs of whom we have heard while here on earth."

Perowne (Immortality, lect. 4) argues that bodily identity con-sists wholly in the sameness of the organizing principle: "We maintain that the same body which has been laid in the grave may be raised at the last day. even though not one single material particle which went to constitute the one body shall be found in the other. For what is it that is necessary to the identity of the body? The identity of the body does not depend on the identity of the material particles of which it is composed. These are in a state of perpetual flux. The body of our childhood is not the body of our youth, nor the body of our youth that of our manhood, nor the body of our manhood that of our old age. Every particle is changed, and yet it is the same body; the person to whom it belongs still continues the same person If you insist upon it that every particle of matter of which my body is built must be brought together to form my new resurrection body, then I ask. What body during this present life is my true body? Is it the body of my childhood or of my youth or of my old age? The body in which I die is no more truly mine than the body with which I came into the world. Both are mine, both are in some sense the same body, and yet they have not a single material particle in common. What possible reason is there then for contending that the body which is laid in the grave must be brought together again, particle for particle, at the resurrection, when it is no more essentially a part of myself than my body at any other stage of my existence? The only thing of which we need to be assured is that the principle of identity which governs the formation of the body in this life shall govern its formation at the resurrection. In the ever flowing torrent of our life, as wave after wave passes through our bodily frame, bringing with it growth and variety in the structure, there is some principle or law or specific form, call it what you will, which remains ever the same. The organism is essentially one. despite the changes of size, of form, of inward constitution. This holds true in every region of nature where there is life: of the acorn which becomes an oak. of the worm which changes to a chrysalis and then to a butterfly. Is it not the same with man? Is not the human embryo the same individual when it becomes child, youth, old man? And yet does there remain in the oak, in the butterfly, in the man, a single one of the ponderable molecules which existed in the germ, the egg, the embryo? And still, we repeat, it is the same vegetable, the same insect, the same man.

"What then is this thing which remains ever the same in the vegetable in all its developments, in the insect in all its metamorphoses, in the human body in every phase of its existence? What is this which never perishes, is never destroyed in all the changes and fluctuations of the material organism It escapes all our investigations; we see it only in its manifestations in the phenomena of life. But that it is a reality all observation goes to show; and if through all the changes of the body during this life this principle continues in all its force, why may it not survive the shock of death? Why may not this specific form,' as Gregory of Nyssa terms it, remain united to the soul, as he conjectured and as other thinkers like Leibnitz have supposed, after its separation from the body and thus become at length the [providential] agent in the resurrection, by reconstituting, though in a new and transfigured condition, the body which was dissolved at death? Why may not the same body which was sown in corruption be raised in incorruption, and that which was sown a natural body be raised a spiritual body? There is, at least, nothing improbable in such a supposition; there is everything in the analogies of nature to confirm it: and when revelation is silent we may be thankful for such glimpses of probability as come to us in aid of our faith."

Respecting the nature of the resurrection body. Augustine (Letter 95.7-8 to Paulinus, A.D. 408) thus remarks: "As to the resur-rection of the body and the future offices of its members in the incorruptible and immortal state, it is to be held most firmly as a true doctrine of Holy Scripture that these visible and earthly bodies which are now called natural' {animalia; 1 Cor. 15:44) shall, in the resurrection of the just, be spiritual bodies. At the same time I do not know how the quality of a spiritual body can be comprehended and described by us, seeing that it lies beyond the range of our experience. There shall be. assuredly, in such bodies no corruption, and therefore they shall not require the perishable nourishment which is now necessary; yet though unnecessary, it will not be impossible for them at their pleasure to take and consume food; otherwise it would not have been taken by our Lord after his resurrection, who has given us such an example of the resurrec-tion of the body that the apostle argues from it. If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised.' But he. when he appeared to his disciples, having all his members and using them according to their functions, also pointed out to them the places where his wounds had been, respecting which I have always supposed that they were the scars and not the wounds themselves and that they were there not of necessity but according to his free exercise of power. He gave at that time the clearest evidence of the ease with which he exercised this power, both by showing himself in another form' to the two disciples and by his appearing not as a spirit, but in his true body, although the doors were shut (Mark 16:12. 14; Luke 24:15-43; John 20:14-29)." Again (Letter 148.16 to Fortu-natianus, A.D. 413) he says: "As to the spiritual body which we shall have in the resurrection, how great a change for the better it is to undergo—whether it shall then become pure spirit, so that the whole man shall then be a spirit, or shall (as I rather think, but yet do not confidently maintain) become a spiritual body in such a way as to be called spiritual because of a certain wonderful facility in its movements, but at the same time to retain its material substance, which cannot live and feel by itself but only through the spirit which uses it, as our present body is animated and used by the soul inhabiting it; and whether, if the properties of the body then immortal and incorruptible shall remain unchanged, it shall then in some degree aid the spirit to see visible, that is. material things, as at present we are unable to see anything of this kind except through the eyes of the body: or whether our spirit shall then be able to know material things directly without the instru-mentality of the body (for God himself does not know these things through bodily senses)—on these and many other things that perplex us. I confess that I have not yet read anything which I regard as sufficiently settled to deserve to be taught to men."

4 Final Judgment

The doctrine of the final judgment was, from the first, immediately connected with the resurrection of the body. Mankind “must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that everyone may receive the things done in his body” (2 Cor. 5:10). The fathers founded their views of the day of doom upon the representations and imagery of Scripture. They believed that a general conflagration will immediately follow the last judgment, which some said will destroy the world; while others ascribed only a purifying agency to it. Augustine (City of God 20.16.24) holds that this world is to be changed, not destroyed, and is to be the “new earth” spoken of in the Apocalypse. Some, like Tertullian and the more rhetorical of the Greek fathers, enter into minute details; while others, like Augustine, endeavor to define dogmatically the facts couched in the figurative language of the Bible. In the Middle Ages, representations varied with the bent of the individual theologian. One popular opinion was that the judgment will be held in the valley of Jehoshaphat. Aquinas main-tained that the last judgment will be mental, because the oral trial of each individual would require too much time. In the modern church, the course of thinking has been similar to that in the ancient and medieval. The creeds of the different Protestant denominations explicitly affirm a day of judgment at the end of the world. Individual speculations, as of old, vibrate between the extremes of materialism and idealism.

According to Scripture, there is a private judgment at death and a public judgment at the last day. The private judgment is proved by the following particulars. First, the Bible teaches that the human when it leaves the body meets God directly, as it never has before: “The dust shall return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it” (Eccles. 12:7). This implies self-consciousness in the immediate presence of God; and this implies self-knowledge in that presence: “Now I know in part, but then shall I know even as also I am known” (1 Cor. 13:12;cf.Ps. 139:1-6). But this self-consciousness and self-knowledge at death is a private individual judgment. Every man when he dies knows his own moral character—and knows it accurately. Consequently, at death every man either acquits or condemns himself. What St. Paul says is done in the public judgment of the last day is also done in the private judgment on the day of death: “The conscience bears witness, and the thoughts accuse or else excuse one another” (Rom. 2:15). Consequently, the private judgment at death indicates the moral state of the soul: “It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this, judgment” (Heb. 9:27).’[1] Second, the private judgment at death and the public judgment at the last day coincide, because in the intermediate state there is no alteration of moral character and consequently no alteration of the sentence passed at death. We have presented the proof from Scripturethat sheol or hades is a state of retribution and misery and paradise a state of reward and blessedness. The parable of Dives and Lazarus teaches that the impenitent spirit goes to hades at death and that hades is hell without the body. Consequently, the destiny of the impenitent is known and determined at death. The same parable teaches that the penitent spirit goes to paradise at death and that paradise is heaven without the body. Consequently, the destiny of the penitent is also known and determined at death. Penitence or impenitence at death is therefore the state of mind that settles the everlasting condition of the individual. Christ teaches that “to die in sin” is to be hopelessly lost (John 8:21, 24). Every man who has the publican’s feeling when he dies and cries “God be merciful to me a sinner” is forgiven through the blood of Christ: “To this man, says the Lord, will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit” (Isa. 66:2); “blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 5:3). Every man who at death is destitute of the publican’s feeling is unforgiven: “The proud he knows afar off (Ps. 138:6); “the day of the Lord of hosts shall be upon everyone that is proud and lofty” (Isa. 2:12). Every penitent pagan is saved, every impenitent nominal Christian is lost. (See supplement 7.4.1.)

That there is a day of judgment and a public judgment is distinctly and often asserted by our Lord: “It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon in the day of judgment” (Matt. 11:22, 24); “the men of Nineveh shall rise in the judgment with this generation” (12:41); 25:34-41 gives a detailed account of the day of judgment; “whosoever shall say, You fool, shall be in danger of hellfire” (5:22); “I will raise him up at the last day” (John 6:39-40, 44); “he has appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness" (Acts 17:31); "the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ" (Rom. 2:16); "that day when I make up my jewels" (Mai. 3:17); "for all these things God will bring you into judgment" (Eccles. 11:9); "God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing" (12:14; Gen. 18:25; Deut. 32:35; Job 21:30; Ps. 1:5-6; 58:11; 90:11; 94:1-2; Prov. 16:25; Eccles. 3:17; Isa. 34:14; 66:24; Dan. 7:9-10; 12:2; Jude 14-15).

The biblical representations of the last judgment are as follows:

1. The preparation: Christ with the angelic host unexpectedly descends in bodily presence, and the throne of judgment is set (Matt. 25:31; Rev. 21:11): "This same Jesus that is taken up from you into heaven shall come in like manner as you have seen him go into heaven" (Acts 1:11). His human nature is one reason why the Son of God is the judge (John 5:27).
2. The congregation of all men before the throne of judgment (Matt. 25:32; Rom. 14:10; Rev. 21:12).
3. The separation of the evil from the good (Matt. 25:32-33): Plato (Republic 10.614) represents the judges as bidding "the just to ascend by the heavenly way on the right hand and the unjust to descend by the lower way on the left hand."
4. The disclosure of character and conduct, so that the grounds of the judgment to be passed upon both classes may be clearly known (Matt. 25:34-46): "God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ" (Rom. 2:16); "all things are naked and opened (tetrachelio-mena)[2] unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do" (Heb. 4:13);

"the Lord will bring to light the hidden things of darkness and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts" (1 Cor. 4:5). In particular, the temporal good which the evil have enjoyed in this life and the temporal evil which the good have experienced will be explained (see Augustine, City of God 20.2).

Respecting the last judgment, Augustine (City of God 20.14) says that there will not be an angel for each man to recite to him the deeds he has done, but we must understand by the phrase another book was opened that by divine power "everyone shall recall to memory all his own works, whether good or evil, and shall mentally survey them with a marvelous rapidity, so that this knowledge will either accuse or excuse, and thus all and each shall be simultaneously judged." (See supplement 7.4.2.)

S U P P L E M E N T S

7.4.1 (see p. 879). Bales (On Death, chap. 2) thus speaks of the private judgment at death: "Death is fearful in the apprehension of conscience, as it is the most sensible mark of God s wrath which is heavier than death and a summons to give an account of all things done in this life to the righteous judge of the world: It is appointed to all men once to die, and afterward the judgment' (Heb. 9:27). The penal fear is more wounding to the spirit than the natural and physical. When the awakened sinner presently expects the citation to appear before the tribunal above, where no excuses, no supplications, no privileges avail, where the cause of eternal life and death must be decided, and the awards of justice be immediately executed, O the convulsions and agonies of conscience in that hour! This made a heathen, a governor of a province, to tremble before a poor prisoner. When Paul reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled' (Acts 24:25)." Again Bates (Eternal Judgment, chap. 5) remarks that "the day of death is equivalent to the day of judgment: for immediately after it there is a final decision of men's states forever. But the distinction that is made between men at death is private and particular and not sufficient for the honor of God's government; hence at the last day all men that have lived in the several successions of ages shall appear, and justice have a solemn process and triumph before angels and men."

The private judgment is taught in the lines of Toplady's hymn:

When mine eyelids close in death,
When I rise to worlds unknown,
See thee on thy judgment throne,
Rock of ages! cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee.

The Scriptures teach it in declaring that at death Judas "went to his own place" (Acts 1:25) and knew that he did and also that Dives "died and was buried, and in hell he lifted up his eyes being in torments" (Luke 16:22-23).

Leighton (Exposition of the Apostles' Creed) describes the private judgment: "It is certainly most congruous that there shall be a solemn judicial proceeding on entering and placing man in the afterstate. And that this be done not only in each particular apart, but most conspicuously in all together, so that the justice and mercy of God may not only be accomplished, but acknowledged and magnified, and that not only severally in the individual persons of men and angels, but universally, jointly, and manifestly in the view of all, as upon one theater. Each ungodly man shall not only read, whether he will or no. the justice of God in himself and his own condemnation, which all of them shall do before that time to their souls' particular judgment: but they shall then see the same justice in all the rest of the condemned world."

Pearson (On the Creed, art. 7) connects the private with the general judgment: "It is necessary that we should believe that an account must be given of all our actions; and not only so. but that this account will be exacted according to the rule of God's revealed will, that 'God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ, according to the gospel' (Rom. 2:16). There is in every man not only a power to reflect, but a necessary reflection upon his actions; not only a voluntary remembrance, but also an irresistible judgment of his own conversation. Now if there were no other judge besides our own souls, we should be regardless of our own sentence and wholly unconcerned in our own condemnations. But if we were persuaded that these reflections of conscience are to be so many witnesses before the tribunal of heaven and that we are to carry in our own hearts a testimony either to absolve or condemn us. we must infallibly watch over that unquiet inmate and endeavor above all things for a good conscience."

7.4.2 (see above). Belgic Confession 37 says that in the last day "the books, that is to say, the conscience, shall be opened, and the dead be judged according to what they shall have done." Bates (Eternal Judgment, chap. 4) declares that "the conscience of every man shall be opened by the omniscience of God and give an accusing or excusing testimony of all things (Rom. 2:15-16). For these acts of conscience, in the present life, have a final respect to God's tribunal; and though the accounts are so vast there shall be an exact agreement between the books of God's omniscience and of conscience in the day of judgment. Now. indeed, the conscience of man, though never so inquisitive and diligent in exam-ining and revising his ways, is unable to take a just account of his sins. As one that would tell the first-appearing stars in the evening, before he can reckon them others appear and confound his memory with their number, so when conscience is seriously intent in reflecting upon itself, before it can reckon up the sins committed against one command, innumerable others appear. This made the psalmist, upon the survey of his actions, break forth in amazement and perplexity: 'My iniquities are more than the hairs of my head, therefore my heart fails me' (Ps. 40:12). But it will be one of the miracles of that day to enlarge the view of conscience to all their sins. Now, the records of conscience are often obliterated, and the sins written therein are forgotten; but then they shall appearin so clear an impression that the wicked shall be inexcusable to themselves, and conscience subscribes their condemnation. This information of conscience, at the last, will make the sinner speechless; for the book of accounts with divine justice was always in God's own keeping, and whatever is recoroed there was written with his own hand.

"Other witnesses, also, will appear to finish the process of that day. (1) Satan will then bring in a bloody charge against the wicked. This is intimated in that fearful imprecation. Let Satan stand at his right hand; when he is judged let him be condemned (Ps 109:6-7). He is now an active watchful spirit whose diligence is equal to his malice and by violent temptations draws men to sin. But then he will be their most bitter accuser, not from zeal for justice but pure malignity (2) The wicked themselves will accuse one another. Then all that have been jointly engaged in the commission of sin will impeach each other. The inferior instruments will accuse their directors for their pernicious counsel, and the directors will accuse the instruments for their wicked compliance (3) All the holy servants of God, who by their instructions, counsels, admonitions, examples, have endeavored to make the world better, will give a heavy testimony against them Indeed, the very presence of the saints will upbraid the wicked for their resisting all the warning melting entreaties, all the grave and serious reproofs, all the tender, earnest expostulations, that were ineffectual by the hardness cf their hearts."

5 Heaven

That the blessedness of the redeemed is endless has been the uniform faith of the church. Representations concerning the nature of this happiness vary with the education and intellectual spirit of the age or individual. Justin Martyr regarded the blessedness of heaven as consisting mainly in the continuation and increase of the happiness of the millennial reign. Origen held that the blessed dwell in the aerial regions and pass from one heaven to another as they advance in holiness. At the same time, he condemns those who expect any sensuous enjoyment. Greek theologians Gregory Nazianzus and Gregory of Nyssa follow Origen. Augustine believed that the heavenly happiness consists in the enjoyment of peace which passes knowledge and the beatific vision of God. One important element in it consists in indefectibility: the deliverance from all hazard of apostasy—the non posse peccare et inori.'[1] The Schoolmen held the patristic views, but with an endeavor to systematize. They divided heaven into three parts: the visible heavens or the firmament, the spiritual heaven where saints and angels dwell, and the intellectual heaven where the beatific vision of the Trinity is enjoyed (see Dante, Paradise 30-33). The modern church maintains the doctrine of the everlasting blessedness but in a more spiritual form than prevailed in either the ancient or the medieval church. The more common opinion is that this world is not to be either annihilated or destroyed, but renovated for the abode of the redeemed. Turretin defends this view (20.5). Anselm (Why the God-Man? 1.18) says: "We believe that the material substance of the world must be renewed and that this will not take place until the number of the elect is completed and that happy kingdom be made perfect and that after its completion there will be no more change."

The scriptural representation of the heavenly state is as follows:

1. It is marked by sinless perfection: “A glorious church without spot or wrinkle” (Eph. 5:27); the “armies” of heaven are “clothed in fine linen, white and clean” (Rev. 19:14); “the Lamb’s wife is arrayed in fine linen, which is the righteousness of saints” (19:8); “the creature shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God” (Rom. 8:21); “the spirits of just men made perfect” are in the “heavenlv Jerusalem” (Heb. 12:23).
2. It is marked by impeccability or indefectibility (Rom. 8:35-39): “We shall ever be with the Lord” (1 Thess. 4:17); “a rest remains to the people of God” (Heb. 4:9); “we shall be like him” (1 John 3:2). Indefectibility, or the absence of that possibility of apostasy which was connected with man as created, renders his state as redeemed more blessed because of the sense of security. Eden was uncertain; heaven is certain. This is the absolute rest into whichhe enters. There is to be no probation or temptation, internal or external: “Every man who not merely supposes but certainly knows that he shall eternally enjoy the most high God, in the company of angels and beyond the reach of ill—this man, no matter what bodily torments afflict him, is more blessed than was he who, even in that great felicity of paradise, was uncertain of his fate” (Augustine, City of God 11.12; cf. Concerning the Gift of Perseverance).
3. It is chiefly mental happiness—the vision of the divine perfections and delight in them: “Then shall we see face to face” (1 Cor. 13:12); “we shall see him as he is” (1 John 3:2); “whom I shall see for myself (Job 19:27; Rev. 4:10-11; 5; 7:9-10; 21:3-4; 22:4): “I shall behold your face in righteousness” (Ps. 17:15); “in your presence is fullness of joy” (16:11).
4. It is the personal presence of the mediator with his redeemed people: “They follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes” (Rev. 14:4); “Father, I will that they whom you have given me be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory” (John 17:24). This is an element in the heaven of redeemed man that does not enter into that of the angels (see Owen, Person of Christ, 19).

6 Hell

History of the Doctrine

The common opinion in the ancient church was that the future punishment of the impenitent wicked is endless. This was the catholic faith, as much so as belief in the Trinity. But as there were some church fathers who deviated from the creed of the church respecting the doctrine of the Trinity, so there were some who dissented from it in respect to that of eternal retribution. The deviation in eschatology, however, was far less extensive than in trinitarianism. The Semiarian and Arian heresies involved and troubled the ancient church much more seriously than did the universalism of that period. Long controversies ending in ecumenical councils and formulated statements were the consequence of the trini-tarian errors, but no ecumenical council and no authoritative counter-statement was required to prevent the spread of the tenet of restoration. Having so little even seeming support in Scripture and reason, it gradually died out of the ancient church by its own intrinsic mortality. Neander (History 2.737), speaking of the second period in his arrangement (312-590), when there was more restorationism than in the first, says:

> The doctrine of eternal punishment continued, as in the preceding period, to be dominant in the creed of the church. Yet, in the oriental church, in which, with the exception of those subjects immediately connected with the doctrinal controversies, there was greater freedom and latitude of development, many respectable church teachers still stood forth, without in juring their reputation for orthodoxy, as advocates of the opposite doctrine, until the time when the Origenistic disputes caused the agreement with Origen in respect > to this point also [namely, restorationism] to be considered as something decidedly heretical.

Hagenbach (History of Doctrine §78) says of the period down to A.D. 250: "Notions more or less gross prevailed concerning the punishment of the wicked, which most of the fathers regarded as eternal."

The principal deviation from the catholic doctrine of endless retribution was in the Alexandrine school, founded by Clement and Origen. The position taken by them was that "the punishments of the condemned are not eternal, but only remedial, the devil himself being capable of amelioration" (Gieseler 1.214). Thus early was the question raised whether the suffering to which Christ sentences the wicked is for the purpose of correcting and educating the transgressor or of vindicating and satisfying the law he has broken: a question which is the key to the whole controversy. For if the individual criminal is of greater consequence than the universal law, then the suffering must refer principally to him and his interests. But if the law is of more importance than any individual, then the suffering must refer principally to it.

Origen's restorationism grew naturally out of his view of human liberty. He held that the liberty of indifference and the power of contrary choice, instead of simple self-determination, are the substance of freedom. These belong inalienably and forever to the nature of the finite will. They cannot be destroyed, even by apostasy and sin. Consequently, there is forever a possibility of a self-conversion of the will in either direction. Free will may fall into sin at any time; and free will may turn to God any time. This led to Origen's theory of an endless alternation of falls and recoveries, of hells and heavens; so that practically he taught nothing but a hell. For, as Augustine (City of God 21.17) remarks, in his refutation of Origen, "heaven with the prospect of losing it is misery."[1]"Origen's theory," says Neander (1.656), "concerning the necessary mutability of will in created beings led him to infer that evil, ever germinating afresh, would still continue to render necessary new processes of purification and new worlds destined for the restoration of fallen beings, until all should again be brought back from manifoldness to unity, so that there was to be a constant interchange between fall and redemption, between unity and manifoldness." (See supplement 7.6.1.)

Traces, more or less distinct, of a belief in the future restoration of the wicked are found in Didymus of Alexandria, the two Gregories, and Diodore of Tarsus and Theodore of Mopsuestia, the leaders of the Antiochian school. All of these were more or less under the influence of Origen. Origen's opinions, however, both in trinitarianism and eschatology, were strongly combated in his own time by the great body of contemporary fathers and subsequently by the church under the lead of Epiphanius, Jerome, and Augustine.

The medieval church was virtually a unit in holding the doctrine of endless punishment. The Reformation churches, both Lutheran and Calvinistic, adopted the historical and catholic opinion.

Since the Reformation, universalism, restorationism, and annihilation have been asserted by some sects and many individuals. But these tenets have never been adopted by those ecclesiastical denominations which hold, in their integrity, the cardinal doctrines of the Trinity and incarnation, the apostasy and redemption, although they have exerted some influence within these denominations. None of the evangelical churches have introduced the doctrine of universalism, in any form of it, into their symbolical books. The denial of endless punishment is usually associated with the denial of those tenets which are logically and closely connected with it: such as original sin, vicarious atonement, and regeneration. Of these, vicarious atonement is the most incompatible of any with universal salvation, because the latter doctrine, as has been observed, implies that suffering for sin is remedial only, while the former implies that it is retributive. Suffering that is merely educational does not require a vicarious atonement in order to release from it. But suffering that is judicial and punitive can be released from the transgressor only by being inflicted upon a substitute. He, therefore, who denies personal penalty must, log-ically, deny vicarious penalty. If the sinner himself is not obliged by justice to suffer in order to satisfy the law he has violated, then, certainly, no one needs suffer for him for this purpose.

Within the nineteenth century, universalism has obtained a stronger hold upon German theology than upon any other and has considerablyvitiated it. It grew up in connection with the rationalism and pantheism which have been more powerful in Germany than elsewhere. Rationalism has many of the characteristics of deism and is vehemently polemic toward evangelical truth. That it should combat the doctrines of sin and atonement is natural. Pantheism, on the other hand, has to some extent been mingled with evangelical elements. A class of antira-tionalistic theologians in Germany, whose opinions are influenced more or less by Spinoza and Schelling, accept the doctrines of the Trinity, incarnation, apostasy, and redemption and assert the ultimate salvation of all mankind. Schleiermacher, the founder of this school, whose system is a remarkable blending of the gospel and pantheism, has done much toward the spread of restorationism. The following are the objections which this theologian (Doctrine §163, app.) makes to eternal damnation:

1. Christ's words in Matt. 25:46; Mark 9:44; and John 5:29 are figurative.
2. First Cor. 15:25-26 teaches that all evil shall be overcome.
3. Misery cannot increase, but must decrease. If it is bodily misery, custom habituates to endurance, and there is less and less suffering instead of more and more.[2] If, on the other hand, it is mental suffering, this is remorse. The damned suffer more remorse in hell than they do upon earth. This proves that they are better men in hell than upon earth. They cannot, therefore, grow more wretched in hell, but grow less so as they grow more remorseful.
4. The sympathy which the saved have with their former companions, who are in hell, will prevent the happiness of the saved. The world of mankind and also the whole universe are so connected that the endless misery of a part will destroy the happiness of the remainder.'[3]

These objections appeal mainly to reason. But the two assumptions that hell is abolished by becoming used to it and that remorse is of the nature of virtue do not commend themselves to the intuitive convictions.

Besides the disciples of Schleiermacher, there are trinitarian theologians standing upon the position of theism who adopt some form of universalism. Nitzsch (Dogmatics §219) teaches restorationism. He cites in support of it only two passages out of the entire Scriptures: 1 Pet. 3:19, which speaks of the "preaching to the spirits in prison"; and Heb. 11:39-40: "These received not the promises." These two passages Nitzschexplains as teaching that "there are traces of a capacity in another state of existence for comprehending salvation and for a change and purification of mind"; and upon them, solely, he founds the sweeping asser-tion that "it is the apostolic view that for those who were unable in this world to know Christ in his truth and grace, there is a knowledge of the Redeemer in the other state of existence which is never inoperative, but is either judicial or quickening."

Rothe {Dogmatics 2.2.46-49, 124-31) contends for the annihilation of the impenitent wicked in the sense of the extinction of self-con-sciousness. Yet he asserts that the aim of penalty is requital and the satisfaction of justice, an aim that would be defeated by the extinction of remorse. Julius Miiller (Sin 2.418-25) maintains that the sin against the Holy Spirit is never forgiven because it implies such a hardness in sin as is incapable of penitence. But he holds that the offer of forgiveness through Christ will be made to every human being, here or hereafter: "Those who have never in this life had an opportunity of knowing the way of salvation will certainly be placed in a position to accept and enter upon this way of return, if they will, after their life on earth is ended. We may venture to hope that in the interval between death and the judgment many serious misconceptions, which have hindered men from appropriating truth in this life, will be removed."[4] The use of the term misconception would seem to imply that some who had the offer of salvation in this life but had rejected it will have the opportunity in the next life to correct their error in this. Dorner (Christian Doctrine 4.416-28), after the arguments for and against endless punishment, concludes with the remark that "we must be content with saying that the ultimate fate of individuals, namely, whether all will attain the blessed goal or not, remains veiled in mystery." His further remark that "there may be those eternally damned, so far as the abuse of freedom continues eternally, but in this case man has passed into another class of beings" looks in the direction of annihilation and suggests that sin may finally destroy the humanity of man and leave him a mere brute. Respecting the future offer of mercy, Dorner (3.77) asserts that "the final judgment can take place for none before the gospel has been so addressed to him that free appropriation of the same was possible." (See supplement 7.6.2.)

Universalism has a slender exegetical basis. The biblical data are found to be unmanageable and resort is had to human sentiment and self-interest. Its advocates quote sparingly from Scripture. In particular, the words of Christ relating to eschatology are left with little citation or interpretation. Actual attempts by the restorationist to explain what the words depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels really mean are rare. The most common device is to dismiss them, as Schleiermacher does, with the remark that they are figurative. Some words of St. Paul, on the other hand, whose views upon sin, election, and predestination, however, are not especially attrac-tive to this class, are made to do yeoman's service. Texts like Rom. 5:18 ("as judgment came upon all men unto condemnation, so the free gift came upon all men unto justification") and 1 Cor. 15:22 ("as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive") are explained wholly apart from their context and by emphasizing the word all. When St. Paul asserts that "the free gift upon all men unto justification," this is severed from the preceding verse, in which the "all" are described as "those which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness." And when the same apostle affirms that "in Christ shall all be made alive," no notice is taken of the fact mentioned in the succeeding verse that not all men are "in Christ"—the clause they that are Christ's at his coming implying that there are some who are not "Christ's at his coming."

Biblical Argument

The strongest support of the doctrine of endless punishment is the teaching of Christ, the Redeemer of man. Though the doctrine is plainly taught in the Pauline epistles and other parts of Scripture, yet without the explicit and reiterated statements of God incarnate, it is doubtful whether so awful a truth would have had such a conspicuous place as it always has had in the creed of Christendom. If, in spite of that large mass of positive and solemn threatening of everlasting punishment from the lips of Jesus Christ which is recorded in the four gospels, the attempt has nevertheless been made to prove that the tenet is not an integral part of the Christian system, we may be certain that had this portion of revelation been wanting, this attempt would have been much more frequent and much more successful. The apostles enter far less into detailed description and are far less emphatic upon this solemn theme than their divine Lord and master. And well they might be. For as none but God has the right and would dare to sentence a soul to eternal misery for sin and as none but God has the right and would dare to execute the sentence, so none but God has the right and should presume to delineate the nature and consequences of this sentence. This is the reason why most of the awful imagery in which the sufferings of the lost are described is found in the discourses of our Lord and Savior. He took it upon himself to sound the note of warning. He, the judge of quick and dead, assumed the responsibility of teaching the doctrine of endless retribution: “I will forewarn you whom you shall fear: Fear him who after he has killed has power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, Fear him.” “Nothing,” says Dr. Arnold, “is more striking to me than our Lord’s own description of the judgment. It is so inexpressibly forcible, coming from his very own lips, as descriptive of what he himself would do” (Stanley, Life of Arnold 1.176).

Christ could not have warned men so frequently and earnestly as he did against “the fire that never shall be quenched” and “the worm that dies not” had he known that there is no future peril fully corresponding to them. That omniscient being who made the statements respecting the day of judgment and the final sentence that are recorded in Matt. 25:31-46 could neither have believed nor expected that all men without exception will eventually be holy and happy. To threaten with “everlasting punishment” a class of persons described as “goats upon the left hand” of the eternal judge, while knowing at the same time that this class would ultimately have the same holiness and happiness with those described as “sheep upon the right hand” of the judge, would have been both falsehood and folly- The threatening would have been false. For even a long punishment in the future world would not have justified Christ in teaching that this class of mankind are to experience the same retribution with “the devil and his angels,” for these were understood by the Jews, to whom he spoke, to be hopelessly and eternally lost spirits.[5] And the threatening would have been foolish, because it would have been a brut ton futmen[6] an exaggerated danger, certainly in the mind of its author. And for the persons threatened, it would have been a terror only because they took a different view of it from what its author did — they believing it to be true, and he knowing it to be false! (See supplement 7.6.3.)

The mere perusal of Christ’s words when he was upon earth, without note or comment upon them, will convince the unprejudiced that the Redeemer of sinners knew and believed that for impenitent men and devils there is an endless punishment. We solicit a careful reading and pondering of the following well-known passages:

When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them one horn another, as a shepherd divides his sheep from the goats. And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall he say unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting lire prepared for the devil and his angels. And these shall go away into everlasting punishment. (Matt. 25:31-33, 41, 46)

If your right hand offend you, cut it off: it is better for you to enter into life maimed than having two hands to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched, where their worm dies not and the fire is not quenched. And if your loot offend you, cut if off: it is better for you to enter into life than having two feet to be cast into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched, where their worm dies not and the fire is not quenched. And if your eye offend you. pluck it out: it is better for you to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye than having two eyes to be cast into hellfire, where their worm dies not and the fire is not quenched. (Mark 9:43-48)

What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? What is a man advantaged if he gain the whole world and be cast away? (Mark 8:36; Luke 9:25)

The rich man died and was buried, and in hell he lifted up his eyes being in torments. (Luke 16:22-23)

Fear not them which kill the body but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. (Matt. 10:28)

The Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do iniquity and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. (Matt. 13:41-42)

Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in your name? Then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, you that work iniquity. (Matt. 7:22-23)

He that denies me before men shall be denied before the angels of God. Unto him that blasphemes against the Holy Spirit, it shall never be for-given. (Luke 12:9-10)

Woe unto you, you blind guides. You serpents, you generation of vipers, how can you escape the damnation of hell? (Matt. 23:16, 33)

Woe unto that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed! It had been good lor that man if he had not been born. (Matt. 26:24)

The Lord of that servant will come in a day when he looks not for him and at an hour when he is not aware and will cut him in sunder and appoint him his portion with unbelievers. (Luke 12:46)

He that believes not shall be damned. (Mark 16:16)

You, Capernaum, which are exalted unto heaven, shall be brought down to hell. (Matt. 11:23)

At the end of the world, the angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from among the just and shall cast them into the furnace of fire. (Matt. 13:49-50)

Then said Jesus again to them, 1 go my way, and you shall seek me and shall die in your sins: whither I go you cannot come. (John 8:21)

The hour is coming in which all that are in their graves shall hear my voice and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation. (John 5:28-29)

To all this, add the description of the manner in which Christ will discharge the office of the eternal judge. John the Baptist represents him as one “whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor and gather his wheat into the garner, but will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire” (Matt. 3:12). And Christ describes himself as a house-holder who will say to the reapers, “Gather together first the tares and bind them in bundles to burn them” (13:30); as a fisherman “casting a net into the sea and gathering of every kind, which when it was full he drew to the shore and sat down and gathered the good into vessels, but cast the bad away” (13:47-48); as the bridegroom who took the wise virgins “with him to the marriage” and shut the door upon the foolish (25:10); and as the man traveling into a far country who delivered talents to his servants and afterward reckons with them, rewarding the “good and faithful” and “casting the unprofitable servant into outer darkness, where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth” (25:19-20).

Let the reader now ask himself the question: Do these representations and this phraseology make the impression that the future punishment of sin is to be remedial and temporary? Are they adapted to make this impression? Were they intended to make this impression? Is it possible to believe that that holy and divine person who uttered these fearful and unqualified warnings, eighteen hundred years ago, respecting the destiny of wicked men and devils, knew that a time is coming when there will be no wicked men and devils in the universe of God and no place of retributive torment? Did Jesus of Nazareth hold an esoteric doctrine of hell: a different view of the final state of the wicked from that which the common and natural understanding of his language would convey to his hearers and has conveyed to the great majority of his readers in all time? Did he know that in the far-off future, a day will come when those tremendous scenes which he described—the gathering of all mankind, the separation of the evil from the good, the curse pronounced upon the former and the blessing upon the latter—will be looked back upon by all mankind as “an unsubstantial pageant faded,” as a dream that is passed and a watch in the night?

Jesus Christ is the person responsible for the doctrine of eternal perdition. He is the being with whom all opponents of this theological tenet are in conflict. Neither the Christian church nor the Christian ministry are the authors of it. The Christian ministry never would have invented the dogma; neither would they have preached it in all the Christian centuries, like Jeremiah, with shrinking and in tears, except at the command of that same Lord God who said to the weeping prophet, “What-soever I command you, you shall speak” (Jer. 1:7).

Having given, in the discussion of the intermediate state, the proof from Scripture that sheol and hades signify the place of punishment for the wicked, we proceed to consider the nature and duration of the suffering inflicted in it.[7]

The Old Testament is comparatively silent upon these particulars. Sheol is represented vaguely as an evil to be dreaded and avoided, and little description of its fearfulness is given by the “holy men of old who spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit.” The New Testament makes a fuller revelation and disclosure; and it is principally the Redeemer of the world who widens the outlook into the tremendous future. The suf-fering in hades and gehenna is described as “everlasting (aidiosf[8] punishment” (Matt. 25:46), “everlasting (aidiosf)[9] fire” (18:8), “the fire that never shall be quenched” (Mark 9:45), “the worm that dies not” (9:46), “flaming fire” (2 Thess. 1:8), “everlasting (aidios)’“[10] chains” (Jude 6), “eternal (aidnios)”[11] fire” (Jude 7), “the blackness of darkness forever” (Jude 13), “the smoke of torment ascending up forever and ever” (Rev. 14:11;19:3), “the lake of fire and brimstone” in which the devil, the beast, and the false prophet “shall be tormented dav and night, forever and ever” (20:10).

Sensible figures are employed to describe the misery of hell, as they are to describe the blessedness of heaven. It cannot be inferred from the mere use of metaphors that the duration of either is temporary. Figures are employed to describe both temporal and eternal realities. The psalmist describes God as rock, fortress, shield, etc.; and man as vapor, flower, etc. A figure by its form, as the rhetoricians call it, indicates the intention of the writer. No one would employ the figure of a rock to denote transiency, or of a cloud to denote permanence. Had Christ intended to teach that future punishment is remedial and temporary, he would have compared it to a dying worm and not to an undying worm, to a fire that is quenched and not to an unquenchable fire. The ghost in Hamlet describes the “glowworm’s fire” as “ineffectual,” that is, harmless (1.5). None of the figures employed in Scripture to describe the misery of the wicked are of the same rhetorical form with those of the morning cloud, the early dew, etc. They are invariably of the contrary form and imply fixedness and immutability. The “smoke of torment” ascends forever and ever. The “worm” of conscience does not die. The “fire” is unquenchable. The “chains” are eternal. The “blackness of darkness” overhangs forever. Had the sacred writers wished to teach that future punishment is for a time only, even a very long time, it would have been easy to have chosen a different species and form of metaphor that would have conveyed their meaning. And if the future punishment of the wicked is not endless, they were morally bound to have avoided conveying the impression they actually have conveyed by the kind of figures they have selected. “It is the willful deceit,” says Paley, “that makes the lie; and we willfully deceive when our expressions are not true in the sense in which we believe the hearer to apprehend them.” (See supplement 7.6.4.)

The epithet aidnios”[12] (everlasting) is of prime importance. In order to determine its meaning when applied to the punishment of the wicked, it is necessary, first, to determine that of the substantive from which the adjective is derived. Aidti’[13] signifies an “age.” It is a time word. It denotes “duration” more or less. Of itself, the word duration or age does not determine the length of the duration or age. God has duration, and angels have duration. The Creator has an aion”[14] and the creature has an aion,”[15] but that of the latter is as nothing compared with that of the former: “Behold you have made my days as a handbreadth; and my age is as nothing before you” (Ps. 39:5).

In reference to man and his existence, the Scriptures speak of two and only two aidnes”‘[16] or ages: one finite and one infinite, one limited and one endless, the latter succeeding the former.”[17] An indefinite series of limited eons with no final endless eon is a pagan and gnostic, not a biblical conception. The importation of a notion of an endless series of finite cycles, each of which is without finality and immutability, into the Christian system has introduced error, similarly as the importation of the pagan conception of hades has. The misconceiving of a rhetorical figure in the scriptural use of the plural for the singular, namely, tous aionas ton aidnon[18] for ton aiona,”[19] has also contributed to this error.

The two eons or ages known in Scripture are mentioned together in the following: “It shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world (aidn)[20] nor in the world (aidn)”[21] to come” (Matt. 12:32); “he shall receive a hundredfold now in this time (kairos)[22] and in the world (aion)[23]’ to come eternal life” (Mark 10:30); “he shall receive manifold more in this present time

(kairos)[24] and in the world (aion)"[25] to come life everlasting" (Luke 18:30); "above every name that is named, not only in this world (aion)[26] but also in that which is to come" (Eph. 1:21). The "things present" and the "things to come" mentioned in Rom. 8:38 and 1 Cor. 3:22 refer to the same two ages. These two eons or ages correspond to the two durations of "time" and "eternity," in the common use of these terms. The present age or eon is "time"; the future age or eon is "eternity ""[27] (See supplement 7.6.5.)

The present finite and limited age or eon is denominated in Scripture "this world" (ho aion hontos)[28] or [29]6lam hazzeh" (Matt. 12:32; 13:22; Luke 16:8; 20:34; Rom. 12:2; 1 Cor. 1:20; 2:6). Another designation is "this present world" (ho nyn aidn[30] or ho enestos aion)"[31] (1 Tim. 6:17; 2 Tim. 4:10; Titus 2:12; Gal. 1:4). Sometimes the present limited age or

The same tremendous truth, that after the temporal the endless follows, is taught in the "mighty line" of Marlowe, in which he describes the emotions of Faustus as "the clock strikes eleven":

Ah, Faustus,

Now hast you but one bare hour to live. And then you must be damn'd perpetually! Stand still, you ever-moving spheres of heaven, That time may cease, and midnight never come; Fair Nature's eye, rise, rise again, and make Perpetual day; or let this hour be but A year, a month, a week, a natural day. That Faustus may repent and save his soul!

O lenle, lenie atrrite. noctis equi! [O slowly, slowly run you horses of the night!] The stars move still, time runs, the clock will strike, The devil will come, and Faustus must be damned.

eon is denoted by aion'[32] without the article: "Which he spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began (ap'aidnos)" "[33] (Luke 1:70); "it was not heard since the world began (ap' aidnos)' "[34] (John 9:39).

For rhetorical effect, the present limited age or eon is sometimes represented as composed of a number of lesser ages or cycles, as in modern phrase the sum total of finite earthly time is denominated "the centuries" or "the ages." The following are examples: "The hidden wisdom which God ordained before the ages (pro ton aidnon)" "[35] (1 Cor. 2:7; cf. Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:26). In 1 Tim. 1:17 God is denominated basileus ton aidnon[36] (king of the ages of time) and therefore "the king eternal" (Authorized Version). In Rom. 16:25 a "mystery" is said to have been kept secret chronois

aidniois'[37] (during eonian times; Authorized Version: since the world began). The ages of the limited eon are meant. The secret was withheld from all the past cycles of time. In Titus 1:2 "eternal life" is said to have been promised pro chrondn aidnidn[38] (before eonian times; Authorized Version: before the world began). The ages of the limited eon are meant. God promised eternal life prior to all the periods of time, that is, eternally promised. In these passages, "eonian times" is equivalent to "the centuries" or the "long ages.""[39] This rhetorical plural does not destroy the unity of the limited age or eon. To conceal a mystery from the past "eonian ages" or the past centuries and cycles of finite time is the same as to conceal it from past finite time as a whole.[40]" (See supplement 7.6.6.)

The future infinite and endless age or eon is denominated in Scripture "the future world" (Authorized Version and Revised Version: the world to come, aidn ho melldn" or [41]dlam habba';[42] Matt. 12:32; Heb. 2:5; 6:5). Another designation is "the world to come" (aidn ho erchomenos;"[43] Mark 10:30; Luke 18:30). Still another designation is "that world" (aidn ekeinos;"[44] Luke 20:35). Frequently, the endless age is denoted by aidn"[45] simply, but with the article for emphasis (ho aidn):[46] "Has never forgiveness (eis ton aidna)""[47] (Mark 3:29; cf. Matt. 51:29; John 4:14; 6:51, 58; 8:35, 51-52; 10:28; 11:26; 12:34; 13:8; 14:16; 2 Cor. 9:9; Heb. 5:6; 6:20; 7:17; 2 Pet. 2:17; 1 John 2:17; Jude 13).

The same use of the plural for rhetorical effect employed in the case of the limited eon is also employed in that of the unlimited. The future infinite aidn"[48] is represented as made up of lesser aidnes"[49] or cycles, as in English "infinity" is sometimes denominated "the infinities," "eternity," "the eternities," "immensity," and "the immensities." The rhetorical plural, in this instance as in the other, does not conflict with the unity of the infinite age or eon. The following are examples of this use: "The Creator is blessed forever (eis tous aionas)'"[50] (Rom. 1:25; cf. 9:5; 11:36; 16:27; 2 Cor. 11:31; Phil. 4:20; Gal. 1:5 [eis tous aionas ton aio-ndn\"[51] ITim. l:17;Rev. 1:6, 18; 4:9-10; 5:13; 7:12). The phrasese/s tous aidnas"[52] and eis tons aionas ton aidnon"[53] are equivalent to eis ton aidna.[54] All alike denote the one infinite and endless eon or age.

Since the word eon (aidn)"[55] or age in Scripture may denote either the present finite age or the future endless age, in order to determine the meaning of eonian (aidnios),[56] it is necessary first to determine in which of the two eons—the limited or the endless—the thing exists to which the epithet is applied, because anything in either eon may be denominated "eonian." The adjective follows its substantive in meaning. Ones-imus, as a slave, existed in this world (aidn)"[57] of "time," and when he is called an eonian or "everlasting" (aidnios)[58] servant (Philem. 15), it is meant that his servitude continues as long as the finite eon in which he is a servant; and this is practically at an end for him, when he dies and leaves it. The mountains are denominated eonian or "everlasting" (aid-nia)'"[59] in the sense that they endure as long as the finite world (aidn)[60] of which they are a part endures. God, on the other hand, is a being that exists in the infinite aion[61] and is therefore aidnios"[62] in the endless sig-nification of the word. The same is true of the spirits of angels and men, because they exist in the future eon as well as in the present one. If anything belongs solely to the present age or eon, it is eonian in the limited signification; if it belongs to the future age or eon, it is eonian in the unlimited signification. If, therefore, the punishment of the wicked occurs in the present eon, it is eonian in the sense of temporal; but if it occurs in the future eon, it is eonian in the sense of endless. The adjective takes its meaning from its noun."[63]

The English word forever has the same twofold meaning both in Scripture and in common use. Sometimes it means as long as a man lives upon earth. The Hebrew servant that had his ear bored with an awl to the door of his master was to be his servant "forever" (Exod. 21:6). Sometimes it means as long as the Jewish state should last. The ceremonial laws were to be statutes "forever" (Lev. 16:34). Sometimes it means aslong as the world stands: "One generation passes away, and another generation comes; but the earth abides forever" (Eccles. 1:4). In all such instances, "forever" refers to the temporal eon and denotes finite duration. But in other instances, and they are the great majority in Scripture, "forever" refers to the endless eon, as when it is said that "God is overall blessed forever." The limited signification of "forever" in the former cases does not disprove its unlimited signification in the latter. That Onesimus was an "everlasting" (aionios)[64] servant and that the hills are "everlasting" (aidniaf[65] no more disproves the everlastingness of God, the soul, heaven, and hell than the term forever in a title deed disproves it. To hold land "forever" is to hold it "as long as grass grows and water runs," that is, as long as this world or eon endures.

The objection that, because aionios[66] or "eonian" denotes "that which belongs to an age," it cannot mean endless rests upon the assumption that there is no endless aion" or age. It postulates an indefinite series of limited eons or ages, no one of which is final and everlasting. But the texts that have been cited disprove this. Scripture speaks of but two eons which cover and include the whole existence of man and his whole dura-

In by far the greater number of instances, aion[75]" and aionios[76]" refer to the future infinite age and not to the present finite age, to eternity and not to time. Says Stuart (Exegetical Essays, 13, 16):

> Aionios[77] is employed 66 times in the New Testament. Of these, 51 relate to the future happiness of the righteous; 7 relate to future punishment (Matt. 18:8;25:41,46; Mark 3:29; 1 Thess. 1:9; Heb. 6:2; Jude 6); 2 relate to God; 6 are of a miscellaneous nature (5 relating to confessedly endless things, as covenant, invisibilities; and one, in Philem. 15, to a perpetual service). In all the instances in which aionios[78] refers to future duration, it denotes endless duration; saying nothing of the instances in which it refers to future punishment. Hebrew 'dldm[79] is translated in the Septuagint by aidn[80] 308 times. In almost the whole of these instances the meaning is time unlimited: a period without end. In the other instances, it means aion[81] in the secondary, limited sense; it is applied to the mountains, the levitical statutes, priesthood, etc.

The younger Edwards (Reply to Chauncy, 14) says that "aidn[82] reckoning the reduplications of it, asaiones ton aidnon,[83] to be single instances maintain the doctrine of conditional immortality. According to this view, the soul is not naturally immortal. Some of this class contend that it is material. It gains immortality only through its redemption by Christ.[85]All who are not redeemed lose all consciousness at the death of the body, and this is the "spiritual death" threatened in Scripture. As the death of the body is the extinction of sensation, so the death of the soul is the extinction of consciousness. The falsity of the theory of annihilation in both of its forms is proved by the following considerations:

1. Death is the opposite of birth, and birth does not mean the creation of substance. The conception and birth of an individual man is the uniting of a soul and a body, not the creation ex mhilo of either; and the physical death of an individual man is the separation of a soul and body, not the annihilation of either. Death is a change of the mode in which a substance exists and supposes that the substance itself continues in being:

Ne, when the life decays and forme does fade, Doth it consume and into nothing goe, But chaunged is and often altered to and froe. The substaunce is not chaunged nor altered, But th' only forme and outward fashion.

—Faery Queen 3.6

The death of an animal substance makes an alteration in the relations of certain material atoms, but does not put them out of existence. Dead matter is as far from nonentity as living matter. That physical death is not the annihilation of substance is proved by 1 Cor. 15:36: "That which you sow is not quickened except it die" (cf. John 12:24). In like manner, the death of the soul, or spiritual death, is only a change in the relations of the soul and its mode of existence, and not the annihilation of its substance. In spiritual death the soul is separated from God, as in physical death the soul is separated from the body. The union of the soul with God is spiritual life; its separation from God is spiritual death: "He that has the Son has [spiritual] life, and he that has not the Son has not [spiritual] life" (1 John 5:12).

2. The spiritually dead are described in Scripture as conscious: "In the day you eat thereof, you shall surely die" (Gen. 2:17) compared with "hid themselves" (3:8). After Adam and Eve's fall they were spiritually dead and filled with shame and terror before God. The "dead in trespasses and sins walk according to the course of this world" (Eph. 2:1-2); "she that lives in pleasure is dead while she lives" (1 Tim. 5:6); "you being dead in your sins has he forgiven" (Col. 2:13); "you live and are dead" (Rev.

3:1). Spiritual death is the same as the "second death," and the second death "hurts" (2:11); and its smoke of torment "ascends forever and ever" (19:3).

3. The extinction of consciousness is not of the nature of punishment. The essence of punishment is suffering, and suffering is consciousness. In order to be punished, the person must be conscious of a certain pain, must feel that he deserves it, and knowthat it is inflicted because he does. All three of these elements are required in a case of punishment. To reduce a man to unconsciousness would make his punishment an impossibility. If God by a positive act extinguishes at death the remorse of a hardened villain by extinguishing his self-consciousness, it is a strange use of language to denominate this a punishment. Still another proof that the extinction of consciousness is not of the nature of punishment is the fact that a holy and innocent being might be deprived of consciousness by his Creator, but could not be punished by him. God is not obliged by his justice to perpetuate a conscious existence which he originated ex nihilo. For wise ends, he might suffer an unfallen angel not only to lose consciousness, but to lapse into his original nonentity. But he could not, in justice, inflict retributive suffering upon him.
4. The extinction either of being or of consciousness admits no degrees of punishment. All transgressors are "punished" exactly alike. This contradicts Luke 12:47-48 and Rom. 2:12.
5. According to this theory, brutes are punished. In losing consciousness at death, the animal like the man incurs an everlasting loss. The annihilationist contends that the substance of punishment is in the result and not in its being felt or experienced. If a transgressor is put out of conscious existence, the result is an everlasting loss to him, though he does not know it. But the same thing is true of a brute. And if the former is punished, the latter is also.
6. The advocate of conditional immortality, in teaching that the extinction of consciousness is the "eternal death" of Scripture, implies that the continuance of consciousness is the "eternal life." But mere consciousness is not happiness. Judas was conscious, certainly, when he hung himself, even if he is not now. But he was not happy.

7. The extinction of consciousness is not regarded by sinful men as an evil, but a good. They substitute the doctrine of the eternal sleep of the soul for that of its eternal punishment. This shows that the two things are not equivalents. When Mirabeau lay dying, he cried passionately for opium, that he might never awake. The guilty and remorseful have, in all ages, deemed the extinction of consciousness after death to be a blessing; but the advocate of conditional immortality explains it to be a curse. "Sight and hearing and all earthly good, without justice and virtue," says Plato (Laws 2.661), "are the greatest of evils, if life be immortal; but not so great, if the bad man lives a very short time."
8. The fact that the soul depends for its immortality and consciousness upon the upholding power of its maker does not prove either that it is to be annihilated or to lose consciousness. Matter also depends for its existence and operations upon the Creator. Both matter and mind can be annihilated by the same being who created them from nothing. Whether he will cease to uphold any particular work of his hand can be known only by revelation. In the material world, we see no evidence of such an intention. We are told that "the elements shall melt with fervent heat," but not that they shall be annihilated. And, certainly, all that God has said in revelation respecting creation, redemption, and perdition implies and teaches that he intends to uphold, not to annihilate the human spirit; to perpetuate, not extinguish its self-consciousness.

The form of universalism which is the most respectable—and therefore the most dangerous—is that which concedes the force of the biblical and rational arguments respecting the guilt of sin and its intrinsic desert of everlasting punishment, but contends that redemption from it through the vicarious atonement of Christ is extended into the next world. The advocates of this view assert that between death and the final judgment the application of Christ's work is going on, that the Holy Spirit is regenerating sinners in the intermediate state, and they are believing and repenting as in this life. This makes the day of judgment, instead of the day of death, the dividing line between “time” and “eternity,” between ho aion houtos[86] and aion ho mettdn.[87] And this makes the intermediate state a third eon by itself, lying between “time” and “eternity,” between “this world” and “the world to come.”

That the “intermediate state” is not a third eon, but a part of the second endless eon, is proved by the following considerations:

First, by the fact that in Scripture the disembodied state is not called “intermediate.” This is an ecclesiastical term which came in with the doctrine of purgatory and along with the exaggeration of the difference between paradise and heaven and between hades and gehenna. Second, by the fact that in Scripture death is represented as the deciding epoch in a man’s existence. It is the boundary between the two biblical eons or worlds. Until a man dies, he is in “this world” (/70 nyn aidn);[88] after death, he is in “the future world” (aidn ho melldn).[89] The common understanding of the teaching of Scripture is that men are in “time” so long as they live, but when they die they enter “eternity”: “It is appointed unto men once to die, but after that judgment” (Heb. 9:27). This teaches that prior to death man’s destiny is not decided, he being not yet sentenced; but after death his destiny is settled. When he dies, the “private judgment,” that is, the immediate personal consciousness either of penitence or impenitence, occurs. Every human spirit, in that supreme moment when it “returns to God who gave it,” knows by direct self-consciousness whether it is a child or an enemy of God in temper and disposition; whether it is humble and contrite or proud, hard, and impenitent; whether it welcomes or rejects divine mercy in Christ. The article of death is an event in human existence which strips off all disguises and shows the person what he really is in moral character. He “knows as he is known,” and in this flashing light passes a sentence upon himself that is accurate. This “private judgment” at death is reaffirmed in the “general judgment” of the last day.

Accordingly, our Lord teaches distinctly that death is a finality for the impenitent sinner. Twice in succession, he says with awful emphasis to the Pharisees, “If you believe not that I am he, you shall die in your sins” (John 8:21, 24). This implies that to “die in sin” is to be hopelessly lost. Again, he says, “Yet a little while is the light with you. Walk while you have the light, lest darkness come upon you: for he that walks in darkness knows not whither he goes. While you have light, believe in the light, that you may be the children of light" (12:35-36). According to these words of the Redeemer, the light of the gospel is not accessible in the darkness of death: "The night comes, wherein no man can work" (9:4). The night of death puts a stop to the work of salvation that is appointed to be done in the daytime of this life. St. Paul teaches the same truth in 1 Thess. 5:5-7: "You are all the children of light and the children of the day: we are not of the night nor of darkness. Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober. For they that sleep sleep in the night; and they that be drunken are drunken in the night." "God said unto him, You fool, this night your soul shall be required of you: then whose shall those things be which you have provided? So is he that lays up treasure for himself and is not rich toward God" (Luke 12:20-21). The end of a man's life on earth is often represented as the decisive moment in his existence: "He that endures to the end shall be saved" (Matt. 10:22; 24:13); "Jesus Christ shall confirm you unto the end" (1 Cor. 1:8); "whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end" (Heb. 3:6); "we are made partakers of Christ if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end" (3:14); "we desire that every one of you do show the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end" (6:11); "he that overcomes and keeps my works unto the end to him will I give power over the nations" (Rev. 2:26). In these passages, the end of life or of this world is meant. No one would think of the end of the intermediate state or of eternity as the teles[90] or telous"[91] in the mind of the writer.

With these New Testament teachings agrees the frequent affirmation of the Old Testament that after death nothing can be done toward securing salvation: "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness [at death]; but the righteous has hope in his death" (Prov. 14:32); "when a wicked man dies, his expectation shall perish" (11:7); "in death there is no remembrance of you: in the grave who shall give you thanks?" (Ps. 6:5); "will you show wonders to the dead? shall the dead arise and praise you? shall your loving-kindness be declared in the grave?" (88:10-11); "the dead praise not the Lord, nor any that go down into silence" (115:17); "to him that is joined to all the living, there is hope: for the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward" (Eccles. 9:4-6). These passages do not teach the utter unconsciousness of the soul after death, in flat contradiction to that long list already cited (p. 844) which asserts the contrary, but that there is no alteration of character in the next life: “In death, there is no [happy] remembrance of God [if there has been none in life]”; “the dead shall not arise and praise God [in the next world, if they have not done so in this world]”; “shall God declare his loving-kindness [to one] in the grave [if he has not declared it to him when upon earth]?” (See supplement 7.6.7.)

The parable of Dives proves that death is the turning point in human existence and fixes the everlasting state of the person. Dives asks that his brethren may be warned before they die and enter hades; because after death and the entrance into hades, there is an impassable gulf between misery and happiness, sin and holiness. This shows that the so-called intermediate state is not intermediate in respect to the essential elements of heaven and hell, but is a part of the final and endless state of the soul. It is “intermediate” only in reference to the secondary matter of the presence or absence of the body.

The asserted extension of redemption into the endless eon or age is contradicted by Scripture. Salvation from sin is represented as confined to the limited eon by the covenant between the Father and the Son. The most important and explicit passage bearing upon this point is 1 Cor. 15:24-28: “Then comes the end, when Christ shall have delivered up the kingdom of God, even the Father, when he shall have put down all [opposing] rule and all [opposing] authority and power. For he must reign till he has put all enemies under his feet.” St. Paul here states the fact disclosed to him by revelation from God that the redemption of sinners will not go on forever, but will cease at a certain point of time. The mediator will carry on his work of saving sinful men until he has gathered in his church and completed the work according to the original plan and covenant between himself and his Father, and then he will surrender his mediatorial commission and office (basileian).[92] There will then no longer be any mediation going on between sinners and God. The redeemed will be forever united to their divine head in heaven, and the wicked will be shut up in the “outer darkness.” That Christ’s mediatorial work does not secure the salvation of all men during the appointed period in which it is carried on is proved by the fact that when “the end comes” some men are described as the “enemies” of Christ and as being “put under his feet” (1 Cor. 15:24-25). All of Christ’s redeemed “stand before his throne” (Rev. 14:3; 19:4-7; 21:3). They are in the “mansions” which he has “prepared” for them (John 14:2-3).

The reason assigned for Christ's surrender of his mediatorial commission is "that God may be all in all" (1 Cor. 15:28); not that "God even the Father may be all in all" (1 Cor. 15:24). It is the Trinity that is to be supreme. To Christ, as an incarnate trinitarian person and an anointed mediator, "all power is [temporarily] given in heaven and upon earth" (Matt. 28:29) for the purpose of saving sinners. As such, he accepts and holds a secondary position of condescension and humiliation, when compared with his original unincarnate position (see pp. 675-76). In this reference, he receives a "commandment" (John 10:18) and a "king-dom" (1 Cor. 15:24). In this reference, as believers "are Christ's," so "Christ is God's" (1 Cor. 3:23); and as "the head of the woman is the man," so "the head of Christ is God" (1 Cor. 11:3). But when Christ has finished his work of mediating between the triune God and sinful men and of saving sinners, this condition of subjection to an office and a commission ceases. The dominion (basileian)" '[93] over heaven and earth, temporarily delegated to a single trinitarian person incarnate for purposes of redemption and salvation, now returns to the eternal three whence it came and to whom it originally belongs. The Son of God, his humanity exalted and glorified and his divine-human person united forever to his church as their head, no longer prosecutes that work of redemption which he carried forward through certain ages of time, but, with the Father and Spirit, three in one, reigns over the entire universe: over the holy "who stand before the throne" and over the wicked who are "under his feet" and "in the bottomless pit."

The confinement of the work of redemption to the limited eon, which terminates practically for each individual at the death of the body, is taught in many other passages of Scripture: "My spirit shall not always [Revised Version: forever] strive with man, for that he also is [sinful] flesh; yet his days shall be a hundred and twenty years" (Gen. 6:3). This teaches that the regenerating agency of the divine Spirit in the sinner's heart was to be restricted to the hundred and twenty years which for atime was the average length of human life. "0 that they were wise, that they would consider their latter end" (Deut. 32:29); "teach us so to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom" (Ps. 90:12); "everyone that is godly shall pray unto you in a time when you may be found" (32:6); "because I have called, and you refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but you have set at naught all my counsel and would none of my reproof; I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear comes; then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me" (Prov. 1:24-28); "whatsoever your hand finds to do, do it with your might; for there is no work nor device nor knowledge nor wisdom in the grave whither you go" (Eccles. 9:10); "seek the Lord while he may be found; call upon him while he is near" (Isa. 55:6); "take heed to yourselves lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness and cares of this life and so that day come upon you unawares: for as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the earth" (Luke 21:34-35); "watch, therefore, for you know not what hour your Lord comes; the Lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looks not for him and shall cut him asunder and appoint him his portion with unbelievers: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Matt. 24:42, 50); "if you had known, even you, at least in this your day, the things which belong unto your peace! but now they are hid from your eyes" (Luke 19:42); "strive to enter in at the strait gate: for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able; when once the master of the house is risen up and has shut the door, and you begin to stand without and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us, he shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence you are" (13:24-25); "we beseech you that you receive not the grace of God in vain; for he says, I have heard you in a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succored you: behold now is the accepted time; behold now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2); "today if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts" (Heb. 3:7). The argument in 3:7-19 is to the effect that as God swore that those Israelites who did not believe and obey his servant Moses during the forty years of wandering in the desert should not enter the earthly Canaan, so those who do not "while it is called today"—that is, while they are here in time—believe and obey his Son Jesus Christ, shall not enter the heavenly Canaan: "Take heed lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief. But exhort one another daily, while it is called today" (3:12-13); "God limits a certain day, saying in David, today after so long a time [of impenitence], today if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts" (4:7). Hebrews 10:26 speaks of a time when "there remains no more sacrifice for sins, but a fearful looking-for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries of God." "Behold I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give to every man according as his work shall be. He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still" (Rev. 22:11-12).

If sinners are redeemed beyond the grave, man must be informed of the fact by God himself. There is no other way of finding it out. He has not been so informed, but, if language has any meaning, has been informed of the contrary. Bishop Butler (Analogy 1.2) states the case with his usual conciseness and clearness:

> Reason did, as it well might, conclude that it should finally be well with the righteous and ill with the wicked; but it could not be determined upon any principles of reason whether human creatures might not have been appointed to pass through other states of life and being, before that distributive justice should finally and effectually take place. Revelation teaches us that the next state of things after the present is appointed for the execution of this justice; that it shall no longer be delayed, but the mystery of God, the great mystery of his suffering vice and confusion to prevail, shall then be finished; and he will take to him his great power and will reign by rendering to everyone according to his works.

The asserted extension of redemption into the period between death and the resurrection cannot be placed upon the ground of obligation and justice; and the only other ground possible, that of the divine promise so to extend it, is wanting. Our Lord teaches that men prior to his coming into the world are "condemned already" (John 3:16). His advent to save them supposes that they are already lost; and they are lost by sin; and sin is man's free self-determination.'[94] Consequently, man the sinner has no claim upon God for redemption. Forgiveness is unde-

94. WS: The strange position has recently been taken that the rejection of Christ is the only sin that brings eternal death. "No one," says Dorner (Christian Doctrine 4.167), "will be damned merely on account of the common sin and guilt. But everyone is definitely brought to [guilty] personal decision only through the gospel." Says a writer in the Dec. 1885 Andover Review: 574: "No one can be lost without the knowledge of Christ." This implies that man's sin against the moral law is not sufficient to condemn him to eternal death. He must sin against the gospel before he can be so condemned. Neither original sin nor actual transgression, neither evil inclination nor outward disobedience, both of which are sins against the law. expose a man to hell. This is an entirely new position, not to be found in the history of eschatology and invented, apparently, to furnish a basis for the doctrine of a future offer of redemption. The objections to it are the following: (a) It contradicts the whole tenor of Scripture. Christ teaches that he came to call actual and guilty sinners to repentance (Luke 5:32); that he came to seek and save that which was really and truly lost (19:10); that he did not come into the world to condemn the world, because it was already condemned, but to save the world (John 3:17-18). St. Paul affirms that the whole world, prior to redemption and irrespective of it, is guilty before God (Rom. 3:19). St. John asserts that the whole world, Gentile and Jewish, unevangelized and evangelized, lies in wickedness (1 John 5:19). To quote all the passages in which the Bible teaches that men are exposed to eternal death on account of their transgression of the law of God would be to quote a large part of the Bible. The rejection of the gospel adds a new sin and a very aggravating one to the already existing sin against divine law (John 15:22), but it is not the primary and original ground of condemnation. Men are punished, first of all, because they "have sinned and come short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). (b) Unless man has first sinned against the law, he cannot sin against the gospel. If he has not previously committed a damning sin for which Christ has atoned, he cannot reject Christ's atonement any more than an innocent angel can. The rejection of salvation is meaningless if no damnation has been incurred. If there is no disease, there can be no cure nor rejection of a cure, (c) If no human soul is in danger of perdition until it has rejected Christ, then if Christ had never been offered to man no man would be lost. For if he were not offered, he could not be rejected. In this case, it would have been infinitely better for mankind had Christ never come into the world on an errand of salvation. Had he remained unincamate, as he had been from eternity, no one could have refused belief in him, and as unbelief is the only damning sin no one could have been damned, (d) If "no man can be lost without the knowledge of Christ," then none of the past heathen world who died without this knowledge incurred perdition for the "deeds done in the body," and none of the existing heathen world who are destitute of this knowledge are liable to perdition from this cause. In this case, it is matter of rejoicing that the past generations of pagans never heard of the Redeemer, and it should be an earnest endeavor of the church to prevent all of the present generation of pagans from hearing of him. Domer's theory that "no one will be damned merely on account of the common sin and guilt" is lull of inconsistency and self-contradiction. First, he holds that man is in a state of "common sin and guilt," but it is a species of sin and guilt that does not deserve endless punishment and is not in danger of it. Second, he holds that man needs "salvation" from such an unendangered state. Third, he holds that God is bound in justice to provide "salvation" from such an unendangered state. "The gospel," he says (4.167), "repentance, and forgiveness of sins are to be preached to all nations. This cannot refer merely to nations as unities, but must refer also to every individual; for otherwise the universality of the gracious purpose would not be sincerely meant; and if God refused what is indispensable to salvation to the individual, condemnation would be impossible." Fourth, he holds that God exhibits mercy when he does what he is obligated to do. To all this self-stultifying soteriology, the principle enunciated by St. Paul (Rom. 11:6) is a conclusive reply: "If by grace, then it is no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace. But il it be of works, then it is no more grace; otherwise workserved, whether offered here or hereafter. The exercise of mercy is optional with God: "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy" (Rom. 9:15). It follows from this that the length of time during which the offer of mercy is made to transgressors is likewise optional with God. It may be long or short, according to the divine will. Should God say to a sinner: "I will pardon your sin today, if you will penitently confess it, but not tomorrow," this sinner could not complain of injustice, but would owe gratitude for the mercy thus extended for a limited time. It cannot be said that unless God offers to pardon man forever and ever he is not a merciful being. Neither can this be said, if he confines redemption to this life and does not redeem sinners in the intermediate state."[95]

It is here that the logical inconsistency of such theologians as Miiller and Dorner appears. Lessing, the first of German critics, makes the following remark respecting the German mind: "We Germans suffer from no lack of systematic books. No nation in the world surpasses us in the faculty of deducing from a couple of definitions whatever conclusions we please, in most fair and logical order" (Preface to Laocoon). The truth of this remark is illustrated by some of the systems of theology and philosophy constructed in Germany. The reasoning is close, consecutive, and true in some sections; but loose, inconsequent, and false as a whole. The mind of the thinker when moving in the limited sphere moves logically; but moving in the universe and attempting to construct a philosophy or theology of the infinite fails utterly. Many of the trains of reasoning in Schleiermacher's Glaubenslehre are profound, closely reasoned, and correct, but the system as a whole has fatal defects. No one will deny the rigor of Hegel's logical processes in segments, but the total circle of his thinking is pantheistic and full of inconsistency.

is no more work." If man's "common sin and guilt" is not damning, then it is no more sin and guilt; otherwise sin and guilt are no more sin and guilt. If Christ's salvation is not from death and hell, then it is no more salvation; otherwise salvation is no more salvation. And if God's mercy is justly due to man, then it is no more mercy; otherwise mercy is no more mercy. Julius Mullen though holding (on the ground of Matt. 12:32) "the glorious hope that in the world to come, in far distant eons, some who here harden their hearts against God's revelation and can expect only a verdict of condemnation in the day of judgment, shall find forgiveness and salvation" (Sin 2.437), denies and combats Domer's position that sin against the gospel is the only damning sin (Sin 2.400). For a very able argument in proof that both evil inclination and outward transgression are damning, see Sin 1.198-214.

Lessing's remark applies to that type of universalism of which Miiller and Dorner are the best representatives and the ablest advocates. In the first place, upon "a couple" of obscure and dubious scriptural texts, they rear the whole great fabric of a future redemption, in direct contradiction to some scores of perfectly plain texts that teach the confinement of redemption to this life. And, second, after laying down a theory of sin which represents it as pure self-determination and guilt, sin is then discussed as an evil that is entitled to the offer of a pardon and a remedy. Miiller and Dorner, both alike, explain sin as originating in the free and guilty agency of the finite will and as requiring an atonement in order to its remission.[96] And yet both alike, when they come to eschatology, assume tacitly, but do not formally assert, that divine perfection requires that the offer of forgiveness be made sooner or later to every sinner, that there will be a defect in the benevolence and a blemish in the character of the Supreme Being if he does not tender a pardon to every transgressor of his law. Their eschatology thus contradicts their hamartiology.

The extension of the work of redemption into the future world is made to rest very much for its support upon the cases of the heathen and of infants. Respecting the former, it is certain that the heathen are voluntary transgressors of the moral law and therefore have no claim upon divine mercy. Scripture teaches that they perish because of their sin and impenitence in sin. It is wicked to sin and still more wicked not to repent of it. The heathen are chargeable with both. St. Paul describes them as those "who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them" (Rom. 1:32); "there is no respect of persons with God; for as many as have sinned without [written] law shall also perish without [written] law" (2:11); "the Gentiles show the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness and their thoughts accusing, in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ" (2:14-15); "the Gentiles walk in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart, who being past feeling have given themselves over into lasciviousness to work all uncleanness with greediness" (Eph. 4:17); "remember that you being in time past Gentiles were at that time without hope and without God in the world" (2:11-12); "murderers, whoremongers, and idolaters shall have their part in the lake of fire and brimstone: which is the second death" (Rev. 21:8). Jesus Christ said from heaven to Saul of Tarsus that he had appointed him to be "a minister and witness to the Gentiles, to open their eyes, to turn them from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins and inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith" (Acts 26:16-18). There is, consequently, no ground for asserting that justice and obligation require that the pardon of sins be tendered to the heathen in the next life.'[97]

It does not follow, however, that because God is not obliged to offer pardon to the unevangelized heathen, either here or hereafter, therefore no unevangelized heathen are pardoned. The electing mercy of God reaches to the heathen. It is not the doctrine of the church that the entire mass of pagans, without exception, have gone down to endless impenitence and death. That some unevangelized men are saved in the present life by an extraordinary exercise of redeeming grace in Christ has been the hope and belief of Christendom. It was the hope and belief of the elder Calvinists, as it is of the later.’[98] The Second Helvetic Confes-reaches: “Doctrines may be said to be necessary either to salvation or to religion or to the church. A doctrine, without the knowledge and belief of which God does not save persons who have come to years of moral consciousness, is necessary to salvation; a doctrine, without the profession and practice of which no one can be considered religious, is necessary to religion; and a doctrine, without which no one is admitted to the communion of the visible church, is necessary to the church. There may be articles without which persons ought not to be admitted to the fellowship of the church, that should not, for that reason, be regarded as absolutely essential either to religion or to salvation. Although we might not dare to pronounce a sentence of condemnation against a particular man, we ought not, in defiance of order and discretion, to receive him forthwith into the bosom of our church, whatever sentiments he might hold and to whatever sect he might belong. And with respect to religion, what tails within the sphere of duty is manifest. But how far it may please a gracious God or how far it may be possible for him in consistency with his perfections and character to extend his forbearance to anyone and save his soul, notwithstanding his errors and sins; or, in short, what are the lowest attainments without which no man is saved—who can tell? For this distinction in doctrines, I am indebted to the celebrated Hoombeck (Confutation of Socinianism 1.209). Again, the knowledge of those doctrines which are necessary to salvation admits various degrees. It is in different measures of clearness, abundance, and efficacy that divine revelation, the means of grace, and the communications of the Spirit are enjoyed; and a corresponding diversity takes place in the degrees of knowledge which the saints attain. In some it is clear, distinct, steady, and accompanied with a very firm and decided assent; in others it is more confused, more implicit and latent, subject to occasional wavering, and attended with an assent that is yielded with difficulty. The command of God indeed lays an indispensable obligation upon all men to make every possible effort to attain a most clear, distinct, and assured knowledge of divine truth. It cannot, however, be questioned that the deity in his unbounded goodness receives many to the abodes of bliss whose knowledge even of the principal articles is very indistinct and such as they are hardly capable of expressing in their own words. The smallest measure of the requisite knowledge appears to be this, namely, that when an article of faith is explained, the mind so far at least apprehends it as to recognize and embrace it as true. Furthermore, times must be distinguished. It admits no doubt that under the bright dispensation of the gospel, a more extensive and explicit knowledge is necessary to salvation than was required under the Old Testament economy; for it is reasonable that both knowledge and the necessity of knowledge should increase in proportion to the measure of revelation afforded. Under the old dispensation, nay, during the time of our Savior's abode on the earth, it was possible for a man to be a true believer and in a state of grace who was ignorant of the sufferings, the death, and the resurrection of Christ and who even presumed to object to the testimony ol Christ himself respecting these momentous topics, as is clear from the instance of Peter (Matt. 16:21-23). or who, though he believed in general in the Messiah, yet knew not t hat Jesus is the Christ, as appears from the history of Cornelius the centurion (Acts 10:2-4). No one, however. I suppose, would now acknowledge any person [in Christendom] as a true believer who should discover ignorance of these truths respecting the Lord Jesus, and still less a person who should contradict them when represented to him. On this subject, the remark of Thomas Aquinas (Summa 2.2.1.7) deserves to be quoted: 'The articles of faith," says he, 'have increased with the lapse of time, not indeed with respect to the faith itself, but with respect to explicit and express profession. The same things which are believed explicitly and under a greater number of articles by the saints in latter days were all believed implicitly and under a smaller number by the fathers in ancient times.'"sion, after the remark that the ordinary mode of salvation is by the instrumentality of the written words, adds (1.7): "We acknowledge, meanwhile, that God can illuminate men even without the external ministry, how and when he pleases, for such lies within his power.""[99] Westminster Confession 10.3, after saying that "elect infants dying in infancy are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who works when and where and how he pleases," adds: "So also are all other elect persons [regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit] who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the word." This is commonly understood to refer not merely, or mainly, to idiots and insane persons, but to such of the pagan world as God pleases to regenerate without the use of written revelation. One of the strictest Calvinists of the sixteenth century, Zanchi, whose treatise on predestination was translated by Toplady, after remarking that many nations have never had the privilege of hearing the word, says (chap. 4) that "it is not indeed improbable that some individuals in these unenlightened countries may belong to the secret election of grace, and the habit of faith may be wrought in them." By the term habit (habitus), the elder theologians meant an inward disposition of the heart. The "habit of faith" involvespenitence for sin and the longing for its forgiveness and removal. The "habit of faith" is the broken and contrite heart, which expresses itself in the prayer, "God be merciful to me a sinner." It is certain that the Holy Spirit can produce, if he please, such a disposition and frame of mind in a pagan without employing, as he commonly does, the written word. The case of the blind man in John 9:36-38 is an example of the "habit of faith," though produced in this instance through the instrumentality of the written law: "Jesus says unto him, Do you believe on the Son of God? He answered and said, Who is he, Lord, that I might believe on him? And Jesus said unto him, You have both seen him, and it is he that talks with you. And he said, Lord, I believe. And he worshiped him." Here was sorrow for sin and a desire for redemption from it wrought in the heart by the divine Spirit, prior to the actual knowledge of Christ as the Savior of sinners. The cases of the centurion Cornelius and the Ethiopian eunuch are also examples of the "habit of faith." These men, under the teaching of the Spirit, were conscious of sin and were anxiously inquiring if and how it could be forgiven. That there is a class of persons in unevangelized heathendom who are the subjects of gracious influences of this kind is implied in St. Paul's affirmation that "they are not all Israel, which are of Israel" (Rom. 9:6) and that "they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham" (Gal. 3:7). It is taught also in Matt. 8:11 and Luke 13:30: "Many shall come from the east and west and shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, but the children of the kingdom [those who have had the written word] shall be cast out. And, behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last." This affirmation of Christ was called out by the "habit of faith or disposition to believe in that Gentile centurion, respecting whom he said, "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel" (Matt. 8:5-10).[100]

The true reason for hoping that an unevangelized heathen is saved is not that he was virtuous, but that he was penitent. A penitent man is necessarily virtuous; but a virtuous man is not necessarily penitent. Sorrow for sin produces morality; but morality does not produce sorrow for sin. A great error is committed at this point. The Senecas, the Antonines, the Plutarchs, and such like have been singled out as the hopeful examples in paganism. It is not for man to decide what was the real state of the heart; but the writings of these men do not reveal the sense of sin, do not express penitence, do not show a craving for redemption. There is too much egotism, self-consciousness, and self-righteousness in them. The man, judged by his books, is moral, but proud. He is virtuous, but plumes himself upon it. This is not a hopeful characteristic, when we are asking what are the prospects of a human soul, before the bar of God: "To this man will I look, says the Lord, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit and trembles at my word" (Isa. 66:2); "blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:3). (See supplement 7.6.8.)

This line of remark holds good in Christendom as well as in heathendom. There is a class of men in modern society marked by morality and lofty self-respect, but by no consciousness of sin and no confession of it. And judged by New Testament principles, no class of mankind is farther off from the kingdom of heaven. There is no class that scorns the publican's cry and spurns the atoning blood with such decision and energy as they. To them, the words of Christ in a similar case apply: "The publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of heaven before you" (Mark 21:31). The Magdalen is nearer divine pity than the Pharisee. And upon the same principle, those benighted children of ignorance and barbarism who feel their sin and degradation and are ready to listen with docility to the missionary when he comes with the tidings of the infinite compassion are nearer to heaven than the children of a gilded and heartless civilization who have no moral unrest and turn a deaf ear to all the overtures of mercy."[101]

This extraordinary work of the Holy Spirit is mentioned by the Redeemer to illustrate the sovereignty of God in the exercise of mercy, not to guide his church in their evangelistic labor. His command is to "preach the gospel to every creature." The extraordinary work of God is not a thing for man to expect and rely upon, either in the kingdom of nature or of grace. It is his ordinary and established method which is to direct him. The law of missionary effort is that "faith comes by hearing and hearing by the word of God" (Rom. 11:17).

Two errors, therefore, are to be avoided: First, that all men are saved; second, that only a few men are saved. Some fifty years ago, Schleiermacher surprised all Lutheran Germany with a defense of the Calvinistic doctrine of election; but the surprise was diminished when it appeared that he held that God has elected and will save every human creature without exception. This cannot be squared with Scripture. On the other hand, some Calvinists have represented the number of the reprobated as greater than that of the elect or equal to it.[102] They found this upon the words of Christ, "Many are called, but few are chosen." But this describes the situation at the time when our Lord spoke and not the final result of his redemptive work. Christ himself, in the days of his flesh, called many, but few responded to the call from his gracious lips. Our Lord's own preaching was not as successful as that of his apostles and of many of his ministers. This was a part of his humiliation and sorrow. But when Christ shall have "seen of the travail of his soul" and been "satisfied" with what he has seen, when the whole course of the gospel shall be complete and shall be surveyed from beginning to end, it will be found that God's elect or church is "a great multitude which no man can number, out of all nations and kindreds and peoples and tongues," and that their voice is as the voice of many waters and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, "Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigns" (Rev. 7:9; 19:6). The circle of God's election is a great circle of the heavens and not that of a treadmill.

Respecting the more difficult case of infants: the Scriptures do not discriminate and except them as a class from the mass of mankind, but involve them in the common sin and condemnation: "Suffer little children to come unto me [their Redeemer]" (Luke 18:16); "the promise [of salvation] is unto you and to your children" (Acts 2:39). The fall in Adam explains their case. Adopting the Augustino-Calvinistic statement of this fall, it can then be said that infants, like all others of the human family, freely and responsibly "sinned in Adam and fell with him in his first transgression" (Westminster Shorter Catechism Q. 16). This is no more impossible and no more of a mystery, in the case of infants than of adults. If it be conceded that the whole race apostatized in Adam, infants are righteously exposed to the punishment of sin and have no claim upon divine mercy. The sin which brings condemnation upon them is original sin and not actual transgressions. But original sin is the sinful inclination of the will. An infant has a rational soul, this soul has a will, this will is wrongly inclined, and wrong inclination is self-determined and punishable.[103]' If sinful inclination in an adult needs to be expiated by the atoning blood of Christ, so does sinful inclination in an infant. Infants, consequently, sustain the very same relation to the mercy of God in Christ that the remainder of the human race do. They need divine clemency like the rest of mankind.

The “salvation” of infants supposes their prior damnation. Whoever asserts that an infant is “saved,” by implication concedes that it is “lost.” The salvation of an infant, like that of an adult, involves the remission and removal of sin and depends upon the unmerited and optional grace of God. This being so, it cannot be said that God would treat an infant unjustly if he did not offer him salvation in the intermediate state. And upon the supposition, now common in the evangelical churches, that all infants dying in infancy, being elect, are “regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who works when and where and how he pleases” (Westminster Confession 10.3), there is no need of any such offer.[104]” (See supplement 7.6.9.)

Rational Argument

The chief objections to the doctrine of endless punishment are not biblical, but speculative. The great majority of students and exegetes find the tenet in the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures. Davidson, the most learned of English rationalistic critics, explicitly acknowledges that > if a specific sense be attached to words, never-ending misery is enunciated in the Bible. On the presumption that one doctrine is taught, it is the eternity of hell torments. Bad exegesis may attempt to banish it from the New Testament Scriptures, but it is still there, and expositors who wish to get rid of it, as Canon Farrar does, injure the cause they have in view by misrepresentation. It must be allowed that the New Testament record not only makes Christ assert everlasting punishment, but Paul and John. But the question should be looked at from a larger platform than single texts: in the light of God’s attributes and the nature of the soul. The destination of man and the Creator’s infinite goodness, conflicting as they do with everlasting punishment, remove it from the sphere of rational belief. If provision be not made in revelation for a change of moral character after death, it is made in reason. Philosophical considerations must not be set aside even by Scripture. (Last Things, 133, 136, 151)

Consequently, after presenting the biblical argument for endless punishment, it becomes necessary to present the rational argument for it. So long as the controversy is carried on by an appeal to the Bible, the defender of endless retribution has comparatively an easy task. But when the appeal is made to human self-love and sentiment or to ratiocination the demonstration requires more effort. And yet the doctrine is not only biblical, but rational. It is defensible on the basis of sound ethics and pure reason. Nothing is requisite for its maintenance but the admission of three cardinal truths of theism, namely, that there is a just God; that man has free will; and that sin is voluntary action. If these are denied, there can be no defense of endless punishment—or of any other doctrine except atheism and its corollaries. (See supplement 7.6.10.)

The Bible and all the creeds of Christendom affirm man's free agency in sinning against God. The transgression which is to receive the endless punishment is voluntary. Sin, whether it be inward inclination or outward act, is unforced human agency. This is the uniform premise of Christian theologians of all schools. Endless punishment supposes the freedom of the human will and is impossible without it. Could a man prove that he is necessitated in his murderous hate and his murderous act, he would prove, in this very proof, that he ought not to be punishedfor it, either in time or eternity. Could Satan really convince himself that his moral character is not his own work, but that of God or of nature, his remorse would cease and his punishment would end. Self-determination runs parallel with hell.'"[105]

Guilt, then, is what is punished, and not misfortune. Free and not forced agency is what feels the stroke of justice. What, now, is this stroke? What do law and justice do when they punish? Everything depends upon the right answer to this question. The fallacies and errors of universalism find their nest and hiding place at this point. The true definition of punishment detects and excludes them.[106]

Punishment is neither chastisement nor calamity. Men suffer calamity, says Christ, not because they or their parents have sinned, "but that the works of God should be made manifest in them" (John 9:3). Chastisement is inflicted in order to develop a good, but imperfect character already formed: "The Lord loves whom he chastens," and "what son is he whom the earthly father chastens not?" (Heb. 11:6-7). Punishment, on the other hand, is retribution and is not intended to do the work of either calamity or chastisement, but a work of its own. And this work is to vindicate law, to satisfy justice. Punishment, therefore, as distinguished from chastisement is wholly retrospective in its primary aim. It looks back at what has been done in the past. Its first and great object is requital. A man is hung for murder, principally and before all other reasons, because he has voluntarily transgressed the law forbidding murder. He is not hung from a prospective aim, such as his own moral improvement or for the purpose of deterring others from committing murder. The remark of the English judge to the horse thief, in the days when such theft was capitally punished, "You are not hung because you have stolen a horse, but that horses may not be stolen," has never been regarded as eminently judicial. It is true that personal improvement may be one consequence of the infliction of penalty. But the consequence must not be confounded with the purpose: cum hoc non ergo propter hoc."[107] The criminal may come to see and confess that his crime deserves its punishment and in genuine unselfish penitence may take sides with the law, approve its retribution, and go into the presence of the final judge, relying upon that great atonement which satisfies eternal justice for sin; but even this, the greatest personal benefit of all, is not what is aimed at in man's punishment of the crime of murder. For should there be no such personal benefit as this attending the infliction of the human penalty, the one sufficient reason for inflicting it still holds good, namely, the fact that the law hasbeen violated and demands the death of the offender for this reason simply and only. Says Kant (Practical Reason, 151 [ed. Rosenkranz]):

> The notion of ill desert and punishableness is necessarily implied in the idea of voluntary transgression; and the idea of punishment excludes that of happiness in all its forms. For though he who inflicts punishment may, it is true, also have a benevolent purpose to produce by the punishment some good effect upon the criminal, yet the punishment must be justified, first of all, as pure and simple requital and retribution, that is, as a kind of suffering that is demanded by the law without any reference to its prospective beneficial consequences; so that even if no moral improvement and no personal advantage should subsequently accrue to the criminal, he must acknowledge that justice has been done to him and that his experience is exactly conformed to his conduct. In every instance of punishment, prop-erly so called, justice is the very first thing and > constitutes the essence of it. A benevolent purpose and a happy effect, it is true, may be conjoined with punishment; but the criminal cannot claim this as his due, and he has no right to reckon upon it. All that he deserves is punishment, and this is all that he can expect from the law which he has transgressed.

These are the words of as penetrating and ethical a thinker as ever lived.[108]

Neither is it tine that the first and principal aim of punishment, in distinction from chastisement, is the protection of society and the public good. This, like the personal benefit in the preceding case, is only secondary and incidental. The public good is not a sufficient reason for putting a man to death,”“[109] but the satisfaction of law is. This view of penalty is most disastrous in its influence as well as false in its ethics. For if the good of the public is the true reason and object of punishment, the amount of it may be fixed by the end in view. The criminal may be made to suffer more than his crime deserves, if the public welfare in suppressing this particular kind of crime requires it. His personal desert and responsibility not being the one sufficient reason for his suffering, he may be made to suffer as much as the public safety requires. It was this theory of penalty that led to the multiplication of capital offenses. The prevention of forgery, it was once claimed in England, required that the forger should forfeit his life, and upon the principle that punishment is for the public protection and not for strict and exact justice, an offense against human property was expiated by human life. Contrary to the Noachic statute, which punishes only murder with death, this statute weighed out man’s lifeblood against pounds, shillings, and pence. On this theory, the number of capital offenses become very numerous, and the criminal code very bloody. So that, in the long run, nothing is kinder than exact justice. It prevents extremes in either direction: either that of indulgence or that of cruelty.[110]

This theory breaks down from whatever point it be looked at. Suppose that there were but one person in the universe. If he should transgress the law of God, then, upon the principle of expediency as the ground of penalty, this solitary subject of moral government could not be punished, that is, visited with a suffering that is purely retributive and not exemplary or corrective. His act has not injured the public, for there is no public. There is no need of his suffering as an example to deter others, for there are no others. But upon the principle of justice, in distinction from expediency, this solitary subject of moral government could be punished. (See supplement 7.6.11.)

The vicious ethics of this theory of penalty expresses itself in the demoralizing maxim, “It is better that ten guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer.” But this is no more true than the converse, “It is better that ten innocent men should suffer than that one guilty man should escape.” It is a choice of equal evil and equal injustice. In either case alike, justice is trampled down. In the first supposed case there are eleven instances of injustice and wrong; and in the last supposed case there are likewise eleven instances of injustice and wrong. Unpunished guilt is precisely the same species of evil with punished innocence. To say, therefore, that it is better that ten guilty persons should escape than that one innocent man should suffer is to say that it is better that there should be ten wrongs than one wrong against justice. The maxim assumes that the punishment of the guilty is not of so much consequence as the immunity of the innocent. But the truth is that both are equally required by justice.

The theory that punishment is retributive honors human nature, but the theory that it is merely expedient and useful degrades it. If justice be the true ground of penalty, man is treated as a person; but if the public good is the ground, he is treated as a chattel or a thing. When suffering is judicially inflicted because of the intrinsic gravity and real demerit of crime, man’s free will and responsibility are recognized and put in the foreground; and these are his highest and distinguishing attributes. The sufficient reason for his suffering is found wholly within his own person in the exercise of self-determination. He is not seized by the magistrate and made to suffer for a reason extraneous to his own agency and for the sake of something lying wholly outside of himself—namely, the safety and happiness of others—but because of his own act. He is not handled like a brute or an inanimate thing that may be put to good use; but he is recognized as a free and voluntary person who is not punished because punishment is expedient and useful, but because it is just and right—not because the public safety requires it, but because he owes it. The dignity of the man himself, founded in his lofty but hazardous endowment of free will, is acknowledged.

Supposing it, now, to be conceded that future punishment is retributive in its essential nature, it follows that it must be endless from the nature of the case. For, suffering must continue as long as the reason for it continues.

In this respect, it is like law, which lasts as long as its reason lasts: ratione cessante, cessat ipsa lex.'"[111] Suffering that is educational and corrective may come to an end because moral infirmity and not guilt is the reason for its infliction, and moral infirmity may cease to exist. But suffering that is penal can never come to an end because guilt is the reason for its infliction, and guilt once incurred never ceases to be. The lapse of time does not convert guilt into innocence, as it converts moral I infirmity into moral strength; and therefore no time can ever arrive when the guilt of the criminal will cease to deserve and demand its retribution. The reason for retribution today is a reason forever. Hence, when God disciplines and educates his children, he causes only a temporary suf-fering. In this case, "he will not keep his anger forever" (Ps. 103:9). But when, as the Supreme Judge, he punishes rebellious and guilty subjects of his government, he causes an endless suffering. In this case, "their worm dies not, and the fire is not quenched" (Mark 9:48).

The real question, therefore, is whether God ever punishes. That he chastises is not disputed. But does he ever inflict a suffering that is not intended to reform the transgressor and does not reform him, but is intended simply and only to vindicate law and satisfy justice by requiting him for his transgression? Revelation teaches that he does: "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, says the Lord" (Rom. 12:19); "vengeance belongs unto me, I will recompense, says the Lord" (Heb. 10:30). Retribution is here asserted to be a function of the Supreme Being and his alone. The creature has no right to punish except as he is authorized by the infinite ruler: "The powers that be are ordained of God. The ruler is the minister of God, an avenger to execute wrath upon him that does evil" (Rom. 13:1,4). The power which civil government has to punish crime—the private person having no such power —is only a delegated right from the source of retribution. Natural religion, as well as revealed, teaches that God inflicts upon the voluntary transgressor of law a suffering that is purely vindicative of law. The pagan sages enunciate the doctrine, and it is mortised into the moral constitution of man, as is proved by his universal fear of retribution. The objection that a suffering not intended to reform but to satisfy justice is cruel and unworthy of God is refuted by the question of St. Paul: "Is God unrighteous who takes vengeance?" (3:5-6). It is impossible either to found or administer a government, in heaven or upon earth, unless the power to punish crime is conceded.

The endlessness of future punishment, then, is implied in the endlessness of guilt and condemnation. When a crime is condemned, it is absurd to ask, “How long is it condemned?” The verdict “Guilty for ten days” was Hibernian. Damnation means absolute and everlasting damnation. All suffering in the next life, therefore, of which the sufficient and justifying reason is guilt, must continue as long as the reason continues; and the reason is everlasting. If it be righteous today in God’s retributive justice to smite the transgressor because he violated the law yesterday, it is righteous to do the same thing tomorrow and the next day and so on ad infinitum, because the state of the case ad infinitum remains unaltered. The guilt incurred yesterday is a standing and endless fact. What, therefore, guilt legitimates this instant, it legitimates every instant and forever.

The demand that penal suffering shall stop when it has once begun is as irrational as the demand that guilt shall stop when it has once begun. The continuous nature of guilt necessitates the endlessness of retribution. A man, for illustration, is guilty of profanity today. God, we will suppose, immediately begins to cause him to suffer in his mind as the righteous requital for his transgression of the third commandment. The transgressor immediately begins to feel remorse for his sin. Why, upon principles of justice, should he feel remorse for his profanity today and not feel it tomorrow? Why should he feel it tomorrow and not feel it a million years hence? Why should he feel it a million years hence and not feel it forever? At what point should remorse stop? If we suppose the state of the case to be unchanged, if we suppose no penitence for the profanity and no appropriation of the only atonement that cancels guilt, then the mental suffering which the profanity deserves and experiences now it always must deserve and experience. The same reasoning will apply to whatever suffering besides remorse enters into the sum total of future punishment.”[112]

Again, the endlessness of punishment follows from the indivisibility of guilt. The nature of guilt is such that it cannot be divided up and distributed in parts along a length of time and be expiated in parts, but is concentrated whole and entire at each and every point of time. The guilt of the sin of profanity does not rest upon the transgressor, one part of it at twelve o’clock and another part of it at half past twelve and another part of it at one o’clock and so on. The whole infinite guilt of this act of sin against God lies upon the sinner at each and every instant of time. He is no more guilty of the supposed act at half past twelve than at twelve, and equally guilty at both these instants. Consequently, the whole infinite penalty can justly be required at any and every moment of time. Yet the whole penalty cannot be paid at any and every moment by the suffering of that single moment. The transgressor at any and every point in his endless existence is infinitely guilty and yet cannot cancel his guilt by what he endures at a particular point. Too long a punishment of guilt is thus an impossibility. The suffering of the criminal can never overtake the crime. And the only way in which justice can approximately obtain its dues is by a never-ceasing infliction. We say approximately, because, tested strictly, the endless suffering of a finite being is not strictly infinite suffering; while the guilt of sin against God is strictly infinite. There is, therefore, no overpunishment in endless punishment.'"[113]

It will be objected that, though the guilt and damnation of a crime be endless, it does not follow that the suffering inflicted on account of it must be endless also, even though it be retributive and not reformatory in its intent. A human judge pronounces a theft to be endlessly a theft and a thief to be endlessly a thief, but he does not sentence the thief to an endless suffering, though he sentences him to a penal suffering. But this objection overlooks the fact that human punishment is only approximate and imperfect, not absolute and perfect like the divine. It is not adjusted exactly and precisely to the whole guilt of the offense, but is more or less modified, first, by not considering its relation to God's honor and majesty; second, by human ignorance of the inward motives; and, third, by social expediency. Earthly courts and judges look at the transgression of law with reference only to man's temporal relations, not his eternal. They punish an offense as a crime against the state, not as a sin against God. Neither do they look into the human heart and estimate crime in its absolute and intrinsic nature, as does the searcher of hearts and the omniscient judge."[114] A human tribunal punishes mayhem, we will say, with a six-month imprisonment because it does not take into consideration either the malicious and wicked anger that prompted the maiming or the dishonor done to the Supreme Being by the transgression of his commandment. But Christ, in the final assize, punishes this offense endlessly, because his all-seeing view includes the sum total of guilt in the case, namely, the inward wrath, the outward act, and the relation of both to the infinite perfection and adorable majesty of God. The human tribunal does not punish the inward anger at all; the divine tribunal punishes it with hellfire: "For whosoever shall say to his brother, You fool, is in danger of hellfire" (Matt. 5:22). The human tribunal punishes seduction with a pecuniary fine because it does not take cognizance of the selfish and heartless lust that prompted it or of the affront offered to that immaculate holiness which from Sinai proclaimed, "You shall not commit adultery." But the divine tribunal punishes seduction with an infinite suffering because of its more comprehensive and truthful view of the whole transaction. And, in addition to all this imperfection in human punishment, the human tribunal may be influenced by prejudice and selfishness:

> In the corrupted currents of this world,
> Offense's gilded hand may shove by justice;
> And oft 'tis seen, the wicked prize itself
> Buys out the law. But 'tis not so above.
> There is no shuffling, there the action lies
> In his true nature; and we ourselves compelled
> Even to the teeth and forehead of our faults,
> To give in evidence.
>
> — Hamlet 3.4

Again, human punishment, unlike the divine, is variable and inexact because it is to a considerable extent reformatory and protective. Human government is not intended to do the work of the supreme ruler. The sentence of an earthly judge is not a substitute for that of the last day. Consequently, human punishment need not be marked, even if this were possible, with all that absoluteness and exactness of justice which characterizes the divine. Justice in the human sphere may be relaxed by expediency. Human punishment may sometimes be more severe and sometimes less severe than exact requital demands, but divine punishment may not be. The retributive element must, indeed, enter into human punishment; for no man may be punished by a human tribunal he deserves punishment—unless he is a criminal. But retribution is not the sole element when man punishes. Man, while not overlooking the guilt in the case, has some reference to the reformation of the offender and still more to the protection of society. Here, in time, the transgressor is capable of reformation, and society needs protection. Hence civil expediency and social utility modify exact and strict retribution.

For the sake of reforming the criminal, the judge sometimes inflicts a penalty that is less than the real guilt of the offense. For the sake of shielding society, the court sometimes sentences the criminal to a suffering greater than his crime deserves. Human tribunals, also, vary the punishment for the same offense: sometimes punishing forgery capitally and sometimes not, sometimes sentencing those guilty of the same kind of theft to one year's imprisonment and sometimes to two.

But the divine tribunal, in the last great day, is invariably and exactly just, because it is neither reformatory nor protective. In eternity, the sinner is so hardened as to be incorrigible, and heaven is impregnable. Hell, therefore, is not a penitentiary. It is righteous retribution, pure and simple, unmodified by considerations either of utility to the criminal or of safety to the universe. In the day of final account, penalty will not be unjustly mild for the sake of the transgressor nor unjustly severe for the sake of society. Christ will not punish incorrigible men and devils (for the two receive the same sentence and go to the same place; Matt. 25:41) for the purpose of reforming them or of screening the righteous from the wicked, but of satisfying the broken law. His punishment at that time will be nothing but just requital. The Redeemer of men is also the eternal judge; the Lamb of God is also the Lion of the tribe of Judah; and his righteous word to wicked and hardened Satan, to wicked and hardened Judas, to wicked and hardened pope Alexander VI, will be: "Vengeance is mine; I will repay. Depart from me, you cursed, that work iniquity" (Rom. 12:19; Matt. 25:41; 7:23); "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and that obey not the gospel" (2 Thess. 1:7-8). The wicked will receive their desert and reap according as they have sown. The suffering will be unerringly adjusted to the intrinsic guilt: no greater and no less than the sin deserves: "That servant which knew his lord's will [clearly] and did not according to his will shall be beaten with many stripes; but he that knew not [clearly] and did commit things worthy of stripes shall be beaten with few stripes. As many have sinned without [written] law shall also perish without [written] law; and as many as have sinned under [written] law shall be judged by the [written] law" (Luke 12:47^48; Rom. 2:12).

It is because the human court, by reason of its ignorance both of the human heart and the true nature of sin against a spiritual law and a holy God, cannot do the perfect work of the divine tribunal that human laws and penalties are only provisional and not final. Earthly magistrates are permitted to modify and relax penalty and pass a sentence which, though adapted to man's earthly circumstances, is not absolute and perfect and is finally to be revised and made right by the omniscient accuracy of God. The human penalty that approaches nearest to the divine is capital punishment. There is more purely retributive element in this than in any other. The reformatory element is wanting. And this punishment has a kind of endlessness. Death is a finality. It forever separates the murderer from earthly society, even as future punishment separates forever from the society of God and heaven.

The difference between human and divine punishment is well stated by Paley (Mural Philosophy 6.9):

> The proper end of human punishment is not the [exact] satisfaction of justice, but the prevention of crimes. By the satisfaction of justice, I mean I the retribution of so much pain for so much guilt, which is the dispensation we expect at the hand of God and which we are accustomed to consider as the order of things that perfect justice requires. Crimes are not by any government punished in proportion to their [exact] guilt, nor in all cases ought to be so, but in proportion to the difficulty and the necessity of preventing them. The crime must be prevented by some means or other; and consequently whatever means appear necessary to this end, whether they be proportionable to the [exact] guilt of the criminal or not, are adopted rightly. It is in pursuance of this principle, which pervades indeed the whole system of penal jurisprudence, that the facility with which any species of crime is perpetrated has been generally deemed a reason for aggravating the punishment. This severity would be absurd and unjust, if the [exact] guilt of the offender was the immediate cause and measure of the punishment.
>
> On the other hand, from the justice of God we are taught to look for a gradation of punishment exactly proportioned to the guilt of the offender. When, therefore, in assigning the degrees of human punishment we introduce considerations distinct from that of guilt > and a proportion so varied by external circumstances that equal crimes frequently undergo unequal punishments or the less crime the greater, it is natural to demand the reason why a different measure of punishment should be expected from God: why that rule which befits the absolute and perfect justice of the deity should not be the rule which ought to be preserved and imitated by human laws. The solution of this difficulty must be sought for in those peculiar attributes of the divine nature which distinguish the dispensations of supreme wisdom from the proceedings of human judicature. A being whose knowledge penetrates every concealment, from the operation of whose will no act or flight can escape and in whose hands punishment is sure—such a being may conduct the moral government of his creation in the best and wisest manner by pronouncing a law that every crime shall finally receive a punishment proportioned to the guilt which it contains, abstracted from any foreign consideration whatever, and may testify his veracity to the spectators of his judgments by carrying this law into strict execution. But when the care of the public safety is entrusted to men whose authority over their fellow creatures is limited by defects of power and knowledge, from whose utmost vigilance and sagacity the greatest offenders often lie hid, whose wisest precautions and speediest pursuit may be eluded by artifice or concealment, a different necessity, a new rule of proceeding results from the very imperfection of their faculties. In their hands, the uncertainty of punishment must be compensated by the severity. The ease with which crimes are committed or concealed must be counteracted by additional penalties and increased terrors. The very end for which human government is established requires that its regulations be adapted to the suppression of crimes. This end, whatever it may do in the plans of infinite wisdom, does not, in the designation of temporal penalties, always coincide with the proportionate punishment of guilt.

Blackstone also (Commentaries 4.1) alludes to the same difference in the following words: “The end or final cause of human punishments is not atonement or expiation for the crime committed, for that must be left to the just determination of the Supreme Being.”

The argument thus far goes to prove that retribution in distinction from correction—or punishment in distinction from chastisement—is endless from the nature of the case, that is, from the nature of guilt. We pass, now, to prove that it is also rational and right.

Endless punishment is rational, in the first place, because it is supported by the human conscience. The sinner's own conscience will "bear witness" and approve of the condemning sentence "in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ" (Rom. 2:16). Dives, in the parable, when reminded of the justice of his suffering, is silent. Accordingly, all the evangelical creeds say with Westminster Larger Catechism 89 that "the wicked, upon clear evidence and full conviction of their own consciences, shall have the just sentence of condemnation pronounced against them." If in the great day there are any innocent men who have no accusing consciences, they will escape hell. We may accommodate St. Paul's words (Rom. 13:3-4) and say: "The final judgment is not a terror to good works, but to evil. Will you, then, not be afraid of the final judgment? Keep the law of God perfectly, without a single slip or failure, inwardly or outwardly, and you shall have praise of the same. But if you do that which is evil, be afraid." But a sentence that is justified by the highest and best part of the human constitution must be founded in reason, justice, and truth. It is absurd to object to a judicial decision that is confirmed by the man's own immediate consciousness of its righteousness:

> For what, my small philosopher, is hell?
> "lis nothing but full knowledge of the truth,
> When truth, resisted long, is sworn our foe:
> And calls eternity to do her right.
>
> —Young

The opponent of endless retribution does not draw his arguments from the impartial conscience, but from the bias of self-love and desire for happiness. His objections are not ethical but sentimental. They are not seen in the dry light of pure truth and reason, but through the colored medium of self-indulgence and love of ease and sin.

Again, a guilty conscience expects endless punishment. There is in it what the Scriptures denominate "the fearful looking-for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries" of God (Heb. 10:27). This is the awful apprehension of an evil that is to last forever, otherwise it would not be so "fearful." The knowledge that future suffering will one day cease would immediately relieve the apprehension of the sinner. A guilty conscience is in its very nature hopeless. Impenitent men, in their remorse, "sorrow as those who have no hope" (1 Thess. 4:13). Unconverted Gentiles "have no hope and are without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12); "the hope of the wicked shall be as the giving up of the ghost" (Job 11:20); "the hypocrite's hope shall perish"(8:13). Consequently, the great and distinguishing element in hell torment is despair, a feeling that is impossible in any man or fallen angel who knows that he is finally to be happy forever. Despair results from the endlessness of retribution. No endlessness, no despair."[115] Natural religion, as well as revealed, teaches the despair of some men in the future life. Plato (Gor-gias 525), Pindar (Olympia 2), and Plutarch (On the Delay of the Deity in the Punishment of the Wicked) describe the punishment of the incorrigibly wicked as eternal and hopeless.

In Scripture there is no such thing as eternal hope. Hope is a characteristic of earth and time only. Here in this life, all men may hope for forgiveness: "Turn, you prisoners of hope" (Zech. 9:2); "now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2). But in the next world, there is no hope of any kind, because there is either fruition or despair. The Christian's hope is converted into its realization: "For what a man sees, why does he yet hope for it?" (Rom. 8:24):

> Soon shall close thine earthly mission,
> Soon shall pass thy pilgrim days;
> Hope shall change to glad fruition,
> Faith to sight, and prayer to praise.

And the impenitent sinner's hope of heaven is converted into despair. Canon Farrar's phrase eternal hope is derived from Pandora's box, not from the Bible. Dante's legend over the portal of hell is the truth: "All hope abandon, you who enter here."[116]

That the conscience supports endless retribution is also evinced by the universality and steadiness of the dread of it. Mankind believe in hell, as they believe in divine existence, by reason of their moral sense. Notwithstanding all the attack made upon the tenet in every generation, by a fraction of every generation, men do not get rid of their fear of future punishment. Skeptics themselves are sometimes distressed by it. But a permanent and general fear among mankind cannot be produced by a mere chimera or a pure figment of the imagination. Men have no fear of Rhadamanthus, nor can they be made to fear him, because they know that there is no such being: "An idol is nothing in the world" (1 Cor. 8:4). But men have "the fearful looking-for of judgment" from the lips of God, ever and always. If the biblical hell were as much a nonentity as the heathen Atlantis, no one would waste his time in endeavoring to prove its nonexistence. What man would seriously construct an argument to demonstrate that there is no such being as Jupiter Ammon or such an animal as the centaur? The very denial of endless retribution evinces by its spasmodic eagerness and effort to disprove the tenet, the firmness with which it is entrenched in man's moral constitution. If there really were no hell, absolute indifference toward the notion would long since have been the mood of all mankind; and no arguments, either for or against it, would be constructed.

would noC only mitigate all other pains but wholly take away the bitter anguish of despair." It is obvious that if God makes any such promise in his word, either expressly or by implication, despair is not only impossible to the believer of Scripture, but is a sin. No man should despair. And if God does not make any such promise, but man makes it to his fellow sinner in saying, as Satan did to Eve, "you shall not surely die," and the human promise is believed, the effect will be the same. There will be no despair until the reckless human falsehood is corrected by the awful demonstration at death.

And finally, the demand, even here upon earth, for the punishment of the intensely and incorrigibly wicked proves that retribution is grounded in the human conscience. When abominable and satanic sin is temporarily triumphant, as it sometimes has been in the history of the world, men cry out to God for his vengeance to come down. "If there were no God, we should be compelled to invent one" is now a familiar sentiment. "If there were no hell, we should be compelled to invent one" is equally true. When examples of depravity occur, man cries: “How long, 0 Lord, how long?” The noninfliction of retribution upon hardened villainy and successful cruelty causes anguish in the moral sense. For the expression of it, read the imprecatory psalms and Milton’s sonnet on the massacre in Piedmont. (See supplement 7.6.12.)

In the second place, endless punishment is rational because of the endlessness of sin. If the preceding view of the relation of penalty to guilt be correct, endless punishment is just, without bringing the sin of the future world into the account. Man incurs everlasting punishment for “the things done in his body” (2 Cor. 5:10). Christ sentences men to perdition, not for what they are going to do in eternity, but for what they have already done in time. It is not necessary that a man should commit all kinds of sin or that he should sin a very long time in order to be a sinner: “Whosoever shall keep the whole law and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all” (James 2:10). One sin makes guilt, and guilt makes hell.”[117]

But while this is so, it is a fact to be observed that sin is actually being added to sin in the future life, and the amount of guilt is accumulating. The lost spirit is “treasuring up wrath” (Rom. 2:5). Hence, there are degrees in the intensity of endless suffering. The difference in the grade arises from the greater resoluteness of the wicked self-determination and the greater degree of light that was enjoyed upon earth. He who sins against the moral law as it is drawn out in the Sermon on the Mount sins more determinedly and desperately than the pagan who sins against the light of nature. There are probably no men in paganism who sin so willfully and devilishly as some men in Christendom. Profanity or the blaspheming of God is a Christian and not a heathen characteristic.”[118] They are Christian peoples who force opium and rum on helpless pagans. These degrees of sin call for degrees of suffering. And there are degrees in future suffering, because it is infinite in duration only. In intensity, it is finite. Consequently, the lost do not all suffer precisely alike, though all suffer the same length of time. A thing may be infinite in one respect and finite in others. A line may be infinite in length and not in breadth and depth. A surface may be infinite in length and breadth and not in depth. And two persons may suffer infinitely in the sense of endlessly, and yet one experience more pain than the other.

The endlessness of sin results, first, from the nature and energy of sinful self-determination. Sin is the creature’s act solely. God does not work in the human will when it wills antagonistically to him. Conse-quently, self-determination to evil is an extremely vehement activity of the will. There is no will so willful as a wicked will. Sin is stubborn and obstinate in its nature because it is enmity and rebellion. Hence, wicked will intensifies itself perpetually. Pride, left to itself, increases and never diminishes. Enmity and hatred become more and more satanic. “Sin,” says South, “is the only perpetual motion which has yet been found out and needs nothing but a beginning to keep it incessantly going on.” Upon this important point, Aristotle, in the seventh book of his Ethics, reasons with great truth and impressiveness. He distinguishes between ako-lasia” ‘[119] and akrasia,” “[120] between strong will to wickedness and weak self-indulgence. The former is viciousness from deliberation and preference and implies an intense determination to evil in the man. He goes wrong not so much from the pull of appetite and passion as purposely, knowingly, and energetically. He has great strength of will, and he puts it all forth in resolute wickedness. The latter quality is more the absence than the presence of will; it is the weakness and irresolution of a man who has no powerful self-determination of any kind. The condition of the former of these two men Aristotle regarded as worse than that of the latter. He considered it to be desperate and hopeless. The evil is incurable. Repentance and reformation are impossible to this man; for the wickedness in this instance is not mere appetite; it is a principle; it is cold-blooded and total depravity.

Another reason for the endlessness of sin is the bondage of the sinful will. In the very act of transgressing the law of God, there is a reflex action of the human will upon itself, whereby it becomes unable to perfectly keep that law. Sin is the suicidal action of the human will. A man is not forced to kill himself; but if he does, he cannot bring himself to life again. And a man is not forced to sin, but if he does, he cannot of himself get back where he was before sinning. He cannot get back to innocency, nor can he get back to holiness of heart. The effect of vicious habit in diminishing a man’s ability to resist temptation is proverbial. An old and hardened debauchee, like Tiberius or Louis XV, just going into the presence of infinite purity, has not so much power of active resistance against the sin that has now ruined him, as the youth has who is just beginning to run that awful career. The truth and fact is that sin, in and by its own nature and operation, tends to destroy all virtuous force, all holy energy, in any moral being. The excess of will to sin is the same thing as defect of will to holiness. The human will cannot be forced and ruined from without. But if we watch the influence of the will upon itself, the influence of its own wrong decisions and its own yielding to temptations, we shall find that the voluntary faculty may be ruined from within, may surrender itself with such an absorbing vehemence and totality to appetite, passion, and selfishness that it becomes unable to reverse itself and overcome its own inclination and self-determination. And yet, from beginning to end, there is no compulsion in this process. The transgressor fol-lows himself alone. He has his own way and does as he likes. Neither God nor the world nor Satan forces him either to be or to do evil. Sin is the most spontaneous of self-motion. But self-motion has consequences as much as any other motion. And moral bondage is one of them: "Whosoever commits sin is the slave of sin," says Christ (John 8:35).

The culmination of this bondage is seen in the next life. The sinful propensity, being allowed to develop unresisted and unchecked, slowly but surely eats out all virtuous force as rust eats out a steel spring, until in the awful end the will becomes all habit, all lust, and all sin: "Sin, when it is finished, brings forth death" (James 1:15). In the final stage of this process, which commonly is not reached until death, when "the spirit returns unto God who gave it," the guilty free agent reaches that dreadful condition where resistance to evil ceases altogether and surrender to evil becomes demoniacal. The cravings and hankerings of long-indulged and unresisted sin become organic and drag the man; and "he goes after them as an ox goes to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks, till a dart strike through his liver" (Prov. 7:22-23). For though the will to resist sin may die out of a man, the conscience to condemn it never can. This remains eternally. And when the process is complete, when the responsible creature in the abuse of free agency has perfected his moral ruin and his will to good is all gone, there remain these two in his immortal spirit: sin and conscience, "brimstone and fire" (Rev. 21:8).

Still another reason for the endlessness of sin is the fact that rebellious enmity toward law and its source is not diminished, but increased, by the righteous punishment experienced by the impenitent transgressor. Penal suffering is beneficial only when it is humbly accepted, is acknowledged to be deserved, and is penitently submitted to; when the transgressor says, "Father, I have sinned and am no more worthy to be called your son; make me as one of your hired servants" (Luke 15:18-19); when, with the penitent thief, he says, "We are in this condemnation justly; for we receive the due reward of our deeds" (23:41). But when in this life retribution is denied and jeered at and when in the next life it is complained of and resisted and the arm of hate and defiance is raised against the tribunal, penalty hardens and exasperates. This is impenitence. Such is the temper of Satan; and such is the temper of all who finally become his associates. This explains why there is no repentance in hell and no meek submission to the Supreme Judge. This is the reason why Dives, the impenitent sensualist, on discovering that there is no reformation in hades, asks that Lazarus may be sent to warn his five brethren, "lest they also come into this place of torment."[121]

In the third place, endless punishment is rational because sin is an infinite evil: infinite, not because committed by an infinite being, but against one. We reason invariably upon this principle. To torture a beast is a crime; to torture a man is a greater crime. To steal from one's own mother is more heinous than to steal from a fellow citizen. The person who transgresses is the same in each instance; but the different worth and dignity of the objects upon whom his action terminates makes the difference in the gravity of the two offenses. David's adultery was a finite evil in reference to Uriah, but an infinite evil in reference to God. "Against you only have I sinned" was the feeling of the sinner in this case. Had the patriarch Joseph yielded, he would have sinned against Pharaoh. But the greatness of the sin as related to the fellow creature is lost in its enormity as related to the Creator, and his only question is "how can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?'""[122]

The incarnation and vicarious satisfaction for sin by one of the persons of the Godhead demonstrates the infinity of the evil. It is incredible that the eternal Trinity should have submitted to such a stupendous self-sacrifice to remove a merely finite and temporal evil. The doctrine of Christ's vicarious atonement, logically, stands or falls with that of endless punishment. Historically, it has stood or fallen with it. The incarnation of almighty God, in order to make the remission of sin possible, is one of the strongest arguments for the eternity and infinity of penal suffering.

punishment, properly so called—dike (SIKT | = punishment, vengeance), ekdikesis (EK81KT |0"IC, = vengeance, punishment), timdria (nuiopia = punishment)—ceases; but, so long as man continues to be the subject of God's righteous punishment, he is excluded from those blessings (John 3:36)." Twesten (Dogma! ik 2.39) argues in the same manner: "Punishment is not a proper means of reformation; for true reformation can issue only from free self-determination. It is voluntary in its nature. But a self-determination that is brought about by the fear of pain would not be moral and of the nature of virtue. Any reformation effected from a selfish motive is not genuine reformation. Furthermore if true reformation could be produced by punishment, why should not the legal and punitive method of the Old Testament have been the only one? The old economy was lull “I threatenings and penalties and nl tearful examples oi their actual execution. Why did God send his Son and make a new covenant and economy of mercy? Of what use is redemption or the remission of punishment if punishment is in itself healing and remedial? The Scriptures never represent punishment as reformatory. The proper punishment of sin is death (Rom. 6:23). As temporal death, which is the extreme penalty in human legislation, is not intended to reform the criminal and reinstate him in human society, but forever cut him off from it, so eternal death in the biblical representation is not intended to be a means of educating the sinner and fitting him for the kingdom of heaven, but forever banishing and excluding him from it.”

The objection that an offense committed in a finite time cannot be an infinite evil and deserve an infinite suffering implies that crime must be measured by the time that was consumed in its perpetration. But even in human punishment, no reference is had to the length of time occupied in the commission of the offense. Murder is committed in an instant, and theft sometimes requires hours. But the former is the greater crime and receives the greater punishment.

In the fourth place, that endless punishment is reasonable is proved by the preference of the wicked themselves. The unsubmissive, rebellious, defiant, and impenitent spirit prefers hell to heaven. Milton correctly represents Satan as saying: “All good to me becomes bane, and in heaven much worse would be my state” and also as declaring that “it is better to reign in hell that to serve in heaven.” This agrees with the scriptural representation that Judas went “to his own place” (Acts 1:25).

The lost spirits are not forced into a sphere that is unsuited to them. There is no other abode in the universe which they would prefer to that to which they are assigned, because the only other abode is heaven. The meekness, lowliness, sweet submission to God, and love of him that characterize heaven are more hateful to Lucifer and his angels than even the sufferings of hell. The wicked would be no happier in heaven than in hell. The burden and anguish of a guilty conscience, says South, is so insupportable that some “have done violence to their own lives and so fled to hell as a sanctuary and chose damnation as a release.” This is illustrated by facts in human life. The thoroughly vicious and ungodly man prefers the license and freedom to sin which he finds in the haunts of vice to the restraints and purity of Christian society. There is hunger, disease, and wretchedness in one circle; and there is plenty, health, and happiness in the other. But he prefers the former. He would rather be in the gambling house and brothel than in the Christian home:

> Those that, notwithstanding all gracious means, live continually in rebellion against God; those that impenitently die in their sins; those that desire to live here forever that they might enjoy their sweet sins; those that are so hardened and naturalized in their vices that if they were revived and brought again into this world of temptations would certainly return to the pleasures of sin—is it not right that their incorrigible obstinacy should be punished forever? (Bates, On Eternal Judgment 3)

The finally lost are not to be conceived of as having faint desires and aspirations for a holy and heavenly state and as feebly but really inclined to sorrow for their sin, but are kept in hell contrary to their yearning and petition. They are sometimes so described by the opponent of the doctrine or at least so thought of. There is not a single throb of godly sorrow or a single pulsation of holy desire in the lost spirit. The temper toward God in the lost is angry and defiant. “They hate both me and my father,” says the Son of God, “without a cause” (John 15:24-25). Satan and his followers “love darkness rather than light,” hell rather than heaven, “because their deeds are evil” (3:19). Sin ultimately assumes a fiendish form and degree. It is pure wickedness without regret or sorrow and with a delight in evil for evil’s sake. There are some men who reach this state of depravity even before they die: “Some men’s sins are evident beforehand, going before to judgment” (1 Tim. 5:24 Revised Version). They are seen in the callous and cruel voluptuaries portrayed by Tacitus and the heaven-defying atheists described by St. Simon. They are also depicted in Shakespeare’s Iago. The reader knows that Iago is past saving and deserves everlasting damnation. Impulsively, he cries out with Lodovico: “Where is that viper? bring the villain forth.” And then Othello's calmer but deeper feeling becomes his own: "I look down toward his feet—but that's a fable: If that thou best a devil, I cannot kill you." The punishment is remitted to the retribution of God.'"[123]

In the fifth place, that endless punishment is rational is proved by the history of morals. In the records of human civilization and morality, it is found that that age which is most reckless of law and most vicious in practice is the age that has the loosest conception of penalty and is the most inimical to the doctrine of endless retribution. A virtuous and religious generation adopts sound ethics and reverently believes that "the judge of all the earth will do right" (Gen. 18:25); that God will not "call evil good and good evil nor put darkness for light and light for darkness" (Isa. 5:20); and that it is a deadly error to assert with the sated and worn-out sensualist: "All things come alike to all; there is one event to the righteous and the wicked" (Eccles. 9:2).

The French people, at the close of the eighteenth century, were a very demoralized and vicious generation, and there was a very general disbelief and denial of the doctrines of divine existence, immortality of the soul, freedom of the will, and future retribution. And upon a smaller scale, the same fact is continually repeating itself. Any little circle of businessmen who are known to deny future rewards and punishments are shunned by those who desire safe investments. The recent uncommon energy of opposition to endless punishment, which started about ten years ago in this country, synchronized with great defalcations and breaches of trust, uncommon corruption in mercantile and political life, and great distrust between man and man. Luxury deadens the moral sense, and luxurious populations do not have the fear of God before their eyes. Hence luxurious ages and luxurious men recalcitrate at hell and "kick against the goads." No theological tenet is more important that eternal retribution to those modern nations which, like England, Germany, and the United States, are growing rapidly in riches, luxury, and earthly power. Without it, they will infallibly go down in that vortex of sensuality and wickedness that swallowed up Babylon and Rome. The bestial and shameless vice of the dissolute rich that has recently been uncovered in the commercial metropolis of the world is a powerful argument for the necessity and reality of "the lake which burns with fire and brimstone."

A single remark remains to be made respecting the extent and scope of hell. It is only a spot in the universe of God. Compared with heaven, hell is narrow and limited. The kingdom of Satan is insignificant in contrast with the kingdom of Christ. In the immense range of God's dominion, good is the rule, and evil is the exception. Sin is a speck upon the infinite azure of eternity, a spot on the sun. Hell is only a corner of the universe. The Gothic etymon (Hohle, Holle) denotes a covered-up hole. In Scripture, hell is a "pit," a "lake"—not an ocean. It is "bottom-less" but not boundless. The gnostic and dualistic theories which make God and Satan (or the demiurge) nearly equal in power and dominion find no support in revelation. The Bible teaches that there will always be some sin and some death in the universe. Some angels and men will forever be the enemies of God.[124]" But their number, compared with that of unfallen angels and redeemed men, is small. They are not described in the glowing language and metaphors by which the immensity of the holy and blessed is delineated: "The chariots of God are twenty thousand and thousands of angels" (Ps. 68:17); "the Lord came from Sinai and shined forth from Mount Paran, and he came with ten thousands of his saints" (Deut. 22:2); "the Lord has prepared his throne in the heavens, and his kingdom rules overall" (Ps. 103:21); "yours is the kingdom and the power and the glory" (Matt. 6:13). The Lord Christ "must reign till he has put all enemies under his feet" (1 Cor. 15:25). St. John "heard a voice from heaven as the voice of many waters and as the voice of a great thunder" (Rev. 14:1). The New Jerusalem "lies four square, the length is as large as the breadth; the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day; the kings of the earth do bring their honor into it" (21:16, 24-25). The number of the lost spirits is never thus emphasized and enlarged upon. The brief, stern statement is that "the fearful and unbelieving shall have their part in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone" (21:8). No metaphors and amplification are added to make the impression of an immense "multitude which no man can number.'""[125] (See supplement 7.6.13.)

We have thus presented the rational argument for the most severe and unwelcome of all the tenets of the Christian religion. It must have a foothold in the human reason or it could not have maintained itself against all the recoil and opposition which it elicits from the human heart. Founded in ethics, in law, and injudicial reason, as well as unquestionably taught by the author of Christianity, it is no wonder that the doctrine of eternal retribution, in spite of selfish prejudices and appeals to human sentiment, has always been a belief of Christendom. From theology and philosophy it has passed into human literature and is wrought into its finest structures. It makes the solemn substance of the Iliad and the Greek drama. It pours a somber light into the brightness and grace of the Aeneid. It is the theme of the Inferno and is presupposed by both of the other parts of the Divine Comedy. The epic of Milton derives from it its awful grandeur. And the greatest of the Shakespearean tragedies sound and stir the depths of the human soul by their delineation of guilt intrinsic and eternal.

In this discussion, we have purposely brought into view only the righteousness of almighty God as related to the voluntary and responsible action of man. We have set holy justice and disobedient free will face to face and drawn the conclusions. This is all that the defender of the doctrine of retribution is strictly concerned with. If he can demonstrate that the principles of eternal rectitude are not in the least degree infringed upon, but are fully maintained when sin is endlessly punished, he has done all that his problem requires. Whatever is just is bevond all rational attack.'"[126]

But with the Christian gospel in his hands, the defender of divine justice finds it difficult to be entirely reticent and say not a word concerning divine mercy. Over against God's infinite antagonism and righteous severity toward moral evil, there stands God's infinite pity and desire to forgive. This is realized, not by the high-handed and unprincipled method of pardoning without legal satisfaction of any kind, but by the strange and stupendous method of putting the eternal judge in the place of the human criminal, of substituting God's own satisfaction for that due from man. In this vicarious atonement for sin, the triune God relinquishes no claims of law and waives no rights of justice. The sinner's divine substitute, in his hour of voluntary agony and death, drinks the cup of punitive and inexorable justice to the dregs. Any man who, in penitent faith, avails himself of this vicarious method of setting himself right with the eternal nemesis will find that it succeeds; but he who rejects it must through endless cycles grapple with the dread problem of human guilt in his own person and alone.

The Christian gospel—the universal offer of pardon through the self-sacrifice of one of the divine persons—should silence every objection to the doctrine of endless punishment. For as the case now stands, there is no necessity, so far as the action of God is concerned, that a single human being should ever be the subject of future punishment. The necessity of hell is founded in the action of the creature, not of the Creator. Had there been no sin, there would have been no hell; and sin is the product of man's free will. And after the entrance of sin and the provision of redemption from it, had there been universal repentance in this life, there would have been no hell for man in the next life. The only necessitating reason, therefore, for endless retribution that now exists is the sinner's impenitence. Should every human individual, before he dies, sorrow for sin and humbly confess it, hades and gehenna would disappear. (See supplement 7.6.14.)

For the Scriptures everywhere describe God as naturally and spontaneously merciful and declare that all the legal obstacles to the exercise of this great attribute have been removed by the death of the Son of God "for the sins of the whole world" (1 John 2:2). In the very center of the holy revelations of Sinai, Jehovah proclaimed it to be his inherent and intrinsic disposition to be "merciful and gracious, long-suffering, forgiving iniquity and transgression" (Exod. 34:6-7). Nehemiah, after the exile, repeats the doctrine of the Pentateuch: "You are a God ready to pardon, gracious and merciful, and of great kindness" (Neh. 9:17). The psalmist declares that "the Lord is ready to forgive and plenteous in mercy unto all that call upon him" (Ps. 86:5); "the Lord takes pleasure in them that fear him, in those that hope in his mercy" (147:11). From the twilight of the land of Uz, Elihu, feeling after the promised Redeemer if haply he might find him (Job 33:23), declares that "God looks upon men, and if any say, I have sinned and perverted that which was right, and it profited me not; he will deliver his soul from going down to the pit, and his life shall see the light" (33:27-28). The Bible throughout teaches that the Supreme Being is sensitive to penitence and is moved with compassion and paternal yearning whenever he perceives any sincere spiritual grief. He notices and welcomes the slightest indication of repentance: "The eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy" (Ps. 33:18); "whoso confesses and forsakes his sins shall have mercy" (Prov. 28:13). The heavenly Father sees the prodigal when he is "yet a great way off." He never "breaks the bruised reed" nor "quenches the smoking flax." If there be in any human creature the broken and contrite heart, divine pity speaks the word of forgiveness and absolution. The humble confession of unworthiness operates almost magically upon the eternal. Incarnate mercy said to the heathen "woman of Canaan" who asked for only the dogs' crumbs, "0 woman, great is your faith; be it unto you even as you will" (Matt. 15:28). The omnipotent is overcome whenever he sees lowly penitential sorrow. As "the foolishness of God is wiser than man," so the self-despairing helplessness of man is stronger than God. When Jacob says to the infinite one, “I am not worthy of the least of all your mercies,” yet wrestles with him “until the breaking of the day,” he becomes Israel and “as a prince has power with God” (Gen. 32:10, 24, 28). When Jehovah hears Ephraim “bemoaning himself” and saying, “Turn me, and I shall be turned,” he answers, “Ephraim is mv dear son. I will surely have mercy upon him” (Jer. 31:18, 20).’“

Now the only obstruction, and it is a fatal one, to the exercise of this natural and spontaneous mercy of God is the sinner’s hardness of heart. The existing necessity for hell punishment is not chargeable upon God. It is the proud and obstinate man who makes hell. It is his impenitence that feeds its perpetual fires. For so long as the transgressor does not grieve for sin and does not even acknowledge it, it cannot be pardoned. Almightiness itself cannot forgive impenitence, any more than it can make a square circle. Impenitence after sinning is a more determined and worse form of sin than sinning is in and of itself. For it is a tacit defense and justification of sin. If after transgression the person acknowl-edges that he has transgressed and asks forgiveness for so doing, he evinces that he does not excuse his act or defend it. On the contrary, he renounces his act, condemns it, and mourns over it. But if after transgression the person makes no acknowledgment and asks no forgiveness, he is repeating and intensifying his sin. He justifies himself in his act of rebellion against authority and thus aggravates the original fault. It is for this reason that impenitence for sin is more dreadful than sin itself. A penitent sinner can be forgiven; but an impenitent sinner cannot be. The former God pities and extends the offer of mercy to him. To the latter God holds out no hope, because he cannot.[127]

This is what gives to human existence here upon earth its dark outlook. All the gloom, discontent, and anxiety of human life grow out of this. This is what makes “all the uses of this world so weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable.” Men are impenitent. They give no heed to the voice of conscience, know little of remorse, nothing of genuine sorrow. They are stolid and lethargic in sin or else angrily deny the fact. They bend no knee in self-abasement before the all holy; they do not cry, “O Lamb of God that takes away the sins of the world, grant me your peace.” Human life is wretched and despairing, not because there is no mercy in the sweet heavens, but because there is no relenting, no softening, in the human heart. One is weary of hearing the incessant wail of the agnostic and the cynic over the “mystery” of this existence, the monotonous moan of the pessimist that life is not worth living. A sincere confession of what the consciousness of every man will tell him is the absolute truth respecting his character and conduct, when tried by a spiritual and perfect standard, would drive away this false view of earthly existence as the miasmic fog is blown by the winds. But instead of confessing sin —Purgatory 31.36 and imploring its forgiveness, men stand complaining of its punishment or employing their ingenuity in endeavoring to prove that there is none; and then wonder that the heavens are black and thunderous over their heads. Not by this method will the sky be made clear and sunny. Whoever will cast himself upon divine compassion will find life to be worth living; but he who quarrels with divine justice will discover that he had better not have been born. (See supplement 7.6.15.)

What the human race needs is to go to the divine confessional. The utterance of the prodigal should be that of every man: “Father, I have sinned.” The utterance of the psalmist should be that of every man: “O you that hear prayer, unto you shall all flesh come. Iniquities prevail against me: as for our transgressions, you shall purge them away.” “God commands all men everywhere to repent” (Acts 17:30). But so long as man glosses over or conceals the cardinal fact in his history, he must live under a cloud and look with anxiety and fear into the deep darkness beyond. It is useless to contend with the stubborn fact of moral evil by the ostrich method of ignoring and denying. The sin is here, in self-consciousness, terrible and real, the lancinating sting of pain and the deadly sting of death, in this generation and in all generations. Kant, the ethical and the metaphysical, is right when he affirms that the noumenon of sin is the dark ground under the phenomenon of life. Confession, therefore, is the only way to light and mental peace. The suppression of any fundamental form of human consciousness necessarily results in unrest. Man’s words about himself must agree with his true character and condition; otherwise he becomes insincere, miserable, and false. The denial of moral evil is the secret of the murmuring and melancholy with which so much of modern letters is filled. Rousseau made a confession, but not truthful, not humble; and hence it brought him no repose. Augustine made a confession, genuine, simple, thoroughly accordant with the facts of human nature; and the outpouring of his confidences into the ear of eternal purity and mercy brought the peace that passes all understanding and the immortal life that knows no melancholy and no dissatisfaction. These historic persons are types of the two classes into which all men fall: the penitent and the impenitent.

The king in Shakespeare's Hamlet, writhing with selfish remorse but destitute of unselfish sorrow, in his soliloquy exclaims:

> Try what repentance can: what can it not?
> Yet what can it, when one cannot repent?
> O wretched state! O bosom black as death!
> O limed soul; that struggling to be free
> Art more engaged!

Bunyan's man of Despair, in the iron cage, when assured by Christian that "the Son of the Blessed is very pitiful," replies: "I have so hardened my heart that I cannot repent."

In these powerful delineations, these profound psychologists of sin bring to view a peril that environs free will. Pardon may be proffered by God, but penitence may become impossible through the action of man. "There are some sins," says Augustine, "that follow of necessity, from foregoing sins that occurred without necessity." The adoption of atheism is a sin without necessity. It is the voluntary action of man. But the hardness of heart that results from it results of necessity. No man is forced to be an infidel; but if he is one, he must be an impenitent man.

A luxurious and skeptical age should remember this. That man cannot repent who drowns himself in pleasure and never seriously reflects upon his accountability to his maker. That man cannot repent who expends the energy of his mind in the endeavor to prove that all human action is irresponsible and the threatenings of revelation an idle tale. They who have "eyes full of adultery cannot cease from sin" (2 Pet. 2:14). Absorption in worldliness and adoption of infidel opinions make repentance an impossibility. Sensuality and atheism harden the human heart and render it impervious to the Christian religion.

SUPPLEMENTS

7.6.1 (see p. 885). Augustine thus states his view of endless punishment: "The church justly abominates the opinion of Origen that even they whom the Lord says are to be punished with everlasting punishment, and also the devil himself and his angels, after a time, however protracted, will be purged and released from their penalties and shall then cleave to the saints who reign with God in blessedness" (Proceedings of Pelagius 10). "Eternal punishment seems hard and unjust to human perceptions, because in the weakness of our mortal condition there is wanting that highest wisdom by which it can be perceived how great a wickedness was committed in that first transgression. The more enjoyment man found in God. the greater was his wickedness in abandoning God; and he who destroyed in himself a good that might have been eternal become deserving of eternal evil Hence the whole mass of the human race is condemned; for he who at first gave entrance to sin has been punished with all his posterity who were in him as in a roof, so that no one is exempt from this just and deserved punishment unless delivered by mercy and undeserved grace. And the human race is so apportioned that in some is displayed the efficacy of merciful grace, in the rest the efficacy of just retribution. For both could not be displayed in all; for if all had remained under the punishment of just condemnation there would have been seen in no one the mercy of redeeming grace; and on the other hand, if all had been transferred from darkness to light, the strict justice of retribution would have been manifested in none. But many more are left under punishment than are delivered from it in order that it may thus be shown what was due to all. And had it been inflicted on all. no one could justly have found fault with the justice of him who takes vengeance: whereas, in the deliverance of so many from that just award, there is cause to render the most hearty thanks to the gratuitous bounty of him who delivers" (City of God 21.12) An analysis of the doctrine contained in these extracts respecting eternal retribution, gives the following particulars: (1) Original sin is the self-determination of the human species in Adam and is punishable for the same reason that any wrong self-determination is Sinful inclination originated in this manner is as voluntary and unforced agency as any volition prompted by it. The whole human race, consequently, responsibly ruined themselves in Adam's fall and made themselves justly liable to eternal death. Actual transgression is not the primary, but the secondary reason for future punishment It adds to original sin and increases the degree of the penalty, but is not the first ground for it. The principal Scripture for this is Rom 5:12-19. (2) Salvation from eternal death is undeserved, because guilt has no desert but that of penalty; it cannot therefore be claimed as due by any man. and it is bestowed without obligation on the part of God and upon whomsoever he chooses. (3) When bestowed, it manifests his attribute of mercy and that in its highest form of self-sacrifice in the vicarious sufferings and death of his Son; and when not bestowed, it manifests his justice. It will be seen from this analysis that the selfproduced and responsible fall of the human race in Adam is the key to Augustine's doctrine of endless retribution If it be denied or disproved, universalism is the logical consequence. For if original sin and sinful inclination are necessitated and guiltless, so are the actual transgressions that issue from it. The stream has the same qualities with the fountain. (4) The number of the saved is less than that of the lost. Modern Calvinists have departed from Augustine in affirming the converse, by teaching the regeneration of all who die in infancy.

7.6.2 (see p. 887). The agnostic position which Dorner takes respecting the doctrine of endless punishment, in saying that it "remains veiled in mystery." though formally negative and noncommittal is really as positive as direct denial and attack. Agnosticism, generally, is a crafty way of casting doubt upon truth and of rejecting it. If a person says that there may or may not be a God. but that no one knows certainly, this has the same practical effect as avowed atheism. It tends to destroy the belief in a deity and the fear of him. So also, if a person says that there may or may not be salvation after death, this has the same general influence as positive universalism It contributes to weaken the conviction that men will be endlessly punished for the deeds done in the body. If I say to a person: "The Bible is reticent upon the subject of the future life. It does not positively teach that probation ends for all mankind at death. It may or it may not; no one knows certainly." I relieve him in a great measure from the fear of hell. For he will regard the assertion that there possibly may be a future probation as equivalent to the assertion of the probability of such a probation. If a thing is possible, it may be actual; and when the thing possible is strongly desired and its contrary is greatly dreaded, the possibility will be construed into actuality. It will be of little use for the agnostic in eschatology to put in a caveat and attempt to warn the sinner. If he reminds him that we do not certainly know that there is salvation after death, the reply will be, that neither do we certainly know that there will not be. A theorist of this class writes as follows: “What resources may be available in other worlds, only the great arbiter can know. Hence modern theology emphasizes with solemn appeal the need of instant surrender of the heart to God Delay is dangerous, and it may be fatal.” “And it may not be fatal,” is the agnostic sinner’s reply, which takes all the force out of this so-called solemn appeal and warning.

This agnostic method of sapping the doctrine of endless retribution is not only wanting in frank and open dealing in an argument, but is chargeable with falsifying divine revelation. To say that the Bible “veils the subject of endless punishment in mystery” and that it is “reticent upon the subject of the future life,” in the face of such an eschatology as the Son of God presents in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew, to say nothing of the great mass of similar teaching in other parts of the divine word, is an assumption and assurance that is contradicted by the well-nigh unanimous verdict ot all readers and students of Scripture in all time.

7.6.3 (see p. 889). In Christ’s account of the day of judgment he describes himself as dividing mankind into two classes, saying to one, “Come, you blessed,” and to the other, “Depart, you cursed.” This language naturally implies that these two classes are to exist always and forever. It makes the impression of finality and has been so understood by the immense majority of readers. But if the penalty of sin is only remedial and temporary, there is ultimately only one class. All men are finally blessed of God Upon this supposition the transactions of the judgment day are a mere unmeaning show. The day of doom, instead of being a solemn administration of divine justice having a final and irrevocable character, as our Lord represents, is only a spectacle like a scene in a play. A temporary curse is pronounced from the throne of judgment upon some men that is afterward followed by an eternal blessing upon them. This view destroys the moral sincerity and veracity of the Son of God. It is inconceivable that he who is and styles himself the truth should engage in such a false and deluding transaction before the assembled universe and that to any of mankind who he foreknows will finally be his friends and enter eternal joy, he will speak the words: “You serpents, you generation of vipers, how can you escape the damnation of hell.” It is incredible that the righteous judge of the universe will at one time say to some of mankind: “Depart from me. you cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels,” and at a subsequent time say to this very same class, “Come, you blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.”

7.6.4 (see p. 892). Respecting the use of figures in describing the misery of hell, Paley (sermon 31) states the case with great plainness and power: “I admit that it is very difficult to handle the dreadful subject of the punishment of hell properly; and one cause among others of the difficulty is that it is not for one poor sinner to denounce such appalling terrors, such tremendous consequences against another. Damnation is a word which lies not in the mouth of man. who is a worm, toward any of his fellow creatures whatsoever; yet it is absolutely necessary that the threatenings of almighty God be known and published. Therefore, we begin by observing that the accounts which the Scriptures contain of the punishment of hell are. for the most part, delivered in figurative or metaphorical terms; that is to say, in terms which represent things of which we have no notion by a comparison with things with which we have a notion. Therefore take notice what those figures and metaphors are. They are of the most dreadful kind which words can express; and be they understood how they may. ever so figuratively, it is plain that they convey and were intended to convey ideas of horrible torment. They are such as these: ‘Being cast into hell, where the worm dies not and where the fire is not quenched.' It is 'burning the chaff with unquenchable fire.' It is 'going into fire everlasting, which is prepared for the devil and his angels.' It is being cast with all the members into hell, where the worm dies not and the fire is not quenched.' These are heart-appalling expressions and were undoubtedly intended by the person who used them, who was no other than our Lord Jesus Christ himself, to describe terrible endurings, positive, actual pains of the most horrible kinds. I have said that the punishment of hell is thus represented to us in figurative speech. I now say that from the nature of things it could not have been represented to us in any other. It is of the very nature of pain that it cannot be known but by being felt It is impossible to give to anyone an exact conception of it without his actually tasting it. Experience alone teaches its acute-ness and intensity. For which reason, when it was necessary that the punishment of hell should be set forth in Scripture for our warning and set forth to terrify us from our sins, it could only be done as it has been done by comparing it with sufferings of which we can form conception and making use of terms drawn from these sufferings. When words less figurative and more direct but at the same time more general are adopted, they are not less strong otherwise than as they are more general: Indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that does evil.' These are St. Paul's words. It is a short sentence, but enough to make the stoutest heart tremble; for though it unfold no particulars, it clearly designates positive torment."

7.6.5 (see p. 893). Olshausen (on Matt. 12:32) thus interprets: "To explain this passage as meaning that although the sin against the Holy Spirit shall not be forgiven in this eon nor the next eon, it shall be afterward, plainly contradicts the intention of the speaker. For the proposition it shall not be forgiven is the direct contrary of the proposition it shall be forgiven, and the adjunct neither in this eon, neither in the eon to come is certainly intended to strengthen, not to weaken, the affirmation of nonforgiveness. Matthew does not conceive of the aion mellon[128] as only a fractional part of future duration which is to be followed by other fractions indefinitely, but as constituting, in connection with aion houtos,[129] the whole of duration." Consequently, if a sin is not forgiven in either eon, it is never forgiven. This same reasoning applies to that other interpretation of this passage which makes it teach that all sins excepting that against the Holy Spirit shall be forgiven in the world to come, if they have not been forgiven in this world. To hold out the hope of forgiveness in the next world is to destroy the force and effect of the threat to punish sin which is made in this world; and it cannot be supposed that God would thus weaken and undo all his punitive legislation and menace here in time.

7.6.6 (see p. 894). Anselm (Proslogion 21) describes the rhetorical plural as the equivalent of the literal singular: "For as an age of time contains all things pertaining to time, so your eternity contains even ages of time themselves. Your eternity is called an age (aion) '[130] on account of its indivisible immensity."

7.6.7 (see p. 901). Another explanation of those texts which seem to teach that the dead are unconscious is given by Edwards (God's End in Creation 2.4): "There are several Scriptures which lead us to suppose that the great thing God seeks of the moral world and the end to be aimed at by moral agents is the manifestation or making known of the divine perfections. This seems implied in that argument God s people sometimes made use of, in deprecating a state of death and destruction; that in such a state they cannot proclaim the glorious excellency of God: Shall your loving-tenderness be declared in the grave, or your faithfulness in destruction? Shall your wonders be known in the dark, and your righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?' (Ps. 88:18-19; 30:9). The argument seems to be this: Why should we perish? And how shall your end, for which you have made us, be obtained in a state of destruction in which your glory cannot be declared? The grave cannot praise you, death cannot celebrate you. The living, the living, he shall praise you, as I do this day; the father to the children shall make known your truth' (Isa. 38:18-19)."

Cook (Bible Commentary), in his introduction to the Psalms §17 and in his interpretation of them, gives the following view of the "notices of the future state" contained in this part of Scripture: "Respecting the feelings and hopes of the psalmist touching a future state, it is clear, on the one hand, that no formal revelation of a future state of retribution had as yet been vouchsafed to the Israelites. It is indeed certain, our Lord's authority makes it certain, that this truth was implicitly contained in God's manifestation of himself as the God of Abraham and the fathers; and also that the patriarchs ot old looked upon lite here but as a pilgrimage (Heb. 11:13). David himself (Ps. 39:12) prays, Hear my prayer, O Lord, and hold not your peace at my tears: for I am a stranger with you and a sojourner, as all my fathers were.' The stranger is one who is merely a guest for a season, the sojourner one who lives as a client under the protection of a prince or noble: neither has any right or settled tooting in the land An image which is at once humbling and suggestive of a sure hope. The earth is not the home of man (cf. Lev. 25:23; 1 Chron 29:15: Ps. 119:19). Still we cannot reasonably doubt that to the generality of the people, the grave or the unknown sheol, of which the grave is the entrance, bounded the region of hope and fear [as it does to the generality of mankind today). It has been shown in the introduction and notes to Job that the writer of that book at least felt that attempts to vindicate the righteousness of God would be futile, were the problem of the future state left unsolved; and that in the agony of the death struggle, when all other hope was finally abandoned, the conviction sprang up that God would manifest himself in some unknown way as the Redeemer But the hope was after all vague and suggestive; little more than a preparation for a future disclosure of the truth.

"It would be easy to settle the question were we to decide it by reference to the numerous passages in which the state of the departed is represented as one of darkness, where there is no •remembrance of God,' where he is not praised,' neither loved nor dreaded. On looking at these passages carefully, we may indeed find reason to conclude that they speak ot the condition of those who are the objects of divine punishment and that they express the fears of one who regards himself as having incurred divine displeasure. Such, for example, is Ps. 6:5. David here speaks of those who die not saved; see verse 4. For such there is no opportunity to celebrate the mercy of God or to give him thanks. David knew that life is the season for serving God, and this knowledge sufficed for practical purposes until the life and immortality dimly anticipated by the patriarchs were brought to light by Christ Again, 16:8-11 (quoted by St Peter in Acts 2:31 and by St. Paul in 13:35 in proof of the resunection) contains one of the very clearest and strongest declarations of belief in a blessed futurity which can be adduced from the Old Testament. As such it is recognized by ancient and modern interpreters, none speaking out more clearly than Ewald, who says: It goes beyond other words of David, nor is anything corresponding to it found in later Hebrew writers.' There is but one adequate explanation of such a fact, namely, that the Spirit of Christ which was in David as a prophet (1 Pet 1:11; Acts 2:30) moved and controlled his utterances, so that while they expressed fully his own yearnings, they 'signified beforehand the glory that should follow' in the resurrection of Christ.

"But even in those psalms which contain such declarations as make the impression of a final triumph of death and the cessation of consciousness, we are struck by the expression of feelings which are wholly incompatible with the certainty of annihilation: in none are there more lively, joyous expressions of trust and hope; see especially the last half of Ps. 146 and 13:3 contrasted with 13:5. Nor are these expressions to be explained as referring to Ihe anticipation of a temporary deliverance from death or to the postponement of a general and inevitable doom. The psalmists speak of thanks to be offered to the Lord God forever (30:12; 61:8; 145:1, 21), of an eternal portion in heaven (16:11; 17:15), and of the end of the upright as peace (37:37). In the very depth of humiliation and hopelessness, so far as this life is concerned. God is called upon as Helper, Deliverer, and Redeemer; as the Lord my salvation' (38:22; 88:1). The general judgment is regarded as a day when the wicked shall not stand in the congregation of the righteous (1:5), as the morning of the eternal day when the upright shall have dominion over the wicked (49:14), when the righteous shall see the light, while the man who is 'in honor and understands not is like the beasts that perish' (49:20) Taking such statements in their combination and mutual bearings as explaining, developing, and illustrating each other, it is strange that any should fail to recognize throughout the Psalms a state of feelings and convictions which speak of a deep, though it may be half-conscious faith in the perpetuity of the soul, the light, the glory (16:9), the spiritual principle of God's rational creatures. The soul will see 'light in God's light' (36:9); God will be its portion forever' (73:26) Touching the great bulk of the Davidic psalms, indeed of the whole Psalter, there are throughout indications, more or less distinct, sometimes faint, sometimes singularly bright and strong, of an undercurrent of feeling in harmony with those undying and irrepressible aspirations which God has implanted in souls bearing his impress and capable of union with him; a union which excludes the possibility of annihilation."

Upon this general subject, Baxter (Dying Thoughts, introduc-tion) remarks as follows: "I have often marveled to find David in the Psalms, and other saints before Christ's coming, to have expressed so great a sense of the things of this present life and to have said so little of another; to have made so great a matter of prosperity, dominions, and victories on the one hand and of enemies, success, and persecution on the other. But I consider that it was not for mere personal, carnal interest, but for the church of God and for his honor, word, and worship. And they knew that if things go well with us on earth, they will be sure to go well in heaven. If the militant church prosper in holiness, there is no doubt but it will triumph in glory. God will be sure to do his part in receiving souls if they be here prepared for his receipt. And Satan does much of his damning work by men; so that if we escape their temptations we escape much of our danger. If idolaters prospered. Israel was tempted to idolatry. The Greek church is almost swallowed up by Turkish prosperity and dominion. Most follow the powerful and prosperous side. And therefore for God's cause and for heavenly, everlasting interest, our own state, but much more the church's, must be greatly regarded here on earth. Indeed, if earth be desired only for earth and prosperity loved but for the present welfare of the flesh, it is the certain mark of damning carnality and an earthly mind. But to desire peace and prosperity and power to be in the hands of wise and faithful men. for the sake of souls and the increase of the church and the honor of God, that his name may be hallowed, his kingdom come, his will be done on earth as it is in heaven, this is to be the chief of our prayers to God."

7.6.8 (see p. 908). Augustine's view of pagan virtue is thus expressed: "You allude in your letter to the fact that Xenocrates converted Polemo from a dissipated to a sober life, though the latter was not only habitually intemperate, but was actually intoxicated at the time. Now although this was. as you truthfully apprehend, not a case of conversion to God, but of emancipation from a particular form of self-indulgence, I would not ascribe even this amount of improvement wrought in him to the power of man, but to the power of God. For even in the body all excellent things, such as beauty, vigor, health, and the like, are the work of God. to whom nature owes its creation and preservation; how much more certain, then, must it be that none but God can impart excellent quality to the soul. If. therefore. Polemo. when he exchanged a life of dissipation for a life of sobriety, had so understood whence the gift came, that renouncing the superstitions of the heathen he had rendered worship to the divine giver, he would then have become not only temperate, but truly wise and savingly religious; which would have secured to him not merely the practice of virtue in this life, but also immortal blessedness in the life to come" (Letter 144.2). "If we say that all without exception who were found in hell were delivered therefrom by Christ when he descended thither, who would not rejoice if this could be proved? Especially would men rejoice for the sake of some who are known to us by their literary labors—poets, philosophers, and orators—who have held up to contempt the false gods of the nations and have even occa sionally confessed the one true God, although along with the rest they observed superstitious rites, and also for the sake of many more of whom we have no literary remains, but respecting whom we have learned from the writings of these others that their lives were to a certain extent praiseworthy, so that with the exception of idolatry and serving the creature rather than the Creator, they may be held up as models of frugality, self-sacrifice, chastity, sobriety, braving death in their country's defense, and keeping faith not only with their fellow citizens but also their enemies. All these things, indeed, when they are not performed in true humility to the glory of God, but in pride and for the sake of human praise and glory, become morally worthless and unprofitable; nevertheless, as indications of a certain temper of mind, they please us so much that we would desire that those in whom they exist should either by special favor or along with all mankind without exception be freed from the pains of hell, were it not that the verdict of human sensibility is different from that of the perfect holiness and justice of God" (Letter 164.4 to Evodius).

7.6.9 (see p. 911). Miiller (S/n2.281) thus describes the sinful selfishness of childhood: "We meet with this natural egoism in child-hood generally, not indeed always in the form of violent passion and self-will, but sometimes under the garb of prevailing passivity and natural softness of disposition and tractableness of character; even in these cases none but a very superficial observer can fail to trace the selfish principle, though modified in its mani festations by natural temperament. An unbiased observation of childhood, when once the moral consciousness is awakened, will satisfy anyone that in the most tenderhearted and affectionate child there is a tendency to indulge hostile feelings against anything that hinders it in the attainment of its own wishes and desires and that it is wont thoughtlessly to give way to this impulse provided it be not held in check by other influences, by blood relationship, or judicious tutelage. Even in the best-dispositioned children we may discover, in greater or less degree, an element of hatred usually aroused by wounded self-love and an element of falsehood which in disputes with its playmates or in answer to its parents or teachers willfully sacrifices truth for the sake of self. Experience indeed shows that this self-seeking on the child's part chiefly appears in the gratification of particular affections and in sensuous pleasures, so that these seem to be the excitants tempting it to wrongdoing and the outward material of its sins: but can this circumstance justify our reducing the principle of selfishness to the excessive strength of particular affections? By no means; on the contrary, the predominance of particular affections and sensuous desires to which experience thus witnesses arises from a radical disturbance in that other sphere of life which is actuated by the perverted will. Experience, moreover, unequivocally testifies that as human development advances selfishness shows itself equally in the spiritual nature and sometimes with such strength as to ignore and suppress the calls of the sensuous nature and ofparticular affections. The theory of sensuousness or of particular affections is quite insufficient to explain these phenomena."

7.6.10 (see p. 911). Owen (Arminianism, chap. 7) teaches the salvation of some infants outside of the covenant and the church: "In this inquiry respecting the desert of original sin, the question is not 'what shall be the certain lot of those that depart this life under the guilt of this sin only?' but what does this hereditary and native corruption deserve in all those in whom it is?' For as St. Paul says. We judge not them that are without.' especially infants (1 Cor. 5:13) But for the demerit of this corruption before the justice of God. our Savior expressly affirms that unless a man be born again he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven'; and let them that can. distinguish between a not going to heaven and a going to hell: a third receptacle for souls in Scripture we find not. St. Paul also tells us that 'by nature we are children of wrath'; even originally and actually we are guilty of and obnoxious unto that wrath which is accomp; nied with fiery indignation that shall consume the adversarie Again, we are assured that no unclean thing shall enter into heave (Rev. 21); with which hell-deserving uncleanness children are pc luted, and, therefore, unless it be purged by the blood of Chris they have no interest in everlasting happiness. By this means s is come upon all to condemnation, and yet we do not peremptori censure to hell all infants departing this world without the laver i regeneration [i.e., baptism], the ordinary means of waiving the pui ishment due to this pollution. This is the question de facto whic we before rejected: yea, and two ways there are whereby Gc saves such infants, snatching them like brands from the fire: Firs by interesting them into the covenant, if their immediate or remol parents have been believers; he is a God of them and of their seei extending his mercy unto a thousand generations of them that fe< him. Second, by his grace of election which is most free and m tied to any conditions; by which I make no doubt that God take many infants unto himself in Christ, whose parents never knew i had been despisers of the gospel And this is the doctrine of oi [English] church, agreeable to the Scripture affirming the desert i original sin to be God's wrath and damnation."

Matthew Henry (on 2 Sam. 12:15-25) remarks respectin infant salvation: "Nathan had told David that the child should ce tainly die, yet while it is within the reach of prayer he earnest intercedes with God for it. chiefly, we may suppose, that its so might be safe and happy in another world and that his own si might not come against the child and that it might not fare th worse for that in the future state. The child died when it was seve days old and therefore not circumcised, which David might pe haps interpret as a further token of God's displeasure, that it die before it was brought under the seal of the covenant. Yet he doe not therefore doubt of its being happy, for the benefits of th covenant do not depend upon the seals. Godly parents have grei reason to hope concerning their children that die in infancy, thi it is well with their souls in the other world; for the promise is I us and our seed.' which shall be performed to those who do ni put a bar in their own door, as infants do not."

7.6.11 (see p. 914). Graves (Pentateuch 2.3) remarks upon "th striking difference that exists between the Mosaic penal code an that of most modern states. No injury affecting property was pur ished by death. Restitution was required, or an additional fin imposed suited to the nature of the offense; or at the utmost, if th offender was too poor to make restitution or pay the regulated fini he might be sold as a slave, still, however, within the pale of th Jewish nation. But this slavery could not exceed seven years, a the Sabbatical Year would terminate it. It must be acknowledge that the Jewish law adjusted its punishments more suitably to th real degree of moral depravity of the different species of crim than modern codes which permit some of the most atrociou instances of moral turpitude to pass with trivial punishments t none at all, while they punish even slight invasions of property wil ignominious death. If in England the crimes of adultery, obstinaf disobedience to parents, and perjury when intended to destrc the innocent man's life cannot now be capitally punished, becaus penal laws so extremely rigorous would not be executed and then fore would be ineffectual, while we daily see our scaffolds loade with criminals prosecuted and condemned for violations of prof erty, will the conclusion be favorable to modern manners? Can w avoid suspecting that our hearts are more anxious for money tha for virtue; and that such lenity proves we slight the crimes to whic we are thus indulgent, notwithstanding the religion we profes: rather than that we act from pure mercy to the criminal?" In th levitical economy, no sacrifice was appointed for the crime of mu der: "You shall take no satisfaction (kopef) '131 for the life of a mu derer which is guilty of death; but he shall surely be put to death" (Num. 35:31).

7.6.12 (see p. 922). The spontaneous impulse to invoke the holy and just retribution ot God upon diabolical wickedness, when it is persisted in and not repented of, finds expression in the imprecatory psalms, only purified by impersonal judicial feeling from the personal and selfish emotion which exasperates the natural man. Those who would exclude the imprecatory psalms from both the liturgical and the didactic services of the church utterly mis-conceive their nature. They suppose them to be the expression of the revengeful anger ot the individual on account of some injury done to himself by sin. instead of being the judicial displeasure of the conscience at sin as the violation of divine law and the dis-honor of God: "Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate you? I hate them with perfect hatred; I count them my enemies" (Ps. 139:21-22). In this instance, David hates the hater of God, not the hater of himself. The person spoken of is not David's enemy, but God's enemy; by reason of his own love and reverence for God he so identifies himself with God that he "counts"

God's enemy as his own enemy, and his invocation of divine retribution thereby obtains the dispassionateness and righteousness of God's own action (119:52-53). The following extract from Tholuck (On (fie Psalms, introduction 4.3) places the subject in a clear and true light: "The attitude of the psalmists toward their enemies has always formed an objection to their morality. Instead of the mild voice of placability and compassion, we hear, it is said, the tumult of revenge and prayers for the condemnation of their foes. Augustine felt this difficulty and endeavored to remove it by saying that the reference is not to the wishes of the psalmists, but only to predictions of God's retributions suspended over confirmed sinners: Indeed, the form of wishing appears in these words, but the foreknowledge of declaring is understood' '132 (sermon 22). The opinion is considerably current that love to enemies is enjoined as a duty only in the New Testament. But the erro-neousness of this is evident from Exod. 23:4-5; Lev. 19:18; Job 31:29; Prov. 24:17-18,29; 25:21-22. In order to form a right estimate of the imprecatory psalms, we must consider the end con-templated by punishment One view is that with God, and also with the truly righteous man, punishment springs from benevolence and love and contemplates the improvement of man But what is to be done if you have to do with an impenitent and incorrigible sinner? By his impenitence he is persisting in sin, justifying his sin, and reaffirming it. No one. certainly, would maintain that this concentration of sin into hardness and insensibility is a reason why it should not suffer the intrinsic desert of sin. That there is no prospect and probability of improvement in this case is no reason why the criminal should be dismissed without any infliction. Improvement as the end does not exhaust the purpose ot penalty. Philosophy agrees with Christianity that the first and principal purpose of punishment is retribution; that is, that the happiness of the individual criminal be wholly sacrificed to the higher demands of justice as expressed in the law of God and the state. Hence to demand, not from selfish and personal motives but from a sense of the holiness of God and his law, that the hardened sinner be punished in order to vindicate the authority of both is as little to be regarded as evidencing moral imperfection as to desire that those who are susceptible of improvement should be reformed by means of painful correctives. If. therefore, it can be shown that the imprecations and prayers for divine retribution do not flow from the vindictive disposition, the personal irritability, and passion of the psalmist, but from the conscientious and unselfish motives relating to God and law just now alluded to, the objection to the imprecatory psalms is removed. These suppli-

cations would then correspond to the desire of a good monarch or a just judge to discover the guilty that justice might be administered. David the king gives expression to this desire in many instances: I will walk within my house with a perfect heart I will set no wicked thing before my eyes; I hate the work of them that turn aside; it shall not cleave to me. A forward heart shall depart from me; I will not know a wicked person. Whoso privily slanders his neighbor, him will I cut off; him that has a high look and a proud heart will not I suffer. He that works deceit shall not dwell within my house; he that tells lies shall not tarry in my sight. I will early destroy all the wicked of the land; that I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the Lord' (Ps. 101). It is not injury and dishonor to himself personally to which he refers in this language, but dishonor to God. He disavows personal and selfish revenge: If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me (yea. I have delivered him that without cause is my enemy), let the enemy pursue my soul and take it; yea, let him tread down my life upon the earth' (7:5-6). Having sinned, he invokes punitive infliction upon himself: 'Let the righteous [God] smite me, it shall be a kindness; and let him reprove me. it shall be an excellent oil' (141:5).

"The psalmists frequently mention reasons like the following for their prayers for the punishment of sinners: that the holiness of God and his righteous government of the world should be acknowledged; that the faith of the pious should be strengthened; that the haughtiness of the ungodly should be brought within bounds; that they should know that God is the righteous judge of the world; and that the fulfillment of his promises to maintain right and justice should not fail. See Ps. 5:11-12; 9:20-21; 12:9; 22:23-32; 28:4-5; 35:24; 40:17; 59:14; 109:27; 142:8. The invocation of divine judgments upon the heathen, such as 79:6: Pour out your wrath upon the heathen that have not known you; and upon the kingdoms that have not called upon your name.' is the expression of a desire that the true religion may prevail in the earth. The victory of the heathen over Israel threatened the destruction of it. Moreover, it should be observed that aversion toward a nation as a whole, on account of its enmity to Jehovah, does not exclude sympathy and kindness toward the individuals of it viewed merely as human beings. An instance of this kind occurs in 2 Kings 6:22. From this point of view, even Lessing once advocated the so-called vindictive psalms.

"In the New Testament the same expression of desire for righ-teous retribution upon the incorrigibly wicked appears. In terms not less severe than those in the Psalms, Christ announces judgment to the cursed' (Matt. 25:41) and sentences the hypocritical and selfish Pharisees to 'the damnation of hell' (23:33). Peter in the name of God smote Ananias and Sapphira with instantaneous death for their blasphemy of the Holy Spirit; and his words to both of them contain not the slightest trace of personal and selfish anger. He said to Simon the sorcerer, in holy indignation. Your money perish with you,' yet added, Repent therefore of this your wickedness.' Did not Paul strike Elymas the sorcerer with blindness and call him a child of the devil ? Did he not solemnly deliver unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh' the wicked Corinthian who had married his stepmother and say, Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil; the Lord reward him according to his works'? Such is the general nature of the imprecations in the Psalms, even if we should concede that in a few instances, like Ps. 137:8-9. there may have been some blending of the unhallowed flame of personal passion with the holy fire."

In his comment upon Ps. 5:10. Tholuck thus explains: "'Make them [consciously] guilty' means may divine justice cause them to feel their guilt by the failure of their enterprises and make them perceive that they did not only oppose man but God.' The Lord said (Deut. 32:35), To me belongs vengeance and recompense.' That declaration caused David to refrain from taking vengeance into his own hands and to refer it to God, as he said to Saul. The Lord judge between me and you. and the Lord avenge me of you: but my hand shall not be upon you' (1 Sam. 24:12). In this psalm, he supplicates vengeance at the hands of God. not for his personal gratification but mainly because the cause of oppressed innocence is always that of God and because divine glory is sullied when wickedness triumphs. Proud men have not the remotest idea that God sets so great a value upon poor mortals that he should consider his eternal majesty injured when they are injured. They no more think that their blows will strike heaven than they do when they tread the dust or mud underfoot. But divine wisdom now and then furnishes the most palpable evidence how precious are to him those 'little ones,' as Christ calls them. With this correspond the words of the prophet, 'He that touches you touches the apple of his eye' (Zech. 2:8). As still another ground for the supplicated manifestation of God's punitive justice, the psalmist adduces the eternal praise and gratitude of the entire company of the godly which should be paid to him for this manifestation: I remembered your judgments of old. O Lord, and have comforted myself (Ps. 119:52). For God is not like an unfeeling idol, unheed-ful of the sacrifices of praise which man his creature offers to him, but he is like a father who rejoices in the honor and love which his children bear to him. David, here and elsewhere, so completely regards all the pious as one component whole, where if one member be honored all the members rejoice with it' (1 Cor. 12:26), that he considers his own deliverance as their common interest; for are not benefits conferred on individuals pledges to the rest?"

It must always be remembered that when the psalmist invokes the retribution of God upon the enemies of God, he supposes their impenitence and persistence in enmity. And what other feeling than the desire that obstinate and persevering hostility to God and his government should be punished is proper? David never calls down the judicial vengeance of heaven upon the humble and penitent man who confesses his sin and endeavors to forsake it. This shows that his feeling is not revengeful and selfish; for when mere revenge exists, no discrimination is made between penitence and impenitence. The cry for mercy is disregarded by the malignant and exasperated man. and he wreaks his anger upon the object of it, without regard to the state of mind which may be in the one who has injured him. When David says, "My eye also shall see my desire upon my enemies, and my ears also shall hear my desire of the wicked that shall rise up against me" (Ps. 92:11). he assumes that there is no relenting on their part and no intention to change their course of conduct. And that "my enemies" means God's enemies is proved by the preceding context: "For, lo. your enemies, O Lord, for, lo, your enemies shall perish; all the workers of iniquity shall be scattered" (92:9).

Butler (On Human Nature, sermon 6) evinces the ethical nature of dispassionate resentment against hardened and obstinate wickedness: "The indignation raised by cruelty and injustice, and the desire to have it punished which persons even when not affected by it feel, is by no means malice. No; it is resentment against vice and wickedness, it is one of the common bonds by which society is held together, a fellow feeling which each individual has in behalf of the whole species as well as of himself; and it does not appear that this, generally speaking, is at all too excessive among mankind. It is not natural but moral evil, it is not suffering but injury, which raises that anger or resentment of which we are speaking. The natural object of it is not one who appears to the suffering person to have been only the innocent occasion of his pain or loss, but one who has been in a moral sense injurious to himself or others."

7.6.13 (see p. 929). The existence of a comparatively small kingdom of evil within the vast holy and blessed universe of God is plainly taught in the Apocalypse. (1) It is denominated "the bottomless pit": "The fifth angel sounded, and to him was given the key of the bottomless pit. And he opened the bottomless pit: and there arose a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace. And there came out of the smoke locusts upon the earth; and unto them was given power as the scorpions of earth have power. And it was commanded them that they should hurt only those men which have not the seal of God in their foreheads. And their torment was as the torment of a scorpion when he strikes a man" (Rev. 9:1-5). (2) Satan or the devil is the prince and head of this kingdom: "They had a king over them, which is the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue has his name Apol-lyon" (9:11); "and the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent the devil, and Satan, which deceive the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him" (12:9). (3) The members of the kingdom of evil are characterized by willing, willful, and intense hatred of God and holiness and by an impenitent and blaspheming spirit: "They worshiped the beast, saying, Who is like unto the beast? who is able to make war with him? And the beast opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name and his tabernacle and them that dwell in heaven. And they blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and repented not of their deeds" (13:4, 6; 16:11). (4) The misery of the kingdom of evil is awful and endless: "The smoke of their torment ascends up forever and ever; and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image and whosoever receives the mark of his name. The beast and the false prophet shall be tormented day and night forever and ever" (14:11; 20:10).

7.6.14 (see p. 930). Bohemian Confession 4 enunciates the often-forgotten truth that the torments of hell, like sin itself, originate in the finite will, not in the infinite; in man, not in God: "For as God is not the cause of sin, even so he is not the cause of punishment."[133] The author of sin is the real author of hell. Says Augustine (On the Trinity 4.12): "The judge inflicts punishment on the guilty; yet it is not the justice of the |udge. but the desert of the crime, which is the cause of punishment."

7.6.15 (see p. 932). The boundlessness of divine mercy, of which Dante speaks, supposes penitence for sin, and penitence necessarily begins with the acknowledgment of justice, because mercy exists and is known only as the antithesis of justice. If there were no justice in God. there could be no mercy in him; for mercy is releasing from justice. Here is the fatal defect in spurious penitence The sinner does not begin at the beginning, by bending the knee before the Holy One. Justice must first be recognized in order to any experience of mercy. Whoever denies the justice of God and recalcitrates at it will be eternally kept in contact and conflict with it and never know anything of divine compassion. He will find it an iron wall through which he cannot break. God, for him, will be a perfectly just and righteously punitive being and nothing more. But whoever humbly recognizes justice by confessing sin and guilt will find that the Supreme Being is infinitely and tenderly pitiful and will forgive and eradicate the deepest sin. For the mercy has been manifested at the cost to the eternal Trinity of a self-sacrifice to satisfy justice of which neither man nor angel has any conception and which was necessitated by the inexorable nature of law and retribution. To deny, therefore, or combat this inexorableness makes the manifestation of pity and mercy on the part of God an utter impossibility.

Accordingly, in all the biblical descriptions of the lost, the absence of sorrow for sin as related to justice and the hatred of justice itself are invariable elements. Satan and his angels, together with condemned men. are utterly and malignantly impen- itenl: “The fourth angel poured out his vial upon the sun; and power was given unto him to scorch men with fire. And men were scorched with great heat and blasphemed the name of God who has power over these plagues; and they repented not to give him glory. And the fifth angel poured out his vial upon the seat of the beast; and his kingdom was full of darkness; and they gnawed their tongues for pain and blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and their sores and repented not of their deeds’ (Rev. 16:8-11). Lost men “despise the goodness and forbearance and long-suffering of God that lead to repentance” and “in proportion to (kala)[134] their hardness and impenitent heart treasure up wrath against the day of wrath " (Rom. 2:4-5).

Notes

Preface

1. Robert Brow, “Evangelical Megashift: What You May Not Have Heard about Wrath, Sin, and Hell Recently,” Christianity Today (19 Feb. 1990): 12-17.

2. They deny God’s foreknowledge because they reason that if God knows the future with certainty then the future will happen just as God knows it will. But if the future will happen just as God knows it will, this seems to them incompatible with the genuine freedom of our choices.

3. See Socinus in glossary 2.

4. In a small number of cases I relied on an existing translation, which I note accordingly.

5. When a foreign-language citation occurred in one of Shedd’s own notes and consisted of only a single word or a common phrase, I simply added the translation with no attribution to me; my lengthier translations added to Shedd’s own notes are preceded by the initials AG.

6. For instance, if a work is known exclusively or even predominately by its original language title I left it untranslated.

7. “Dr. Shedd has not always been careful to verify his references. In some instances, when he quotes at secondhand, he repeats the mistake of the book in which he found the quotation. He often gives the substance of a citation, omitting words and clauses, yet makes the whole an unbroken sentence, and encloses it in double quotation marks. The Westminster Confession is often treated in this way, so that those who are familiar with the exact phraseology are disturbed by the unaccustomed arrangement of words. When only the sense of a passage is given the signs of precise citation should not be used. A quotation is made from Dr. Schaff s article on’Hades’in which a sentence is taken from a division marked (c), another from an earlier division marked (3), yet the latter follows the former in a continuous sentence which is designated by quotation marks." George Harris, "A Review of Dogmatic Theology bv W. G. T. Shedd," Andover Review 11 (1889): 178.

8. In my translation of foreign-language passages I typically translated what was before me, assuming it to be correct. However, when I had some reason to suspect a problem in the citation, I sought the original text for comparison. It was in a few of these instances that I discovered the faulty citations I noted.

A Historical and Theological Introduction to W. G. T. Shedd and His Dogmatic Theology

1. Thornton Whaling, "Review of Shedd's Dogmatic Theology" Presbyterian Quarterly 9 (1895): 323.

2. Monica M. Grecu, "William G. T. Shedd," in American Literary Critics and Scholars, 1850-1880 (ed. John W. Rathbun and Monica M. Grecu; Dictionary of Literary Biography 64; Detroit: Gale, 1988), 217.

3. For the reader's convenience I collated the most salient facts of Shedd's lite from several biographical resources on Shedd. I drew specifically and primarily on the following works: John DeWitt, "William Greenough Thayer Shedd, D.D., L.L.D.," Presbyterian and Reformed Review 5 (1895): 295-322; Grecu, "William G. T. Shedd"; Edward E. Hindson, "Introduction," in Shedd's Dogmatic Theology (repr. Nashville: Nelson, 1980), l.iii-vi; Bernard Vernon Munger, William Greenough Thayer Shedd: Reformed Traditionalist, 1820-1894 (Ph.D. diss., Duke University, 1957); Mark A. Trechock, Orthodoxy for a Critical Period: Five Case Studies in American Protestant Theology, circa 1870 (Th.D. diss., Iliff School of Theology, 1987); Cyril J. Barber, "Foreword," in a combined edition of Shedd's Theological Essays and Orthodoxy and Heterodoxy (repr. Minneapolis: Klock & Klock, 1981); and M. Eugene Oosterhaven, "Introduction," in Shedd's Dogmatic Theology (repr. Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1953), 1.1-6. The interested reader may also wish to consult Paul P. Faris's essay on Shedd in Dictionary of American Biography (ed.Dumas Malone; New York: Scribner, 1935), 17.56-57; and the essay in Encyclopedia of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America (Philadelphia: Presbyterian Encyclopedia, 1884), 825.

4. Grecu, “William G T. Shedd,” 215.

5. Ibid.. 214.

6. DeWitt, “William Greenough Thaver Shedd,” 304.

7. Ibid., 310.

8. Ibid.

9. Ibid., 321. However, as DeWitt points out, Shedd continued to teach for another year as Union Seminary arranged for his successor.

10. See the following works by Shedd: Calvinism: Pure and Mixed (New York: Scribner, 1893): Orthodoxy and Heterodoxy (New York: Scribner, 1873); and Proposed Revision of the West-minster Standards (New York: Scribner, 1890).

11. DeWitt, “William Greenough Thayer Shedd,” 299.

12. As Whaling (“Review of Shedd’s Dogmatic Theology,” 324) states, “We believe no American writer in the field of philosophy or theology has excelled him in the clearness, force and beauty of his style, and in a certain subtle, vital quality hard to describe, but easily recognized in the products of some minds.”

13. Edward Morris, “Dr. Shedd’s System of Theology,” Presbyterian Review 10 (1880): 356.

14. T. E. Peck, “Review of Shedd’s Dogmatic Theology,” Presbyterian Quarterly 3 (1889): 290.

15. Ibid., 290.

16. He treats this most explicitly in his Lectures upon the Philosophy of History (Andover: Draper, 1856), though he enunciates his convictions throughout his writings.

17. W. G. T. Shedd, “The Nature, and Influence, of the Historic Spirit,” in Theological Essays (New York: Scribner, Armstrong, 1877), 105. 250.

18. Henry Warner Bowden, “W. G. T. Shedd and A. C. McGiffert on the Development of Doctrine,” Journal of Presbyterian History 49 (1971): 251.

19. W. G. T. Shedd, History of Doctrine (New York: Scribner. 1863), 1.23.

20. Bowden, “W. G. T. Shedd and A. C. McGiffert,” 251.

21. Shedd, History of Doctrine, 1.23.

22. Cushing Strout, speaking of Shedd’s view, makes this point lucidly: “Without historical culture the mind never achieved communication: isolated, it became the easy prey of strident passions and temporary fashions. The historically oriented mind seized the present in its deeper meaning and maintained its balance by its sense of tradition. Thus partisan eccentricities of individual minds would be tempered by contact with the ‘general mind. “ See Cushing Strout, “Faith and History: The Mind of William G. T. Shedd,” Journal of the History of Ideas 15 (1954): 158.

23. See Alan W. Gomes, “William Greenough Thayer Shedd (1820-1894) on Evangelical Unity: Some Prescriptions—Theoretical and Practical,” Presbyterian 29/1 (Spring 2003): 9-26.

24. Grecu (“William G. T. Shedd,” 215) makes a closely related point in terms of how Shedd would value the moral quality of literature: “He felt that Christian eschatological views had profoundly affected and altered the human view of history by establishing a universal history of substitutionary atonement and subsequent redemption. Hence, history could be seen as a continuum progressing toward morality in which the major way-stations were paganism, Romanism, and finally the Reformation. It stood, then, that post-Reformation literature would also be morally superior. Shedd’s exemplar was Milton.’

25. “There were some minds in the former ages of Christianity who were called by providence to do a work that will never be outgrown and left behind bv the Christian church; some men who thought more deeply and came nearer to the center of truth upon some subjects than any modern minds. … It would be difficult to mention an intellect in the eighteenth or nineteenth centuries whose reflection upon the metaphysical being and nature of God has been more profound than that of Anselm, whose thinking upon the Trinity has been more subtle and discriminating than that of Athanasius, whose contemplation of the great mystery of sin has been more comprehensive and searching than that of Augustine, whose apprehension of the doctrine of atonement has been more accurate than that formulated in the creeds of the Reformation” (pp. 37-38).

26. DeWitt, “William Greenough Thayer Shedd,” 315.

27. Morris, “Dr. Shedd’s System of Theology,” 361, 364-65.

28. E.g., DeWitt, “William Greenough Thayer Shedd.” Morris (“Dr. Shedd’s System of Theology,” 360): “A third admirable characteristic of the Dogmatic Theology appears in the continuous and careful effort to secure a solid basis in reason and the nature of things, as well as in external authorities, for the several doctrines advanced.”

29. E.g., Munger, William Greenough Thayer Shedd.

30. Shedd, “The Method, and Influence, of Theological Studies,” in Theological Essays and Orthodoxy and Heterodoxy (repr. Minneapolis: Klock & Klock, 1981), 31.

31. Shedd, Sermons to the Spiritual Man (New York: Scribner, 1884), 6-7.

32. Munger, William Greenough Thayer Shedd, 205-6.

33. Ibid., 206.

34. Ibid., 209.

35. Morris, “Dr. Shedd’s System of Theology,” 359.

36. See Richard A. Muller, Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics, vol. 2: Holy Scripture: The Cognitive Foundation of Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1993).

37. Shedd, History of Doctrine, l.vi-vii.

38. Ibid., viii.

39. See, e.g., Shedd's Homitetics and Pastoral Theology (New York: Scribner, 1867), 16-17, in which he compares the theologians and writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries with those of the eighteenth and nineteenth.

40. As Peck ("Review of Shedd's Dogmatic Theology," 288) observes, the Westminster Standards "are cited on almost every page." Moms ("Dr. Shedd's System of Theology," 360) counts "no less than sixty distinct references" to the Presbyterian creeds. If anything, that number strikes me as low.

41. Peck, "Review of Shedd's Dogmatic Theology" 289.

42. Ibid., 289.

43. Shedd states, "While dissenting from the views of Hodge on the nature of the union between Adam and his posterity and of the imputation of the first sin, the writer has the most profound respect for the opinions of this learned and logical theologian. With the exception of the elder Edwards, to no divine is American theology more indebted" (p. 462 n. 99). In addition to the two topics mentioned, Shedd could well have added Hodge's apparent denial of Christ's impeccability to this list, concerning which he states, "It is remarkable that a theologian of such soundness and accuracy as the elder Hodge should deny the impeccability of the God-man" (p. 660 n. 4).

44. Morris, "Dr. Shedd's System of Theology," 356-57.

45. Ibid., 367.

46. Harris, a contemporary of Shedd, censures his uneven distribution of topics, which he believes arises, at least in part, from an undue individualistic emphasis ("Review ox Dogmatic Theology," 179): "The church is looked on merely as having the sacraments, and the sacraments are considered as means of grace to the individual. The final consummation and triumph of the kingdom of God makes no distinct part of the eschatology…. Heaven, to which a chapter of two pages is given, is a place in which the blessedness of the believer is realized. … I cannot refrain from expressing the conviction that a system is radically defective which has no place for the doctrine of the kingdom of God on earth and in heaven, nor for the church of Christ."

47. Morris, "Dr. Shedd's Svstem of Theologv," 364-65.

48. Ibid., 367-68.

49. My purpose in this section is not to defend Shedd's views, though I do note some instances where I believe he is misunderstood by other reviewers. Nor is the task here to explain his arguments in great detail. Rather, I present Shedd's conclusions on some important issues, especially where his lake on a particular matter is unique or otherwise noteworthy. While I provide some indication of how Shedd arrived at his conclusions, the reader should certainly not conclude that there is no more to Shedd's argument than what is presented here. Glossary 1 may assist the reader in following this section at certain points.

50. The christological method of organization was used by Henry Boynton Smith, Shedd's predecessor at Union Seminary.

51. Morris, "Dr. Shedd's System of Theology," 361.

52. "The first step to be taken is to deduce the doctrine itself from Scripture by careful exegesis; and the second step is to justify and defend this exegetical result upon grounds of reason. Christian theology differs from every other branch of knowledge by being the outcome of divine revelation. Consequently, the interpretation of Scripture is the very first work of the theologian. When man constructs a system of philosophy, he must look into his own mind for the data; but when he constructs the Christian system he must look in the Bible for them. Hence the first procedure of the theologian is exegetical. The contents and meaning of inspiration are to be discovered. Christian dogmatics is what he finds, not what he originates" (pp. 47-48).

53. Morris, "Dr. Shedd's System of Theology," 359.

54. See, e.g., Harris's criticism ("Review of Dogmatic Theology," 177) of Dogmatic Theology on precisely this point.

55. Munger (William Greenough Thayer Shedd, 62 n. 6) points out that Shedd gives "one paragraph each to the moral argument and the historical argument; two pages each to the cos-mological argument and the teleological argument; and twenty pages to the ontological argument." Of course, this could be explained in part by the complexity of the ontological argument. Another factor is the controversy surrounding this argument and the objections to it that required answering. Finally, and perhaps most obviously, the ontological argument fits with Shedd's speculative bent, and Shedd tends to give extended attention to what he finds important and of interest to him.

56. He regards the modified versions of it that appeared subsequent to Anselm (e.g., Descartes) as weakening it.

57. "A contemporary of Anselm, the monk Gaunilo,… raised the objection which has been repeated over and over again: the idea of an object does not involve its existence. We have the idea of a tree, but it does not follow that there is an actual tree. We have the idea of a winged lion, but it does not follow that such a creature actually exists. The reply is that the ideas compared are not analogous in respect to the vital point of necessary existence, but are wholly diverse. One idea is that of perfect and necessary being, the other that of imperfect and contingent being. What is true of the latter idea is untrue of the former and vice versa. The idea of a tree implies contingency, that it may or may not exist; that of the absolutely perfect being implies necessity, that he must exist. From the idea of the tree we cannot prove actual objective reality, because of the element of contingency; but we can from the idea of God, because of the element of necessity. If the idea of a thing implies that it may or may not exist, it does not follow from the idea that the thing does exist. But it the idea of a thing implies that it must exist, it does follow from the idea that the thing does exist. This objection, therefore, to the ontological argument breaks down because the analogy brought in to support it is a spurious one. … Analogical reasoning is valid between things of the same species, but invalid if carried across into another species. Gaunilo, arguing against Anselm, urged that the idea of the 'lost island' does not imply that there is such a thing. Anselm replies that if Gaunilo will show that the idea of the lost island' implies its necessary existence, he will find the island for him and will guarantee that it shall never be a lost island' again" (p. 204).

58. Morris, "Dr. Shedd's System of Theology," 362.

59. Peck ("Review of Shedd's Dogmatic Theology," 291) states, "It is a revival of old Scholastic speculations for which no man was ever the wiser, except so far as they served to produce a more enlightened conviction of his own ignorance." Similarly, Morris ("Dr. Shedd's System of Theology," 364) opines: "We assuredly can know nothing by mere speculation, however interesting or profound such speculation may be."

60. Some criticize, e.g., the doctrine of the Son's eternal generation from the Father as a case in point. But as Shedd points out, the Bible describes the members of the Trinity by the titles Father, Son, and Spirit, and it follows that there must be something about these persons that warrants such designations. Now, it is impossible to conceive of the father/son relationship apart from some concept of generation. And if there is generation and if the Son is the same ontological being as the Father, who is eternal, then the generation must be an eternal generation. No doubt this is a deduction that goes beyond any given biblical text, but it follows inexorably from the nature of the case. Therefore, the theologian is not remiss in drawing deductions from the revealed data when the seeds of that deduction are found in inchoate form in the revealed data.

61. Shedd, "The Atonement a Satisfaction for the Ethical Nature of Both God and Man," in Theological Essays and Orthodoxy and Heterodoxy (repr. Minneapolis: Klock & Klock, 1981), 273.

62. Munger, William Greenough Thayer Shedd, 78; citing Shedd, “College Education” in Bib-liotheca sacra and Theological Review 7 (1850): 140.

63. For a description of the different options within Reformed theology- on the order of the decrees, see infralapsarianism, sublapsarianism, and supralapsarianism in glossary 1.

64. For example, Munger (William Greenough Thayer Shedd, 94) states, “Concerning the divine foreordination of everything which comes to pass, Shedd only reproduced the most rigid Calvinist tradition.”

65. For example, Harris, who clearly opposes Reformed theology generally, commits this error. In his review of Shedd he attacks monergism generally (“Review of Dogmatic Theology,” 176), but from the wording one would think that this criticism terminates on Shedd in particular, as if the doctrine were somehow peculiar to him. Even more puzzling are the criticisms of Morris, a fellow Presbyterian who repudiates Shedd along the same lines. For example, he criticizes Shedd for being a monergist, for advancing a “rigid” doctrine of predestination, etc. (“Dr. Shedd’s System of Theology,” 381). When reading Morris’s critique (378-83) it is very clear that the doctrines in which he believes Shedd has “gone too far” are merely the standard tenets of Morris’s own professed tradition.

66. See traducianism in glossary 1.

67. “To make the eternal damnation of a human soul depend upon vicarious sin contradicts the profound convictions of the human conscience” (p. 448).

68. Harris (“Review of Dogmatic Theology,” 171) regards this schema as a manifest evasion: we are guilty for Adam’s sin either by virtue of our specific, unbroken unity in Adam and our actual participation in the sin, or we are constituted guilty by a positive divine decree, but not both. While Harris rejects all theories that charge us as guilty for Adam’s sin, he regards Shedd’s version as “the most fanciful of all.” In fairness to Shedd, the simplest response to Harris might be—on Shedd’s terms—that undifferentiated existence in Adam and Eve would be a necessary condition for the participation in their guilt, with its concomitant transmission to their individuated posterity, though it might not be a sufficient one, if God so decreed it. That is, God could not impute guilt where there is no participation, though he might refrain from imputing guilt even where there is participation (e.g., when the entire race was still in Adam prior to their generation of offspring). Whether Shedd would opt for such an explanation is difficult to say.

69. See anhypostasis and enhypostasis in glossary 1.

70. Harris ("Review of Dogmatic Theology," 169), in his sometimes astute though highly negative review, appears to have misunderstood Shedd at this point. He presents Shedd as teaching that the two natures in Christ combine to form a person. This is not Shedd's position. Shedd believed that the second person of the Trinity assumed a human nature, not that two unpersonalized natures formed a theanthropic person.

71. "The chapter on this subject [atonement], which is much the longest chapter in the two volumes, if it were taken out from its connection, and printed as a separate monograph, would be recognized as worthy of a place among our best discussions of the topic" (Morris, "Dr. Shedd's System of Theology," 379).

72. "A substituted satisfaction of justice without an act of trust in it would be useless to sinners. It is as naturally impossible that Christ's death should save from punishment one who does not confide in it as that a loaf of bread should save from starvation a man who does not eat it. The assertion that because the atonement of Christ is sufficient for all men therefore no men are lost is as absurd as the assertion that because the grain produced in the year 1880 was sufficient to support the life of all men on the globe therefore no men died of starvation during that year. The mere fact that Jesus Christ made satisfaction for human sin, alone and of itself, will save no soul. Christ, conceivably, might have died precisely as he did and his death have been just as valuable for expiatory purposes as it is, but if his death had not been followed with the work of the Holy Spirit and the act of faith on the part of individual men, he would have died in vain. Unless his objective work is subjectively appropriated, it is useless so far as personal salvation is concerned. Christ's suffering is sufficient to cancel the guilt of all men and in its own nature completely satisfies the broken law. But all men do not make it their own atonement by faith in it by pleading the merit of it in prayer and mentioning it as the reason and ground of their pardon. They do not regard and use it as their own possession and blessing. It is nothing for them but a historical fact. In this state of things, the atonement ol Christ is powerless to save. It remains in the possession of Christ who made it and has not been transferred to the individual. In the scriptural phrase, it has not been imputed.' There may be a sum of money in the hands of a rich man that is sufficient in amount to pay the debts of a million debtors; but unless they individually take money from his hands into their own, they cannot pay their debts with it. There must be a personal act of each debtor in order that this sum of money on deposit may actually extinguish individual indebtedness. Should one of the debtors, when payment is demanded of him, merely say that there is an abundance of money on deposit, but take no steps himself to get it and pay it to his creditor, he would be told that an undrawn deposit is not a payment of a debt" (p. 726).

73. "The Christian gospel—the universal offer of pardon through the self-sacrifice of one of the divine persons—should silence every objection to the doctrine of endless punishment. For as the case now stands, there is no necessity, so far as the action of God is concerned, that a single human being should ever be the subject of future punishment. The necessity of hell is founded in the action of the creature, not of the Creator. Had there been no sin, there would have been no hell; and sin is the product of man's free will. And after the entrance of sin and the provision of redemption from it, had there been universal repentance in this life, there would have been no hell for man m the next life. The <>nlv necessitating reasc in, iherefore, foi endless retribution that now exists is the sinner's impenitence. Should every human individual, before he dies, sorrow for sin and humbly confess it, hades and gehenna would disappear" (p. 930).

74. See Shedd, Doctrine of Endless Punishment (New York: Scribner, 1886).

75. I believe that Peck is correct when he states ("Review of Shedd's Dogmatic Theology," 292), "It [Shedd's chapter on hell] is the ablest argument for 'endless punishment' we have ever met with, and a crushing refutation, even upon rational grounds, of the whole tribe of univer-salists, restorationists, future probationists, etc.”

76. This story is recounted by Augustus H. Strong, Systematic Theology (Philadelphia: Jud-son, 1907), 1052-53.

Preface1

1. The reader is reminded that the supplementary material that Shedd published in volume 3 is in this reprint edition collated into the main body of the theology by moving it to the end of each chapter to which it belongs.

Part: 1
1. True Method in Theological Science

1. images = exposition of faith

2. WS: Systems of theology since the Reformation generally include bibliology. It is found in those of Calvin, Turretin, De Moor-Marck, Gerhard, Chemnitz, Ouenstedt, Hutter, Holla/, Buddaeus, Döderlein, Baiei, Bretschneider, Knapp, Ebrard, Schleiermacher. Twesten, Watson, Hill, Hodge, and others.

Part 1:
2. Plan, Divisions, and Subdivisions

1. images = a word or discourse about the Bible

2. images = a word or discourse about God

3. images = the theologian

4. images = a word or discourse about human beings

5. images = a word or discourse about Christ

6. images = a word or discourse about salvation

7. images a word or discourse about last things (i.e., end-times)

8. Common places (i.e., common topics in theology)

9. Confession of faith

10. Vortesungen über neutestamentliche Theologie

11. images

12. Polemical theology. From the Greek word polemos (war), polemical theology is that branch of theology that attacks other theological positions.

Part 1:
3. Nature and Definition of Theological Science

1. images = a word or discourse about God

2. Oui autem omnia quae ad cultum deorum pertinerent diligenter retractarent, et tanquam relegerent, sunt dicti religiosi, ex relegendo; ut elegantes ex eligendo, a diligendo diligentes, ex intelligendo inteUigentes. As H. C. P. McGregor notes, Cicero's point is that "all these words contain the same sense of 'choosing' (legere) that is present in religious'"; Cicero, Nature of the Gods (trans. H. C. P. McGregor; Middlesex: Penguin, 1972), 153.

3. to tie, fasten behind

4. Hoc vinculo obstricti deo et religati sumus: unde ipsa religio nomen recepit, non ut Cicero interpretatus est, a relegendo.

5. images = a discussion or discourse about God

6. images = reverence for or worship of God

7. Omnia pertractantur in sacra doctrina sub ratione dei, vel quia sunt ipse deus, vel quia habent ordinem ad deum ut ad principium, et finem. Unde sequitur quod deus vere sit subjec-tum hujus scientiae.

8. WS: Bentley, On Free Thinking, 8. See Newton's exposure of the mistakes of Bolingbroke in Prophecies, diss. 1.

9. WS: A writer in the Oct. 1838 Quarterly Review shows that Gibbon's account of gnosticism is superficial and sometimes positively erroneous. The knowledge of gnosticism must be derived from the Christian fathers.

10. WS: See a searching criticism of Draper by Smith, Faith and Philosophy, 337-57.

11. WS: "Is a man," says Plutarch (On Superstition), "of opinion that indivisibles were the first origin of things? It is indeed a mistaken view, but makes no ulcer, no shooting searching pain. But is a man of opinion that wealth is his chief good? This error contains in it a canker: it preys upon a man's spirits, it suffers him not to sleep, it makes him horn-mad." Similarly Frank (Christian Certainty, 105) remarks "that it is of slight importance for the person of the observer, whether this physical object which I see before me is in truth as I see it or other than I see it. But the whole constancy and strength and worth ot the personality depends upon the question whether this moral good which I experience as real has an actual existence or not; the personality cannot free itself therefrom, without the innermost basis and supreme aim of its life being lost."

12.  images

13. WS: Strato (289 B.C.) maintained that "there is inherent in nature an eternal and necessary principle of motion, or force, without intelligence, which is the only cause of the production or dissolution of bodies."

14. WS: See especially Whewell's recapitulation in 1.18.

15. Nova Zembla is an island in the Russian Arctic.

16. Lilliput and Brobdingnag are two fictitious lands described in Swift's famous Gulliver's Travels. In Lilliput, Gulliver is a giant in comparison to the six-inch-tall Lilliputians. Conversely, the inhabitants of Brobdingnag are giants who tower over Gulliver.

17. WS: Epicurus, on the contrary, carried the doctrine that the senses are the only measure of truth so far as to affirm that the sun is no larger than it appears; see Descartes, Preface to Principles of Philosophy.

18. images = a looking at, viewing, or beholding (consequently, speculation)

19. images = I have found it

20. WS:
Him the Maker, we behold not; calm
He veils himself in everlasting laws,
Which and not Him, the skeptic seeing, exclaims, “Wherefore a God? The world itself is God.”
—Schiller, Don Carlos

21. WS: Shedd, Literary Essays, 301-5. On the inferiority’ of natural science to moral, see Plato, Phaedo 96-100.

22. images = a proving or conviction about

23. WS: On Hamilton’s and Mansel’s views, see Smith, Faith and Philosophy, 297-336; Porter, Human Intellec t, 681-97; Hodge, Theology 1.346-65; Miiller, Science of Language, 2d series, 596-600.

24. quanquam

25. images

26. images

27. images

28. heavenly bodies (as in astronomy)

29. from the outside

Part 2:
1. Revelation and Inspiration

1. images = a word or discourse about the Bible

2. images

3.

4. revelatio natural is

5. WS: See Twesten, Dogmatics 2.146; Shedd, Theological Essays, 303-4; Neander, Book of Acts §6: “Reconciliation.”

6. WS: See Conybeare’s “Reply to Tindal” in Shedd. History of Doctrine 1.208.

7.  = wrath

8.  = love

9. religiones licitae

10. inspiratio antecedens

11. inspiratio concomitans

12. inspiratio consequens

13. Res quae in scriptura continentur, non solum per assistentiam et directionem divinam infallibilem Uteris consignatae sunt, sed singulari Spiritus Sancti suggestioni, inspirations et dictamini, acceptae ferendae sunt.

14. Res Sanctis scriploribus naturaliter prorsus incognitae; naturaliter quidem cognosci-biles, actu tamen incognitae; non tantum naturaliter cognoscibiles, sed etiam actu ipso notae.

15. the matters themselves

16. a basic or foundational writing

17.

18.

19. images = teaching of the apostles

20. images = to arrange a narrative, compile an account (New American Standard Bible)

21. images = teaching of the apostles

22. ab extra = from the outside

23. WS: Immer (Hermeneulics, 18) argues against the infallibility of St. Paul because of the failure ol his memory in regard to a certain particular (1 Cor. 14:16). Because the apostle could not remember how many persons he had baptized, therefore his teaching in 1 Cor. 15 respecting the resurrection is fallible! Upon the same principle, he should deny St. Paul's infallibility because he was ignorant of the steam engine and telegraph.

24. afflatus = a blowing or a breathing on, an inspiration

25. images = God-breathed (hence, divinely inspired)

26. images

27. WS: "In his extreme old age, the elder Adams was asked for an analysis of James Otis's speech in 1761 on the acts of the Board of Trade, which was five hours long. He answered that no man could have written the argument from memory the day after it was spoken," much less 'after a lapse of fifty-seven years.' Adams then proceeded to compose a series of letters on the subject tilling thirty-three closely printed pages. Comparing these letters with letters written at or near the time, I am obliged to think that the venerable man blended together his recollections of the totality ol the influence and doctrines of Otis during the years 1761-66. I own that I have had embarrassment in adjusting the authorities" (Bancroft, History 4.416). If St. John did not compose and write his gospel until A D. 80 or 90, he certainly would have needed supernatural assistance in reporting so minutely and fully as he has the last discourse of Christ, some fifty or more years after its delivery.

28. WS: Says Philippi (.Doctrine, chap. 2), “While we maintain verbal inspiration (Wortinspi-ration), we do not mean the inspiration of each word separately and by itself (WOrterinspiration).” As he explains his meaning, it seems to be that an apostle or prophet under the impulse of the divine Spirit originated a product (hat as a unity and a whole was inspired both in matter and form, thought and language. But each particular word, one by one, was not mechanically and separately suggested to him. The process of inspiration was dynamic, continuous, and flowing.

29. images

30. images a word as it exists in the mind)

31. images(i.e., a word that has been uttered forth)

32. WS: On the necessary connection of thought and language, cf. Muller, Science of Language, 1st series, lects. 1-2,9; Science ofThought 1.284-85; VJesicoll. Study of the Gospels (introduction); Shedd, Literary Essays, 149-68.

33. images = the holy thing (neuter) begotten. The neuter gender is significant here because it shows that Christ derived his human nature from Mary; the neuter noun is suited to refer to Christ’s “impersonal” (i.e., not yet personalized) human nature. On the other hand, the root of Christ’s person is the divine Logos, the second person of the Trinity, who assumed that nature. If the reference were to his person, one would expect to find a masculine noun (see p. 629 n. 38). See anhypostasis and enhypostasis in glossary 1.

34. images = one (neuter)

35. images = one (masculine)

36. Shedd’s point is that in John 10:30 the neuter is used because a oneness of essence/being/substance is in view; hence, the meaning is “I and the Father are one thing [i.e., God].”

37. images = the form of God

38. images = the essence of being of God. A trinitarian person is one mode or form (more-phe) in which the divine essence (ousia) subsists. Thus, the word morphe would have referene to Christ' preincarnate personhood rather than to the essence that the three trinitarian person have in common. See modus subsistendi in glossary 1.

39. images = those (plural) whom you have given (to me). The plural could be theologically significant in arguing that election has reference to particular individuals rather than merely to the church as a corporate entity. Shedd, in keeping with Reformed theology generally, holds the former.

40. images = that which (singular) you have given to me

41. images = that which

42. images = those

43. the very words, the exact words, the words themselves

44. I work to be briel, I become obscure

45. images = memoirs

46. images = the voice (i.e., sound) of a trumpet

47. to the sense

48. to the word

49. In other words, in this case the New Testament writer conveys Moses' meaning even though he does not reproduce Moses' exact wording.

50. WS: See Whewell, Inductive Sciences 5.3.4 (the Copernican system opposed on theological grounds).

51. images = matter

52. images

53. images = a recollection

54. images

55. images

56. images = in word

57. images = in word

58. images = word

59. images of word

60. images = word

61. Quia ipsa verba cogitamus nos intusapud animam loqui.

62. I am angry

63. images

64. images = having been carried along

Part 2:
2. Authenticity of Scripture

1. WS: Watson (Apology, letter 2) defines “an authentic book” as one “that relates matters of fact as they really happened.” This is credibility and is the earlier use of the term. The later usage makes authenticity to mean genuineness. Cf. Shakespeare’s use with that of Addison and Burke in Richardson’s Dictionary (under the appropriate entries).

2. spoken against (a term applied to certain biblical books whose canonicity was questioned)

Part 2:
3. Credibility of Scripture

1. Needless to say. Shedd would have been quite surprised at the actual growth of Mor-monism, currently at eleven million members!

2. WS: See South, On Christ's Resurrection, sermon 3.91, Also Christlieb's summing up of the ten appearances of Christ after his resurrection (Modem Doubt, lect. 7).

3. in the year of (our) Lord

4. WS: Edersheim (Life of Jesus 3.1) observes that the temptation of Christ in the gospels is not found in the rabbinic representation of the Messiah.

5. WS: While this remark of Channing disconnects the New Testament too much from the Old and separates Christianity too much from the spiritual Judaism that prepared for it, it is nevertheless correct in regard to the originality of Christ's doctrines and is the more significant as it comes from one who denied his deity.

6. WS: On the distinction between historic faith (jides humana) and saving faith (fides di-vina), see Domer, Christian Doc trine 1.98-113.

7. At the same time, it is also worth noting that Shedd believed that the ontological argument for God's existence is valid and true and quite compelling when the argument is correctly apprehended.

8. WS: On the subject of Christian certainty, in distinction from natural certainty, see the thoughtful treatise of Frank.

9. inter scripturas canonicas

10. I prove, demonstrate

Part 2:
4. Canonicity of Scripture

1. tantum = only

2. unam = one

Part 3:
1. Nature and Definition of God

1. images = God (is) spirit

2. images spirit

3. in the direction of what comes before (i.e.. looking backward in time)

4. in the direction of what comes after (i.e.. looking forward in time)

5. God is said to be immortal not only because he will have no end but also because he had no beginning; God's immortality "always was and will be," whether one looks to the past or to the future.

6. WS: But in both of these modes of manifestation, the infinite spirit though in a form is not shut up and confined in it. The Son of Man was also in heaven at the same instant that he-was on earth in a human body. Jehovah, though present in the form of the burning bush, was at the same moment omnipresent also.

7. images

8. images

9. images

10. images = appearance

11. WS: Claudienus of Vienne. in the fifth century, notes the following points of difference between soul and body: (1) Everything is incorporeal which does not occupy space. The soul occupies no space. (2) Reason, memory, and will occupy no space. (3) The body feels the impression of touch in the pail touched; but the soul feels the impression as a whole, not in a part. (4) There is in all bodies a right and a left, an up and a down, a front and a back; but nothing ol the kind in the soul. (5) The soul feels by visible organs, but feels invisibly. The eye is one thing, seeing is another; the ears are one thing, hearing is another; the hand is one thing, touching is another. We distinguish by the touch what is hot and what cold, but we do not touch the sensation of touch, which in itself is neither hot nor cold; the organ by which we feel is a different thing from the sensation (Guizot, Civilization 1.399 [ed. Bohn]).

12. images = similar nature

13. images = same nature

14. Deus est quaedam substantia, nam quod nulla substantia est, nihil omnino est. Substantia ergo, aliquid esse est.

15. being

16. WS: It should be noticed that it is not because space and time are invisible that they are not substances or entities. An entity may be invisible. The forces of nature are invisible, but they are entities, not abstract ideas or forms of thought. They make an impression upon substances. They are efficient Dowel's. They answer to Plato's definition of substance. The force of gravity is like time in having none of the geometrical dimensions, but it cannot, like time in Kant's philosophy, be explained as a mere form of the understanding, the mode in which the human mind conceives. Gravity is a substantial or material force and constitutes a part of the material universe. It is invisible matter; matter without form, but not without entity. The same is true of all the other forces of inorganic nature. Matter has an invisible and formless mode of existence in organic nature, as well as in inorganic. The principle of animal life is real entity, but it is without geometric dimensions and is as invisible as the spirit of man or of God. But it is matter, not spirit. The bodily life, the so-called animal soul of a dog, is nothing but matter. It constitutes no part of the moral and spiritual world. It dies with the body which it inhabits and vitalizes. It was the overlooking of the distinction between matter as visible and invisible that led Butler, Wesley, Agassiz and others to favor the doctrine of animal immortality. Because the dog's soul is invisible like that of man. they concluded that it is immortal like his. But an invisible principle may be as perishable as a visible body and must be in case it is a material or physical principle, in case it belongs to the world of matter, not of spirit.

17. images

18. images

19. images

20. from the earth

21. and for that reason, it must be eternal

22. WS: More departed from the common opinion in contending that spiritual substance has extension and the three dimensions, like material substance. It differs from matter in having self-motion and in not having impenetrability. It is not moved ab extra, and its presence does not exclude that of material substance. He denied the Schoolman's dictum that the soul is all in every part of the body because this is incompatible with the view that spiritual substance is extended.

23. corporalitas animae

24. Incorporalitas enim nihil patitur, non habens per quod pati possit; aut si habet, hoc erit corpus. In quantum enim omne corporale passibile est, in tantum quod passibile est, corporate est.

25. Tertulliano corpus generaliter significat substantiam vere subsistentem, sive sit visibilis, sive invisibilis. Hinc deum quoque corpus esse dixit. Sed praestat ejusmodi images (akyrologias)vitare.

26. Qui aut figuram negant habere ullam deum, aut nullo affectu commoven putant.

27. images

28. WS: Similarly, Schelling (Idealism of the Theory of Knowledge. 240) remarks: "Nur eine in sich selbst zuriickgehende Kraft schafft sich selbst ein Innres. Daherder Materie kein Innres zukommt" [AG: Only a force that goes back into itself can itself create an Innres, since matter cannot attain to the same]. Coleridge adopts this in his Biographia (ed. Harper, 242). Schubert says that "the farther we penetrate into matter, we find the minute and microscopic more and more; but the further we penetrate into mind, we discover the great and grand more and more" (Opinions, 195).

29. from the outside

30. from within

31. images = without a body, disembodied

32. images

33. Cogitatio attributum dei est, sive deus est res cogitans.

34. Extensio attributum dei, sive deus est res extensa.

35. WS: For a refutation of Spinoza, see Howe, Living Temple, 21. For a clear statement of Spinozism, see Oberweg, History 2.55-56. Hobbes denied the existence of anything but body and asserted that God is corporeal (Cudworth, Intellectual System 5.3). Berkeley (Principles of Knowledge) takes the other extreme and maintains that mind is the only substance.

36. images = being

37. images

38. Esse relativi est ad aliud se habere. Si igitur relatio sit ipsa divina essentia, sequitur quod esse divinae essentiae sit ad aliud se habere; quod rcpugnat perfectioni divino esse quod est maxime absolutum est et per se subsistens.

39. from within

40. from the outside

41. Die Liebe Gottes ist eine anthropopathische Vorstellung von ganz gleicher Ordnung mit der Personlichheit Gottes; sie steht und fallt mit dieser, und ist dem religiosen Bewusstseyn [sic] auf pantheistischcr Basis ebenso entbehrlich wie diese.

42. images

43. images

44. WS: On the subject of divine anger, see Tertullian, Concerning the Wrath of God; Nean-der. Book of Acts 2.616 (reconciliation in Rom. 4:35; Phil. 2:6); Shedd, Theological Essays, 269-85.

45. images = lust

46. WS: One of the contradictions in Spinoza's system is that while he denies self-determination to man, he concedes self-consciousness to him. But a theorist who could attribute to God the two contradictories thought and extension could attribute to man the two contradictories personality and necessity. On these two factors in personality, see Miiller, Sin 2.113—42 (trans. Urwick).

47. Ein Gegensalz von Selbstbewusstsein und Weltbewusstsein, von Ich and Nicht Ich, von Subject und Object in Gott, nicht denkbar ist. Vielmehr sein Selbstbewusstsein mit seiner intu-itiven Weltbewusstsein eins ist. Das Absolute kann kein anderes Selbstbewusstsein haben als sein intuitives Weltbewusstsein.

48. within, on the inside. In this context, the reference is to relationships within the Godhead itself, as opposed to the relationships the Godhead sustains to objects outside of itself (i.e., ad extra).

49. images

50. images

51. images = form of God

52. images = being of God

53. images

54. WS: For a fuller development of this subject, see Shedd, History of Doctrine 1.365-68; Augustine's On the Trinity, 8-9 (introduction);

Augustine, On the Trinity 14.6-7; Guricke, Church History, 203; Mutter, On Sin 2.136-37; Billroth, Philosophy of Religion Ã‚Â§Ã‚Â§89-90; Wilberforce, Incarnation, 3; Kidd, On the Trinity (eternal sonship; intra. Candlish); Candlish, Fatherhood of God; Dorner, Christian Doctrine 1.412-62; Kurtz, Sacred History Ã‚Â§2; Christlieb, Modem Doubt, lect. 3; Passavant, Wille 4.

55. omnis determinatio est negatio

56. WS: It is also to be observed that God cannot properly be denominated an object of benevolence or benevolent regard. Only a created being can be such. We bless God in the sense of adoring him, but not in the sense of bestowing a blessing upon him. We do not wish him well, as we do or should all creatures. God is above this. To wish a being well implies the possibility of his not being so.

57. images = the one

58. images = the all

59. images = the one and all

60. images

61. images = the unseen things

62. standing under

Part 3:
2. Innate Idea and Knowledge of God

1. what it is

2. the fact that is/whether it exists

3. images = those without God in the world

4. images = strangers to the covenants

5. e re certa incerta confirmare

6. images = his invisible (attributes)

7. images = everlasting power

8. images = everlasting power

9. images = sovereignty

10. images = Godhead

11. images

12. images = truth

13. images

14. images

15. images = to reveal

16. images = to make known or manifest

17. images = God>

18. images = the divinity

19. images = the great God

20. images = God

21. images = the demiurge

22. images = the ruler/leader

23. images = the first God

24. images = the first mind

25. images = the highest ruler

26. images = divine providence

27. simile aut secundum

28. Audio vulgus, cum ad caelum manus tendunt nihil aliud quam deum dicunl, et: “Deus magnus est,” et; “Deus verus est,” et; “Si deus dederit.” Vulgi iste naturalis sermo est. an chris-tiani confitentis oratio? Et qui Jovem principem volunt, falluntur in nomine, sed de una potes-tate consentiunt.

29. Platonis philosophiam, in iis quae omnium maxime necessaria sunt cum ilia Hebraeo-rum convenire.

30. images

31. images = God made it evident

32. WS: Channing is one of the ablest and most eloquent of them. See his sermon “Likeness to God.”

33. tabula rasa = blank slate

34. Unser Gottesbewustsein ist immer, wenn es ein wahres ist, auch ein von Gott bewirktes.

35. Je sens qu’il y a un dieu, et je ne sens pas qu’il n’v en ait point.

36. noverim me. noverim te

37. WS: On this subject see Van Oosterzee, Dogmatics, 25; Hardwick, Christ and Other Masters; Stillingfleet, Origines Sacrae 3.5.

38. Quo propius homoaberat abortu et divina progenie, hoc melius ea fortasse, quae essent vera cernebat.

39. WS: On the influence of the patriarchal revelation, see Bolton, Evidences, 2; Stillingfleet, Origines Sacrae 3.5; Gale, Court of the Gentiles.

40.  images = the wrath of God

41.  images = the love of God

42. WS: It is no reply to say that although God does not owe the exercise of mercy to the sinner, he owes it to himself. For if God owes it to his own attributes and perfection of character to pardon sin, a neglect or refusal to do so in a single instance would be a dereliction of duty to himself and a spot on his character. Mercy, on this supposition as well as on the other, is not grace but debt.

43.  images = that which is known of God

Part 3:
3. Arguments for the Divine Existence

1.  images = discussion concerning being

2. to not exist (i.e., nonexistence)

3. to exist (i.e., existence)

4.  images = a change inlo another kind/species

5. WS: Another flaw in Gaunilo's counterargument is that he starts from the conception of a being "greater than all things else that exist," but Anselm starts from the conception of a being "greater than all things else that can be conceived." The latter implies a greater perfection than the former. From the former conception, Anselm would not attempt to prove actual existence. The ideal may be more perfect than the actual.

6. are altogether different in kind

7. from the force of the term (i.e., the expression infinite being includes within it the notion of necessity)

8. WS: Kuno Fischer on Kant, 125, 258-59 (trans. Mahaffv).

9. one

10. unique, one of a kind

11. WS: In this criticism, we have assumed as Kant and Fischer do that "existence" may be regarded as an attribute and have argued from their point of view. As will be seen further on, existence is not strictly an attribute. But if "necessity of existence" be substituted for "existence," the argument still holds good. Certainly if from the concept of the absolutely perfect being the attribute of necessity of existence be subtracted, the concept itself is changed.

12. a logical entity

13. WS: Oberweg (2.50) notices the difference between the two forms of the argument in the following remark: "The Cartesian form of the ontological proof has a defect from which the Anselmic is free, namely, that the premise 'being is a perfection' involves a very questionable conception of 'being' as a predicate among other predicates, while Anselm has indicated a definite kind of being, namely, being not merely in our minds but also outside of them, as that in which superior perfection is involved." But this misses the true point of difference. Anselm's "definite kind of being" is necessity of being, "not being outside of our minds." This latter is objective being and is the same as Descartes's "existence." If this is all the difference between Anselm and Descartes, there is none at all.

14. WS: Descartes seems to have been aware of the defect in this form of stating the argument. He more commonly employs "existence" in Method and Meditations. But he uses "necessity of existence" in Method. 79; Meditations, 67-68; Principles of Philosophy, 119, 189-91 (trans. Veitch). Oberweg (History 2.42.49. 51), Schwegler (History, 175), and Locke (King, Life of Locke, 314) represent Descartes as stating the argument in the Anselmic form.

15. WS: See Locke, Understanding 4.10, for the arguments for divine existence. In this part of his work, he really admits the doctrine of innate ideas in the sense in which Plato taught them, though not in the mistaken sense in which he himself combats them.

16. WS: Alexander, “Jehovah” in Kitto’s Encyclopedia. Maimonides, a twelfth-century rabbi, so explains Jehovah (see Lowman, Hebrew Ritual. 270). Delit/sch (Old Testament History of Redemption §58) says that “the name Jehovah denotes the one whose nature consists in being (Seyn), which continually manifests itself as existence (Daseyn), the eternal and eternally living one.”

17.  images = God

18.  images = God

19.  images= discussion concerning the world

20. a begging of the question. This expression refers to a logical fallacy in which one assumes the truth of the very proposition to be proven. That is, the truth of the conclusion is assumed in the premises of the argument.

21. WS: Janet, Final Causes; Bell. Hand; Kirby, History and Habits of Animals.

22.  images

23. WS: Final causes are more easily discovered in a narrow than in a wide sphere, in biology than in astronomy. When it is asked why do the planets revolve around the sun, the efficient cause is commonly meant. The inquirer asks for the particular force that causes the revolution. But when it is asked why the motor nerves run along the limbs, the final cause is commonly meant. The inquirer asks for the purpose of this arrangement.

24. Opus ad intra in this context refers to an internal operation of the Godhead, whereas opus ad extra refers to an operation of the Godhead in producing something outside of itself. See p. 173 n. 48.

Part 3:
4. Trinity in Unity

1. Cum dico unum, non me trinitatis turbat numerus, qui essentiam non multiplicat, non variat, nec partitur. Rursum, eum dico tria, non me arguit intuitus unitatis, quae ilia quae-cumque tria. seu illos tres, nec in confusionem cogit, nec in singularitatem redegit.

2. Hymnō se monas, hymno se trias images monas ei trias On, trias ei monas On images

3. one

4. unique

5. images

6. Singularitas ad personam pertinet, unitas ad naturam.

7. images

8. pater hominum deorumque

9. images

10. images

11. images

12. images

13. images

14. images

15. WS: Cf. Witsius, Covenants 1.2.5-7: Leighton, Theological Lectures, 7; Lee, Inspiration, lect. 3.123; Dorner, Christian Doctrine §25.

16. plural of excellency. As Hebraists note, plural nouns in Hebrew can, under certain conditions and in certain contexts, be used to express the excellency or majesty of the object in question. For example, in Gen. 39:3, 7, 19 Potiphar is called “Lord,” with the plural ‘adonayw being used. The plural form is used to express the importance of Potiphar’s position and rank.

17. images = God (the Hebrew noun is plural)

18. images

19. images

20. images

21. images

22. images

23. images

24. images = desire of

25. images = picked out, select

26. images = three

27. Respondeo, dicendum quod relationes quaedam sunt in divinis realiter.

28. images = being

29. images = nature, being

30. images= being

31. essence (see essentia in glossary 1)

32. substance (see substantia in glossary 1)

33. nature (seeessentia in glossary 1)

34. being (see essentia in glossary 1)

35. a thing (see essentia in glossary 1)

36. images = substance

37. images = being

38. images = from a different hypostasis or ousia. See Shedd's discussion in this context for the possible meaning of these terms.

39. images = being

40. images = substance

41. images = similar being/substance

42. images = same being/substance

43. images = substance

44. images

45. images = substance

46. images = being

47. images

48. essence or substance

49. to be wise

50. wisdom

51. to be, exist

52. essence

53. images = being

54. Quod enim dixi summam trinitatem posse dici tres substantias, Graecos secutus sum, qui contitentur tres substantias in una essentia, eadem fide qua nos tres personas in una substantia. Nam hoc significant in deo per substantiam quod nos per personam.

55. images = same nature

56. Substantia divina est ea natura, in qua inest vis agendi infinita; essentia est complexus omnium perfectorum infinitorum.

57. Ilia igiturest summa justitia, summa sapientia, summa Veritas, summa bonitas, summa beatitudo, summa eternitas, potestas, unitas; quod non est aliud quam summe ens, summe vivens; et alia similiter.

58. one substance

59. images = (etymologically) substance. However, the Greek trinitarians also used the word to refer to an instance of a substance, i.e., as equivalent to a person in a trinitarian context. See hypostasis and also modus subsistendi in glossary 1.

60. images = substance

61. images = face, person

62. images = the exact image of his person. It should be noted, however, that some translations render hypostaseds in this verse as “nature,” not “person” (e.g., New American Standard Bible).

63. images

64. subsistence

65. images = form

66. images

67. images

68. images = being

69. images

70. images = appearance

71. after making the necessary changes

72. WS: The defect in the ternary of subject, object, and subject-percipient, like that in the ternary of memory, understanding, and will employed by Augustine and the patristic trinitarians, is that neither of them are so objective to each other as the three persons of the Trinity are. The personal pronouns cannot be employed respecting them; neither can personal actions and affections be ascribed to them. They illustrate the trinality of the one divine essence, but not the substantiality of the three persons. The subject-ego cannot send the object-ego on a mission. The memory cannot address the understanding as a distinct person.

73. mode of subsisting

74. images = manner of subsisting

75. Persona differre dicitur ab essentia, non realiter, id est essentialiter, ut res et res; sed modaliter, ut modus a re.

76. images = one thing with two names

77. images = God is spirit

78. images = in order that God might be all in all

79. images = hypostaticallv (i.e., personally)

80. images = essentially

81. images = God

82. images = the Word was God

83. images = God

84. lacking the definite article the

85. images = spirit

86. images = God

87. images = God

88. internal marks or characteristics

89. external marks or characteristics

90. internal works or operations (see p. 173 n. 48)

91. Deus est actus purissimus, sine ulla potentialitate.

92. spiritus quia spiratus

93. images = spirit

94. images = at the same time there is a father there is a son

95. In hac trinitate nihil prius aut posterius, nihil majus aut minus, sed tota tres personae coaetemae sibi sunt, et coaequales.

96. The quotation trom Turretin l eads non libertate indifferenliae, sed spontaneitatis. Tur-retin's meaning is this: The Father's "freedom" in generating the Son is not a freedom of indifference or of contrary choice, as if the Father could refrain from generating him. Rather, the Father "freely" generates the Son in that this generation is a spontaneous activity of the Father, free from any outside consideration or coercion.

97. WS: The objections made by the English Arians and Semiarians (Clarke, Whiston, etc.) to the Athanasian doctrine were "that generation implies division of essence, and necessary generation implies outward coaction; that generation is an act. and every act implies choice; that necessary agents are no agents, and necessary causes are no causes; that three persons must be three intelligent agents, and three agents cannot be one being, one substance, one God" (Water-land, Second Defence, 4).

98. images

99. images

100.  = God from God

101.  = son

102.  = child (son or daughter) or slave, servant

103.  = my servant

104.  = servant

105.  = child (son or daughter) or slave, servant

106.  = breath

107.  = spirit

108. spiritus quia spiralus

109.

110.  = out of the essence

111.

112. Filius est genilus, spiritus sanctus procedit. sive emanat, a patre.

113. emanat

114. genitu

115. procedit

116. re rum natura

117. Emanatio a patre et filio, distinctam a filii generatione.

118. Patrem esse principium Filii et Spiritus Sancti, et utrumque ab ipso propagari interi-ore productione, non externa: uncle lit, ut non modo ex Patre, sed in ipso sint, et Pater in ipsis; neque in sacra Triade altera persona ab altera separari possit, sicut tres humanae personae ab invicem disterminantui.

119. images = from the essence/substance

120. images = the same essence/substance

121. images = out of, from

122. images = same

123. same

124. WS: The English Arians Clarke, Whiston, Whitby, and others denied that consub-stantialin means one numerical substance pi issessed by eat h ol the three persons (Hunt, Rettgious Thought in England 3.23).

125. images

126. circumincession

127. WS: Athanasius (Orations 3.21) remarks that Christ prays here that the disciples "may imitate the trinitarian unity of nature in their unity of affection. Had it been possible for the disciples to be in the nature of the Father as the Son is, he would have prayed 'that they may be one in you,' instead of 'one in us.'"

128. In trinitate maxime propria est et perfectissima images(perichdresis), siquidem personae sese mutuo continent; ita ut ubicunque una persona est, ibi reliquae duae existant, hoc est ubique omnes sint.

129. WS: The Platonists employed this figure of circulatory movement to explain the self-reflecting and self-communing nature of the human mind: "It is not possible lor us to know what our souls are, but only by their kine'seis kyklikai images their circular and reflex motions, and converse with themselves, which only can steal from them their own secrets" (Smith, Discourses: Immortality 2).

130. In trinitate, nihil prius aut posterius [tempore], nihil majus aut minus [natura], sed tota tres personas coetemas sibi esse et coequales.

131.

132.

133.  = only begotten God

134. Dubitari nequit quin testimoniorum pondere valeat.

135.  = the fountain of the Godhead

136.  = the root of all the Godhead

137. fountainhead/source of the Trinity

138. fountainhead/source of deity

139. fountainhead/source of deity

140. si modus subsistendi spectatur

141. pater est Tmyaia OrdniToc, (pe’gaia theotetos)

142.

143. Dicimus concedere nos Christum esse naturalem Dei Filium.

144. Filium personam esse non diffitemur. eamque divinam.

145.  = the same essence/substance

146.

147.

148.

149.

150. images

151. images

152. images

153. images = Christ

154. images = Lord

155. images = God

156. images = of God

157. images = the Word was God

158. images = God

159. images = spirit

160. images = God is spirit

161. images = was

162. images = became, came into being

163. images = with/face to face with God

164. images = with God

165. images = this is the true God

166. images = this (one)

167. images = Jesus Christ

168. images = God

169. images = who being

170. images = according to the flesh

171. images = God

172. images = of God

173. images = savior

174. images = appearing

175. images = great

176. images = my Lord and my God

177. images = he (Thomas) said to him (Jesus)

178. images = the

179. images = O!

180. images = of God

181. images = Lord

182. images = God

183. images = he who

184. images

185. images = booty, prey

186. images

187. WS: On the connection of Old Testament Wisdom with John's Logos, see Bleek, Introduction to the New Testament §81; Luthardt, Authenticity of the Fourth Gospel; Godet, Commentary on John; Dorner, Person of Christ, vol. 1.

188. images = I am

189. images = came into being (New American Standard Bible)

190. images = was

191. images = became

192. images = who is

193. fuisse

194. images = not one thing

195. images = through him

196. images = through him

197. images = through him

198. images = for him

199. images = through him

200. ἐν αὐτῷ = in him

201. ἐν αὐτῷ συνέστηκε = in him (all things) hold together (New American Standard Bible)

202. ἀφ᾽ ἑαυτοῦ

203. ἕν (neuter)

204. WS: Athanasius (Against the Arians 4.9) remarks that there are three ways in which these words can be understood: (1) that which is one thing in one respect is two in another, (2) that which is one thing is two by having two names, and (3) that which is one thing is two by being divided into two parts. The first is Nicene trinitarianism. The second is Sabellianism.

205. אלהים = judges

206. ἀρχή

207. ἀρχή = beginning

208. ἀρχή καὶ τὸ τέλος = the beginning and the end

209. περὶ ἀρχῶν (peri archon)

210. ἀρχή = beginning

211. νοῦς = mind

212. ἡ ἀρχὴ τῆς κίνησεως = the beginning of motion

213. οὐ ἡ ἀρχὴ ἐν αὐτῳ ἐστί = that which has its beginning in him

214. οὐ ἡ ἀρχὴ ἐξωθεν = whose beginning (causative principle) is outside (of the person)

215. ὁποτ' ἂν ἡ αἰτία ἐν τοῖς ἐκτός = when the cause of these things is in external circumstances (lit., outside)

216. μονογενής = only begotten

217. πρωτότοκος = firstborn

218. πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως

219. πρῶτος = first

220. πρῶτος μου ἦν = he was before me

221. πρωτότοκος ἐκ πάσης κτίσεως = firstborn out of all creation

222. ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν = from (out of) the dead

223. ἀγαπητός = beloved

224. ἴδιος = one's own, pertaining to oneself

225. πατέρα ἴδιον

226. τὸν ἑαυτοῦ υἱόν

227. מוֹצִא

228. ἐξήγειρά σε

229. spiritus quia spiratus

230. ὅταν ἔλθῃ ἐκεῖνος τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας = when he, the spirit of truth, comes

231. τῷ πνεύματι ὅς ἐστιν ἀρραβών = in the spirit, who is the pledge

232. δύναμις

233. WS: In Rev. 5:6 "the seven spirits of God sent forth into all the earth" are the "seven eyes of the Lamb"; in the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs "seven spirits" of error are described who stand for Satan the archspirit of evil (Grabe, Spicilegium 1.146).

234. μόνου = alone

235. images = from the Father alone

236. images = being

237. images = substance

238. images = being

239. images = substance

240. images = face

241. images = there was once when he was

242. images

243. images

244. images

245. images = of himself

246. images = I came forth from the Father

247. images = from

Part 3:
5. Divine Attributes

1. divinae virtutes sunt ipsa essentia

2. Attributa dei non possunt realiter differre ab essentia, vel inter se tanquam res et res.

3.images

4.images

5.images

6.images

7. extra flammantia moenia mundi

8. outside of the world

9. Somewhere

10. In quo loco est animus? Credo equidem in capite: et cur credam, afferre possum. Sedalias ubi sit animus, certe quidem in te est.

11. Specialis approximatio essentiae divinae ad substantiam credentium.

12. jovis monia osse plena

13. deum ire per omnes terras maris,coelumque profundum

14. the eternalone. the lord

15. Eternitas est tota simul; in tempore enerminotesnon sunit idem.

16. Eternitas est mensura esse permanentits,tempus vero est mensura motus

17. images

18. Deus est actus purissimus sine ulla potentialitate.

19. Necesse est id quod primum ens, esse in actu. et nullo modo in potentia.

20. images = the king eternal

21. images

22. images

23. images

24. scientia simplicis intelligentiae

25. scientia media

26. scientia conditionata

27. scientia media

28. images

29. images

30. images

31. WS: Descartes asserts this: “God did not will that the three angles of a triangle should be equal to two right angles because he knew it could not possibly be otherwise. But because he willed that the three angles of a triangle should be necessarily equal to two right angles, there-Fore this is now true; and so on of other things. Nor is there any need to inquire how God from eternity could have made it true that twice four should not be eight, for I confess that this cannot be understood by us” (Responsiones §6). In other places, however, Descartes “reasoned more Correctly,” says Cudworth (ed. Tegg 2.532).

32. absolute power

33. ordained power

34. images

35. images

36. WS: Owen, On Divine Justice; Edwards, Satisfaction for Sin, 2.

37. animi affectus suum cuique tribuens

38. images

39. images

40. images

41. images

42. images

43. images

44. images

45. images

46. Impersonaliter poenam necessario infligi omni peccato, sed non personaliter omni peccatori.

47. Duplex jus oritur circa poenae inflictionem; aliud necessarium et indispensabile respectu peccati ipsius, aliud vero libeium et posilivum respectu peccatoris. A “positive” law is one which is enacted freely and could be otherwise. On the other hand, a law which is absolutely necessary is so by the nature ol the case.

48. to give oneself up (to death)

49. WS: Cf. what Cicero (On Duties 1.10) says concerning a “malicious interpretation” of law.

50. fiat justitia ruat coelum

51. Dei qualitas non est, sed tantum effectus voluntatis ipsius.

52. Divinae justitiae, per quam peccatores damnari meremur, pro peccatis nostris neque Christum satisfecisse, neque ut satisfaceret, opus fuisse, arbitror.

53. for the purpose of destroying that most pestilential heresy

54. WS: See Plato, Republic 10.614-21; Phaedo 113-14; Gorgias 523-27, Tacitus, Annals 6.6; 14.20; 15.26; Lewis, Plain against the Atheists, app. 59; Tholuck, On Heathenism; Owen, On Divine Justice; Shedd, Theological Essays, 284-93.

55. WS: Magee, Atonement (“Human Sacrifices”; “Propitiation as held by Jews and HeaÂ¬then”; “Universality of Sacrifice”); Owen, On Divine Justice, 4; Smith, Christian Theology, 443-45.

56. with this, not therefore on account of this. The meaning here is that an action may effect results that lie beyond the puipose for which the action was performed. Such results are conÂ¬nected “with” the action, but the action was not performed “on account ofâ„¢ or so as to effect these results.

57. Although Shedd correctly defines the term acceplitatio, the position he illustrates in the following sentences is more properly denominated acceptatio. In acceptilatio, nothing is paid but the debt is wiped out as if a full payment has occurred. In acceptatio, a payment of less than the full amnunt is accepted as if it wprp navmpnl in full

58. images= good

59. images= useful

60. images= useful

61. images= righteous

62. images= good

63. images

64. images

65. images

66. images = useful

67. images

68. images

69. images

70. images

71. images

72. scientia simplics intelligentiae

73. Voluntas quidem justitiae est ipsa justitia; voluntas vero beatitudinis non est beatitudo; quia non omnis habet beatitudinem qui habet ejus voluntatem.

Part 3:
6. The Divine Decrees

1. images

2. images

3. imagesfrom the outside

4. images

5. images

6. images

7. images

8. images

9. images

10. permitted things

11. images

12. images

13. images = matter

14. WS: Calvin is sometimes represented as differing from Augustine and teaching that God decrees sin as he does holiness by an efficacious decree. Mohler so asserts in his Symbolics, but Baur (Gegensatz. 744-45) shows that this isa mistake. Modern Lutheran theologians often make the same assertion. Fisher (Reformation, 202) says that in his Institutes Calvin "makes the primal transgression the object of an efficient decree," but "in the Consensus Genevensis confines himself to the assertion of a permissive decree in the case of the first sin." But Calvin 3.23.8 affirms that "the perdition of the wicked depends upon divine predestination in such a manner that the cause and matter of it are found in themselves. Man falls according to the appointment of divine providence, but he falls by his own fault (suo vitio cadit).” Calvin, it is true, asserts (2.4.3-5) that “prescience or permission” is not the whole truth respecting God’s relation to sin, because he is said in Scripture “to blind and harden the reprobate and to turn, incline, and influence their hearts.” But the accompanying explanation shows that he has in mind the notion of permission in the case of an idle spectator who cannot prevent an action and can do nothing toward controlling it after it has occurred—the same notion that is alluded to in the Westminster Confession and other Calvinistic creeds. The “blinding, hardening, turning,” etc., Calvin describes as the consequence of divine desertion, not causation. Some of his phraseology in this place is harsh, but should be interpreted in harmony with his explicit teaching in 3.23.8. One proof that Calvinism does not differ from Augustinianism on the subject of the origin of sin under the divine decree is the fact that the Dort Canons, which are a very strict statement of Calvinism, reject supralapsarianism and assert infralapsarianism/sublapsarianism. This means that the relation of God to the origin of sin is not efficacious, but permissive, which was Augustine’s view.

15. from the outside

16. WS: Alexander in the 1831 Princeton Repertory makes the same objection as above to the doctrine of the concursus.

17. WS: On fate as presented in the pagan writers, see the appendix to Toplady’s translation of Zanchi, On Predestination.

18. images = no one can escape his appointed fate, not even a god

19. WS: On this point, see Clarke, Demonstration, prop. 20, who contends, however, only that foreknowledge does not necessitate, not that foreordination does not. He is Arminian on the subject of decrees.

20. Si praescita sunt omnia futura, hoc ordine venient, quo ventura esse praescita sunt. Et si hoc ordine venient, certus est ordo rerum praescienti deo. Et si est certus ordo rerum, est certus ordo causarum; non enim aliquid fieri potest, quod non aliqua efficiens causa prae-cesserit. Si autem certus est ordo causarum quo fit omne quod fit, fato fiunt omnia quae fiunt. Ouod si ita est, nihil est in nostra potestate.

21. magna dii curant, parva negligunt

22. images

23. images

24. images = to circumscribe or limit beforehand

25. images = to foreknow

26. images = to divide, define

27. images = to determine before

28. images

29. images

30. images

31. images

32. images

33. images

34. images

35. images

36. images

37. images

38. images

39. images was foreknown

40. images to know

41. images

42. images

43. images = to foreknow

44. images

45. images

46. images

47. images

48. images

49. WS: On this point, see Hodge, Tlieology 2.639-710; Dabney, Theology, 580-81; Watson, Institutes 2.395-96.

50. Et quamvis dens norit qui sunt sui, et alicubi mentio fiat paucitatis electorum, bene sperandum est tamen de omnibus, neque temere reprobis quisquam est adnumerandus.

51. Alii dicunt: si vero sum de reproborum numero.

52. Nous croyons que de cette condemnation, Dieu retire ceux lesquels il a elus, laissanl les aulres.

53. Nous croyons que Dieu s'est demontre tel qu'il est; savoir misericordieux et juste: mis-ericordieux, en retirant et sauvant ceux qu'en son conseil etemel il a elus; juste, en laissant les autres en leur mine et trebuchement oii ils se sont precipites.

54. Scriptura Sacra testatur non omnes homines esse electos, sed quosdam non electos, sive in aeterna dei electione praeteritos, quos scilicet deus ex liberrimo, justissimo, irrepre-hensibili, et immulabilimi beneplacito decrevit in communi miseria, in quam se sua culpa prae-cipitarunt. relinquere.

55. WS: The Formula of Concord (1576-84) teaches that foreknowledge extends to both good and evil, that predestination extends to good only. The Waldensian Conlession (1655) teaches inability, election, and pretention. It is an abridgment of the Gallican Confession and is “highly prized” by the modern Waldensians. The Articles of the Congregational Union of England and Wales (1833) teach election. The creed of the Free Church of Geneva (1848) teaches inability and election. The Free Italian Church (1870) teaches inability. The Methodist Articles (1784) drawn up by Wesley teach inability; the sinner “cannot turn and prepare himself to faith.” The Arminian Articles (1610) teach impotence and that “God by an eternal purpose has determined to save those who believe and persevere.” Niemever excludes this from his collection of “Reformed” Confessions. The Cumberland Presbyterian Confession (1813-29) teaches inability and that “God’s sovereign electing love is as extensive as the legal condemnation or reprobation, in which all men are by nature. But in a particular and saving sense, none can be properly called God’s elect till they be justified and united to Christ. None are justified from eternity. God has reprobated none from eternity” (Schaff, Creeds 3.772).

56.  images

57. Agnoscimus interim, deum illuminare posse homines etiam sine externo ministerio, quo et quando velit: id quod ejus potentiae est.

58. WS: The case of the Indian described in Edward’s Life of Brainerd is sometimes cited, but il is not so clear and satisfactory as some others. Brainerd describes the Indian as one who “had formerly been like the rest of the Indians, until about four or live years previously. Then, he said, his heart WLIS very much distressed. At length God comforted his heart and showed him what he should do.” Brainerd adds: “I must say that there was something in his temper and disposition which looked more like true religion than anything I ever observed among other hea-thens.” But Brainerd does not say that this Indian believed and trusted in Christ when Christ was presented to him as the Savior from sin: yet had he done so, he would certainly have mentioned it. On the contrary , Brainerd remarks that the Indian “disliked extremely” some of his teaching. He also continued to practice the tricks of a conjurer in connection with idolatrous worship. The evidence and criterion of a true sense of sin and ol a genuine work ol the Holy Spirit in a heathen heart is that readiness to welcome and believe in Christ when pleached, which was exhibited by Cornelius and the eunuch.

59. Homo creabilis et labilis non est objectum praedestinationis, sed creatus et lapsus.

60. images

61. images

62. WS: Says Haeckel (Evolution of Man 2.3): “The human embryo passes through the whole course of its development in the space of forty weeks. Each man is really older, by this period, than is usually assumed. When, for example, a child is said to be 9.25 years old, he is really 10 years old.”

63. images = in order that it might be made known

64. images to preach the gospel

65. images = to bring to light

66. Ubi nuda est permissio, ibi locum non habet causalitas.

67. WS: “Pharaoh was hardened because God with his Spirit and grace hindered not his ungodly proceedings, but suffered him to go on and have his way. Why God did not hinder or restrain him we ought not to inquire” (Luther, Tabic Talk, 49 [ed. Bogue]).

68. images= I hated

69. WS: Respecting election, Watson (Institutes 2.338) remarks as follows: “To be elected is to be separated from the world CI have chosen you out of the world) and to be sanctified by the Spirit (‘elect unto obedience). It follows, then, that election is not only an act of God in time, but also that it is subsequent to the administration of the means of salvation. Actual election cannot be eternal, for from eternity the elect were not actually chosen out of the world and could not be actually sanctified unto obedience.” This explanation makes election to be sanctification itself, instead of its cause: “To be elected is to be separated from the world and to be sanctified.” The term separate is used here by Watson not as St. Paul uses it to denote election, w hen he says that God “separated him from his mother’s womb” (Gal. 1:15); but in the sense of sanctification, as St. Paul employs it in 2 Cor. 6:17: “Be separate and touch not the unclean thing.” By this interpretation, election is made to be the same thing as sanctilication, instead ol being an act of God that produces it, as is taught in Eph. 1:4 (“he has chosen us that we should be holy”) and in 1 Pet. 1:2 (“elect unto obedience”).

70. images

71. WS: Baur (Gegensatz, 216) shows that the same inconsistency, in first asserting and then denying inability, appears in the Lutheran doctrine of regeneration as stated in the Formula of Concord.

72. WS: The Septuagint, contrary to New Testament usage, incorrectly renders this by houlo- mai images = to decide) instead of llwlo images = to desire).

73. images

74. WS: Cf. Edwards. On Decrees and Election 59-62; Howe, Reconciliableness of God’s Prescience with His Sincerity; Baxter, Directions for Spiritual Peace and Comfort 1.252 (ed. Bacon).

75. images

76. images

77. images

78. WS: Augustine (Enchiridion 101) shows how one man in doing right may agree with the revealed will of God and disagree with the secret will; and another in doing wrong may disagree with the revealed will and agree with the secret. A sick father has two sons. One of them is godly and desires and prays for his father’s recovery. The other is wicked and desires and prays for his father’s death. God purposes that the father shall die, and he does die. See Owen, Armiiri-anism, 5.

79. voluntas signi = will of sign, i.e., his revealed will

80. voluntas beneplaciti = will ol good pleasure

81. images= well pleased

82. images = satisfied

83. images = that which does not hinder (an action) is responsible (for it)

84. images = wrath

85. ad inclinandas eorum voluntates

86. images

87. UlpSUS est prirnus homo , quia Dominus ita expedire ccnsuc ra t: cur ce ns ucri t nos lat el. Certurn ramen est non a liter ce ns u isse , nisi quia vidc lxu nominis su i gloriaminde merito illustrari . Ubi mentionem gloriae Dei audis, illic justitiam cogita. Justum enim oported quod lauderm meretur. Cadit igitur homo, Dei providentia sic ordinante: sed suo vitio cadit.

88. sed suo vitio cadit

89. Pro nu ntiavera t paulo ante Dominu s omnia quae fecerat esse valde bona. Unde ergo ilia homini pravitasut a Deo def iciat ? Ne ex creatione putaretur, elogio suo approbaverat Deus quod profectum erat a se ipso. Propriaergo malitia, quam acceperat a Domino puram naturam corrupit; sua ruina totam posteritatem in exitium suum attraxit. Quare in corrupta potius himani generis natura evidentem damnationis causam, quae nobis propinquior est, contemplemur, quam absconditam ac penitus incomprehensibilem inquiramus in Dei praedestinatione. Tametsi aeterna Dei providentia in eam cui subjacet calamitatem conditus est horno, a se ipso tamen ejus mate-riam, non a Deo, sumpsit; quando nulla alia ratione sic perditus est, nisi quia a pura Dei creatione in vitiosam et impuram perversitatem degeneravit

90. cadit homo Deo sic ordinante, sed suo vitio

91. de nihilo (which carries essentially the same meaning as ex nihilo)

92. from the outside

93. images = except

94. images =the son of perdition

95. images = except

96. images = Naaman the Syrian

97. In this connection Richard Muller's observation about the "horrible decree" is worth repeating: "Decretum horrible: terrifying decree; a much-abused term from Calvin. It does not translate 'horrible decree' and in no way implies that the eternal decree is somehow unjust or horrifying, but only that the decree is awesome and terrifying, particularly to those who are not in Christ"; Richard A. Muller, Dictionary of Greek and Latin Theological Terms (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985), 88.

98. To images intelligendum est comparate pro amore minori et diminuto.

99. images

Part 3:
7. Creation

1. images

2. images= to create

3. images= to create by making

4. images

5. The Oal is the simplest pattern of the Hebrew verb. It is used to express the basic meaning of the verb root. The Piel is a Hebrew verb pattern that may also express the basic meaning for some verb roots, though it more usually indicates some intensification of the action. For verbs whose Oal pattern represents a state or condition rather than an action (e.g., “to be heavy”), the Piel will refer to bringing about or making that condition (e.g., “to make heavy”).

6. images= to make

7. ex, non designat sed excludit materiam

8. images

9. images

10. images= from nonexisting things

11. ex nihilo nihil fit

12. nullam rem e nihilo gigni divinitus unquam

13. De principiis philosophiae Renati Descartes.

14. substantia una et unica

15. petitio principii

16. WS: A similar petitio principii is seen in von Baer’s definition of evolution, adopted by Spencer, as the “transformation [transmutation] of the homogeneous into the heterogeneous.” That a homogeneous substance (say, vegetable) can be transmuted into a heterogeneous substance (say, animal or mineral) is the point in dispute, but is quietly assumed in the definition. And. in order to give plausibility to this petitio, a false definition of the “homogeneous” is introduced. It is defined as “that which is without organs,” the heterogeneous being “that which has organs” (Carpenter, Physiology, 888). But the presence or absence of organs is not a mark of a difference in substance, which is what is requisite in order to heterogeneity. Vegetable protoplasm before the differentiation into organs begins is as really vegetable substance as afterward. Animal protoplasm is as really animal matter before the organs appear as after. There is nothing heterogeneous in either instance. Another petitio principii of the same kind appears in the agnostic definition ol knowledge as “classification.* According to this delinition, nothing can be known unless it can be brought under a class; and a class implies several individuals of the same species. “The first cause, the infinite, in order to be known must be classed,” says Spencer (First Principles, 81). But as the infinite is the only one of the species, he cannot be put into a class, and therefore he is utterly unknowable. The point in dispute is whether all knowledge is classification and is quietly assumed by the agnostic in his definition of knowledge. Even in regard to those objects which can be classified, the whole of our knowledge does not consist merely in knowing the class to which they belong. Classification is only one of several elements in cognition.

17. ex nihilo nihil fit

18. WS: On this dogma of creation ex nihilo, so vital to theism, ethics, and religion, see Cud-worth. Intellectual System, chap. 5; Pearson, On the Creed, art. I; Clarke. Demonstration, 76; Augustine, Confessions 11-12; Ambrose, Hexaemeron 2.1-2; Shedd, History oj Doctrine 1.7-15; Theological Essays, 133-35. 154-59.

19. images= there was not when he was not

20. images = matter

21. WS: See also City of God 11.9; On the Literal Meaning of Genesis 1.9.15; Gangauf, Augusti-nus, 100. Howe (Oracles 2 .9) lakes the same view, as does Pearson, On the Creed, art. 1. Delitzsch (Old Testament History of Redemption, 12) says that “the account of the creation begins with an all-comprehending statement (Gen. 1:1). The creation which is here intended is the very first beginning, which was not preceded by any other and hence embraces the heaven of heavens. That which follows in the second verse is confined to the earth and its heavens.”

22. multum impares (i.e., to our days)

23. WS: For a lucid statement ol the teachings of geology concerning the order of creation, see Dana, Creation.

24. images

25. images

26. images

27. images

28. WS: This is (he rendering of the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Authorized Version. But even if that of the Targums, Syriac, Gesenius, and many modern Hebraists, whom the Revised Version follows, be adopted, it still appears from the narrative that there was a time when “no plant of the field was yet in the earth and no herb of the field had yet sprung up.” In this state ol things, it is plain that the earth could not “bring forth” what was not “in the earth,” except by the intervention of a creative act.

29. WS: Philo (Questions on Genesis) so explains: “Moses here (Gen. 2:5) intimates, in enigmatic expressions, the incorporeal species which were created first in accordance with the intellectual nature which those things which are upon the earth perceptible to the outward senses were to imitate.”

30. images

31. vis inertiae

32.from the outside

33.from the outside

34. images= mind is the beginning of motion

35. Corpus omne pei”severare in statu quo quiescendi vel movendi uniformiter in directum, nisi quatenus illud. a viribus impressis, cogitur statum suum mutare.

36. vis inertiae

37. WS: Darwin's theory of evolution requires a Creator to account for the primitive pro-toplasm, though no Creator subsequently.

38. WS: "The progress of science is incalculably promoted by the existence of a body of men, trained to the study of the higher mathematics, who are prepared when an abstruse theory comes before the world to appreciate its evidence, to take steady hold of its principles, to pursue its calculations, and to convert it into a portion of the permanent science of the world" (Whewell, Inductive Sciences 2.130). Pseudoevolution has had no endorsement of this kind.

39. WS: The theory that thought is nothing but cerebration and that all mental phenomena result from the motion of the molecules of the brain was taught in the University of Laputa, according to Swift. Among the various methods of instruction employed in that wonderful institution, Lemuel Gulliver mentions the following: "I was at the mathematical school, where the master taught his pupils after a method scarce imaginable to us in Europe. The proposition and demonstration were fairly written on a thin wafer, with ink composed of a cephalic tincture. This, the student was to swallow upon a fasting stomach, and for three days following eat nothing but bread and water. As the wafer digested, the tincture mounted to his brain, bearing the proposition along with it" (Gulliver's Travels, 5).

40. from the outside

41. WS: The following facts go to prove the comparatively recent origin of the solar system. (1) The earth is cooling slowly, yet at such a rate as to make it impossible that it should have existed many millions of years. It would have been stone cold clear through, in that case. (2) There is reason to believe that the earth is not rotating on her axis with the same rapidity as in lor-mer ages, and inasmuch as her shape would have been different if, at the same time she was in a molten state, she had been rotating more rapidly than now, it follows that she has not been rotating so long as has been supposed. (3) The sun is parting with caloric at such a rate as to make it certain that it could not have continued to radiate heat at the same rate for more than a few millions of years. (4) The changes in the earth's crust, stupendous and varied as they are. could be and probably were accomplished in shorter periods than some geologists consider possible (Quarterly Review 1876).

42. WS: It is claimed that the same amount of heat produced by the combustion of the carbon in a man's dinner would be produced by the same amount of carbon if burnt out of the body. But no experiment has proved that the vital heat in this instance is equivalent mathematically to the chemical heat or that the two are identical in kind. Cf. Cooke, Credentials of Science,172-73.

43. from the outside

44. omne animal ex ovo est

45. WS: The hopefulness of the evolutionist is expressed in the words of Wagner in the second part of Goethe's Faust, act 2: Look yonder! see the flashes from the hearth !
Hope for the world dawns there, that, having laid
The stuff together of which man is made.
The hundredfold ingredients mixing, blending,
(For upon mixture is the whole depending).
If then in a retort we slowly mull it,
Next to a philosophic temper dull it.
Distil and redistil, at leisure thin it.
All will come right, in silence , to a minute.
Turning again to the hearth.
Tis fonning—every second brings it nearer—
Andmy conviction becomes stronger, clearer.
What nature veils in mystery, I expect
Through the plain understanding to effect;
What was organization will at last
Be with the art of ma king crystals classed.

46. WS: The loose use of the term species covers up much sophistical reasoning of the evo-lutionists. Quatrefages (Human Species, 96) says: "Darwin has formed no clear conception of the sense which he gave to the word species; I have been unable to find in any of his works a single precise statement on this point." Darwin remarks that "it seems probable that allied species are descended from a common ancestor.” The connection in which this is said shows that by “allied species” he means only varieties of pigeons, dogs, etc.

47. lex legum

48. Non ad translationem generis, sed ad aegritudinem quandam seminis, videtur esse referendum.

49. WS: This supposes that in nature an eye can be found in isolation, by itself, separate from the body of which it is the eye. But nature never forms organs in this way. They are found only in connection with the organization and growth of the entire body.

50. pine

51. horse

52. pear tree

53. WS: Lewis, “On the Early Populations of the Globe” in “Genesis” in Lange’s Commentary, 314-15; Southall, Recent Origin of Man; Pouchet, Universe, 609; Fraser, Blinding Lights; Lyell, Antiquity of Man; Quatrefages, Human Species 3.12-13; British Quarterly Review 1863 (review of Lyell); Cabell, Unity of Mankind.

54. Les textes de Manethou sont prolondement alteres, et la serie des dates monumentales est tres incomplete.

55. WS: Hume, Popidousness of Ancient Nations; “Population” in Penny Cyclopaedia; Wallace, Dissertation on the Numbers of Mankind; Petavius, Computation in Thomas Brown’s Pseu-dodoxia 6.6.

56. Gleaning of the fathers

57. let it bring forth

58. final causes. In the Aristotelian scheme of causality, a final cause refers to the goal or end toward which an entity or activity tends.

59. in through a leap, suddenly. The meaning here is that species arise suddenly rather than gradually.

Part 3:
8. Providence

1. Deus concurrit cum causis secundis juxta ipsarum naturam; cum liberis libere, cum ne-cessariis necessario, cum debilibus debiliter, cum fortibus fortitur, pro sua suavissima dispo-sitione universali operando.

2. images= and we are/exist

3. magna dii curant, parva negligunt

4. images = matter

5. images = matter

Part 3:
9. Miracles

1. Nec deus intersit, nisi dignus vindicc nodus incident.

2. praeter omnem piiorem experientiam

Part 4:
1. Man’s Creation

1. images= a word or discourse about man(kind)

2. images

3. images

4. images

5. images

6. WS: Augustine describes man as the union of spiritual and corporeal substance (Letter 137 to Volusianus): “Persona hominis mixture est animae et corporis, duarum rerum com-mixtio: unius incorporeae, et alterius corporeae; nam si anima in sua natura non (allatur. incor-poream se esse comprehcndit” [AG: In the person of man is a mixture of soul and body, a commixture of two things: the one incorporeal and the other corporeal. For if the soul is not mistaken regarding its own nature, it comprehends itself to be incorporeal]; “Ouicquid enim corpus non est, et tamen aliquid est, jam recte spiritus dicitur” [AG: For whatever is not body, but nevertheless is something, indeed is rightly called “spirit”]; On the Literal Meaning of Genesis 12.7.16; cf. Gangauf, Psychology of Augustine, 101.

7. WS: Hodge notices the contrariety of the two views: “If we reconcile the condemnation of men on account of the sin of Adam, on the ground that he was our representative or that he sustained the relation which all parents bear to their children, we renounce the ground of a realistic union. If the latter theory be true, then Adam’s sin was our act as truly as it was his. If we adopt the representative theory, his act was not our act in any other sense than that in w hich a representative acts for his constituents” (Theology 2.164). “A union of representation is not a union of identity. If Adam and his race were one and the same, he was not their representative, for a thing cannot represent itself. The two ideas are inconsistent. Where the one is asserted, the other is denied” (Princeton Essays 1.138).

8. guilt, culpability

9. obligation/liability to punishment

10. middle knowledge

11. images= man, mankind

12. images

13. images

14. images

15. WS: Gesenius does not agree with this statement: images= man, mankind) is rarely put for the singular, is more commonly collective for the whole race (Job 7:17; 15:14; Ps, 8:5). It is the same as images= man, mankind), but only in poetic style."

16. images

17. images= man

18. images = man (i.e., male)

19. images= man (or Adam)

20. images= man

21. primos illos homines in paradiso

22. the first ones formed, the first men

23. images

24. images

25. images

26. images

27. images= begotten

28. images= flesh

29. images

30. images

31. images = spirit of holiness

32. images= flesh

33. images= to become

34. images

35. images

36. images= of our

37. images

38. images

39. images

40. images= flesh

41. images(sarfx)bezeicchnet heir so wening als irgendwo den Leib (daher der Creationismus sich für die Lehre, dasz der Leib allein von den Ältern gezeugt werde, die Seele aber von Gott geschaffen werde, mit Unrecht auf diese Stelle beruft); sondern images (sarx) bezeichnet hier, wie immer, das natürliche durch creaturliche Krafte zu Stande kommende Leben.

42. images

43. images

44. images

45. images= we are Jews by nature

46. images= sinned

47. images= all sinned

48. images= all were regarded as sinners

49. images= sinned

50. WS: Cf. As You Like II 1.1: “I know you are my elder brother the courtesy of nations allows you my better, in that you are the firstborn: but the same tradition takes not away my blood, were there twenty brothers between us: I have as much of my father in me as you.”

51. images= to fashion or form

52. images= transgression

53. tradux peccati, tradux animae

54. sensu physico et ralione seminali

55. nondum erant in rerum natura

56. Eadem ratione constituimur peccatores in Adamo, qua justi constituimur in Christo. At in Christo justi constituimur per justitiae imputationem; ergo et peccatores in Adamo per peccati ipsius imputationem.

57. in rerum natura

58. qui totius prosapiae suae personam tunc gerebat

59. ut rami in radice, massa in primitiis, et membra in capite

60. Representare est vi quadam juris exhibere praesentiam ejus, quod praesens non est.

61. WS: A similar incongruity is found in the combination of creationism with traducianism, attempted by Martensen (Dogmatics 74) and Domer (Christian Doctrine 2.353).

62. Est unitas naturae, cui unitas fbederalis erat innixa.

63. WS: Turretin denominates the federal union the principal union (praecipue). But if it be true that Adam and his posterity were not constituted a unity by the covenant (foedus) of works, it cannot be the primary and principal one.

64. massa - mass

65. natura = nature

66. essentia = essence

67.Etsi enim in Adamo et Heva, natura initio pura, bona, et sancta creata est; tamen per lapsum, peccatum ipsorum naturam invasil.

68. Lapsus Adae vi pessima, humana tola massa, natura, et ipsa essentia corrupta est.

69. Nec negat ab altera parte apostolus mulieris peccatum, cum unum hominem, quern ceu  Christoopponit, peccati propagati auctorem, in quo peccavimuset morimur i mines, esse docet, quern expresse quoque Adamum vocat. Coll. Rom. 5:12-19 cum 1 Cor. 15:21-22.

70. primos illos homines in paradiso

71. The most extensive library of the fathers

72. Quaeritur quomodo peccatum habeamus ab origine nostra quae est Adam et Eva.

73.

74. Omnes peccaverunt, hoc est, culpa et reatu tenentur.

75. by participation of guilt

76. by the imputation of the obligation to punishment

77. WS: The proof that participation in the first sin is an essential point in early Calvinism has been carefully collected by Landis in a volume entitled Original Sin and Gratuitous Imputation. The author, however, while asserting participation and combating the later doctrine of mere representation by Adam, with particular reference to the views of Hodge, yet rejects the realistic doctrine of race-existence as the true explanation (13, 20, 31). In so doing, he departs from both Augustine and the elder Calvinists, as much as do the advocates of the representative theory. For it is clear that there can be no participation in the first sin unless the posterity are in existence to participate in it. And the only way in which they could exist and act in Adam is as a single specific nature. They could not exist in Adam as an aggregate of millions of individuals.

78. WS: Breckenridge (Theology, 499), on the contrary, contends that “we must not attempt to separate Adam’s federal from his natural headship, by which he is the root of the human race; since we have not a panicle ol reason to believe that the former would ever have existed without the latter.”

79. images= sinned

80. images=sinned

81. peccati poenam subire

82. pro peccati [sic] culpam sustines

83. images= sinned

84. Per unius illius voluntatem malam omnes in eo peccaverunt, quando omnes ille unus fuerunt.

85. obligation to punishment

86. Repudianda prorsus est papistica distinctio inter reatum culpae et poenae.

87. Reatus est obligatio peccatoris ad poenam justam sustinendam propter culpam.

88. potential obligation (to punishment)

89. actual obligation (to punishment)

90. the obligation to guilt

91. the obligation to punishment

92. Reatus est potentialis, qui notat meritum intrinsicum poenae, quod a peccato insepa-rabile est; vel actualis, qui per dei misericordiam ab eo separari potest, per remissionem scilicet, quae proprie est reatus actualis ablatio. Ille pertinet ad peccati demeritum, et TO KaraKpi TIKOV seu condemnabilitatem, quae semper, peccato adhaeret. Iste vero ad demeriti judicium, seu KaTcocpiua, condemnationem, quae tollitur in iis quibus venia peccati facta est.

93. Perperam vero a Pontificiis distinguitur reatus in lapsum culpae et poenae: reatus culpae illis dicitur, quo peccator ex se indignus est dei gratia, dignus autem est ipsius ira et damna-tione; poenae vero, quo obnoxius est damnationi, et ad earn obligatur.

94. Inepte distinguunt Pontificii inter reatum poenae et reatum culpae, quasi a nobis pos-sit tolli reatus culpae manente tamen realu poenae: quasi Christus nos liberasset a culpa, sed ita ut nos ipsi luamus poenam, vel in purgatorio, vel alibi: quod est falsissimum. Ubi enim nulla est culpa, ibi nullus prorsus reatus, nullaque poena concipi potest.

95. images= sinned

96. culpability

97. punishment

98. WS: It may be objected that on the traducian theory the human nature ot Christ did participate in Adam's sin because it was a fractional part of the original human nature which committed this sin. This is true; and if Christ had been born by ordinary generation and his human nature had not been supematurally prepared for a union with the divine, he would have shared the common guilt of Adam's sin. But the effect of the miraculous conception and incarnation upon Christ's humanity was to abolish both the guilt and the pollution derived through the virgin mother from Adam. Christ's human nature was both justified and sanctified before it was assumed into union with the Logos—justified proleptically, as were the Old Testament saints, on the ground of an atonement yet to be made and sanctified completely by the power of the Holy Spirit. This justification and sanctification of Christ's human nature was tantamount to nonparticipation in Adam's sin. For it placed Christ's human nature in the same innocent and perfect state that the common human nature was in by creation and before apostasy. See pp. 475-76. For Owen's statement on this point, see Communion with the Trinity, 1.

99. WS: While dissenting from the views of Hodge on the nature of the union between Adam and his posterity and of the imputation of the first sin, the writer has the most profound respect for the opinions of this learned and logical theologian. With the exception of the elder Edwards, to no divine is American theology more indebted.

100. images= according to debt/what is owed

101. images= according to grace

102. images= freely

103. images= without works

104. images= according lo debt/what is owed

105. images= freely

106. images =without works

107. WS: "Nec si Adamus nos injustos constituit effective per propagationem vitiositatis inhaerentis, propter quam etiam rei sumus mortis coram deo: sequitur pariter Christum nos justos constituere per justilicationem forensem judicii dei per justitiam inhaerentem nobis ab ipsodatam. Quia scopus Apostoli, qui unice respiciendus, non eo tendet, sed tantum vult aperire fundamentum communionis reatus ad mortem, et juris ad vitam, ex unione nostra cum Adamo primo et secundo, quoad rem, licet modus sit diversus propter diversilatem subjecli." [AG: Nor if Adam constituted us unrighteous efficiently through the propagation of an inhering corruption, on account of which even we are obligated to death before God, does it follow equally that Christ constituted us righteous through the forensic justification of God’s judgment through an inhering righteousness granted to us by him. The scope of the apostle’s argument, which alone is to be considered, does not extend to this. He only wishes to show the ground of the common obligation to death and ol the r ight to life from our union with the first and second Adam, as to the fact of it, even though the mode is diverse on account of the diversity of the subject.] This phraseology of Turretin, taken by itself, would teach the mediate imputation of Adam’s sin, which Turretin combated. If Adam’s posterity are constituted unrighteous merely and only “by the propagation of inherent depravity’1 (and this is all he says here), this was the view of Pla-caeus. But in other places, Turretin abundantly teaches that there is a reason for this propagation of depravity—namely, the immediate imputation of the first sin. The propagation of inherent depravity requires an explanatory and justifying reason; but the advocate of mediate imputation in denying the imputation of the first sin itself gives none. So far as Turretin held to natural union, the logical reason for the propagation of depravity would be the imputation of the first sin to the posterity because of their participation in it; so far as he held to representative union, the logical reason would be the imputation of the first sin to the posterity constructively and without participation.

108. Effective, per propagationem vitiositatis inhaerentis.

109. WS: This is the rendering of the Septuagint and Vulgate. The Targums and Syriac render “Now no plant of the field was yet in the earth, and no herb of the field had yet sprouted forth” (Speaker’s Commentary in loco).

110. images

111. images

112. WS: “Invisible” is preferable to “immaterial” in this connection because the immaterial strictly speaking is the mental and spiritual. Physical life is neither. It belongs to the material world. It is matter, not mind, but in an invisible state or mode.

113. power of life

114. organizing force

115. the healing power of nature

116. WS: Anselm complained ol this same misapprehension of the notion of a species on the part of Roscellin and the Nominalists. He contended that general conceptions were not mere vocis [AG: breath of the voice; i.e., mere words or labels], but denoted substances. “Non-dum intellegit,” he says of Roscellin; “quomodo plures hommes [sic] in specie sint unus homo; non potest intelligere aliquid esse hominem, nisi individuum” [AG: he does not yet understand in what way many men are one man in species; he cannot understand anything to be man except the individual]; Baur, Doctrine of the Trinity 2.411-12.

117. WS: The inquiry may arise whether carbon, here, is not a species and the crystal an individual under it—contrary to what was said on p. 468 respecting the inorganic sphere. The reply is that the crystal though having an individuality has not a specific individuality. This requires that the individual be produced by propagation and have no other properties than those which are in the specific substance. But a crystal is not produced by propagation, and even in the instance of the diamond, which is the purest form of carbon, it is not absolutely free from other properties than those of carbon: while anthracite, charcoal, and graphite, and other individual forms of carbon are highly impure. Carbon, however, is one of those general terms which denote an objective reality within the sphere of inorganic being and so far goes to prove the truth ol realism. The original sum total of carbon is as objectively real as any one of its individualized parts.

118. universal in the thing (i.e., the universal exists in the thing) (see universals in glossary I)

119. universal before the thing (i.e., the universal exists prior to the particular object) (see universals in glossary 1)

120. WS: On realism and nominalism, see Hase, Anselm 2.77; Neander, History 4.356; Domer, Person of Christ 2.377; Oberweg, History of Philosophy 1.365-66; Baur, Doctrine of the Trinity 2.406-7; Baumgartcn-

Crusius, Concerning the True Difference between the Realist and Nominalist Scholastics.

121. Rudimenta pallium omnium simul parit et producit.

122. images

123. images= out of

124. WS: Creationism asserts that it was incomplex and simple. It was only physical and material.

125. images

126. images

127. WS:That the antithes is, here, between sarx (images = flesh) and pneuma (images= spirit) is the same as in 1 Pet. 3:18 and Rom. 1:3-4—namely, between the humanity and the divinity in Christ's person—is plain from the context. If this be so, the dative is instrumental in both instances, denoting the agency by which the action of the verb is brought about: "God was manifested by the humanity and justified by the divinity." The "justificat ion" of the human nature was through the atonement made by the divine nature incarnate. This view of the antithesis between sarx (images) and pneuma (images = spirit) was taken generally by the older commentators. Of modern exegetes, it is adopted by Wiesinger.

128. images

129. WS: A species or specific nature is divisible, but an individual is not —as the etymology (individuus) implies.

130. Communior est sententia eorum, qui volunt animam esse ex traduce; i.e., animam traduci ex anima, non per decisionem aut partitionem animae patemae, sed modo quodem spirituali, ut lumen accenditur de lumine. Nos autem statuimus, animas omnes immediate a deo creari, et creando infundi.

131. deus est qui nos personat

132. WS: Shedd. Theological Essays, 252: Delitzsch, Biblical Psychology 7.137.

133. WS: It is certainly an error when Band (Elolrim, 356) asserts that “the blood of Cain and Abel does not now flow in any human veins; that human nature is not any longer transmitted from them; but that Seth is the father of the present population of the earth.” The line of Seth was that of the church, and that of Cain of the world as the opposite of the church. Both individuals were concerned in the propagation of the species.

134. being

135. existence

136. Dicitur duobus modis peccatum, personale et na-turale. Et naturale est cum quo nascimur, et quod ab Adam trahimus in quo omnes peccavimus. In ipso enim erat anima mea, specie non persona, non individua sed com-muni natura. Nam omnis humanae animae natura erat in Adam obnoxia peccato. Et ideo omnis humana anima cul-pabilis est secundum suam naturam, etsi non secundum suam personam. Ita peccatum quo peccavimus in Adam, mihi quidem naturale est, in Adam vero personale. In Adam gravius, levius in me; nam peccavi in eo non qui sum, sed quod sum. Peccavi homo (quod sum), sed non Odo (qui sum). Peccavi substantia, non persona; et quia substantia non est nisi in persona, peccatum substantiae est etiam personae, sed non personale. Peccatum vero personale est quod facio ego qui sum, non hoc quod sum; quo pecco Odo, non homo; quo pecco persona, non natura; sed quia persona non est sine natura, peccatum personae est etiam naturae, sed non naturale.

137. Sicut aliquid de universali dicitur pro individuo, sic aliquid dicitur pro parte de toto; ut propter animam solam dicatur peccator homo individuus, qui animam simul habet et corpus. Ad corpus peccatum non pertinel, et tamen peccator est qui corpus habet. non igitur anima sola peccase dicitur in Adam, sed et ipse per animam, scilicet totus ex pluribus partibus per unam. Dicitur ergo et Adam pecasse, quia peccavit anima quam habuit ipse. Et si peccavit Adam, peccavit homo; quia si peccavit ipse homo, peccavit humana natura quae est homo. Sed humana natura tota tunc erat in ipso, nec usquam erat alibi specialis homo. Cum ergo peccavit persona, scilicet ipse homo, peccavit tota natura, scilicet communis homo. Et in peccato personae, culpabilis factus est homo communis naturae. Et qualem Adam fecit humanam naturam in se, talem posteris etiam post se. Et qualis lacta est humana natura per insipientiam peccatoris, talis necesse est transfundatur in posteros per justitiam.

138. rootstock (according to Irven Resnick in Odo of Tournai's On Original Sin and a Disputation with the Jew, Leo, concerning the Advent of Christ, the Son ol God [trans. L M. Resnick; Philadelphia: University of Philadelphia Press, 1994], 70)

139. nutritive power (according to Resnick in Odo of Toumai's On Original Sin ,70)

140. ust (according to Resnick in Odo of Tournai's On Original Sin, 71)

141. Dicunt seminatoresanimarum, quorum rationem post orthodoxos insumpsimus dicere, quod omnis anima venit de traduce, id est anima per semen de anima, sicut e jus corpus per semen propagatur de corpore, vel arbor de arbore, et sic esse vim seminariam in anima, quemad-modum in corpore. In animalibus enim nisi trim vegetabilem trahat semen parentis, non proficit ad cre-ationem (i.e., generationem) sequentis prolis, nam semen fusum in femina, quomodo pullulat nisi vim animae vegetabilem trahat? Quomodo concrescit in viscera praeg-nantis seminatum, nisi utcunque fuerit animatum? Infun-dantur urina de parente, vel sputum, vel aliud quidquam, non proticit in partum, vel in prolem ullam, nec unquam natum est animal tali infusione, quia talis infusio caret animatione. Nullam vim animae talis infusio trahit, ideo non prospicit in partum, nec inde pullulat aliquid… . Trahit ergo secum semen corporis semen animae, scilicet vim vegetationis quae corporeum semen vegetet in humanam formam, ipse cum eo succrescens in rationalem animam, ut sicut particula quae non est humanum corpus ab humano corpore fluit in sementem, sic particula quae non est humana anima ab humana anima decurrat ut semen. Et sicut pruritus corporis non solet sine delecta-tione animae fieri, sic pruritus a corpore non excutit seminarium liquorem nisi simul animae deleclatio produ-cat ab anima seminariam vim, id est vegetabilitatem ut sit humanae animae vis vegetabilis, sicut seminarius liquor semen est corporis. Et sicut simul procedunt causae, scilicet delectatioet pruritus, sic simul sequuntur effectus, id est vis vegetabilis et liquor seminarius simul etiam cum crescendo proficiunt, hoc usque ad humanam tormam, illud ad rationalem animam, inde simul manent in una persona usque ad mortem. Causae conjunctae simul jun-gunt suos effectus in unum individuum ejus quod constat ex animae et corpore… . Tolle animam, non facit corpus semen; facit semen, habet igitur animam. Habet ergo semen ab anima vim vegetabilem. Aut habet ab anima, aut a corpore. Si a corpore, tolle animam et funde semen, et dabimus palmam tibi victoriae si videamus sequentem prolem. Si autem non potest fieri, confitere veritatem, et animae concede vim vegetabilem. Et licet ipsa vis non sit anima, per earn tamen ab anima propagatur anima, et fit semen animae propagantis animam.

142. mode/way of propagation

143. Animas eorum qui Adamo et Eva progeniti fuis-sent non creatas, neque etiam generatas, sed propagatas fuisse

144. Anima humana non immediate creator, sed medi-ante semine foecundo a parentibus generatur et in liberos traducitur. Non generatur anima ex traduce sine semine foecundo tanquam principio materiali, sed per traducem seu mediante semine prolifico tanquam vehiculo, propagatur

145. Consensus Repetitus, Fidei verae Lutheranae, Punct. 22.

146. Profitemur et docemus, hominem generare hominem, idque non tantum quoad corpus sed etiam ani-mam. Rejicimus eos qui docent in hominibus singulis ani-mas singulas non ex propagine oriri sed ex nihilo tunc pri-mum creari et infundi cum in uteris matrum foetus concept] atque ad animationem praeperati sunt.

147. omnes eramus unus ille homo

148. not simply as another’s, but even as our own; neither as innocent, but as ompanions of the offense, and guilty together with him

149. omnes eramus unus ille homo

Part 4:
2. Man’s Primitive State

1. images(to beliion kai to timiOteron pro-teron einai te pltysei dokei)

2. Vetustissimi mortalium, nulla adhue mala libidine. sine probro, scelere, eoque sine poena aut coercitalionibus, agebant: neque praemiis opus erat, cum honesta suopte ingenio peteren-tur: et ubi nihil contra morem cuperent, nihil per metum vetabantur.

3. images= according to God

4. we are not born full

5. in a state of pure nature. Richard A. Muller translates this phrase as “in a purely natural condition”; see Dictionary of Greek and Latin Theological Terms (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985), 151.

6. WS; The narrative in Genesis speaks ol a knowledge like that of “God” (Gen. 3:22) and like that of “the gods” or Satan and his angels (3:5). The knowledge is described from two points of view. Adam, by apostasy, came to have a knowledge of evil similar to that of God in that it was a thorough knowledge and a knowledge identical with that of Satan, because it was a conscious knowledge. Respecting the knowledge of unfallen Adam, see Augustine, City of God 22.30; Stillingfleet, Origines Sacrae 1.2.3.

7. from within

8. WS: Throughout this discussion, self-determination is synonymous with spontaneity or inclination.

9. images = from itself

10. images

11. voluntarie moveri est ex se moveri, et non ab alio

12. WS: “Fons erroris est, libertatis naturam metiri ex iooppoTtio:,let ei to duxfeippeita; essen-tiale facere; cum per lubentiam et spontaneitatem definienda sit” [AG: The source of the error is that the nature of liberty is to be measured by indifferent inclination (isorropia) and to make ambiguity (to amphirrepes) essential to it. Rather, liberty should be defined in terms of willingness and spontaneity); Turretin 6.5.11.

13. possibility of sinning.

14. libertas indifferentiae est impossibilis

15. WS: Sometimes “indifference” is employed to denote the possibilitas peccandi (possibility of sinning) connected with Adam’s mutable holiness. Maresius (System 6.23) so uses it: “Libertatem tribuimus homini primo, non solum spontaneitatis, quod nempe ultro et absque coactione ruerit in peccatum, sed etiam indifferentiae, juxta quam potuissct abstinere a peccato, et in illo statu permanere” [AG: We attribute liberty to the first man, not only of spontaneity—because no doubt he fell into sin of his own accord and without coercion—but also of indifference, according to which he would have been able to refrain from sin and to remain in that state]. But this is not the ordinary use of the term. Nor is it a proper use of it. Holy Adam, while “able to abstain from sin and to continue holy,” was not indifferent to holiness. Howe also asserts that the human will “was created without any determination to good; it was made in such a state of liberty as to be in a certain sort of equipoise, according as things should be truly or falsely represented by the leading faculty, the mind or understanding” (Oracles 2.22). Howe supposes this in order to explain the possibility of the fall. The understanding of Adam was capable of being deceived because it was finite. And the will was capable of yielding to the decep-tion. This capability he calls an “equipoise” of the will. A will not in equipoise but inclined to holiness is capable of yielding to deception or any other temptation, providing it be a finite and mutable will. It is not necessary to assume absolute indifference to holiness and sin in order to account for the apostasy of Adam’s will. While, however, asserting this indifference, Howe does not regard it as a necessary element in freedom. It was necessary only in order to probation. It is “not a perfection belonging immutably to the nature of man,” he says. Alter the tall, it disappears. The sinful will is not in equipoise. Nor is the holy will in its perfect state in heaven.

16. images= cause, reason, charge, ground for complaint

17. from the outside

18. originated inclination

19. originating inclination

20. originating inclination

21. originated inclination

22. images = spectacle, sight

23. images

24. not able to sin (see posse peccare el non posse peccare in glossary 1)

25. images

Part 4:
3. Human Will

1. WS: In this reasoning, however, Edwards, as is frequently the case, does not mark off choice or volition from desire. He calls a volition a desire. “All things considered,” he says, “the man chooses to utter such words and does not desire not to utter them.” Here, the volition by which the words are spoken is called a “desire.” But this is not desire as spoken of by Locke, when he says that the man does not desire that the words shall be effectual to persuade. The desire and the volition, in Locke’s use of the terms, which is also the correct use, are two different acts of the will, and one may not agree with the other. But the desire and the volition, in Edward’s use, in this place, are one and the same act and of course cannot disagree with each other.

2. WS: A full classification on this basis would be understanding, will, and instinct (using the latter term in a wide sense). The old psychology, however, did not formally appropriate the term instinct to designate the involuntary side of man’s nature, but left it undesignated.

3. WS: The classification of the instinctive desires is various. Hopkins (Outlines, lect. 9),besides the physical appetites, enumerates the desire of existence, good (happiness), power, knowledge, property, esteem, liberty, society, beauty. These can all be brought under the category of the finite. No one of them is desire for God and spiritual good.

4. amor seu dilectio valentior est voluntas

5. Affectus in deo nihil aliena sunt quam actus voluntatis divinae.

6. Voluntas, quae est appetitus rationalis, semper est conjuncta cum appetitu sensitivo, ita quidem, ut ipse appetitus sensitivus in homine proporlionaliter respondeat voluntati.

7. Non omnino involuntarii sunt isti motus, quia nostra voluntate eos attraximus. Nihil obstat, quominus ad peccatum actuale eos etiam motus referamas: quia nimirum concupis-centia actuale peccatum est: motus autem isti aut partes, aut prima puncta, concupisccntiae.

8. Velle, nihil aliud est quam inclinatio quaedam in objectum voluntatis, quod est bonum universale.

9. images = to desire

10. images = to decide

11. images

12. images

13. images

14. images

15. images

16. images

17. images

18. images = love, affection

19. images= heart

20. images= will

21. images = will

22. images= heart, understanding

23. images= spirit

24. images = mind

25. images= thinking, understanding

26. images = life, soul

27. images= spirit

28. images= heart

29. images

30. images = the effective [part]

31. images=will

32. images

33. images= will

34. images= will

35. images= will

36. images = spirit

37. images = mind

38. images = thinking, understanding

39. images

40. images

41. images

42. images

43. images

44. images = heart

45. images = spirit

46. images

47. images

48. images

49. images = spirit

50. images = heart

51. images

52. images

53. images

54. images

55. images

56. images

57. images

58. images

59. Je puis laire de bonnes et fortes actions; je ne puis avoir de bons precédés.

60. WS: Prelcrence is inclination, not choice, though Locke (Understanding 4.31) considers (hem to be identical. Preference is bias. A man can choose what he does not prefer. He can choose pain in a particular instance, though he prefers pleasure. He can control his choice by a volition, but not his preference.

61.WS: Sometimes a volition may be exerted without any inclination prompting it. Out oftliim silver dollars, all newly minted and all alike, a man may take one arbitrarily. He has no motive or inclination to take the one he does take, rather than another: stat pro ratione volun- tas [AG: the will stands lor the reason]. This is caprice. Such a volition is uncommon and has no morality. Il is only a sporadic spasmodic act of the will that moves the muscles convulsively.

62. possibility of sinning

63. originating righteousness

64. originated righteousness

65. originating sin

66. WS: This designation of the subjective and objective aspect of an active principle by the active and passive participle is employed by the philosopher as well as the theologian. A force of nature contemplated subjectively as energizing and producing effects is called natura natu-rans; contemplated objectively as having energized and produced an effect it is called natura naturata. Gravitation viewed subjectively as cause is the invisible force. This is natura naturans. Gravitation viewed objectively as effect is the visible phenomenon or fact (e.g., the falling apple). This is natura naturata. The old English poet Hawes (Pastime of Pleasure, chaps. 25, 39) employs the terms: The right hye power Nature, naturying Naturate made the bodyes above. In sundry wise, to take their working That aboute the worlde naturallye do move. Till that dame Nature naturying had made All thinges to growe.

67. originated sin

68. WS: The following arc examples of the indiscriminate use of inclination and choice by Edwards: “II the will, all things now considered, inclines or chooses to go that way, then it cannot choose, all things now considered, to go the other way and so cannot choose to be made to go the other way” (Will 3.4). Edwards, here, is speaking of inclination, not of volition. Again, he says: “The thing which has led men into this inconsistent notion of action when applied to volition, as though it were essential to this internal action …” (Will 4.2). Here, Edwards designates the internal action or inclination of the will bv the term volition.

69. WS: Hartmann in his Philosophy of the Unconscious makes will synonymous with vitality. Animal growth, animal instinct, and animal lust equally with human inclination and volition are alike modes of will, according to this theorist. The distinction between nature and spirit, matter and mind, is denied, and the whole universe is converted into a blind pantheistic movement of physical appetite and bestial desire called “will.”

70. See noumenon and phenomenon in glossary 1 for the Kantian distinction between these two terms.

71. the thing in itself

72. originating

73.originated

74. WS: “The subject of the Paradise Lost is the origin of evil—an era in existence, an event more than all others dividing past from future time, an isthmus in the ocean of eternity” (Campbell, Essay on English Poetry).

75. WS: Of American writers, Hopkins (Outline Study of Man, 224) distinguishes between “choice” and “volition” in a manner that approximates the distinction between inclination and volition: “Rational choice is the lundamental, the voluntary, the moral pail ol the will; volition is the executive part of the will." "The point of freedom is in choice and in that only. Choice being made, volition follows of course. The one is the essential element of freedom manifesting itself in the spiritual realm and is the immediate object of divine government; the other simply instrumental and executive and is that ol which human governments chiefly lake cognizance" (225; cf. 212, 231, 257). Hickok also tends toward the distinction between inclination and volition in his threefold discrimination ol "immanent preference," "governing purpose," and "desultory volition" and in his definition of "spiritual susceptibility" and "spiritual disposition" (Empirical Psychology, 282-92). But both Hopkins and Hickok adopt the classification of intellect, sensibility, and will.

76. images= will

77. images= will

78. WS; Hodge (Theology 2.307) defines a self-determined will as "acting independently of reason, conscience, inclinations, and feelings." This is the Arminian volitionary self-determination, which is accompanied with the power to the contrary.

79. WS: Owen (Arminianism, 12) defines freedom, with Prosper, as "a spontaneous appetite of what seems good unto it: liberum arbitrium est rei sibi placilae spontaneus appetitus."

80. Libertas est spontaneitas intelligentis, itaque, quod spontaneum est in bruto vel alia substantia intellectus experte, id in homine vel in alia substantia intelligente, altius assurgit et liberum appellatur.

81. images

82. images

83. images

84. WS: inclination

85. WS: volition

86. WS: desire

87. WS: desire

88. WS: desires

89. unwillingly

90. WS: inclination

91. from the outside

92. from the outside

93. a certain free impulse

94. serially, in succession

95. in the direction ol what came belore (i.e., looking backward in time)

96. a material automaton/machine

97. a spiritual automaton/machine

98. Inanimatum est omne quod impulso agitur extemo; quod autem anima est, id motu cietur interiore et suo.

99. Voluntarie declinans in unam partem magis quam in alteram.

100. images

101. inclinatio pugnans cum lege dei

102. concupiscentia = concupiscence

103. voluntary inclination

104. originating sin

105. originated

106. from the outside

Part 4:
4. Man’s Probation and Apostasy

1. possibility of sinning

2. WS: The possibility of sinning must not be confounded with the tendency to sin. The possibility of sinning is merely the power to originate sin ex nihilo by the act of self-determination. The tendency to sin implies that the originating or self-determining power has been inwardly exerted, though it may not have been externally. A tendency to sin is an inclination to sin. It is a propensity of the heart and a disposition of the will. The possibility of sinning is innocent; the tendency to sin is sinful.

3. to be able to die

4. to be able not to die. To describe the state of being unable to die, I believe that Shedd should have given the Latin as non posse mori, which would be translated “unable to die.”

5. WS: Wesley held that the death caused by the first sin was spiritual, not physical; yet that it brought physical death upon the brutes; Southey, Weslev, chap. 20.

6. WS:Cf. Howe, Oracles 2.24; Augustine, City of God 14.12, 14; 21.12, 15.

7. images

8. images

9. the highest good

10. images = flesh

11. images = spirit

12. Peccatum non est quid substantial, ut Flacius Illyricus, haud procul a Manichaeismo, saltern deoriginale labe statuebat. Materia peccati proxima est ipsamet vel imagesvel actio vitiosa. (Note, however, the alternate meaning for hexis that Shedd cites below.)

13. images = being in a permanent condition

14. the highest good

15. the highest good

16. pleasant good or a pleasant good thing

17. under the idea/notion of the good

Part 4:
5. Original Sin

1. WS: Hodge (Princeton Essays 1.150. 168) thinks that Edwards here "abandons" the doctrine of immediate imputation which "he maintains in two-thirds of his work on original sin" and adopts mediate imputation. But Edwards, in this place, explicitly imputes the guilt of the first rising of evil desire as well as of the corruption resulting from it; and this rising of evil desire he says was the first sin, which was inseparable from its consequence, namely, corruption of nature. Had Edwards asserted that only the corruption as the effect, but not the rising of evil desire itself as the cause of the effect, is imputed, he would have been liable to the charge of holding mediate imputation.

2. WS: If it be objected to this explanation of the term gods in this place that in Gen. 3:22 the knowledge is described as like that of God himself ("one of us"), the reply is that there are two ways of knowing evil: the one as Satan knows it, namely, by personal sinfulness and self-consciousness; the other as God knows it, namely, by the intuition of omniscience without personal sinfulness and self-consciousness. The knowledge can therefore be spoken of from either point of view. As prohibited, it must have been as a bad knowledge, that is, the knowledge of "the gods" in the bad sense, the knowledge which Satan and his angels had.

3. WS: The lustful looking of Eve is indicated in Luther’s version of Gen. 3:6 (Lange’s Commentary in loco).

4. images

5. images

6. images

7. images

8. images

9. images

10. images = to be desired

11. images = you shall not lust

12. images = lust

13. images = sin

14. images = lust

15. WS: Cf. Heppe, Reformed Dogmatics 2.249; Augustine, Unfinished Work 5; Concerning Nature, Healthy and Corrupt.

16. images

17. images

18. images

19. images

20. images

21. images = sinned

22. images = sinned

23. images = sinned

24. images = in whom all sinned

25. διὰ τῆς ἁμαρτίας = through sin

26. images = sin

27. images = sinned

28. images = sin

29. images = sin

30. images = transgression

31. images = sinned

32. Verbum images (hemarton - sinned) propria non protest trahi ad habitum peccati, vel ad corruptionem habitualem et inhaerentem, sed proprie peccatum aliquod actuale notat, idque praeteritum, quod non potest aliud esse quam ipsum Adami peccatum; aliud quippe est pec-catorem esse vel nasci, aliud vera reipsa peccare.

33. images = sinned

34. images = sinned

35. images = sinned

36. images = to sin

37. images = sinned

38. images = sinned

39. images

40. images = sinned

41. images = 1 sin

42. images = to sin

43. images = to be

44. images = all were regarded as sinners

45. images = I will be (regarded as) a sinner

46. images = I and (my son) Solomon will be counted sinners

47. images = all

48. images = sinned

49. images = death

50. images = sinned

51. images = I sin

52. Haud justum fuissel unius angeli crimen alteri imputari, vel unius hominis peccatum alterius censeri, posito quod singuli seorsim essent creati sicut angeli. Sed est unitas naturae, cui unitas foederalis erat innixa.

53. WS: See Ritschl. History of Justification, 390-410 (trans. Black); Shedd. Theological Essays, 243-54.

54. a partner in crime

55. WS: “Sin,” as Miiller (Sin 2.163) remarks, “must begin, not in a state, but in an act.” Yet the first act of sin, it must be remembered, causes and produces a state of sin.

56. Illis enim verbis | in the decree of the synod] aut exposita non est Placaei sententia, aut male exposita est. Is enim primi peccati Adae imputationem nunquam simpliciter negavit, nun-quam negatam voluit. Cum igitur imputationem primi illius peccati quandam affirmet. quan-dam neget, non exponitur ejus sententia, si dicitur simpliciter, et nulla distinctione adhibita, primi peccati Adae imputationem negare.

57. images

58. images

59. images

60. images

61. images

62. images

63. images

64. images

65. images

66. images

67. images

68. Daninant Pelagianos et alios, qui vitium originis negant esse peccatum. (Vilitmi can also mean “sin, offense, vice.’)

69. WS: Shedd, History of Doctrine 2.35^*2, 180-86; on Rom. 7:15-17; Mullet, Sin 2.400.

70. images = sin

71. images = transgression

72. images = sin

73. images = lust, desire

74. images = flesh

75. images = do not lust/covet

76. images

77. Aliquid concupilum, dictum, factum, contra legem dei.

78. Lex “ne concupiscito” inquit. Itaque et si cupiditate, quae te incendit, non assentiaris, ipse tamen carnis tuae impetus peccatum est.

79. Inclinatio. actio, vel omissio pugnans cum lege dei.

80. concupiscentia est inclinatio voluntaria

81. originating sin

82. originated

83. WS: Edwards defines inclination as the “leading act” of the will. See p. 512.

84. WS: The Arminian and the Calvinistic views of freedom are contrasted in the following statement of Edwards: “Natural sense does not place the moral evil of volitions and dispositions in the cause of them, but the nature of them. An evil thing’s being from a man in the sense of from something antecedent in him is not essential to the original notion we have of blameworthiness; but it is its being the choice of the heart. When [on the other hand] a thing is from a man in the sense that it is from his will or choice, he is to blame for it because his will is in it: so far as the will is in it blame is in it, and no further. Neither do we go any further in our notion of blame to inquire whether the bad will be from a bad will: there is no consideration of the original of that bad will: because, according to our natural apprehension, blame originally consists in it [i.e., the bad will]”; Will in Works 2.174.

85. The author of evil is not the avenger of evil.

86. WS: Calvin 2.2.5; Shedd, History of Doctrine 2.164-77; Theological Essays, 235-43; Sermons to the Natural Man, sermon 11.

87. images

88. WS: Had St. Paul intended to teach that these virtuous heathen do all things required by the law, he would have said ton nomon poie~ (tov vouov Ttoifl ÃƒÂ¢Ã¢â‚¬Ã‚Â he keeps the law), as in Gal. 5:3.

89. WS: On the natural instincts and the moral and religious affections, see p. 511.

90. images = nature

91. Nam setvit voluntas peccato, non nolens sed volens. Etenim voluntas non noluntas dicitur.

92. images

93. WS: Cf. Formula Consensus Helvetica, 737 (ed. Niemever). ForTurretin's account of the distinction; see 10.4.39.

94. WS: In Works 2.102 Edwards, however, speaks doubtfully on this point: "If moral inabil-ity can truly be called inability." Cf. his doubt whether it is proper to call God a part ot "being in general." See nature and definition of God on pp. 176-77.

95. images

96. WS: So Ursinus (Christian Religion 0. 8) argues: "They who cannot but sin are unjustly punished; but the unregenerate cannot but sin: therefore God does unjustly punish them. Answer. They who necessarily sin are unjustly punished, except that necessity come voluntarily and by their own will. But men have drawn upon them that necessity voluntarily in the first parents and themselves do willingly sin. Therefore God does justly punish them."

97. the possibility of sinning

98. (the) power (of sinning)

99. WS: “To choose” here means “to incline” or “to be willing.” It does not mean “to exert a volition,” for a man is able to exert a volition “contrary to a present inclination.”

100. WS: Shedd, Sermons to the Natural Man, 11,14.

101. free will

102. Praecepta dei non sunt mensura virium, sed regula officii; non docent quid nunc pos-sumus. sed quid debeamus, et quod olim potuerimus.

103.

104. by his own movement

105. WS: Will in Works 2.17. So also does Locke, Understanding 2.8,21; and Hobbes, Works 2.410.

106. The cause of a cause is the cause of the thing caused.

107. from within

108. WS: See also Howe, Blessedness of the Righteous, 18; Boston, Fourfold State 2.3.1-3; and especially Owen, Holy Spirit 3.2.

109.

110. an argument reiving on personal abuse

Part 5:
1. Christ's Theanthropic Person

1. χριστοῦ λόγος = a word/discourse about Christ

2. WS: The patristic and Reformation divines find both the Trinity and the God-man in the Old Testament. Irenaeus (Against Heresies 4.33-34) makes ample quotations in proof of both doctrines. For the Lutheran and Reformed citations, see Gerhard, Chemnitz, Hase, Heppe, and Schweitzer in locis.

3. WS: SeeKitto's Encyclopedia. Speaker 's Commentary on Gen. 49:10: and Newton, Prophecies, diss. 4.

4. WS: The connection is strongly against this last interpretation: "Probably the town Shiloh did not exist in Jacob's time, and Judah neither acquired nor lost the preeminence over the other tribes at Shiloh. He was not the leader in the wilderness, for the people were led by Moses and Aaron; nor did he gain any fresh authority at Shiloh. Every ancient version, paraphrase, and commentator makes Shiloh, not the objective case after the verb, but the nominative before the verb" (Speaker's Commentary in Itx-o).

5. מָשִׁיחַ

6. χρίστος = Messiah, Anointed One

7. WS: "It is supposed t hat John the Baptist began his ministry about three and a half years before Christ: so that John's ministry and Christ's put together made seven years, which were the last of Daniel's weeks. Christ came in the middle of the week, as Daniel foretold: And in the middle of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease'" (Edwards, Work of Redemption in Works 1.407).

8. Non ipsa trinitas bene incarnata dicatur, quia incarnatio non terminatur ad naturam di-vinam absolute, sed ad personam τοῦ λογοῦ (tou logou) relate.

9. ἄνθρωπος ἔνθεος

10. Naturalis unio animae et corporis in unam naturam humanam est separabilis, quae soluta fuit morteChristi; personalis unio duarum naturarum, divinaeet humanae, in unam personam est inseparabilis, quia quod semel λόγος (logos) assumpsit nunquam deposuit.

11. WS: In a similar manner, the body and soul of a believer, though separated from each other between death and the resurrection, are both as truly united to Christ during this disembodied period as they were before it (Westminster Larger Catechism 86). But in this case the union is mystical, not theanthropic.

12. WS: It did not become strictly omnipotent, according to the later Lutheran doctrine, for this would be, insofar, the conversion of the human nature into the divine. But it became powerful enough to do anything which the Logos willed it to do.

13. τὸ γεννώμενον = that which is begotten

14. WS: The term occultatio (hiding, concealment) is used by Zanchi, Heidegger, Ursi-nus, and others to denote the self-emptying (heaulon ekenose, ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσε = he emptied himself) of the Logos spoken of by St. Paul in Phil. 2:7. The exinanition related to the use and manifestation of divine excellences, not to their possession. Traces of this are seen in Ambrose (On the Incarnation 1), who employs the terms retentio (keeping back, withholding) and retraxit (holding back). Van Mastricht uses subducere (to take away stealthily) with occultare (to hide). Francis Junius says: "In humana natura, gloriam et majestatem apud homines non exercuerit Christus ut post resurrectionem et ascensionem, sed veluti represserit et occultam continuerit: vel (ut loquitur Irenaeus) quieverit, ut humana natura tentari et mori possit, quamvis interim divinae naturae quaedam vindicia [sic] ad fidei confirmationem prodierint" [AG: Christ did not make use of his glory and majesty in his human nature among men as he did after his resurrection and ascension, but accordingly he restrained and kept them hidden—or, as Irenaeus said, he remained quiescent (quieverit). He did this so that the human nature could be tempted and die. although, meanwhile, certain vindicia of the divine nature appeared for the confirmation of faith]; Theological Theses: Concerning the Humiliation oj Christ. The words of Irenaeus are the following: "As Christ became man in order to undergo temptation, so also was he the Word that he might be glorified; the Word remaining quiescent, that he might be capable of being tempted, dishonored, crucified, and suffering death" (Against Heresies 3.19, quoted by Paraeus in Christian Doctrines Q. 37). [AG: The word vindicia in the above passage from Junius may be an error in Shedd's citation. If Shedd cited the Latin correctly, then vindicia probably carries the sense of "vindicating marks or evidences." If the Latin word is actually indicia (evidences), then the text reads "certain evidences of the divine nature appeared." Either way the meaning is nearly the same.] (See supplement 5.1.4.)

15. Ipsa θεότητος plenitudo sese, prout et quatenas ipsa libuit, humanitati assumtae insinuavit.

16. Videtur mihi, hie locus non impie posse exponi hunc in modum, ut dicamus divinam sapientiam menti humanae Christi effectus suos impressisse pro temporum ratione. By pro tem-porum ratione (according to the manner of the times), Grotius presumably is referring to Christ's mental development appropriate to his chronological age.

17. quia verbum hoc illi non releverat

18. WS: Bengel on Mark 13:32 adopts the explanation favored by Augustine: "Christ's words may be understood to mean that he does not know the time of the judgment day because it was not among his instructions from the Father to declare the time. An apostle was able both to know and not to know one and the same thing, according to the different point of view (T know that I shall abide'; Phil. 1:25); how much more Christ?" In 1 Cor. 2:2 to "know" means to "make known": "I determined not to know anything among you but Christ and him crucified." The same is the meaning of "know " in Gen. 22:12: "Now I know that you fear God, seeing you have not withheld your son from me." God has made Abraham's faith to be known by this trial.

19. point of time

20. λόγος ἄσαρκος = the Word (Logos) outside of the flesh

21. λόγος ἔνσαρκος = the Word (Logos) enfleshed

22. For more information on this passage from Calvin, see extra calvinisticum in the glossary 1.

23. Christus dicitur de coelo descendisse ratione divinae naturae, non ita quod natura divina in coelo desierit; sed quia in infimis novo modo coepit, scilicet secundum naturam assumptam.

24. σπέρμα

25. ὑπεστησάτο

26. homo ex substantia matris in saeculo natus

27. See essentia and substantia in glossary 1 for a discussion of these terms.

28. θεάνθρωπος = God-man

29. ἅγιον τὸ γεννώμενον

30. ἀνυπόστατον = anhypostatic (see anhypostasis and enhypostasis in glossary 1)

31. WS: It is noticeable that in this place Turretin describes Christ's "human nature," while existing in the virgin mother, as a "spiritual" and "intelligent" substance and not as merely physical. This is inconsistent with the creationist view adopted by Turretin.

32. WS: This agrees with Aristotle's materia appetit formam [AG: matter seeks form].

33. Subsistentia non ad essentiam hominis pertinet, sed ad terminationem humanitatis. For the meaning of terminus in this quotation, note Shedd's discussion of the word in this paragraph.

34. Non enim persona (alioquin duae essent in Christo personae), sed natura humana, propria personalitate destituta, assumpta est.

35. natus e massa seminali

36. e semine animato

37. e massa sanguinea virginis

38. WS: The human nature of Christ viewed by itself and prior to the union with the Logos must be designated by the impersonal pronoun it. We could not call it he; nor could we address it as you. In Luke 1:35 the neuter is employed: to genndmenon τὸ γεννώμενον "that holy thing which shall be born" or rather "which is being conceived."

39. WS: The more accurate statement would be that the human nature in the virgin mother, antecedent to the assumption of it by the Logos, is impersonal. Strictly speaking, the human nature when once "in the person ol Christ" is no longer impersonal, because it has been personalized by the union. As Owen says, the Logos "gave it its subsistence in his own person, whence it has its individuation and distinction from all other persons whatever."

40. Ineffabilis quaedam relatio divinae personae ad humanam naturam per quam haec humana natura peculiariter est humana natura secundae personae deitatis.

41. WS: Domer (Christian Doctrine§93) objects to "the anhypostasia or impersonality of the human nature" and asserts that "it has passed into no creed and is only to a moderate extent the doctrine of theologians." The extracts given above disprove the latter assertion. Dorner's objection to the tenet is that "if a divine ego is supposed to take the place of the human, there is an abridgment of the humanity, according to its complete idea—a more subtle kind of Apol-linarianism ." But the divine ego does not take the place of the human ego, for the reason that there is no human ego. There is, at the moment of the assumption, only the seed or unindividualized substance of the virgin. Domer assumes that a human nature without a human individua lity is "abridged" and incomplete humanity. But all the essential properties of humanity are in this nature. Only it has not been constituted a particular person by conception in the womb. This personalizing, which in the case of Christ's humanity is produced miraculously by its union with deity, adds no new properties to the human nature. It only gives it a new form.

42. WS: This description is traducian. The creationist concedes only one side to the nature, namely, the sensuous; and finds only physical properties.

43. σπέρμα

44. μόρφη θεοῦ = form of God

45. οὐσία θεοῦ = being of God

46. φὐσις θεου = nature of God

47. οὐσία = being

48. φυσις θεου = nature of God

49. ὄργανον ἐνυπόστατον ἴδιοποιησε

50. Natura humana. prius dvunoaxaTOC,. in unitatem personae assumpta est a ἀνυπόστατος, et facta λόγῳ

51. ἐνυπόστατος.

52. Humana natura, ut Damascenus dicit, habet suam personalitatem in Christo.

53. Maleriam ex beatissimi virginis substantia decisam.

54. WS: It is at this point that the strongest objection to the traducian theory arises. How can unextended substance be subdivided? How can that have parts which has none of the geometrical dimensions? (see pp. 476-77).

55. Dicendum quod Verbum Dei non assumpsit humanam naturam in universali sed in atomo, id est, in individuo, sicut Damascenus ait, Orthod. Fid. 3.7; alioquin oporteret quod cuili-bet homini conveniret esse Dei Verbum, sicut convenit Christo.

56. WS: In this passage, choris hamartias (χωρις αμαρτιας = without sin) qualifies pepeira-smenon (πεπειρασμένον = having been tempted), showing that all of Christ's temptations were sinless. He was not "tempted and drawn away by inward lust" (James 1:14).

57. τὸ γεννώμενον

58. Eandam humanam nostram natuiam (opus videlicet suum) Christus redemit, eandam (quae ipsius opus est) sanctificat, eandam a mortuis resuscitat, et ingenti gloria (opus videlicet suum) ornat.

59. ἐσώθη καὶ ἠλευθερώθη

60. Non conveniebat λόγῳ (logo), filio dei, assumere naturam pollutant peccato. Ouicquid enim natum est ex carne, peccatrice scilicet et non sanctificata, caro est, mendacium et vani-tas. Spiritus Sanctus optime novit separate peccatum a natura hominis; substantiam ab acci-dente. Peccatum enim non est de natura hominis, sed aliunde a diabolo naturae accessit. Se-paravit a foetu omnem impuritatem, et contagionem peccati originalis.

61. Idem Spiritus, singularissima praesentia et virtute, Mariam semper virginem ad con-cipiendum mundi Salvatoi em foecundam reddidit, semen prolificum ex castis ejus sanguinibus elicuit, ab omni adhaerente peccato purgavit, ipsique Mariae virtutem praebuit qua conciperet ipsum Dei Filium.

62. Carnem humanam habuit Christus ex substantia virginis Mariae, cum ejus filius (Luc. 11:7), et ex muliere factus (Gal. 4:5), dicatur.

63. Actio Spiritus fere triplex fuit; foecundatio seminis virginei, humanae naturae forma-tio, et ab omni labe praeservatio; quae inde bene derivari potest, quod Christus, supematuraliter generatus, culpa Adamica non tenetur, hinc labe illius infici non potest.

64. Altingius observat "semen illud, ex quo corpus Christi formatum est, ut a peccatrice decisam, sic peccato, saltern quoad dispositionem, fuit infectum. At Spiritus Sanctus praeparando illud repurgavit ab omni labe inhaerente; atque etiam principia in!irmitatum, toti speciei communium, quae manserunt, ab ἀνομία καὶ ἀταξία secrevit."

65. Semen illud virgincum quasi defoecavit, non quidem ab impuritate morali sen peccato, utpote cui semen necdum animalum non est obnoxium; sed ab intemperie physica,a qua, suo tempore, peccatum potuisset resultare, aut saltern nativitatem abomni impuritate praeservavit, ad hoc, ut quod ex eo nasceretur esset sanctum (Luc. 1:35).

66. WS: The impossibility of harmonizing the Augustino-Calvinistic tenet that original sin as culpability is transmitted by propagation with creationism is here virtually acknowledged by Van Mastricht. Only physical corruption can be inherited, if only the body is propagated; but physical corruption without moral, as Van Mastricht teaches, is not peccatum (sin). And the cleansing from it is quasi cleansing. In 4.10.24 Van Mastricht assigns as the principal reason for the absence of original sin from the human nature of Christ that this nature though na-turaliter in Adam, velut in capite el radice naturae humanae (naturally in Adam, just as in the head and root of human nature), was not foederaliter (federally) in him. But, in his reasoning, he apparently confounds the simple humanity of Christ with the composite θεάνθρωπος (thean-thrdpos = God -man), who of course was neither naturally nor federally in Adam (seeDinner, Person of Christ 2.308, 34 In).

67. Istud autem semen, licet per peccatores ad Mariam fuerit propagatum; peccato tamen, seu malitiae morali, non fuit obnoxium, cum malitia ista non cadat in inanimatum et irrationale, licet intemperiem naturalem possit habere, quae postmodum peccato possit occasionem prae-bere, quam nine, a semine Mariano, per Spiritum Sanctum sublatam diximus.

68. In primo conceptionis nostrae momento, ipsum semen ex quo homo formatur peccato contaminatum et corruptum est.

69. WS: Even it the Romish dogma of the immaculate conception of Mary were true, it would not follow that a human nature transmitted by her would also be immaculate. Regeneration and sanctification by the Holy Spirit are confined to the individual. They do not affect the specific nature in him. See pp. 91-92.

70. Quod Christum camem et sanguinem suum non e Maria virgine assumpserit, sed e caelo attulerit.

71. WS: Irving's view is that Christ's human nature after its union with the Logos was still fallen and "sinful flesh" (Rom. 8:3) as it was before the union, but that by means of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit Christ repressed all stirrings of this sinful flesh, so that he not only never committed an outward transgression, but never exercised a sinful desire. At the same time, Irving contends that Christ experienced all the temptations which sinful man experiences. His words are as follows: Christ's humanity "was flesh in the fallen state and liable to all the temptations to which [fallen] flesh is liable; but the soul of Jesus, thus anointed with the Holy Spirit, did ever resist the suggestions of evil. I wish it to be clearly understood that I believe it to be necessary unto salvation that a man should believe that Christ's soul was so held in possession by the Holy Spirit and so supported by the divine nature as that it never assented unto an evil suggestion and never originated an evil suggestion" (Irving, On the Incarnation: Its Method, 1). This last assertion is inconsistent with the assertion that Christ "was liable to all the temptations to which sinful flesh is liable." If his human nature "never originated an evil suggestion," he could not have been tempted by inward lust, which is one species of temptation that sinful man experiences, according to James 1:14. Irving's view of Christ's holiness seems to be that ol spiritual regeneration by the Holy Spirit as in the case of a believer, rather than of a supernatural transformation by the miraculous conception. Only, the regeneration in Christ's case completely subjects the inward corruption, while in the believer it imperfectly subjects it. According to the catholic doctrine, the corruption is entirely extiipated from the human nature of Christ; according to Irving's doctrine, it remains, but is repressed and subdued: "They argue for an inherent holiness; we argue for a holiness maintained by the person of the Son through the operation of the Holy Spirit. The substance of our argument is that Christ's human nature was holy in the only way in w hich holiness under the fall exists or can exist, namely, through inworking or energizing of the Holy Spirit" (Irving, Works 5.564).

72. WS: Here, we notice an important point of difference between traducianism and creationist!). According to the former theory, both the soul and body of Christ were formed simultaneously and by one act of the Holy Spirit out of the psychico-physical substance of the mother. According to the latter, only the body was Conned out of the virgin's merely physical substance, the soul being subsequently created ex nihilo and infused in to the body . Turretin presents this view in 13.11.11-15. As in the creation of Adam, God first made his body out of the substance of the earth and then by a second act created and inbreathed his soul, so, according to the creationist, in the origination of the humanity of our Lord two acts must be postulated: one by which his human body was conceived out of the substance of the virgin and another by which his human soul was created from nothing.

73. WS: Shedd in Presbyterian Review (July 1881): 618-21.

Part 5:
2. Christ's Divinity

1. κατὰ σάρκα = according to the flesh
2. κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιωσύνης = according to the spirit of holiness
3. ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πάντων = the one who is over all
4. ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πάντων = existing/being in the form of God
5. = God

Part 5:
3. Christ's Humanity

1. δοκεῖν = to think, suppose
2. σῶμα = body, flesh
3. ψυχή = soul
4. πνεῦμα = spirit
5. κατὰ σάρκα = according to the flesh
6. κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιωσύνης = according to the spirit of holiness
7. κατὰ σάρκα = according to the flesh
8. ἐπί παντῶν θεός = God over all (things)
9. WS: Dorner (Christian Doctrine 3.280) is Eutychian in asserting that Christ had "a God-human nature" and in denominating "the God-human personality" "a God-humanity." This is confounding and mixing the natures. A "God-human nature" would be a theanthropic nature. There is a "God-human" or theanthropic person having two natures, but not a "God-human" or theanthropic nature having two sets of properties, divine and human. A "God-humanity," strictly speaking, would be a divine humanity, that is, a human nature that is divine. But this is very different from a divine-human person. Hooker's statement is excellent on this point: "Let us set it down for a rule or principle necessary to the plain deciding of all doubts and questions

Part 5:
4. Christ's Unipersonality

1. κατὰ σάρκα = according to the flesh
2. κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιωσύνης = according to the spirit of holiness
3. WS: The reading θεοῦ = of God) is supported by (*, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Textus Recep-tus, and Hort; κυρίου = of the Lord) is supported by A, C, D, E, Sahidic, Coptic, Ti-schendorf, and Lachmann.
4. ἰδίου υἱοῦ
5. τοῦ υἱοῦ τῆς ἀγάπης αὐτοῦ = of his beloved son
6. WS: "Virgo Maria non nudum aut merum hominem, sed verum dei filium, concepit et genuit: unde recte mater dei appellatur" [AG: The virgin Mary did not conceive and give birth to only a mere man, but the true Son of God. Consequently, she is rightly called the "Mother of God"]; Formula of Concord 8.
7. WS: When St. Paul says: "I hate what I do" and "with the mind I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh I myself serve the law of sin" (Rom. 7:15, 25), the two modes of consciousness spring out of one nature, namely, the mental or spiritual and are both alike mental. This would not illustrate the difference in the consciousness that arises from two diverse natures.
8. communication of attributes (see glossary 1)
9. in which the human nature is exalted by divine attributes
10. Hae duae naturae in persona Christi nunquam confunduntur, vel altera in alteram mutatur.
11. Unius naturae proprietates essentiales nunquam alterius naturae proprietates essen-tiales fiunt.
12. In hac unione, utraque natura essentiam et proprietates suas retinet.
13. Non tanlum ut deus. verum etiam ut homo, ubiquc praesens dominatur et regnat a rnari ad mare, et usque ad terminos lerrae.
14. WS: A similar self-contradiction is found in the Formula of Concord respecting the doctrine of predestination and election (see Miiller, Sin 2.228-30 [trans. Urwick]).
15. Quo filius dei idiomata divinae suae naturae humanae naturae, propter unionem per-sonalem, vere et realiter communicavit, ad communem possessionem, usurpationem, et denominationem.
16. Subjectum, cui data est majestas divina, est Christus secundum humanam naturam, vel quod idem est, humana natura in ὑπόστασιν τοῦ λογοῦ assumpta.
17. Communicatio naturaram in persona Christi est mutua divinae et humanae Christi naturae participatio, per quam natura divina τοῦ λογοῦ particeps facta humanae naturae, hanc permeat, perficil, inhabitat, sibique appropriat; humana vero particeps facta divinae naturae, ab hac permeatur, pcrficitur et inhabitatur.
18. WS: Dorner (Christian Doctrine §§93, 95) so understands it: "The Reformed disown the communication of essence of the Lutherans."
19. Genus majestaticum continet propositiones quibus de natura humana idiomata naturae divinae praedicantur.
20. οὐσίαι
21. ὑπόστασις
22. μία θεανδρίκη ἐναργεῖα = one theandric (i.e., God-human) energy

Part 5:
5. Christ's Impeccability

1. WS: Neander, Life of Christ. 77-78 (ed. Bohn): Jeremy Taylor, Life of Christ Ãƒâ€šÃ‚Â§3; Ullmann, Sinlessness of Jesus 3.1.2; Trench, Studies in the Gospels ("The Temptation"). Ullmann is profound and thoughtful on Christ's sinlessness, but deficient on the subject of his impeccability. Edwards (Will 3.2) asserts Christ's impeccability.
2. to be able not to sin (see posse peccare et non posse peccare in glossary 1)
3. to not be able to sin (see posse peccare et non posse peccare in glossary 1)
4. WS: It is remarkable that a theologian of such soundness and accuracy as the elder Hodge should deny the impeccability of the God-man. "The sinlessness of our Lord," he says (Theology 2.457), "does not amount to absolute impeccability. It was not a non potest peccare (he is not able to sin). Temptation implies the possibility of sin. If from the constitution of his person it was impossible for Christ to sin, then his temptation was unreal and without effect, and he cannot sympathize with his people." Theodore Mopsuestia and Abelard denied impeccability.
5. ὁ γὰρ θεὸς ἀπείραστος = for God cannot be tempted
6. ἐπιθυμία = lust
7. ἁμαρτία = sin
8. you shall not have evil desires
9. ἐπίνοια
10. κακία
11. WS: When Westminster Larger Catechism 37 affirms that "Christ was born of the virgin Mary, yet without sin." the meaning is not that he "was born of the virgin Mary, yet did not commit sin," but that he "was born sinless of the virgin Mary."
12. χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας = without sin
13. πεπειρασμένον = tempted
14. WS: The preposition choris χωρίς = w ithout, apart from) denotes entire separation χωρίζειν= to separate). The author of Hebrews frequently uses it. Their consecration was oathless: "Those priests were made without an oath (choris horkdmosias, χωρὶς ὁρκωμοσίας (Heb. 7:21). The dedication was not bloodless: "The first testament was not dedicated without blood (choris haimatos, χωρὶς αἵματος (9:18). Remission is not bloodless: "There is no remission without shedding of blood (choris haimatekchysias, χωρὶς αἱματεκχυσίας *(9:22). So, too, any temptation that is choris hamartias (*χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας *= without sin) is sinless: wholly separate from sin, either internal or external. Had the writer omitted choris hamartias (images),* the passage would read: "Tempted in all points (kata panta, images) like as we are." In adding this, he modifies kata panta images so that it reads: "all points, sin excepted." See Ebrard on Heb. 4:15.
15. images = through sin
16. images = from sin
17. images = without sin
18. gemuit sub pondere c> mba
19. images = to make perfect
20. images= to make holy, sanctify

21. images= temptation

Part 6:
1. Christ's Mediatorial Offices

1. images = a word/discourse about salvation
2. WS: See also Christ's parables of the foolish virgins (Matt. 25) and the wedding garment (Matt. 22). Cf. Witsius. Apostles'Creed, diss. 10.42-44; 26.76.
3. images
4. WS: "Israel, as well as (he Messiah, and in due dependence on him, was to be the light of the Gentiles, the Redeemer of apostate nations" (Alexander on Isa. 59:21). In Isaiah, the "servant of the Lord" is sometimes national (i.e., the church) and sometimes personal (i.e., the Messiah). This is the key to the interpretation.
5. WS: Christ is the mediator of the covenant of redemption as well as of grace; for though no one mediates between the Father and the incarnate Son, yet as the elect are one with him in the former covenant as well as the latter, he is a mediator in respect to them in the former case as well as in the latter. All the benefits that come to the church from the covenant between the Father and the Son are mediated to it through the Son.
6. images
7. WS: The difference between these two phases of one and the same evangelical covenant is marked in the Authorized Version of the New Testament by the translation of diatheke images . It is generally rendered "covenant" when it refers to the administration of mercy in the old dispensation and "testament" when it refers to the administration of mercy in the new. But the only passage in which it can with any plausibility mean "testament" is Heb. 9:16-17; and in this "covenant" might be used in accordance with the following rendering: "For where a covenant is, the death of the covenantor (tou diathemenou, images of necessity is implied (ananke pheresthai, images. For a covenant is valid [only] over dead victims (nekrois, images,); since it is never of force while the covenantor (ho dialhemenos, images,) lives. Wherefore, neither the first covenant was instituted without blood [i.e., without a vicarious victim]." The clause death of the covenantor is natural from the Hebrew point of view. In the biblical conception, the covenantor is identified with his substituted offering. The death of the offering is equivalent, before the divine tribunal, to the death of the offerer. The covenantor is reckoned to have died when his vicarious victim dies. Such a phrase as the death of the covenantor would not have seemed strange in the least to the Hebrews, to whom the epistle was addressed.
8. WS: On the use of the term condition applied to the covenant of grace, see Witsius, Apostles'Creed, diss. 1 n. 44.
9. WS: Cf. "Priest" in Kilto's Encyclopedia; Lowman, Hebrew Ritual; Outram, On Sacrifice; Kurtz, Mosaic Sacrifices; Cave, On Sacrifice; Blunt, Coincidences, 14-22.
10. images

Part 6:
2. Vicarious Atonement

1. images
2. images
3. images
4. images
5. images
6. images
7. images
8. images
9. images
10. images
11. images
12. images
13. images
14. images
15. images
16. images
17. images
18. images
19. images
20. images
21. images
22. images = Would you even be willing to die, O Episthenes, on his behalf?
23. images
24. images
25. images
26. images
27. images
28. images
29. images
30. Wenn auch in vielen Stellen das apothanein hyper nur ein Sterben zum besten Anderer ist, so kann doch wohl in den Stellen, Rom. 4:25; Gal. 1:4; Rom. 8:3; 1 Cor. 15:3; 2 Cor. 5:14, der Begriff der Stellvertretung, wenigsten der Sache nach, nicht zuriickgewiesen werden.
31. images
32. images = in place of
33. images = for
34. images= on account of
35. images= concerning
36. images
37. images
38. WS: The first of these statements might be either hyper hemon (images = on our behalf/in our place) or ami hemon (images= in our place); the second might be hyper ion hamartematon hemon (images= because of our sins) or peri (images) or dia images, but not anti images. The preposition anti (images) has only the one meaning of substitution: the others have more than this meaning.

39. images

40. images

41. images

42. WS: The law as precept, however, would not be satisfied. This proves that endless punishment is not excessive punishment. It still leaves the sinner in debt. According to strict justice, the law could require from the lost an active as well as a passive obedience, perfect obedience in the present and future as well as suffering the penalty for past disobedience.

43. WS: The following are the principal points of difference between Unitarianism and Calvinism respecting the subject of Christ's redemption. Unitarianism contends (a) that God is inherently and spontaneously merciful; (b) that justice is only a form of benevolence and opposes no obstacles to the exerc ise of God's inherent and spontaneous mercy; (c) that Christ was not God, but an exalted creature sent to announce divine mercy, set a holy example, and proffer spiritual assistance to imitate it; it was no pail of his mission to satisfy legal claims and harmonize justice with mercy, because there is no need ol harmonizing them; and (d) that the doctrine of vicarious atonement implies that God is not inherently merciful, but needs to be made so by the agency of another being, namely, Christ (Channing, Life 1.294, 344, 349, 354). Calvinism contends (a) that God is inherently and spontaneously merciful; (b) that justice is an attribute distinct from benevolence, requiring satisfaction for sin and prohibiting the exercise of mercy until this requirement is met; (c) that Jesus Christ was incarnate God himself, who suffered vicariously for sinners in order to satisfy the legal claims which obstructed the exercise of divine mercy; and (d) that this vicarious satisfaction of justice by God himself is the way in which God shows his inherent and spontaneous mercifulness and not a means employed by a third party, other than God, to make him merciful.

44. WS: Divine wrath against sin, we have seen (p. 168), causes no unhappiness or misery in God because of its righteousness and legitimateness.

45. WS: "It was in China that a Baptist missionary found his converts slow to appreciate the value of Christ's atoning blood, until the Book of Leviticus threw light upon the sacrificial offering and showed the relation between shedding of blood and remission" (Bible Society's Record. 21 Nov. 1878).

46. WS: Bahr (Symbolism of the Mosaic Culms) denies that there is anything piacular in the levitical sin offering. The slain victim is emblematic of self-consecration and self-sacrifice, not of penal satisfaction. The death of the lamb or goat teaches, not that the offerer deserves to die for his past transgression, but that he ought to live for future consecration to obedience. This interpretation lies under all the moral theories of the atonement. Its inconsistency is apparent in making the shedding of blood or death the symbol of life.

47. images

48. The Piel is a Hebrew verb pattern that may express the basic meaning for some verb roots, though it more usually indicates some intensification of the action.

49. images

50. images = to make an atonement, cover over

51. images

52. images

53. images

54. Venia sive condonatio peccatorum, ex vulgari et biblica dicendi consuetudine, est abo-litio poenae peccatis contractae, et restitutio benevolentiae divinae erga peccatorem.

55. images = forgive us our debts

56. images= your sins are forgiven you

57. images

58. WS: If it be objected that in the statement of the doctrine of vicarious atonement it is maintained that God atones to God (pp. 702-3), the reply is that Jesus Christ does not make satisfaction to himself as Jesus Christ, but to the Trinity. The incarnate Word satisfies the justice of the Godhead. The relation of his death is therefore objective. It has reference to the divine nature, not to his own theanthropic personality.

59. images = to make an atonement, cover over

60. images = to propitiate

61. images

62. images = atonement, reconciliation

63. images = to conciliate, appease

64. images

65. images

66. images = is appeased

67. images= atonement, reconciliation

68. images

69. WS: See Magee, Atonement, diss. 20; Owen, Vindications, chap. 21; Shedd, Theological Essays, 265-73.

70. images

71. images

72. images

73. images

74. images

75. images

76. images

77. images

78. images

79. images

80. images

81. Respira, o peccator, respira; ne desperes, spera in eo quem times. Affuge ad eum a quo aufugisti. Invoca importune quem superbe provocasti.

82. from the outside

83. from within

84. Non dicimur reconciliati quasi deus de novo amare incipiret, nam aeternoamoredilexit, sed quia per hanc reconciliationem sublata est omnis odii causa, turn per ablutionem peccati, turn per recompensationem acceptabilioris boni.

85. Scholastici loquntur, dilexit deus humanum genus quantum ad naturam quam ipse fecit; odit quantum ad culpam quam homines contraxerunt.

86. WS: The same principle applies to the afflictions of life. The strength and comfort must come from the very same being who afflicts. God is the source of affliction, and he is the God of all comfort. God wounds, and God heals the wound. See Pascal's letter to his brother-in-law on the death of his own father. The same truth is expressed in the lines of George Herbert: Ah, my dear, angry Lord! Since Thou dost love, yet strike; Cast down, yet help afford; Sure, I will do the like. I will complain, yet praise; I will bewail, approve; And all my sour-sweet days, I will lament, and love.

87. oderunt quem laeserint

88. WS: "La conscience est la voix de l ame, les passions sont la voix du corps" [AG: The conscience is the voice of the soul, the passions are the voice of the body]; Rousseau, Emile, 4. This is borrowed from Descartes, Passions of the Soul, arts. 18-19.

89. WS: On the difference between divine and human anger, see Shedd, Theological Essays, 269-84.

90. WS: Suicide, if the act of sanity, is ipso facto proof of insubmission and rebellion toward God and impenitence in sin. Socrates (Phaedo 61) contends that to take one's own life is to defraud and dishonor the Creator. "The gods," he says, "are our guardians, and we are a possession of theirs. If one of your own possessions, an ox or an ass, for example, took the liberty of putting himself out of the way when you had given no intimation of your w ish that he should die, would you not be displeased with him and would you not punish him if you could?" It was upon this view of suicide that the self-murderer was denied burial by the church in consecrated ground.

91. images = treats like a child

92. res domi = matters of the home

93. images = a change into another kind

94. images = for what is profitable

95. WS: See the excellent treatise of Crawford. Fatherhood of God.

96. law of retaliation

97. WS: See the explanation and defense of it by Kalisch on Exod. 21:22-25.

98. law of retaliation

99. images = to be amazed

100. images = to be distressed

101. WS: Christ felt that he was forsaken of God, but not, like a despairing person, that he was eternally forsaken. The desertion was only temporary. The comforting presence of God returns to Christ, as is indicated in the statement of Luke 23:46 that "Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Father, into your hands I commend my spirit." Again, the agony ol Christ was not despair, because in this very cry he says "my God." A despairing man or angel would say "O God" and would not exclaim, saying, "Why have you forsaken me?" Again, Christ did not experience despair, because he knew that the union between the divine and human natures was indissoluble. He also knew that the covenant of redemption between him and the Father could not fail. His distress did not relate to either of these two particulars. It arose (a) from his view of the nature of the curse upon sin which he had vicariously come under; (b) because the comforting influences from the union of the divine with the human nature were temporarily restrained; (c) from temporary desertion of God; and (d) from positive infliction when the "sword was awakened" against him (Owen, Third Sacramental Discourse). The words why have you forsaken me? express wonder, not ignorance or unbelief or complaint. Christ well knew why he was deserted at this hour, had perfect faith and confidence in his Father, and was entirely submissive to his will. But he was amazed and paralyzed at the immensity of the agony. The word why is not interrogative, but exclamatory. The words are equivalent to "how you have forsaken me!" This is Hugh St. Victor's explanation (see Hooker 5.48). When a Christian exclaims, "Why am I so unbelieving and sinful?" it is only another way of saying, "How unbelieving and sinful I am!" He is not asking for information. He well knows the reason why.

102. WS: South, Sermon on Messiah's Suffering; Edwards, Excellency of Christ in Works 4.189.

103. ira dei est voluntas puniendi

104. WS: Philippi, Active Obedience of Christ.

105. WS: Piscator was the first formally to present this view . John Taylor ot Norwich went to an opposite extreme and held that active obedience was the sole cause of man's salvation. He denied any piacular effect of Christ's death and held that as a reward of Christ's active obedience alone the remission of sin was given to man, as the eminent sen ices of a soldier are rew arded by the monarch by benefits to his family.

106. images

107. WS: See on this point, Paley, sermon on Heb. 9:26, part 2.

108. therefore, he merited by making satisfaction, and he made satisfaction by meriting

109. WS: Owen (Justification, chap. 10) endorses the distinction as made by Grotius: "Whereas we have said that Christ has procured two things for us, freedom from punishment and a reward, the ancient church attributes the one of them to his satisfaction, the other to his merit." Edwards adopts it: “Whatever in Christ had the nature of satisfaction, it was by virtue of the suffering or humiliation in it. But whatever had the nature of merit, it was by virtue of the obedience or righteousness that was in it” (Redemption in Works 1.402).

110. WS: Bengel composed his Syntagma de sanctitate (Book on holiness) to prove that all the attributes of God are implied in Hebrew qaddS (images). But he did not hold that all are holiness.

111. WS: Butler (Nature of Virtue, diss. 2) contends that “the whole of virtue does not consist in promoting happiness.” This is the same as contending that all moral qualities cannot be resolved into benevolence.

112. fiat justitia mat coelum

113. Misericordia non tollit justitiam, sed quaedam justitiae plenitudo est.

114. Ipse deus, ipse sacerdos, ipse hostia, pro se, de se, sibi satisfecit.

115. images

116. images

117. images= grace

118. images = forbearance

119. WS: That this is the correct interpretation is proved by the use of the preposition dia (images = on account of) in Rom. 3:25. God set forth Jesus Christ “to be a propitiation, to declare his righteousness on account of (dia) the pretermission of sins.” Had the act of pretermission been the final cause or chief end of the propitiation, the preposition employed would have been eis (images = unto). The main and ultimate purpose of Christ’s death is always denoted in the New Testament by eis apheshi hamartidn (images = unto the forgiveness of sins). The phrase dia paresin hamartimatOn (images = on account of the forgiveness of sins) occurs only this once in the New Testament.

120. images

121. images

122. Impersonaliter poenam necessario infligi omni peccato, sed non personaliter omni peccatori.

123. Shedd makes two mistakes here: (1) He applies the label acceptilation when what he actually describes is an acceptation. In an acceptilation no payment is received and the debt is declared paid, whereas in an acceptation the creditor accepts some payment, but one of lesser value (e.g., fifty cents on the dollar) to absolve the debt. (2) Socinus denied that Christ’s death is even a partial payment of a debt, teaching instead that God forgives out of pure mercy.

124. It is significant that Socinus himself cites the case of Zaleucus but, rather than using the story to illustrate his own view, he subjects it to withering ridicule (see Socinus, De Jesu Christo Servatore 3.3.251).

125. the exact same money

126. WS: Witsius (Covenants 1.4) finds four elements in the pains of hell: (1) privation of divine love, (2) sense of divine hatred, (3) the worm of conscience, and (4) despair ol God’s favor. The second, third, and fourth elements did not enter into Christ’s experience. The first did, temporarily.

127. Cum reddis aliquid quod debes deo, non debes computare hoc pro debito quod debes pro peccato. Omnia enim debis deo.

128. WS: While there may be vicarious as well as personal punishment, because punishment is suffering endured for a judicial purpose and this purpose can be fulfilled by a substitute as well as by the criminal, there can be no vicarious confession of sin and no vicarious repentance for it. Confession and repentance are necessarily personal acts. The Scriptures never represent Christ as vicariously confessing the sins of his people or as vicariously repenting of them. Yet McLeod Campbell, while dissatisfied with the Catholic doctrine of vicarious atonement, has set forth the theory that Christ has made a perfect confession of human sin and that this is an adequate satisfaction for sin. See Crawford, On Atonement and On the Fatherhood of God, lect. 4.

129. punishment
130. satisfaction
131. in the direction of what comes after (i.e., looking forward in time)
132. See glossary 1.
133. images
134. WS: Hill, Theology, b<x>k 4; Candlish, On Atonement 1.2; Cunningham, Historical Theology 2.323-70.
135. WS: To "extend" the atonement might be understood to mean to "offer" the atonement. But this is not the meaning in this connection. To extend, in the sense now being considered, is not only to offer the atonement but also to render it personally efficacious by regenerating grace.
136. Sufficienter pro omnibus, sed efficaciter tantum pro electis.
137. WS: Owen in his treatise against Arminianism presents "arguments against universal redemption."
138. it is not the efficient cause of justification but only the material cause
139. WS: Cf. Dabney, Theology, 580-81; Watson, Institutes 2.395-96.
140. images
141. images
142. WS: As a specimen of exe gesis that throws out the qualifying words and explanatory statements of the author, consider the following from Farrar (St. Paul 2.201): "The word all is the governing word in the Epistle to the Romans. All—for whatever may be the modifications which may be thought necessary, St. Paul does not himself make them—all are equally guilty, all are equally redeemed. All have been temporarily rejected, all shall be ultimately received. All shall be finally brought into living harmony with that 'God who is above all and through all and in all' (Eph. 4:6)." The words of St. Paul in Eph. 4:6 are "God who is in you all"—the reference being to believers. The uncials omit hymitt (images= in you) but the preceding verse contains it, and the succeeding verse implies it.
143. images = lord, master
144. images = savior
145. images = to buy, purchase
146. images = to redeem
147. images
148. images
149. images = any
150. images
151. images= repentance
152. images= to advance
153. WS: To say that common grace if not resisted by the sinner would be equivalent to regenerating grace is not the same as to say that common grace if assisted by the sinner would be equivalent to regenerating grace. In the first instance, God would be the sole author of regeneration; in the second he would not be.
154. WS: See Owen, Works 14.411 (ed. Russell).
155. WS: Owen, Display of Arminianism 4.1.8.
156. WS: Zanchi, On Predestination, 67 (trans. Toplady).

Part 6:
3. Regeneration

1. WS: In the older theological treatises, regeneration commonly does not constitute a separate topic, but is discussed under vocation.
2. images
3. images
4. images = is renewed
5. images = to renew
6. images= to renew
7. images= to give birth to
8. images= to create
9. images= to give birth to. Shedd has gentian images, which is probably a typo forgen-nad (Tfewdw), judging by the present context.
10. images = to make alive
11. images = to be renewed
12. images = to be made new
13. images = renewal
14. Conversio habitualis seu passiva fit per habituum supernaturalium infusionem a Spi-ritu Sancto.
15. Conversio actualis seu activa fit per bonorum istorum habituum exercitium, quo actus fidei et poenitentae. et dantur a deo, et homine eliciuntur.
16. WS: Edwards denominates it the origination of a new "principle": "By a principle I mean that foundation which is laid for any particular kind of exercise of the faculties of the soul. A new holy disposition of heart is not a new faculty of will, but a foundation laid for a new kind of exercise of the faculty of will" (Affections 3.1). Similarly, Owen remarks: "As the principle of holiness has the nature ol a habit, so also has it the properties thereof. And the first property of a habit is that it inclines and disposes the subject wherein it is unto acts of its own kind" (On the Spirit 4.1).
17. WS: Owen, Works 2.357-58 (ed. Russell).
18. images = essence
19. images = essence
20. WS: Meyer in loco explains eti images literally: "Still from his mother's womb." After birth, he was still the subject of the Holy Spirit's influences as he was before it.
21. Quicquid recipitur, recipitur in modum recipientis.
22. from the outside
23. Proprium est dei movere voluntatem, maxime interius eam inclinando.
24. point of time
25. point of time
26. images
27. WS: In the case of an adult, the precedence of regeneration to conversion is of order and nature only, not of time. Regeneration immediately exhibits its fruit in the converting acts of faith and repentance. In the case of infant regeneration, there is an interval of time between regeneration and conversion.
28. WS: The words in James 1:18 are sometimes quoted to prove that the truth is a means of regeneration: "Of his own will, he gave us birth with the word of truth." The original is boidelheis apekyesen hemas logo aletheias images Revised Version: "According to his purpose, he brought us forth by the word of truth." Apokyein ( images = to bring forth) denotes the maternal, not the paternal act; as  images (yalad) primarily does in Ps. 2:7: "I have begotten you." And logos aletheias ( images = word of truth) means the gospel, as in Eph. 1:13: "After that you heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation"; and in Col. 1:5: "Whereof you heard before, in the word of the truth of the gospel, which is come unto you as it is in all the world." The teaching, then, of St. James in this text is that "in accordance with the divine purpose man is born a child of God, under the gospel dispensation." There is a similar statement in 1 Pet. 1:23: "Being bom again (anagegennemenoi,  images) not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God." The "word of God," here, is not the "incorruptible seed" itself from which the birth proceeds. The Holy Spirit is this. But it is the sphere within which the birth takes place. It denotes the gospel dispensation, like the "word of truth" in James 1:18. Christians are born again of incorruptible seed, namely, of the Holy Spirit, under the Christian dispensation. The Revised Version rendering of this verse is "having been begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God."

29. WS: On legal and evangelical humiliation, see Edwards, Affections 3 in Works 3.137-38; Howe, Blessedness of the Righteous, chap. 17; Owen, Works 2.309-10 (ed. Russell).

30. WS: Cf. "if I be lifted up, I will draw all men unto me" and "my word shall not return unto me void." These texts do not mean that every single individual shall be saved, but describe the general and common effect of the gospel.

31. WS: See Bunvan's account of his own experience in Grace Abounding; Edwards, Manner of Seeking Salvation in Works 4.386-87; Pressing into the Kingdom in Works 4.381-82.

32. WS: See the admirable remarks of Calvin entitled "Praver the Principal Exercise of Faith" in 3.20.1-17.

33. WS: The regenerate child, youth, and man believes and repents immediately. The regenerate infant believes and repents when his faculties will admit the exercise and manifestation of faith and repentance. In this latter instance, regeneration is potential or latent faith and repentance.

34. WS: Westminster Confession 7.3; 8.8; 9.4; 10.1; 14.1; Westminster Larger Catechism Q. 32; Q. 59; Q. 67; Q. 72.

35. As noted by Benjamin Warfield in Perfectionism, the same comment would apply to the theology of Charles Finney.

36. anew

37. after this, yet not therefore on account of this

Part 6:
4. Conversion

1. WS: Jeremy Taylor's elaborate and eloquent treatise Unum necessarium; or, Doctrine and Practice of Repentance is somewhat vitiated by a legalizing element and tendency.

2. to  images) = to believe

3.  images = in

4.  images = unto

5. images = upon

6.

7.

8.  = to believe

9.

10.

11.

12.

13.

14. WS: The priority in the order of faith to all other acts is illustrated by the following anecdote: “In a beautiful New England village a boy lay very sick, drawing near to death and very sad. His heart longed for the treasure which was worth more to him now than all the gold of the western mines. One day I sat down by him, took his hand, and looking in his troubled face asked him what made him so sad. ‘Uncle,’ said he, ‘I want to love God. Won’t you tell me how to love God?’ I cannot describe the piteous tones in which he said these words and the look of anxiety which he gave me. I said to him: ‘My boy, you must trust God first, and then you will love him without trying to at all.’ With a surprised look he exclaimed, What did you say?’ I repeated the exact words again, and 1 shall never forget how his large, hazel eyes opened on me, and his cheek flushed as he slowly said, ‘Well, I never knew that before. I always thought that I must love God first before I had any right to trust him.’ ‘No, my dear boy,’ 1 answered, ‘God wants us to trust him; that is what Jesus always asks us to do first of all, and he knows that as soon as we trust him we shall begin to love him. This is the way to love God, put your trust in him first of all.’ Then I spoke to him of the Lord Jesus and how God sent him that we might believe in him and how, all through his life, he tried to win the trust of men; how grieved he was when men would not believe in him, and everyone who believed came to love without trying at all. He drank in all the truth and simply saying, ‘I will trust Jesus now,’ without an effort put his young soul in Christ’s hands that very hour; and so he came into the peace of God which passes understanding and lived in it calmly and sweetly to the end."

15. WS: For twelve points of difference between union with Adam and union with Christ, see Shedd on Rom. 5:19.

16. a work worked (see opus operatum in glossary 1)

17. images= change of mind

18. images

19. images

20. images

21. images = heart

22. images = to repent, change one's mind

23. images = repentance

24. images = regret, repentance

25. WS: Sorrow for sin must be carefully distinguished from shame on account of it. The impenitent experience shame forsin, and they "awake to shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan. 12:2). A person may feel degraded by his vices and ashamed of them without any sincere grief for them as committed against God. Such feeling as this is selfish, while godly sorrow is disinterested. A man may be vexed and angry with himself and despise himself without any humble prostration of soul before God and confession of guilt. A sense of the meanness and disgrace of sin is not the sense of its odiousness and ill desert.

26. WS: "Melanchthon taught that repentance was the effect of the law and anterior to faith and used forms of expression which were thought to imply that good works or sanctification, although not the ground of justification, were nevertheless a causa sine qua non [a cause without which not] of our acceptance with God. To this Luther objected, as true sanctification is the consequence and in no sense the condition of the sinner's justification. We are not justified because we are holy; but being justified, we are made holy" (Hodge, Theology 3.238).

27. images

28. images

Part 6:
5. Justification

1. images = righteous

2. images

3. images

4. WS: Mohler [Symbolics §13) contends that justificare means "to acquit" only when applied to the innocent and holy and is inapplicable to a transgressor. "The forgiveness of sin," he says, "is undoubtedly a remission of the guilt and the punishment which Christ has borne upon himself; but it is likewise the transfusion of his Spirit into us." But St. Paul expressly says that "God justifies the ungodly" (Rom. 4:5). So far as a person has infused righteousness, he is not ungodly.

5. images

6. images= one's own righteousness

7. images = my righteousness

8. images = without works (of man)

9. images

10. images

11. faith is (a) work

12. WS: For the Tridentine view of justification adopted partially by a Protestant, see Jeremy Taylor's sermon "Faith Working by Love." Coleridge (Works 5.195) refers to this defect in Jeremy Taylor. Yet in an earlier period in his life, he fell into the same error himself; see "The Friend" in Works 2.288 (ed. Harper).

13. WS: Cf. Calvin 3.14.11, Shedd, History of Doctrine 2.318-32; Sermons to the Spiritual Man, 293-98.

14.

15.  = apart from works

Part 6:
6. Sanctification

1.

2. WS: See Shedd on Rom. 7:23 and 8:10 for the meaning of this trichotomy.

3.  = spirit

4.  = soul

5.  = body

6.

7.

8.

9.

10.

11.

12. images = mind

13. WS: The situation in Heb. 6:4-6 is hypothetical, as is proved by verse 9: “We are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak.” A supposition which is not an actual or even a possible case is sometimes made for the sake of illustrating or enforcing truth. In 1 Cor. 13:1-3 Paul supposes the existence of Christian faith without that of Christian charity. In Gal. 1:8 he supposes that an angel from heaven may preach another gospel than the true one. In Matt. 13:21-22 the stony-ground hearer is not a true believer. In 2 Pet. 2:20-21 the “dog who turns to his own vomit” is a false professor. His “knowing the way of righteousness” is superficial knowledge, like that of the stony-ground hearer.

14. WS: The seeming contradiction between Paul and James disappears if James is understood to put, by metonymy, the effect for the cause—the work of faith for faith itself. When he says that “Abraham was justified by works” (James 2:21) and “Rachel was justified by works” (2:25), he means that they were justified by a faith that produced works or a working faith. Abraham’s “work” proved that his “faith” was genuine and therefore might well stand for and represent it. It was a “work of faith” (1 Thess. 1:3) (Shedd, Sermons to the Spiritual Man, sermon 19).

15. Hanc fidem, renovationem, et remissionem pec-catorum, sequentur bona opera. Dicimus praeterea, ubi non sequuntur bona opera, ibi fidem esse falsam, et non veram.

16. from the outside

17. images

18. images = to be justified, declared righteous

Part 6:
7. Means of Grace

1. WS: When the world of unregenerate men are said to have the means of grace, the means of conviction under common grace, not of sanctification under special grace, are intended: “The Spirit of God makes the reading, but especially the preaching of the word, an effectual means of enlightening, convincing, and humbling sinners, of driving them out of themselves, and drawing them unto Christ” (Westminster Larger Catechism 155).

2. WS: Respecting the nature of the church, Calvin (dedication to the Institutes) presents the Protestant view in two fundamental positions: (a) That the church may exist without a visible form, because it is both invisible and visible. The former is composed of all who are really united to Christ; the latter, of all who profess to be united to Christ. The former has no false members; the latter has, as the parables of the tares and the net show, (b) That the visible form of the church is not distinguished by external splendor, but by the pure preaching of God’s word and the legitimate administration of the sacraments. The Romanist contends that the church exists only in a visible form and that this form is in the see of Rome and her order of prelates alone. Rome makes the invisible and visible churches identical and coterminous. For a concise and able statement of the prelatical theory of the church, see Jeremy Taylor’s consecration sermon.

3. WS: On this subject, see the thorough discussion of Calvin 4.14.17.

4. images = mystery

5. images = mystery

6. Although in this section Shedd makes a few passing references to baptism and the sacraments in general, he deals almost exclusively with the Lord’s Supper. He treats baptism at length in the next section.

7. WS: The substantive verb in this passage has the same signification as in Gal. 4:24: “These [women] are the two covenants.”

8. WS: The presence of Christ in the bread and wine themselves would be a local and extended presence, because bread and wine are local and extended substances. But the presence of Christ to “the faith of a believer” is a presence in his soul, which is an illocal and spiritual presence, because the soul is an illocal and spiritual substance.

9. Ratio fidei

10. (1) Res sanctae et venerandae, (2) testimonium rei gestae praebunt, (3) vice rerum sunt quas significant, (4) res arduas significant.

11. in the contemplation of faith

12. Ratio fidei

13. Augustinus dixit Christi corpus in aliquo coeli loco esse oportere, propter visi corporis modum. Non est igitur Christi corpus magis in pluribus locis quam nostra corpora.

14. WS: The Lord's Supper took the place of Jewish Passover: "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us" (2 Cor. 5:7). The Passover was a divinely appointed symbol, reminding of and setting forth the deliverance of the firstborn by the sprinkling of blood. But the paschal lamb was also typical of the Lamb of God. The visible emblem in the instance of both Passover and the supper teaches the expiation of sin bv Christ's vicarious sacrifice.

15. WS: On this point see Calvin 4.17.9-12, 33, 36, 39.

16. WS: Proselyte baptism included the whole family, males and females, adults and infants. It was associated also with the circumcision of the males. Some time before the advent, the whole nation of the Idumeans embraced Judaism rather than be expelled from their country. Josephus says that Queen Helena of Adiatum and her son became proselytes. On this subject, see Maimonides; Wall, History of Baptism; Lightfoot; Hammond, On Baptism.

17. WS: Calvin 2.508-10, 516; Jeremy Taylor, Liberty of Prophesying, 18.

18. images

19. images

20. images

21. images

22. images = to be sprinkled

23. images

24. WS: Whether the baptism of Naaman (2 Kings 5:10, 14) was sacramental or ceremonial is doubtful. If it was sacramental, like that of the restored leper under the levitical economy, it was performed by a priest or his deputy and was administered by sprinkling. This is the view of Baird, Bible History of Baptism, 157. He explains the command go wash (2 Kings 5:10) by Acts 22:16: Ananias said to Saul, “Rise, baptize yourself (baptisai, images), and wash away your sins.” Here the baptism is described as self-administered, as it is in Naaman’s case, though really administered by another. If, on the other hand, Naaman’s baptism was ceremonial, like the ceremonial washing of the blind man in the pool of Siloam (John 9:7), it was by pouring.

25. WS: On Old Testament baptism, see the valuable treatise of Baird, Bible History of Baptism; Mosheim, Commentaries 1.89-90.

26. images = to dip

27. images = to dip

28. images

29. images

30. images = purifying rite

31. images = washing, cleansing

32. images = dipping, baptism

33. images = baptizer

34. images

35. WS: In the later time of the Roman Empire, when public baths were erected, the bathing tub (labrwn) was called baptisterium. The term was probably borrowed from Christian usage. But the labrum was not large enough to immerse the whole body. Water was taken from it and poured upon the head of the person standing in it or beside it (“Baths” in Anthon’s Dictionary of Antiquities, 148).

36. images

37. images

38. images

39. images

40. images

41. images

42. images

43. images

44. images

45. WS: An example of the application of the term baptize to a wetting of the person that is not immersion is found in Dan. 4:33: Nebuchadnezzar’s “body was wet (ebaphe, images) with the dew of heaven.” Another is found in Judith 12:7: Judith “washed herself (ebaptizeto, images) in a fountain of water by the camp.” That this was not an immersion is highly certain, because the fountain would be used for drinking and culinary purposes. And though the washing was “in the night,” yet in a camp there would be nearly as little privacy by night as by day.

46. images

47. images

48. WS: The preposition eis (images) rendered in the Authorized Version “into” (Acts 8:38) and “in” (Mark 1:9) might be rendered “unto” or “at” (cf. Acts 8:40) equally well. So, likewise, apo (images) and ek images may be rendered “from” or “out or in Matt. 3:16; Mark 1:10; Acts 8:39. The clause were baptized in the Jordan (en to iordane, images) ‘top8dvr|) does not necessarily denote immersion, any more than the phrase he lives in the Connecticut does.

49. WS: There is an apparent exception to this in Acts 19:5. Bengel’s explanation is that these persons “had not known that they were bound by the baptism of repentance to faith in Jesus Christ.” John’s baptism had not been administered to them with an intelligent understanding on their part of the meaning of the rite. Had it been, they would not have been “baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.” Says Bengel (on Acts 19:5), “The baptism which is mentioned in Matt. 3:6 and 28:19 was one; otherwise, there would not have been ‘the beginning of the gospel’ in John the Baptist (Mark 1:1-3), and the Lord’s Supper in Matt. 26 would be older than baptism in Matt. 28.”

50. images = to bury with

51. images

52. images

53. Daturus Dominus Spiritum sanctum, dixit se panem qui de coelo dcscendit, hortans ut credamus in cum. Credere enim in cum, hoc est mandueare panem vivum. Qui credit, manducat: invisibiliter saginatur, quia invisibiliter renascitur.

54. Hoc est ergo mandueare illam escam, et ilium bibere potum, in Christo manere, et ilium manentem in se habere. Ac per hoc qui non manet in Christo, et in quo non manet Christus, procul dubio nec manducat (spiritualiter) camem ejus, nec bibit ejus sanguinem (licet carnaliter et visibiliter premat dentibus sacramentum corporis et sanguinis Christi).

55. In coena Domini naturale ac substantiate istud corpus Christi, quo et hie passus est et nunc in coelis ad dex-teram patris sedet, not naturaliteratque peressentiam edi-tur, sed spiritualiter tantum. Spiritualiter edere corpus Christi, nihil aliud quam spiritu ac mente niti misericor-dia et bonitate Dei per Christum. Sacramentaliter edere corpus Christi, cum proprie volumus loqui, est, adjuncto sacremento, mente et spiritu corpus Christi edere.

56. Manducatatio non est unius generis. Est enim manducatio corporalis, qua cibus in os percipitur ab homine, dentibus atterritur et in ventrem deglutitur. Hoc manducationis genere intellexerunt olim Capemaitae sibi manducandam carnem Domini, sed refutantur ab ipso. Joann. cap. 6. Est et spiritualis manducatio corporis Christi, non ea quidem, qua existememus cibum mutari in spiritum, sed qua, manente in sua essentia et propri-etate corpore et sanguine Domini, ea nobis communicantur spiritualiter, utique non corporalimodo, sed spirituali, per Spiritum San ctum. qui videlicet ea quae per carenem et sanguinem Domini pro nobis in mortem tradita paratasunt , ipsam , inquam , remissionem peccatorum, liberation em et vitam aetemam, applicat et confert nobis, ita ut Christus in nobis vivat et nos in ipso vivamus. Ex quibus omnibus claret , nos per spiritualem cibum minime intellegere imaginarium, nescio quem , cibum, sed ipsum Domini corpus pro nobis traditum , quod tamen percipiatur a fidclibus. non corporaliter, sed spirltualiter per fidem. In qua re sequimur peromnia doctrinam ipsius Salvat vatoris Christi Domini, dicentis apud Joann. 6:63 , “Caro (nimirum corporaliter manducatio) non prode st quid-quam, spiritus est qui vivificat. Verba quae loquor vobis spiritus et vita sunt.” Fit autem hic esus et potus spiritualis etiam extra Domini coenam , et quoties, aut ubicunque homo in Christum crediderit. Quo fortassis illud Augustini pertinet : “Quid paras dentem et ventrem ? Crede et manducasti.”

57. images

58. images

59. images

Part 7:
1. Intermediate or Disembodied State

1. images = a word/discourse about the end-times

2. WS: It is often difficult to say positively and without qualification what the opinion of a church father really was upon the subject of hades, owing to the unsettled state of opinion. One and the same writer, like Tertullian or Augustine, for example, makes different statements at different times. This accounts for the conflicting representations of dogmatic historians. One thing, however, is certain: the nearer we approach the days of the apostles, the less do we hear about an underworld and of Christ's descent into it. Little is said concerning hades by the apostolic fathers. In the longer recension of Ignatius's To the Smymaeans 9, they are exhorted to "repent while yet there is opportunity, for in hades no one can confess his sins." Justin Martyr (Trypho 5) simply says that "the souls of the pious remain in a better place, while those of the wicked are in a worse, waiting for the time of judgment." The extracts from the fathers in Huidekoper's volume Christ's Mission to the Underworld show the uncertainty that prevailed. The same is true of those in Konig's Christi Hbllenfahrt (Christ's descent into hell), notwith-standing the bias of the author. For proof of the unsettled state of opinion among the fathers on many points of doctrine, see Jeremy Taylor's Liberty of Prophesying, 8.

3. fringe, border

4. fringe, border

5. images = hades

6. WS: The pagan nomenclature is self-consistent, but the pagan-Christian is not. In the pagan scheme, hades is a general term having two special terms under it: Elysium and Tartarus. But in the paganized Christian scheme, hades does double duty, being both a general and a special term. When the pagan is asked, "Of what does hades consist?" he answers, "Of Elysium and Tartarus." But when the mythological Christian is asked, "Of what does hades consist?" he must answer, "Of paradise and hades." He cannot answer, "Of paradise and Tartarus," because the latter is gehenna, which he denies to be in hades. Hence he converts the whole into a part of itself. To say that hades is made up of paradise and hades is like saying that New York City is made up of Central Park and New York City.

7. WS: On the influence of Hellenism on later Judaism, see Edersheim, Messianic Prophecy and History, lect. 9.

8. WS: The strong tendency of the later Jews to adopt both the customs and opinions of the heathen nations is noticed by Chemnitz in his learned and thorough examination of the Tri-dentine doctrine of purgatory (Examination concerning Purgatory, 2): “Ex philosophorum rati-ocinationibus, et ex superstitiosis gentium sacrificiis, quae ubique usitata erant, cum, quidem, sicut de caris absentibus ita etiam de mortuis naturalis quaedem cura et sollicitudo animis nos-tris insita est, ad Judaeos etiam hujus opinionis contagium quoddam, inclinato jam Judaismo, serpere coepit. Quanquam enim incisio camis, et evulsio capillorum, in luctu mortuorum, expresse prohibita erant (Lev. 19, Deut. 14), ex conversatione tamen intergentes, Israelitisetiam prophetarum tempore ilia usurpari coepta fuisse, ex Jeremiae, cap. 16, non obscure colligitur. Sicut a gentibus etiam tibicines in funerum curatione mutauti sunt (Matt. 9), juxta versum poetae: ‘cantabat moestis tibia funeribus.’ Eadem ratione tandem post prophetarum tempora, etiam orationes et sacrificia pro mortuis, Judaei imitari coeperunt circa annum 170 ante natum Christum, cujus exemplum extat 2 Maccabaeorum 12. Id quod turn fieri coepit, cum collapsa doctrina, et rebus omnibus, cum in imperio turn in templo, perturbatissimis, Judaei una cum foederibus, etiam lingua, appellationibus, moribus, et ritibus, conformitatem cum gentibus quaererent et affectarent: sicut lota historia Maccabaeorum ostendit.” [AG: With Judaism already in a state of decline, a certain infection of this opinion began to creep in among the Jews from the reasonings of the philosophers and from the superstitious sacrifices of the heathen, which were everywhere customary. Indeed, just as a certain natural care and solicitude is implanted in our souls concerning beloved ones who are absent, so likewise (this carried over into a concern for) the dead. For although the cutting of the flesh and the pulling out of the hair in the mourning of the dead was expressly prohibited (Lev. 19; Deut. 14), nevertheless, it is clearly inferred from Jer. 16 that, due to regular contact with the heathen, those things had begun to be practiced by the Israelites even in the time of the prophets. Thus, they even borrowed from the heathen the use of flute players in conducting their funerals (Matt. 9), according to the verse of the poet, “The flute was playing at the sad funerals.” In the same way, at length after the time of the prophets, the Jews began to imitate (around 170 B.C.) also the prayers and sacrifices for the dead—an example of which is found in 2 Maccabees 12. With the collapse of teaching and with everything in disarray—both in government and in the temple—it happened at that time that the Jews together with their covenants (note: Kramer renders una cum foederibus as “together with their confederates”—though lexically foedus means “covenant” or “agreement”) sought and aspired to conformity with the heathen also in speech, names, customs, and rites. This is shown by the entire history of the Maccabeans]

9. images = sheol

10. WS: As an example of the degree to which the mythological view of the condition of the dead had worked itself into the Christian church in the first part of the third century, see the fanciful description of hades by Hippolytus in a fragment of his Discourse against the Greeks.

11. into the infernal/lower parts

12. to the men below

13. images

14. images

15. Maxime dicitur de spatio quod e loco superiore ad inferiorem extenditur (Schleusner, entry “chasma”).

16. in the lower parts/regions

17. in the upper parts/regions

18. in the highest

19. WS: Respecting the entire separation between the good and the evil, see 1 Sam. 25:29: Ps. 26:9; 28:3.

20. images

21. some part of the lower regions

22. images

23. images

24. Insontes supra, sontes infra. Insontes in coelo, sontes in profundo. Insontes in manu dei, sontes in manu diaboli.

25. WS: The Council of Ferrara-Florence (1438-39), composed of Greek and Latin bishops, which attempted to unite the Latin and Greek churches, decided “that the souls of the saints are received immediately into heaven and behold God himself as he is, three in one” (Taylor, Liberty of Prophesying. 8).

26. WS: In the narrative concerning the witch of Endor, the term sheol is not once used.

27. he descended into hell

28. WS: Coleridge (Works 5.278) remarks: “This clause was not inserted into the Apostles’ Creed till the sixth century after Christ. I believe the original intention of the clause was no more than vers mortuus est (he truly died), in contradiction to the hypothesis of a trance or suspended animation.”

29. descent into hell

30. WS: See Hagenbach, History of Doctrine §77-78, 141-42 (ed. Smith).

31. images= hades

32. WS: Notwithstanding the currency which the view of hades as the abode of the good and evil between death and the resurrection has obtained, it would shock the feelings, should a clergyman say to mourning friends: “Dry your tears, the departed saint has gone down to hades.”

33. WS: The Episcopal church does not regard the descent into hell as a necessary part of the Christian faith. In the order for evening prayer, it is said that “any churches may omit the words he descended into hell.” The Forty-two Articles of Edward VI explain the clause to mean a descent into hades and preaching to the Old Testament saints in prison there. The Elizabethan Thirty-nine Articles give no explanation, but contain both clauses. Hence Pearson concludes that the Episcopalian has some liberty in the interpretation of this article. His own method is, first, to explain the Scripture and then to explain the creed as it now reads in its modern form. His explanation of Scripture is that in the clause you will not leave my soul in hell soul is metonymi-cally put for body and hell means the grave because (a) soul is frequently put for body in the Hebrew, (b) sheol means grave in many places, and (c) the Aquileian Creed so intended. Still, he says, “Though this may be a probable interpretation if the words of David, yet it cannot pretend to be an exposition of the creed as it now stands” in the Thirty-nine Articles, that is, as containing both clauses. When both clauses are retained, as in the Thirty-nine Articles, the second must be more than a mere repetition and explanation of the first. For if one merely explains the other, one would be omitted, as Rufinus says was the case in the Aquileian Creed and as is the case in the Athanasian Creed. Hence Pearson decides that the form of this article as it is adopted in the Thirty-nine Articles requires to be explained as the descensus ad inferos (descent into hell) in order to avoid tautology. But the form itself he shows to be a late addition to the Apostles’ Creed. If both clauses are retained, the explanation proposed by Whitby (on Acts 2:26-27) is consistent with Scripture: “The Scripture does assure us that the soul of the holy Jesus, being separated from his body, went to paradise (Luke 23:43), and from thence it must descend into the grave or sepulcher to be united to his body that this might be revived. And thus it may be truly said: ‘He was dead and buried; his soul descended afterward into hades (the grave) to be united to his body; and his body being thus revived, he rose again the third day.’“

34. WS: Baumgarten-Crusius (History of Doctrine 2.109) finds three stadia in the development of the dogma of the descent to hades: (1) the descent was the burial itself put into an imaginative form; (2) the descent was a particular condition or status of Christ resulting from his burial; and (3) the descent was entirely separate from the burial, being another and wholly distinct thing. Van Oosterzee’s history of the clause he descended into hell is as follows: “As concerns the history of this article, the conviction was expressed even by some of the earliest of the fathers—Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, and others—that Jesus, after his burial, actually tarried in the world of spirits and by some of them, also, that he there preached the gospel, while the romantic manner in which this mysterious subject is presented in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus is well known. Gnosticism, especially, warmly espoused this idea; according to Marcion, this activity of the Lord was directed to delivering the victims of the demiurge and leading them upward with himself. From the creeds of the Semiarians, this much-debated article appears to have passed over to those of the orthodox church, according to some, with a view to controvert Apollinarianism. In the Exposition of the Aquileian Symbol of Rufinus, this formula is found, and especially through his influence it appears also to have passed over into other confessions of faith; although it is remarkable that in the Nicene Creed mention is made only of ‘was buried’; in the Athanasian Creed, on the other hand, only of ‘descended into hell.’ It is manifest from this, that both expressions were first employed by many interchangeably, though very soon greater stress was laid upon the latter, and its contents regarded as the indication of a special remedial activity of the Lord. As the doctrine of purgatory became more developed, the conception found wider acceptance that the Lord had descended into the lower world in order to deliver the souls of the Old Testament believers from their subterranean abode, the limbus patrum. Especially under the influence of Thomas Aquinas was developed the doctrine of the Romish church that the whole Christ, both as to his divine and human nature, voluntarily repaired thither to assure to the above-mentioned saints the fruits of his death on the cross and to raise them out of this prisonhouse to the full enjoyment of heavenly blessedness. According to Luther, on the other hand, who regards the descensus as the first step in the path of the exaltation, the Lord, after his being made alive according to the spirit and immediately upon his return from the grave, descended, body and soul, into hell, there to celebrate his triumph over the devil and his powers (Col. 2:15) and to proclaim to them condemnation and judgment. Reformed theologians either understood the expression in the sense of ‘buried’ or explained it of the final anguish and dismay of the suffering Christ. This latter is the view of Calvin 2.16 and of Heidelberg Catechism A. 44. Some divines, for example, the Lutheran Aepinus, even maintained that the reference is to the sufferings of hell, which Christ endured in his soul, while his body was lying in the grave. No wonder that the Formula of Concord declared this article to be one “qui neque sensibus, neque ratione nostra comprehendi queat, solo autem fide acceptandus sit” (AG: which neither can be understood with the senses nor with our reason, but only is to be accepted on faith alone], which, however, did not prevent its being possible to say, on the other side, that “there are almost as many dissertations concerning the descensus as there are flies in the height of summer” (Witsius). Left by the supranat-uralism of the past century entirely in a misty obscurity, it was wholly rejected by the Rationalists as the fruit of an exploded popular notion, to which, according to Schleiermacher, nothing but a fact wholly unnoticed by the apostles (unbezeugte Thatsache) served as a basis. Only in our day has the tide turned and theologians ol different schools have begun to return with increased interest, yea, with manifest preference to this dogma and to bring it into direct connection not only with soteriology, but also with eschatology.” In the face of this historical account, Van Oosterzee proceeds todelend the doctrine of a local descent to hades, founding on Ps. 16:10; Acts 2:25-31; 13:33-37; Eph. 4:8-10; I Pet. 3:19-21; 4:6; Dogmatics 2.558-59.

35. WS: Augustine, Bede, Aquinas. Erasmus, Beza, Gerhard, Hettinger, Clericus, Leighton, Pearson, Seeker, Hammond, Hoffmann, and most Reformed theologians explain 1 Pet. 3:18-20 to mean that Christ preached by Noah to men who were “disobedient” in the days of Noah and who for this cause were “spirits in prison” at the time of Peter’s writing. The particle pole (note when), qualifying apeithesasi (images = having been disobedient), shows that the disobedience (or disbelief) occurred “when the ark was preparing.” But the preaching must have been contemporaneous with the disobedience or disbelief. What else was there to disobey or disbelieve? Says Pearson (On the Creed, art. 2): “Christ was really before the flood, for he preached to them that lived belore it. This is evident from the words of St. Peter (I Pet. 3:18-20). From which words it appears, first, that Christ preached by the same Spirit by the virtue of which he was raised from the dead: but that Spirit was not his [human] soul, but something of a greater power; second, that those to whom he preached were such as were disobedient; third, that the time when they were disobedient was the time before the flood, when the ark was preparing. The plain interpretation is to be acknowledged for the true, that Christ did preach unto those men which lived before the flood, even while they lived, and consequently that he was before it. For though this was not done by an immediate act of the Son of God, as if he personally had appeared on earth and actually preached to that world, but by the ministry of a prophet, by the sending of Noah ‘the eighth pr eacher of righteousness’: yet to do anything by another not able to perform it witho ut him as mu ch dem on strat es th e existe nce o f th e principal ca use as if he did it himself with out an y int erv ening instrument.“ Another pr oof of th e co rrectness of this in terpreta tion is the fact that Christ's preaching to "the spiri ts in pri son ” was pneum ati (images=in the spiri t) only. Th e tot a l theanthropos (images =God-man) did not preach. The sarx images o r human nature of Christ had no part in th e act. But Christ’s person a l a nd local preaching in had es wou ld require his whole di vine-human person , as mu ch so as his preaching in Galil ee or Jerusal em. Formula of Co ncord 9.2 so underst ands a nd teach es : “Cred imus quod rot a person a , deu s et homo , post se pulturam, ad inferos descenderit , Sat an arn devicerit ” [AG:We beli eve th at th e enti re person , God a nd man , after he was buried , descended into hell. thoroughly conquered Satan] . Christ’ s preaching through Noah- “a preacher of righteousnes s” (2 Pet. 2:5) a nd therefore an "ambass ado r of Christ" (2 Cor. 5:20)-might be don e th rough his divinity alon e. See Ep h, 4:20-2 1: Act s 26:23: John 10:16 fo r in stances in which Christ’s preaching by othe rs is ca lled hi s preaching. It is objected that the phrase he went and preach ed iporeutheis ekeryxe top images in 1 Pet. 3:19 would not a pply to a preach ing that was instrumental a nd spiri tua l. But th e sa me use is found in Eph. 2:17: Chri st "ca me a nd preach edielthon euangelisato , i:images) to you which were a far off .“ Th e reference is to Chri st ’s pr ea ch ing to the Gentile world by his apostles. Chri st , in his own person , did not pr each to them wh ich were "afar off”: a nd he forbade his d iscipl es to do so until the time a ppo inted by th e Fat her (Matt , 10:5: Acts I:4) . The objection that actua lly livin g men u pon ea rt h would not be ca lled “spirits” is met by Rom. 13:I ; I John 4:1, 3 a nd by th e fact tha t at th e tim e o f Pet er ’s writing th e person s meant are d isembodied s pi ri ts . First Pet. 4:6, sometimes ci ted in proo f of th e descensu s ad inferos , refers to th e pr eaching of the gospel to th e spiri tua lly “dead in trespasses and sins .” Thi s is Augu st ine’s int erpret ati on (Lette r 6.21 to Eu od ius). In Eph, 4:9 ta kat ot era mere tes ges (images = th e lower parts of th e ea rt h) to wh ich Christ “descende d” from “on h igh” sign ifies this lower wo rld of ea rt h. St. Paul is speaking her e of the incarnation. The incarnate Logos did not de scend from heaven to hades or ascend from had es to heaven . Cr. Isa . 44:23: “Sh out , you lower parts o f

th e ea rt h.” Thi s is th e oppos ite of th e “heavens,” whi ch a re bidden to “sing.” In Acts 2:19 thi s wo rld is ca lled he ge ka la (images = the ea rt h below). Had es would be ta kauu ata mere tes ges (images =th e lower pa rt s of th e ea rt h). In Rom. 10:7 Chris t’s descent “into th e deep (abysso images)” is shown by th e co ntext to be his descent int o th e gra ve. Wha tever be th e in terpret ati on of I Pet. 3:18-20, suc h a rema rkable doctr ine as the descent to hades s hould ha ve more foundation than a single disputed text. The doct rine itself is so obscu re th at it ha s had five different forms o f sta tement: (I) Christ virtua lly descended in to had es , because his deat h was efficaciou s upon th e so uls th ere ; (2) Chris t ac tua lly descended int o had es ; (3) Christ’s descent into had es was his sufferi ng th e torments of hell ; (4) Christ ’s descent into had es was his bu rial in th e grave; and (5) Chri st’s descent int o had es was his rem aining in th e sta te of th e dead for a season.Westmin st er Larger Cat ech ism 50 co mbin es th e la st two: “Ch rist’s humiliati on a fter his death co ns isted in his bein g buried and continuing in the state of the dead and un der the power o f death, till the third day, which ha s been otherwise expressed in the words he descended int o hell .”

36. first gospel (a term used to refer to the first indications of a gospel of salvation)

37. WS: Cf. Mozley, Essay on Job.

38. images

39. WS: The common opinion of the church, ancient, medieval, and modern, is that this passage teaches both immortality and the resurrection. De Wette, Ewald, and even Renan find the doctrine of immortality in it (see Perowne, On Immortality, n. 3).

40. WS: Muller regards it as so unquestionable, from the description in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, that hades is not a place for repentance and salvation that he places future redemption after the day of judgment. He asserts that “those theories of apokalastasis (dnoKmricrtaaic, = restoration) which represent it as taking place in the interval between death and the general resurrection directly violate the New Testament eschatology. If, therefore, the idea ofanapokala-stasis pantOn (riiuncaTaoTaaic, itdvitov = restoration of all things) is to be maintained, it must be referred to a period lying beyond the general resurrection" (Sin 2.426).

41. WS: If hades in this passage means an underworld, it would include paradise, and thus paradise would be cast into the lake of fire.

42. images = 0 death

43. images = his soul

44. images

45. images

46. WS: In committing themselves to the position that sheol and hades "signify the abode of departed spirits and correspond to the Greek hades or the underworld" (preface to the Old Testament) and that neither term denotes either the place of punishment or the grave, the Revised Version translators have placed themselves in doctrinal opposition, on a very important subject, to James's translators, to Luther and the authors of the principal European versions, and to the missionary translators generally. In all these versions, sheol and hades are understood to mean either hell or the grave and never an underw orld containing all spirits good and bad. The view of the Reformers on this point is stated in the following extract from "Hades" in the Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia: "The Protestant churches rejected, with purgatory and its abuses, the whole idea of a middle state and taught simply two states and places—heaven for believers and hell for unbelievers. Hades was identified with gehenna. and hence both terms were translated alike in the Protestant versions. The English (as also Luther's German) version of the New Testament translates hades and gehenna by the same word hell and thus obliterates the important distinction between the realm of the dead (or netherworld, spirit world) and the place of torment or eternal punishment; but in the Revision of 1881 the distinction is restored and the term hades introduced."

47. WS: "The meaning of Hebrew ii'dl is doubtful, but I have not hesitated to translate it hell. I do not find fault with those who translate it grave, but it is certain that the prophet means something more than common death;

otherwise he would say nothing else concerning the wicked than what would also happen to all the faithful in common with them" (Calvin onPs. 9:17).

48. images = death

49. WS: That "the heart of the earth" means the grave, Witsius (Apostles' Creed, diss. 17) argues in the following manner: "Jonah says that, while he was in the bowels of the fish, he was 'in the belly of hell' or of the grave and 'in the middle [Hebrew: heart] of the sea': and in this respect he was a figure of Christ placed in the heart of the earth. This does not mean the hell of the damned, which, as Jerome says, is commonly said to be 'in the middle of the earth'; but an earthen receptacle which has earth above, below, and on every side; or more briefly, which is within the earth. As the Scripture places Tyre 'in the heart of the sea,' that is, surrounded by the sea, as 'the way of a ship is in the heart of the sea' when it is surrounded on all sides by the sea, as Absalom was 'alive in the heart of the oak,' that is, in the oak, within its branches—so the grave is 'the heart of the earth.' Chrysostom remarks that 'the sacred writer does not say in the earth, but in the heart of the earth, that the expression might clearly denote the grave, and that no one might suspect a mere appearance [of death].'"

50. WS: This text and Gen. 42:38 are parallel to 37:35 and explain Jacob's words: "I will go down mourning into sheol unto my son." "Gray hairs" are matter and cannot go into a world of spirits. It is objected that sheol does not mean the "grave" because there is a word images for grave. A grave is bou gh t a nd so ld, a nd th e plural is used; but sheol is never bou ght and so ld or used in th e plural. Th e re ply is th at "grave" has an a bs trac t and general se nse, denoted by images a nd a co nc re te and particula r, den ot ed by qeber images All men go to the grave; but not a ll men have a gra ve. When our Lord says tha t "a ll that a re in the ir gra ves (II/II/' II/eioi s,).Iv'1).1 dOl ~) sha ll come fort h" (John 5:28). he docs not mean that only those sha ll be ra ised who have been laid in a particul a r gra ve with fun eral o bsequies . A man is "in th c gra ve" in th c gene ra l se nse when hi s so ul is se pa ra ted fro m his body a nd his bod y has "returned to the du st " (Gen. 3:19). To be "in th e grave" in th e ab st ract se nse is to have the eleme nts of the body min gled with those of th e ea rth from wh ich it was tak en (Eccles. 12:7). The part icula r spot where th e mi ngling occ urs is unessent ial. Moses is in th e grave; but “no man knows of his sepulcher unto th is day.” We say of one drowned in th e ocean th at he found a watery grave. Th ese remarks a pply a lso to th e use of hades  and II/llell/eioll  = grave). According to Pea rson (011 the Creed , a rt , 5), the Jeru sa lem Targum, Ta rgum Jona than. and the Persia n Targum explain se  = sheol) in Gen . 37:35 and 42:38 by qeber  .To the objection th at Jacob knew or suppose d th at his so n had been devoured by wild beast s and co nse que ntly had no gra ve and, th erefore, meant to say that he sho uld go down to th e world of spi rits to meet him , Rivetus (Exercise 151. in Gen esi s) repli es as follows: “Per se pulchru m non int elligimus stricte , id de quo apud jurisconsu ltos disputatur , cum agunt de sepulchro viola te , se d id rcferimus ad ra tionem humantion is in genere, qua ndo cumq ue mod o terra redda tu r terrae, juxta se ntentiam d ivin am, ’Pulvis es , et in pul verern reverteris.’ Sep eliri en im dicuntu r qu icunqu e terrae reddu ntur , etiam qu i sepeliun tur ’sepultura asi ni ,’ quod de Joachimo pronunt iavit Jeremias (22:19). Igitur verba Jacobi ’Descendam ad filium meum lugen s in infenum,’ id est , in se pulchru m, non possumus melius explicare quam verbis Albini, qu i s ic ingemi scentis patris expo nit qu ere larn : ’ In luctu perrnan eb o, don ee me terra susc ipia t, ut filium meum se pulchrum ja m suscepit.’ Id ipse Jacobus etiam int e llexit , qui per vocem sheo l locum den ot at ’quo se num cani cum dolore deducu ntur.” [AG: We sho uld not understand th e word grave s trictly, as th at abo ut whi ch lawyers d ispute wh en th ey are deal , ing with th e violation of a grave. Rather, we refer it to the reason for bu rying in general, whe never th e earth is ret urned to earth. according to th c divin e sentence: “You are du st , and to du st you will re turn .’ For whoever a re re tu rn ed to th e earth are said to be buried, eve n those who are bu ried “in th e grave of a donkey.” which Jeremi ah (22:19) pron ounced co nce rning Jeh oiak irn. Therefore, we ca n no bett er explai n th e words of Jaco b, “I will go down to my so n mourning int o hell,” th at is, in to th e grave, than by th e word s of Albinu s, wh o thus expla ins the compla int of th e gro aning father as follows: “I sha ll rem ain in mourning until the earth receives me. as th e grave has a lready received my so n.” Moreover , Jacob himself under stood it. who through the word sheol indi cat es th e place “to wh ich th e gray hai rs of th e age d go down wit h sorrow.”]

51. WS: In support of this interpretation of these words, we avail ourselves of the unquestioned learning and accuracy of Pearson. After remarking that the explanation which makes the clause he descended into hell to mean "that Christ in his body was laid in the grave" is "ordinarily rejected by denying that 'soul' is ever taken for 'body' or 'hell' for the 'grave,'" he proceeds to say that "this denial is in vain: for it must be acknowledged that sometimes the Scriptures are rightly so, and cannot otherwise be, understood. First, the same word in the Hebrew, which the psalmist used, and in the Greek, which the apostle used and we translate 'the soul,' is elsewhere used for the body of a dead man and rendered so in the English version. Both nepes~ (images = life, soul) and psyche (images= soul) are used for the body of a dead man in the Hebrew and Septuagint of Num. 6:6: 'He shall come at no dead body (nepes" mil, images = dead soul).'The same usage is found in Lev. 5:2; 19:28; 21:1, 11; 22:4; Num. 18:11, 13; Hag. 2:13. Thus, several times, nepeS (images = life, soul) and psyche (images = soul) are taken for the body of a dead man, that body which polluted a man under the law by the touch thereof. And Maimonides has observed that there is no pollution from the body till the soul be departed. Therefore nepes' (images = life, soul) and psyche (images = soul) did signify the body after the separation of the soul. And it was anciently observed by St. Augustine that the soul may be taken for the body only: "Animae nomine corpus solum posse significari, modo quodam locutionis ostenditur, quo significatur per id quod continetur illud quod continet" [AG: That the word soul can signify the body alone is shown in a certain manner of speaking, in which the thing contained signifies the container]; Letter 157 al. 190 to Optatus; Concerning ihe Origin of Souls 5.19. Second, Hebrew images (images = sheol), which the psalmist used, and the Greek word hade's images, which the apostle employed and is translated 'hell' in the English version, does certainly in some other places signify no more than the 'grave' and is translated so. As when Ainsworth follows the word, 'For 1 will go down unto my son, mourning, to hell'; our translation, arriving at the sense, renders it, 'For 1 will go down into the grave, unto my son, mourning' (Gen. 37:35). So again he renders, 'You shall bring down my gray hairs with sorrow unto hell,' that is, 'to the grave' (Gen. 42:38). And in this sense we say, 'The Lord kills and makes alive: he brings down to the grave and brings up' (1 Sam. 2:6). It is observed by Jewish commentators that those Christians are mistaken who interpret those words spoken by Jacob, ‘I will go down into sheol,’ of hell [in the sense of underworld], declaring that sheol there is nothing but the grave” (Pearson, On the Creed, art. 5). The position that nepei (images = life, soul) is sometimes put for a dead body and that sheol in such a connection denotes the grave was also taken by Ussher (as it had been by Beza on Acts 2:27, before him) and is supported with his remarkable philological and patristic learning; see his discussion of the limbus patrum and Christ’s descent into hell in his Answer to a Challenge of a Jesuit in Ireland in Works, vol. 3. This metonymy of “soul” for “body” is as natural an idiom in English as it is in Hebrew and Greek. It is easier for one to say that “the ship sank with a hundred souls” than to say that it “sank with a hundred bodies.” And yet the latter is the real fact in the case.

52. fringe, border

Part 7:
2. Christ’s Second Advent

1. images

2. images

3. images = to raise, raise up

4. images = to make alive

5. images =to make alive again

6. WS: Tischendorf, Hort, A, B, and Vulgate read images= lived) instead ofimages= lived again) in Textus Receptus. The Revised Version omits “again.”

Part 7:
3. Resurrection

1. images

2. images

3. images

4. images

5. Aliud est corpus fieri spirituale quoad qualitates ratione claritatis, agilitatis, subtilitatis, et similium; aliud vero fieri spiritum, seu mutari in naturam spiritus.

6. images= natural

7. images =spiritual

8. images= soul

9. images = spirit

10. images

11. images

12. images

13. images

14. WS: The trichometry in Heb. 4:12 is one of the coincidences with Paul's usage in his undoubted epistles which go to prove that he is the author, directly or indirectly, of Hebrews.

15. images

16. images

17. images

18. images

19.

20. images = resurrection

21. images = resurrection

22. images= from the dead

23. images

24. images.

25. images

26. images

27. images

28. images

29. images

30. images

31. images

32. images

33. images

34. images

35. images

36. images

37. images

38. WS: Howe [Vanity o(Man) denominates the soul “the statique individuating principle” of the body.

39. images

40. images

41.

42.

43.

44.

45.

46. WS: In I Cor. 2:14 fallen man is denominated anthtOpos psychikos ( = soulish [i.e., natural] man) because he is ruled by the animal rather than the rational soul. In saying that “that was not first which was spiritual, but that which is natural” (15:46), the order as it now exists alter apostasy, and not the original order, is given. Sin is prior to salvation and is presupposed by redemption. But by creation, man is first “spiritual” and holy and afterward becomes “natural,” and sinful.

47. from “not to be” to “not to be able” (i.e., to argue from nonexistence in fact to the impossibility of existence in principle)

48.

49.

50. See glossar1.

Part 7:
4. Final Judgment

1.  = judgment) is anarthrous. The writer does not say that the judgment immediately succeeds the death ot the body, but that a judgment does.

2.

Part 7:
5. Heaven

1. not to be able to sin and to die (see passe peccare el non posse peccare in glossary 1)

Part 7:
6. Hell

1. “”[AG: he who considers that it is possible for him to be unhappy will not be happy]; Cicero, On Ends 2.27.

2.In millon’sParadise Lost 2.274-78, Satan suggests lhat custom may mitigate the pains ol hell: Our torments also may, in length of time, Become our elements: these piercing fires As soft as now severe; our temper changed Into their temper; which must needs remove The sensible of pain.

3. WS: Respecting this very common objection, Miiller (Sin 1.239) makes the following remark: “The primary meaning of κρισις = judgment) is discrimination and separation and implies that the main contrast between man and man in relation to the future state is made manifest by the cessation of intercourse between those who obey God and those who resist him. Beings whose relations to God are diametrically opposite, and persistently so, differ so greatly from each other that other ties of relationship become as nothing in comparison. Bonds of union among men arising out of the relationships of natural life must give way of themselves, if the tie which binds man’s spiritual consciousness and will to his Creator be on either side wholly severed. For those bonds have not in themselves an eternal significance, save so far as they are included in that relation to God which is of everlasting importance.”

4. WS: In placing the time of repentance “between death and the judgment” (2.425), Miiller appears lo contradict what he says in 2.426, 429: “It is clear that those theories of an ἀποκατάστασις = restoration) which represent it as taking place in the interval between death and the general resurrection directly violate the New Testament eschatology. If the idea, therefore, is to be maintained, it must be referred to a period lying beyond the general resurrection. αιών μέλλων melton [αιών μέλλων = world to come) does not mean the time and slate immediately ensuing upon death, but the period when the kingdom of the Messiah shall be fully realized and revealed: the period which follows the resurrection and the judgment. Christ’s words

[Matt. 12:32], therefore, inspire the glorious hope that in ‘the world to come,’ in far distant eons, they who here harden their hearts against God’s revelation and can expect only a verdict of condemnation in the day of judgment shall find forgiveness and salvation.”

5. WS: Edersheim (ἀνθρώπος ψυχικός Jesus 2.789) assorts that the schools of Shammai and Hillel both taught the doctrine of eternal punishment: “These schools represented the theological teaching in the time of Christ and his apostles, showing that the doctrine of eternal punishment was held in the days of our Lord, however it may have been afterward modified.” Edersheim adds that “the doctrine of the eternity ol punishment seems to have been held by the synagogue throughout the whole first century. In the second century, there is a decided difference in rabbinic opinion; some denying the doctrine of endless retribution. In the third century, there is a reaction and a return to former views.”

6. an unfeeling thunder (i.e., an empty threat)

7. WS: There is no dispute that gehenna denotes the place of retributive suffering. It is employed seven times in Matthew’s Gospel, thrice in Mark’s, and once in Luke’s. In every one of these instances, it is Christ who uses the term. The only other person who has used it is James (3:6). It is derived fromge (גי הנם) “) = valley of Hinnom: (גהנם). It was a valley southeast of Jerusalem, in which Molech worship was practiced (2 Kings 23:10; Ezek. 23:37, 39). It was called Tophet (abomination) in Jer. 31:32. King Josiah caused the filth of Jerusalem to be carried thither and burned (2 Kings 23:10). Robinson asserts that there is no evidence that the place was used in Christ’s day for the deposit and burning of offal. Gehenna at the time of the advent had become a technical term for endless torment; as paradise and Abraham’s bosom had for endless blessedness.

8. αἰώνιος

9. αἰώνιος

10.  images

11. images

12. images

13. images

14. images

15. images

16. images

17. WS: The common phrase here and hereafter denotes that human existence divides into only two sections. When Faust sells his soul to Mephistopheles. both parties understand that there are only two worlds: the temporal and the eternal. The latter covenants with the former as follows: I to thy service here agree to bind me, To run and never rest at call of you; When over yonder you shalt find me, Then you shalt do as much for me.

18. images

19. images

20. images

21. images

22. images

23. images

24. images

25. images

26. images

27. WS: It is relative, not absolute eternity; eternity a parte post [AG: in the direction of what comes after; i.e., looking forward in time], not a parte ante [AG: in the direction of what comes before; i.e., looking backward in time]. The future eon or age has a beginning, but no ending. This is the meaning when in common phrase it is said that “a man has gone into eternity” and that his happiness or misery is “eternal.” The absolutely eternal has no beginning as well as no ending; it is the eternity of God. The relatively eternal has a beginning but no end; it is the immortality of man and angel. The Schoolmen called the former eternitas; the latter sempi-temitas. Scripture designates the absolute eternity of God by the phrase from everlasting to everlasting (Ps. 90:2). The punishment of the wicked is more properly endless than eternal.

28. images

29. images

30. images

31. images

32. images

33. images

34. images

35. images

36. images

37. images

38. images

39. WS: The Revisers make the reference to be to the unlimited eon or to eternity. Their rendering of Titus 1:2 by “before times eternal” involves the absurdity that a divine promise is made prior to eternity and of Rom. 16:25 by “through times eternal” represents the mystery as concealed during eternity: that is to say, as forever concealed.

40. WS: The phrases end of the ages tele images1 Cor. 10:11), fullness oj the time (Gal. 4:4), fullness oj times (Eph. 1:10), and these last days (eschatos ton hemeion touton, imagesdenote the time of the Messiah's first advent, that epoch in the temporal aion (images) when the incarnation occurred (Hodge on Eph. 1:10).

41. images

42. images

43. images

44. images

45. images

46. images

47. images = unto eternity

48. images

49. images

50. images

51. images= lit., unto the ages of the ages

52. images = forever

53. images = forever and ever (lit., unto the ages of the ages)

54. images = forever

55. images

56. images

57. images

58. images

59. images

60. images

61. images

62. images

63. WS: “Aidn [images] de quocunque temporis spatio itadicitur, ut, quale sit, judicari deheat in singulis locis ex orationis serie et mente scriptoris, rebus adeo et personis de quibus sermo est” [AG: The word eon is used for any duration of time, which must be judged in each individual passage from the (tow [serie) of the language, from the mind of the writer, and from the matters and persons thus far under discussion]: Schleusner, entry aidn.

85. WS: This theory was presented by Dodwell, Epistolary Discourse: Thai the Soul Is a Principle Naturally Mortal Immortalized by the Pleasure of God (London, 1706).

86. images = this age

87. images = the age to come

88. images

89. images

90. images = end

91. images = end

92. images

93. images

94. WS: The stra nge positi on has recentl y been taken th at th e rejec tion of Chri st is the only sin that brings eterna l death. “No one,” says Dorn er iChristian Doctrine 4.167), “will be damned merely on accou nt of the common sin and guilt. But everyone is definitely brou ght to [gui lty] per son al decision only th rou gh th e gospel.” Says a writer in the Dec. 1885 Andover Review: 574: “No one can be lost without the knowled ge of Chri st .” This impl ies th at man 's sin aga ins t the mora l law is not sufficie nt to co ndemn him to eternal death. He must sin aga ins t the gos pel before he ca n be so co ndemned. either origina l sin nor actu al tra nsgression , neither evil inc lination nor outward di sob edi en ce, both of whic h are sins aga inst th e law , expose a man to hell . This is an entire ly new posi tion , not to be found in the history of esc ha tology and invented , ap parent ly, to furnish a bas is for the doctri ne of a future offer of redemption . The objections to it are the following: (a) It co ntra dicts the whole ten or of Scripture. Christ teaches th at he came to ca ll actu al and guilty sinners to repe nta nce (Luke 5:32); th at he came to see k and save that whi ch was really and tru ly lost (19 : I0); th at he did not come into the world to condemn the world , becau se it was a lrea dv co ndemned, but to sa ve the world (John 3:17- 18). 51. Paul affirms th at th e whole world , prior to redemption and irre spective of it, is guilty before God (Rom . 3:19). 51.John as sert s that the whole world, Gen tile and Jewish , un evan gelized and evan gelized, lies in wickedn ess (I Jo hn 5:19). To qu ote a ll the passages in whi ch the Bible teach es th at men a re exposed to eternal dea th on account of their tran sgr ession of the law of God would be to quote a la rge part of the Bible . Th e rejection of the gos pel adds a new sin and a very agg ravating one to the alrea dy existing sin aga inst divine law (John 15:22), but it is not the primary and orig ina l gro und of condemna tion. Men a re punished, first of a ll, because they “have sinned and come short of the glory of God” (Rom. 3:23). (b) Unless man has first sinned against th e law, he can not sin aga inst the gos pel. If he has not previou sly committed a damning sin for which Chri st has a to ned, he ca nno t reject Chri st' s a tonement any more th an an inn ocent angel ca n. The rejection of sa lvation is meaningless if no damnation has bee n incurred . tf there is no disease , th er e ca n be no cure nor rejection of a cure. (c) If no human soul is in dan ger of perdition until it has rejected Chri st, then if Christ had never been offered to man no ma n would be lost. For if he wer e not offere d , he could not be rejected . In th is ca se , it would have been infi nit elv better for mankind had Chris t never come into the world on an errand of sa lvation. Had he remained un inca rnate , as he had been from eterni tv, no one could have refuse d belief in him, and as unbelief is the only damning sin no one could ’have been damned. (d) If “no man ca n be lost withou t the knowled ge of Chri st,” then no ne of the past hea th en world who died without thi s knowledge incu rr ed perdit ion for the “deeds do ne in th e body,” and none of the existing heathen worl d who ar e destitute of thi s knowledge ar e lia ble to perdition from th is ca use. In this cas e, it is mailer of rejoicing that the past genera tions of pagan s never heard of the Redeemer, and it sho uld be an earnest endeavor of the church to prevent all of the present generation of paga ns from hearing of him. Dom er’s theory th at “no one will be damned mer ely on account of the common s in and guilt” is full of inco nsisten cy and self-contra diction. First, he ho lds that man is in a state of “common s in and gu ilt.” bu t it is a spe cies of sin and guilt that does not deserve endless punishment and is not in danger of it . Second, he holds th at man needs “sa lvat ion” from suc h an un end an gered sta te. Third, he hold s tha t God is bound in justice to pro vide “salva tion” from such an unendan gered state. “The gos pe l.” he says (4.167), “repentance, and forgiven ess of s ins are to be preach ed to all nati on s. This ca nno t refer merel y to nati on s as unities, but must refer a lso to every individual; for ot he rwise the universa lity of the grac ious purpose would not be since re ly mea nt ; and if God refused what is indi spen sabl e to salvation to the indi vidu a l, condemna tion would be impossib le.” Fourth , he holds th at God exhibi ts mercy when he does what he is obliga ted to do. To all thi s self-stultifying so te riology, the principl e enuncia ted by 51. Paul (Rom . II :6) is a conclusive reply: “If by grac e, then it is no more of works; othe rw ise grace is no mor e grace. But if it be of works , then it is no more grace: ot he rwise work is no more work.“ If ma n’s ”commo n sin and guilt” is not damning. then it is no more sin a nd gu ilt; ot herwi se si n a nd guilt a re no more sin a nd guilt. If Christ’s sa lva tion is not from de a th a nd hell, then it is no mor e sa lvation; othe rwise sa lva tion is no mor e sa lvation. And if God ’s me rcy is jus tly du e to ma n, th en it is no more mer cy; othe rwise mercy is no more mercy. Julius MUller, thou gh holding (on th e gro und of Matt . 12:32) “the glorious hope that in th e world to co me , in far di stant eo ns , so me who here ha rden th ei r hearts aga ins t God ’s revelation a nd ca n expec t only a verd ict of co ndemna tion in th e day of judgment, sha ll find forgiven ess and sa lvation”

(Si“ 2.437), denies a nd comba ts Domer’s positi on tha t sin against th e gos pel is the only damning sin (Si ” 2.400). For a very a ble argume nt in proo f that bot h evil incli na tio n a nd outwa rd transgression are damning, see Si ll I.198- 214 .

95. WS: Shedd, Sermons to the Natural Man, sermon 18.

96. WS: The merit of Miiller, in particular, in respect to a profound and true view of sin is very great. No theological treatise of the nineteenth century has more value on this subject than his.

97. WS: “The distinction,” says Miiller (SIM 1.207), “between superable and insuperable ignorance will affect our calculation of the degree of guilt. A man cannot be reproached on account of ignorance regarding things accidental and changeable; but to be ignorant of those fundamental truths whereof conscience informs him, and of their bearing upon conduct, is the sign of a sinful perversion of the inner life. If. from the moment when he first heard the voice of conscience, his aim always had been simply and solely to know what that voice tells him and unconditionally to obey, there would be no sins of ignorance to be laid to his charge. But the sinfulness of human nature, in this respect, prevents our exculpating him thus from the guilt of particular sins. It is the unrighteousness of man that hinders the development of truth in his consciousness (Rom. 1:18). And hence we lind that savages, when they have been converted from the abominations of idolatry—from lust and murder and unbridled selfish impulse—to the faith of Christ never excuse themselves on the ground of ignorance, but in deep humiliation feel the reproaches of an awakened conscience. St. Paul recognizes the mitigation of guilt in the case of the heathen, when he says that God overlooked’ the chronoi les agnoias (images = times of ignorance) (Acts 17:30) but he by no means considers the sinful heathen to be free from guilt.” For a powerful description of heathen depravity, see Thucydides, History 2.53; 3.82. And For a powerful specimen of human depravity, see the “Plebeian’s Speech” in Machiavelli, History of Florence 3.3.

98. WS: The following extract from Witsius (Apostles’ Creed, diss. 2) exhibits the hopeful view which the elder Calvinism took of the possible extent to which God’s decree of election reaches: “Doctri nes may hesaid to he necessa ry ei ther to sa lvation or to rel igion or to the church. A doc trine, without th e knowledge and belief of whic h God does not save person s who have come to yea rs of moral co nscious ness, is necessary to sa lvatio n; a doctrin e, without the profe sian a nd practice of which no one ca n be conside red rel igious , is necessary to religion : and a doc tri ne. wit ho ut wh ich no one is admitted to th e communion of th e visib le churc h, is neee sary to th e churc h. There may be a rt icles without whic h person s ought not to be admitted to th e fellowship of th e churc h, that should not , for th at reason, be regarded as absolutely essential eithe r to religion or to sa lvation. Althou gh we might not dare to pro nou nce a sentence of condemna tion aga ins t a part icul a r ma n, we ought not , in defian ce of order a nd di scretion, to rece ive him fort hwith into the bosom of OUI' church, whatever sen timents he might hold and to wha tever sec t he might belong.And wit h respect to religion ,what falls withi n th e sphere of du ty is man ifest. But how far it may please a gracious God or how far it may be possible for him in co nsis te ncy with his perfections a nd character to extend his forbearance to a nyo ne a nd save his soul. notwithsta nding his errors a nd sins; OJ’, in sho rt. what a rc the lowest atta inments wit hout whic h no ma n is save d-who ca n tell? For thi s dist inct ion in doctrines, I am indebted to the celebra ted Hoornbeck iCont utatiou orSocinianism 1.209). Again , the know ledge of those doct rin es which a rc necessary to sa lvation admits various degrees. It is in differ ent measures of clearness, a bunda nce, a nd efficacy th at di vine revela tio n, the mean s of grace, and th e communications of th e Sp irit a rc enjoye d; a nd a corresponding di vers ity takes place in th e degre es of knowledge whic h the saints attain. In some it is clear, distinct, steady, a nd accompa nied with a very firm and decid ed assent; in others it is more co nfused, more implicit a nd lat ent, subjec t to occas iona l wavering, and attended with an assent that is yielded with di fficulty, The comma nd of God indee d lays a n indis pensable obliga tio n u pon all men to make every possible effort to attain a most clear, dist inct. a nd ass ured knowledge of divin e truth. It ca nnot, however, be questio ned that th e dei ty in his unbounded goodness receives man y to the abodes of bliss whose knowledge even of the prin cip al articles is very indi sti nct a nd suc h as they a re hardl y ca pable of expressing in th eir ow n words , The sma llest measure of the req uisit e knowledge a ppears to be th is, namely, th at when a n a rtic le of fai th is explained, the mind so fa r a t least apprehends it as to recognize a nd embrace it as tru e. Furt hermore . times must be distingui shed . It admits no doubt th at und er th e brig ht dispensa tion of the gospel. a mo re exte nsive a nd explici t knowl edge is necessa ry to sa lvation than was required under th e Old Tes tament eco no my; for it is reasona ble th at both knowledge a nd the necessity of knowledge should increase in pro portion to th e measu re of revelation affo rded. Unde r the old dispen sat ion , nay, du ring th e tim e of our Savior's abode on th e ea rt h. it was possible for a manto be a tru e believer a nd in a sta te of grace who was ignoran t of the suf ferings, th e death , a nd the res urrection of Chris t a nd who even pr esumed to objec t to the test imon y of Christ himself res pec ting these momen tous topics , as is clear from th e insta nce of Peter (Matt. 16:2 1-23), or who, thou gh he believed in genera l in the Messiah , yet knew not tha t Jesu s is th e Christ, as a ppears from th e histo ry of Corneliu s th e ce nturion (Acts 10:2-4). No o ne, however, I suppose, would now ac knowledge a ny person [in Christendom] as a true believer who should discover ignorance of these truths resp ecting th e Lord Je u and still less a person who shou ld contradict th em whe n represented to him. On th is subject, th e remark of Thom as Aqu inas (Summa 2.2.1.7) deserves to be qu ot ed : 'The articles of faith: says he, 'have increased with the lap se of time , not ind eed wit h resp ect to the fait h itself, but with respe ct to explicit a nd express profession. The same th ings whic h are believed explicitly and under a grea ter number of a rt icles by the sa ints in la tter days were all believed implicitly and under a sma ller number by the fathers in anci ent tim es:"

99. Agnoscimus, interim, deum illuminare posse homines etiam sine externo ministerio, QUO et auando velit: id ouod ejus notentiae est.

100. WS: "It is a very significant fact that the subject of the Book of Ruth isa heathen woman; she is, indeed, the third heathen woman in the genealogy of David and Christ, being preceded by the Canaanitess Tamar (Gen. 38) and the Canaanitess Rahab. Ruth is the most noble of all; a consecrated flower of paganism turning with a longing desire to the light and salvation of Israel. The fact that these three females are brought forward and engrafted on the chosen line or family conveys a very expressive lesson to the Israelites, abases their national pride, and bears testimony (by being both a fulfillment and a type) to all that had been promised to Abraham respecting his seed, namely, that in him should all families of the earth be blessed' (Gen. 12:3). Of those who are blessed in the seed of Abraham, Naomi represents the people of God who are to proceed from the ancient people of the covenant, and Ruth represents those proceeding from the heathen world" (Kurtz, Sacred History §66).

101. WS: The passage "in every nation, he that fears God and works righteousness is accepted with him" (Acts 10:35) is often explained as teaching that there are in every nation some who live virtuous and exemplary lives and upon this ground obtain the rewards and blessedness of the future. This would be salvation by works, which is impossible, according to St. Paul. This is the error in the question put by Dante to the "eagle" (Paradise 19.66-67): A man is born on Indus' banks, and none is there Who speaks of Christ, nor who doth read nor write; And all his inclinations and his acts, As far as human reason sees, are good; And he offendeth not in word or deed: But unbaptized he dies, and void of faith. Where is the justice that condemns him? This is an imaginary case of perfect obedience. There is no such man. It is with reference to such an interpretation of this text, that Westminster Confession 10.4 asserts that "men not professing the Christian religion cannot be saved in any other way whatever, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to (he light of nature and the law of that religion which they do profess," because their "diligence" is a failure. The Thirty-nine Articles §18 assert that no man, either in Christendom or heathendom, can be saved by his morality and virtue: "They also are to be had accursed that presume to say that every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professes, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to the law and the light of nature. For Holy Scripture does set out unto us only the name of Jesus Christ, whereby men must be saved." In the passage above cited, the phrases fearer of God and worker of righteousness are employed technically by St. Peter to denote a man inquiring after the way of salvation: somewhat as it was among the Jews, to signify a proselyte of the gate (Guricke, Church History, 29). This is evident from the fact that to this "devout" Cornelius who "feared God with all his house" (Acts 10:2), the apostle preached Christ as the Savior of sinners, "through whose name, whosoever believes in him shall receive remission of sins," and that Cornelius believed and was baptized (10:36-48). He would not have done this had he expected that his “fearing God” and “working righteousness,” in other words his own morality and virtue, would save him. In 13:26 the “fearers of God” (hoi phohoumenoi ton theon. οἱ φοβούμενοι τὸν θεόν) are distinguished from “the stock of Abraham” or native-born Jews. They were the proselytes of the gate. Into this class of “fearers of God” fall the “devout Greeks” (hoi sebomenoi hellenes, οἱ σεβόμενοι ἑλλήνες; 17:4), the “devout persons” {hoi sebomenoi, οἱ σεβόμενοι 17:17), and Lydia, “a worshiper of God” (sebomeni ton theon, σεβομένη τὸν θεόν; 16:14). Lydia went to the Jewish oratory (proseuche, προσεύχη) .) in which the audience was divided into Jews and proselytes, each class occupying seats by themselves. As examples of inquirers after salvation, take Augustine and his friends Alypiusand Nebridius (Confessions 6.10).

102. WS: Cf. Augustine, City ofGod 21.12.

103. WS: “Quamvis infantes non sint legis capaces quoad actum, sunt tamen quoad habi-tum, utpote creaturae rationales, quibus lex praescribit omnimodam sanctitatem, tarn habi-tualem quam actualem” [AG: Although infants are not capable of the law with respect to action, they nevertheless are with respect to disposition (habitus), seeing that they are rational creatures to whom the law prescribes every kind of holiness, both dispositional (habitualem) and actual]; Turretin 9.1.9.

104. WS: Toplady, one ol the highest Calvinists of the Church of England, remarks as follows respecting the salvation of all infants dying in infancy: “The rubric of the Church of England declares that ‘it is certain by God’s word that children which are baptized, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved.’ I believe firmly the same. Nay, I believe more. I am convinced that the souls of all departed infants whatever, whether baptized or unbaptized, are with God in glory . And I think my belief warranted by an authority which cannot err: Matt. 18:14” (Church of England Vindicated). The elder Alexander remarks on this point: “As the Holy Scriptures have not informed us that any of the human family departing in infancy will be lost, we are permitted to hope that all such will be saved” (Life, 585).

105. WS: Many of the arguments constructed against the doctrine of endless punishment proceed upon the supposition that original sin, or man's evil inclination, is the work of God: that because man is born in sin (Ps. 51:5), he was created in sin. All the strength and plausibility of John Foster's celebrated letter lies in the assumption that the moral corruption and impotence of the sinner, whereby it is impossible for him to save himself from eternal death, is not self-originated and self-determined, but infused by his maker. "If," says he, "the very nature of man, as created by the sovereign power, be in such desperate disorder that there is no possibility ol conversion and salvation except in instances where that power interposes with a special and redeeming efficacy, how can we conceive that the main portion of the race, thus morally impotent (that is, really and absolutely impotent), will be eternally punished lor the inevitable result of this moral impotence?" If this assumption of concreated depravity and impotence is correct, Foster's objection to eternal retribution is conclusive and fatal.

106. WS: For a discriminating and thorough statement of the aim of punishment and its distinction from chastisement, see Miiller, Sin 1.244-51.

107. with this, not therefore on account of this. The meaning here is that an action may effect results that lie beyond the purpose for which the action was performed. The unintended results are connected "with" the action, but the action was not performed "on account of or so as to effect these results.

108. WS: Beccaria and Bentham are (he principal modern advocates of (he contrary theory that punishment is founded on utility and expediency. Beccaria's position is that the standard of crime is the Injury which i(does to socie(y. He refers exclusively (o (he public good and never appeals to the moral sentiment ("Beccaria" in Penny Cyclopaedia). Bentham takes the same view, connecting it with the utilitarian ethics. From these writers, this theory has passed considerably into modern jurisprudence. Austin, a popular writer on law, follows Bentham. Hobbes (Leviathan 2.28) maintains it. The theory which founds morality upon righteousness and punishment upon justice is historical. Plato (Laws 10.904-5) held that punishment is righteous and retributive. Cicero (On the Laws 1.14-15) contends that true virtue has regard to essential justice, not to utility.

Grotius defines penalty as “the evil of suffering which is inflicted on account of the evil of doing.” The great English jurists Coke, Bacon, Selden, and Blackstone explain punishment by crime, not by expediency. Kant, Herbart, Stahl, Hartenstein, Rothe, and Woolsey define punishment as requital for the satisfaction of law and justice (Woolsey, Political Science 2.8; cf. Coleridge, Works 5.447).

109. WS: Hence, those who found punishment upon utility and deny that is it retributive endeavor to abolish capital punishment. And if their theory of penalty is true, they are right in their endeavor.

110. WS: See the remarks of Graves (Pentateuch 2.2) on the excellence of the Mosaic code in this particular.

111. after the reason ceases, the law itself ceases

112. WS: The intrinsic endlessness of guilt is vividly described by Carlyle: “From the purpose of crime to the act of crime there is an abyss, wonderful to think of. The finger lies on the pistol; but the man is not yet a murderer: nay, his whole nature staggering at such a consummation, is there not a confused pause rather—one last instant of possibility for him? Not yet a murderer; it is at the mercy of light trifles whether the most lixed idea may not yet become unfixed. One slight twitch of a muscle, the death-flash bursts; and he is it and will for eternity be it; and earth has become a penal Tartarus for him; his horizon girdled now not with golden hope, but with red flames of remorse; voices from the depths of nature sounding, Woe, woe on him! Of such stuff are we all made; on such powder mines of bottomless guilt and criminality— ‘if God restrained not,’ as is well said—does the purest of us walk? There are depths in man that go to the length of lowest hell, as there are heights that reach highest heaven—for are not both heaven and hell made out of him, made by him, everlasting miracle and mystery as he is?” (French Revolution 3.1.4).

113. WS: It must be remembered that it is the degree, together with the endlessness of suffering, that constitutes the justice of it. We can conceive of an endless suffering that is marked by little intensity in the degree of it. Such, according to Augustine, is the suffering of unbaptized infants (mitissima omnium = the mildest of all). It is negative banishment, not positive infliction. An evil that is inflicted in a few hours may be greater than one inflicted in endless time. One day of such torment as that of Satan would be a greater distress than a slight physical pain lasting forever. The infinite incarnate God suffered more agony in Gethsemane than the whole finite human race could suffer in endless duration. Consequently, the uniformity in the endlessness must be combined with a variety in the intensity of suffering in order to adjust the future punishment to the different grades of sin (see p. 738).

114. WS: “Human laws,” says Paley (Moral Philosophy 1.3), “omit many duties, such as piety to God, bounty to the poor, forgiveness of injuries, education of children, gratitude to benefactors. And they permit or, which is the same thing, suffer to go unpunished many crimes, such as luxury, prodigality, caprice in the disposition of property by will, disrespect to parents, and a multitude of similar examples.”

115. WS: “If,” says Pearson (On the Creed, art. 5), “we should imagine any damned soul to have received an express promise of God that after ten thousand years he would release him from those torments and make him everlastingly happy and to have a true faith in that promise and a firm hope of receiving eternal life, we could not say that that man was in the same condition with the rest of the damned or that he felt all that hell which they were sensible of or all that pain which was due unto his sins, because hope and confidence and relying upon God would nor only mitigat e a ll other pa ins but wholly take away the bitter angui sh of despa ir. ”It is ob vious th at if God make s any suc h promise in his word. either express ly or by impl icati on , despair is not only imp ossib le to the believer of Sc ripture, but is a sin. No man should despair. And if God does not make any suc h prom ise, but ma n makes it to his fellow sinner in say ing, as Satan did to Eve, “you sha ll not sure ly die,” and the human promi se is believed , the effect will be the sa me. There will be no despa ir un til the reckless human falsehood is corrected by the awful demonst ration at death.

116. WS: The words of Paul in 1 Cor. 13:13 are sometimes cited to prove the eternity of hope, because it “abides.” But in this passage, “faith, hope, and charity” are contrasted with the supernatural charismata of 1 Cor. 12. These latter are transitory, but the former “abide,” because they are essential to the Christian life here on earth. But in respect to the eternity of "faith," St. Paul teaches that it is converted into "sight" (2 Cor. 5:7) and that "hope" is converted into "fruition" (Rom. 8:24). Charity is "greater" than faith and hope, because it is not changed into something else, but is eternal.

117. WS: O fearful thought! one act of sin Within itself contains the power of endless hate of God. And everlasting pains. —Faber, Hymn on Predestination

118. WS: It is related of Dr. Scudder that on his return from his mission in India, after a long absence, he was standing on the deck of a steamer with his son, a youth, when he heard a person using loud and profane language. "See, friend," said the doctor, accosting the swearer, "this boy, my son, was born and brought up in a heathen country and a land of pagan idolatry; but in all his life he never heard a man blaspheme his maker until now."

119.  = viciousness

120. images = weakness

121. WS: Miiller 'Sin 1.246) exposes the error of supposing that punishment is remedial in its nature and adapted to produce penitence and reformation, in the following terms: "The distinctive purpose of divine punishment cannot be the improvement of the person punished, because this is the object of redemption. If punishment were the means appropriate to this end, there would be no need for redemption, or rather, if this object is attained by redemption, of what use is the severity of punishment? Are we to suppose that when redemption proves ineffectual for the improvement of man, punishment must be resorted to, to attain the object? It would then follow that punishment is more effectual for man's regeneration than redemption. The conflict between the sphere of punishment and that of redemption becomes all the more perplexing when we recollect that the main feature of redemption is the doing away with punishment by the forgiveness of sins. If punishment be remedial, is it a kindness to free man from it before it has accomplished its work? And how is it possible that redemption, which is the removal of punishment, should renovate, if punishment itself does so also? And yet the influence of punishment in preserving and reestablishing the power of moral goodness in the sufferer must not be wholly denied. Punishment, on the one hand, acts as a barrier against the desolating inroads of sin by reasserting the fixed ordainments of the law; and, on the other hand, it beat's witness to the sinner of the crushing power wherewith evil recoils upon himself and makes him tremble when he surrenders himself to it. In these two ways, it prepares man for the work of redemption. But in its own distinctive nature, it is not adapted or calculated to produce a true improvement, an inward renovation of the sinner. On the contrary, the two spheres, that of redemption, which alone can accomplish a true renewal, and that of punishment, mutually exclude one another. Whenever a living participation in the blessings of redemption begins,

122. WS: Those who deny the position that sin is an infinite evil forget that the principle upon which it rests is one of the commonplaces of jurisprudence: the principle, namely, that crime depends upon the object against whom it is committed as well as upon the subject who commits it. The merely subjective reference of an act is not sufficient to determine whether it is a crime. The act may have been the voluntary act of a person, but unless it is also an offense against another person, it is no crime. To strike is a voluntary act; but to strike a post or a stone is not a culpable act. Furthermore, not only crime, but degrees of crime depend upon the objective reference of a personal act. Estimated only by the subjective reference, there can be not only no culpability, but no difference in culpability. Killing a dog is no worse than killing a man, if merely the subject who kills and not the object killed is considered. Both alike are voluntary acts and of one and the same person. If, therefore, the gravity of the act is to be measured solely by the nature of the person committing it and not by that of the thing against whom it is committed, killing a dog is as heinous as killing a man. Now this principle of jurisprudence is carried into theology by the theologian. The violation of the moral law is sin and guilt, only when viewed objectively in reference to God primarily and to man secondarily. Viewed merely and wholly in reference to the transgressor himself, it is not sin and guilt at all. It is sin only as committed against God or man. Again, it is only the objective reference that will yield degrees of sin. One and the same act may be simultaneously an offense against an individual, a family, a state, and God. Measured by the nature and qualities of the offender himself, it has no degrees. But measured by the nature and qualities of these moral objects against whom it is committed, it has degrees of turpitude. As the first three are only finite in worth and dignity, the culpability is only certain degrees of the finite. As the last is infinite in worth and dignity, the culpability is infinite also. Cf. Edwards, Justice of God in Works 4.228.

123. WS: It ought to be noticed that the "hatred" of himself and of his Father, which Christ attributes to "the world" (John 15:18-19) and which is a distinguishing element in impenitence, does not necessarily imply sensuality and vice. Sin may be wholly intellectual: what St. Paul denominates "spiritual wickedness" (Eph. 6:12). The most profound of Shakespearean critics calls attention to "the passionless character of Iago. It is all will in intellect" (Coleridge, Works 4.180). The "carnal mind" manifests itself in two ways. The proud spirit of the moralist is one phase of it: the self-indulgent spirit of the voluptuary is the other. The Pharisee represents the first; Dives the last. Both alike confess no sin and implore no forgiveness. In illustration of the former, consider the temper of a certain class of intellectual men toward the cross of Christ. They are perhaps austerely moral. By temperament, taste, study, and occupation, they have even an antipathy to sensuality. They "scorn delights and live laborious days." But present for their acceptance those truths of the New Testament which involve the broken and contrite heart, and their whole inward being rises in vehement recoil. Of the effect of the doctrine of election, Calvin remarks that "when the human mind hears of it, its irritation breaks all restraint, and it discovers as serious and violent agitation as if alarmed by the sound of a martial trumpet" (3.22.1). So, too, when the authoritative demand of Jesus Christ to confess sin and beg remission through atoning blood is made to David Hume or David Strauss or John Stuart Mill, none of whom were sensualists, it wakens intense mental hostility. Now without asserting which theory in religion is true, that of the New Testament or that of the skeptic, is it not clear that if there be another lile and il the teaching ol the New Testament shall prove to be the absolute truth, the latter person must be classed with the "haters of God?" Will not the temper of this unsensual and intellectual man toward what is found, in the end, to be eternal verity be as thoroughly of the nature of enmity as that of the most

immoral and hardened debauchee? Miiller alludes to unsensual and intellectual sin in the following terms: “That which makes sin to be sin and which is the evil of evil is the selfish isolation of the man which it involves. There are cases . . . where a man keeps himself free from wild ungovernable passions and only seldom is guilty of oven acts which conscience recognizes as sins; yet in his inmost heart ‘the I, that gloomy despot,’ rules supreme; he stands alone in the world, shut up within himself and in a chaos of selfish endeavors, preferences, antipathies, without any true participation in the joys and sorrows of mankind, estranged from God. In such a state, the principle of sin, though shut up within, rules with no less real power than where its dominion is manifest in glaring wickedness and vice and a wild disorder of the outward life” (Sin 1.136). Miiller also notices that mere intellectuality is no certain preservative against sensuality and vice: “A superficial observation of life has led to the conclusion that immorality decreases in proportion as the growth of the intellectual nature increases, and the children of this generation’ pride themselves in no small degree upon the discovery that culture and not Christianity is the means of true freedom and the panacea for all the disorders of the world. But a single unbiased and penetrating glance at life will suffice to dissipate these illusions. We oftentimes find the deepest moral degradation and disorder in the very highest stages of culture, a Irivolity of mind resolving all the relations of life into rottenness and utter insensibility to every impulse of holy love and a cold, calculating, self-conscious egotism, which puts from it the call to sacrifice any one of its own interests as something altogether absurd—the men with whom it comes in contact being regarded merely as ciphers, by whose help its own aggrandizement may be attained. Menial culture does not eradicate a single tendency of moral depravity; it only veils and refines them all; and so far from redeeming the man, if it be not sanctified by a higher principle, it really confirms within him the dominion of sin” (Sin 1.306-7). In corroboration of this, see the discriminating remarks of Thomas Arnold on the character of Sylla in “Roman Republic, 21” in Encyclopaedia Metropolitana.

124. WS: “There is this certainty,” says Hooker (Polity 5.49), “that life and death divide between them the whole body of mankind. What portion either of the two has, God himself knows; for us he has left no sufficient means to comprehend and for that cause has not given any leave to search in particular who are infallibly the heirs of the kingdom of God and who are castaways. Howbeit, concerning the state of all men with whom we live, we may till the world's end always presume, that as far as in us there is power to discern what others are and as far as any duty of ours depends upon the notice of their condition in respect to God, the safest axioms for charity to rest itself upon are these: 'He which believes already is the child of God; and he which believes not as yet may become the child of God.' It becomes not us, during life, altogether to condemn any man, seeing that for anything we know there is hope of every man's forgiveness, the possibility of whose repentance is not cut off by death. And therefore charity, which 'hopes all things,' prays also for all men." To the same effect says Zanchi (Predestination, 3): "I grant that there are some particular persons mentioned in the divine word, of whose reprobation no doubt can be made; such as Esau and Judas. But now the canon of Scripture is completed, we dare not, we must not pronounce any man living to be nonelect, be he at present ever so wicked. The vilest sinner may, for aught we can tell, appertain to the election of grace and be one day wrought upon by the Spirit of God. This we know, that those who die in unbelief and are finally unsanctified cannot be saved: because God in his word tells us so and has represented these as marks of reprobation. But to say that such and such individuals, whom perhaps we now see dead in sins, shall never be converted to Christ, would be a most presumptuous assertion, as well as an inexcusable breach of the charity which hopes all things."

125. WS: Calvin, explaining the elect "seven thousand" in Rom. 11:4, remarks that "though this stands for an indefinite number, it was the Lord's design to specify a great multitude. Since, then, the grace of God prevails so much in an extreme state of things, let us not lightly give over to the devil all those whose piety does not openly appear to us." Zwingli thought that all who died in early childhood are regenerated and saved. Edwards (Against Chauncy, 14) denies that it is an article of his faith that "only a small part of the human race will finally be saved." Hopkins (Future State, 5) asserts that "there is reason to believe that many more of mankind will be saved than lost; yea, it may be many thousands to one." Hodge (Theology 3.879) says that "we have reason to believe lhat the number of the finally lost, in comparison with the whole number of the saved, will be very inconsiderable."

126. WS: Said one of the deepest and most profoundly penitent of human spirits: “I have had more than a glimpse of what is meant by death and outer darkness and the worm that dies not—and that all the hell of the reprobate is no more inconsistent with the love [benevolence] of God than the blindness of one who has occasioned loathsome and guilty diseases to eat out his eyes is inconsistent with the light of the sun” (Cottle, Reminiscences of Coleridge, 282).

127. WS: Beatrice expresses the same truth to Dante: Whene’er the sinner’s cheek Breaks forth into the precious-streaming tears Of self-accusing, in our court the wheel Of justice does run counter to the edge. —Purgatory 31.36

128.  images = age to come

129.  images = this age

130.  images

131.  images

132. In verbis quidem figura optantis apparet, sed intelligitur praescientia nuntiantis.

133. Ut enim Deus non est causa peccati, ita non est (causa) poenae.

134. Kara

Bibliography

Following each bibliographic item is the title of the chapter (or chapters) in which the writing is cited. To indicate that only a part of the work is relevant to the subject of the chapter, Shedd variously gives page numbers, section numbers, section title, or some other indicator after the chapter title.

Part 2: Bibliology

Alexander, Archibald. The Canon of the Old and New Testaments Ascertained.
Canonicity of Scripture
Alexander, Joseph Addison. Isaiah Translated and Explained.
Revelation and Inspiration:“Prophetic Inspiration”
Augustine. The City of God.
Revelation and Inspiration: 15-18
Bannerman, James. Inspiration.
Revelation and Inspiration
Barlett, Samuel C. Sources of History in the Pentateuch.
Authenticity of Scripture
Bissell, Edwin Cone. Historic Origin of the Bible
Revelation and Inspiration
———The Pentateuch.
Authenticity of Scripture
Bleek, Friedrich. An Introduction to the New Testament.
Authenticity of Scripture
Canonicity of Scripture: “History of New Testament Canon”
———An Introduction to the Old Testament.
Authenticity of Scripture
Blunt, John J. Undesigned Coincidences in the Writings Both of the Old and New Testament.
Credibility of Scripture

Briggs, Charles Augustus. Biblical Study.
Revelation and Inspiration
Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion.
Revelation and Inspiration: 1.7-9
Chambers, Talbot W. Canon of Scripture.
Canonicity of Scripture
———Essays on Pentateuchal Criticism.
Authenticity of Scripture
Charteris. A. H. Canonicity.
Canonicity of Scripture
Christlieb, Theodor. Modern Doubt and Christian Belief.
Revelation and Inspiration: lecture 2
Credibility of Scripture: lectures 6-8
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor. Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit.
Revelation and Inspiration
Cosin. John. A Scholastic History of the Canon of the Holy Scripture.
Canonicity of Scripture
Credner, Karl August. Zur Geschichtedes Kanons.
Canonicity of Scripture
Curtiss, Samuel Ives. The Levitical Priests.
Authenticity of Scripture
Davidson, Samuel. The Canon of the Bible.
Canonicity of Scripture
———Sacred Henueneutics Developed and Applied.
Revelation and Inspiration: 12
Dorner, I. A. A System of Christian Doctrine.
Revelation and Inspiration: §§57-60
Du Pin, Louis Ellies. On the Canon.
Canonicity of Scripture
Ebrard, J. H. A. The Gospel History.
Authenticity of Scripture: 2.2
Credibility of Scripture: 2.1
Edersheim, Alfred. The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah.
Credibility of Scripture
Faber, George Stanley. Horae mosaicae.
Authenticity of Scripture

Fisher. George Park. Essays on the Supernatural Origin ofChristianity.
Authenticity of Scripture
Gaussen, Louis. The opneustia.
Revelation and Inspiration
Gerhard, Johann. Loci theologici.
Revelation and Inspiration: "De Inspiratione" Given, John James. The Truth of Scripture.
Revelation and Inspiration
Graves, Richard. Lectures on the Four Last Books of the Pentateuch.
Authenticity of Scripture
Green, William Henry. The Hebrew Feasts.
Authenticity of Scripture
———Moses and the Prophets.
Authenticity of Scripture
———The Pentateuch.
Authenticity of Scripture
Greswell, Edward. Harmonia evangelica.
Credibility of Scripture
Grotius, Hugo. De veritate religionis chrislianae. Translated by John Clarke.
Credibility of Scripture
Guizot, M. Meditations on the Essence of Christianity. First series.
Revelation and Inspiration
Havernick. H. A. C. An Historico-Critical Introduction to thePentateuch.
Authenticity of Scripture
Hayley, John W. An Examination of the Alleged Discrepancies of the Bible.
Revelation and Inspiration
Henderson, Ebenezer. Divine Inspiration.
Revelation and Inspiration
Hengstenberg, Ernst Wilhelm. Christology of the Old Testament.
Revelation and Inspiration: "Prophecy"
———Dissertations on the Genuineness of the Pentateuch.
Authenticity of Scripture
Herder, J. G. The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry.

Revelation and Inspiration
Hodge. Charles. Systematic Theology.
Revelation and Inspiration:
1.151-87
Home, Thomas Hartwell. An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures.
Revelation and Inspiration
Canonicity of Scripture
Jones, Jeremiah. A New and Full Method of Settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament.
Canonicity of Scripture
Josephus. Against Apion.
Canonicity of Scripture: I
Keim, Theodore. The History of Jesus of Nazara.
Credibility of Scripture
Ladd, George T. The Doctrine of Sacred Scripture.
Revelation and Inspiration
Canonicity of Scripture
Lange, John Peter. The Life of the Lord Jesus Christ.
Credibility of Scripture
Lardner, Nathaniel. The Credibility ofthe Gospel History.
Credibility of Scripture
Canonicity of Scripture
Lee, William. The Inspiration of HolyScripture.
Revelation and Inspiration
Lewis, Tayler. The Divine Human in the Scriptures.
Revelation and Inspiration
Lightfoot, J. B. Essays on the Work Entitled Supernatural Religion.
Authenticity of Scripture
MacDonald, Donald. Introduction to the Pentateuch.
Authenticity of Scripture
Marsh, Herbert. A Course of Lectures… Divinity.
Authenticity" of Scripture: 23-34
Maitensen, H. Christian Dogmatics.
Revelation and Inspiration: §§24-36
Mill, W. H. Obsen'ations on the Attempted Application of Pantheistic Principles.
Authenticity of Scripture
Neander, August. General History of the Christian Religion and Church.

Revelation and Inspiration:
2.388-94
———The Life of Jesus Christ in Its Historical Connexion and Historical Development.
Credibility of Scripture
Nitzsch, Carl Immanuel. System of Christian Doctrine.
Revelation and Inspiration: §§36-37
Norton, Andrews. The Evidences of the Genuineness of the Gospels.
Authenticity of Scripture
———Internal Evidences of the Genuineness of the Gospels.
Credibility of Scripture
Paley, William. A View of the Evidences of Christianity.
Credibility of Scripture
Rawlinson, George. Chronicles.
Speaker's Commentary.
Revelation and Inspiration:
"Introduction" §10
———The Historical Evidences of the Truth of the Scripture Records.
Credibility of Scripture
Reuss, Eduard. History of the Canon of the Holy Scriptures in the Christian Church. Translated by David Hunter.
Canonicity of Scripture
Robinson, Edward. A Harmony of the Four Gospels.
Credibility of Scripture
Robson, John. The Bible.
Revelation and Inspiration
Rogers, Henry. The Superhuman Origin of the Bible.
Revelation and Inspiration
Sanday, William. The Gospels in the Second Century.
Authenticity of Scripture
Smith, Henry Boynton. Faith and Philosophy.
Revelation and Inspiration: 1-48
Smith, John. Select Discourses.
Revelation and Inspiration: "Of Prophecy" Strauss, David. The Life of Jesus Critically Examined.
Credibility of Scripture

Streat, William. The Dividing of the Hoof.
Credibility of Scripture
Stuart, Moses. Critical History and Defence of the Old Testament Canon.
Canonicity of Scripture
Taylor, Isaac. The Spirit of the Hebrew Poetry.
Revelation and Inspiration
Terry. Milton S. Biblical Hermeneutics.
Revelation and Inspiration
Twesten, August. Vorlesungen uber die Dogmatik.
Revelation and Inspiration: 1.23-28
Ulrici, Hermann. Glauben und Wissen.
Revelation and Inspiration
Van Oosterzee, J. J. Christian Dogmatics.
Revelation and Inspiration:1.388-94
Warrington. On Inspiration.
Revelation and Inspiration
Watts, Robert. The Newer Criticism andthe Analogy of Faith.
Authenticity of Scripture
Weiss, Bernhard. Biblical Theology ofthe Sew Testament.
Credibility of Scripture
Canonicity of Scripture
Westcott, Brooke Foss. A General Survey of the Canon of the New Testament.
Authenticity of Scripture
Wieseler, Karl. .4 Chronological Synopsis of the Four Gospels.
Credibility of Scripture
Wordsworth, Christopher. On the Inspiration of the Bible.
Revelation and Inspiration

Part 3: Theology (Doctrine of God)

Agassiz, Louis. The Structure of AnimalLife.
Creation
Anonymous. “Miracles.” In Penny Cyclopaedia of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.
Miracles
Anselm. De concordia praescientiae et praedestinationis.

The Divine Decrees
———De fide christiana trinitatis et de incamatione verbi.
Trinity in Unity
———De processione spiritus sancti.
Trinity in Unity
———Monologion.
Nature and Definition of God: 1-6, 17-28
Arguments for the Divine Existence
Creation: 8-9
———Proslogion. Translated in*Bibliotheca Sacra* <1851).
Arguments for the Divine Existence
Argyll, George Douglas Campbell.
Primeval Man.
Creation
Aristotle. Metaphysics.
Nature and Definition of God:11.6-7
Arminius, James. The Works of James Anninius. Translated by James Nichols.
The Divine Decrees: 3 (“Discussionwith Junius”) Athanasius. Contra arianos.
Trinity in Unity
———.De decresis nicaenae synodi.
Trinity in Unity
Augustine. The City of God.
Innate Idea and Knowledge oi God:4.24-25, 31; 7.6; 8.1-12
Trinity in Unity: 11.10
Creation: 11
Miracles: 10.8-11:21.2-8
———. De predestinatione sanctorum.
The Divine Decrees
———De trinitate.
Trinity in Unity
Miracles: 3.2-9
———.Letter 194.
The Divine Decrees: “Ad Sixtum”
Bates. William. Considerations of the Existence of God, and of the Immortality of the Soul.
Nature and Definition of God
Arguments for the Divine Existence
Baur, Ferdinand Christian. Die christliche Lehre von der Dreinigkeit.
Trinity in Unity: 1.395-70
Beale. Lionel Smith. Protoplasm.
Creation
Billroth, Gustav. Vorlesungen uber Religionsphilosophie.

Arguments for the Divine Existence: §§33ff.
Trinity in Unity: §§89-90
Bolton. W. J. The Evidences of Christianity, as Exhibited in the Writings of Its Apologists down to Augustine.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God
Bowen, Francis. Modem Philosophy.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 3
Bruce. Alexander Balmain. The Miraculous Element in the Gospels.
Miracles
Buchanan, James. Modem Atheism.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God
Bull, George. Defensio fidei nicaenae.
Trinity in Unity
Cabell, James. The Testimony of Modem Science to the Unity of Mankind.
Creation
Calderwood, Henry. The Relations of Science and Religion.
Creation
Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 1.3-4, 10
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 1.1,3
Trinity in Unity: 1.13; 5
The Divine Decrees: 1.11-14
Campbell, George. A Dissertation on Miracles.
Miracles
Chalmers, Thomas. On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God as Manifested in the Adaptation of External Nature, to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man.
The Bridgewater Treatises.
Arguments for the Divine Existence
Chalybäus, H. M. Historical Survey of Speculative Philosophy from Kant to Hegel.
Arguments for the Divine Existence: lecture 3

Channing, William Ellery. A Discourse on the Evidences of Revealed Religion.
Miracles
Charnock. Stephen. Discourses upon the Existence and Attributes of God.
Nature and Definition of God: “God a Spirit”
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 1-2
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 1-2
———.On the Attributes of God.
Divine Attributes
Christlieb, Theodor. Modem Doubt and Christian Belief .
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 2
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 2
Trinity in Unity: 4
Miracles: lecture 5
Cicero. De natura deonom.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 3.16-25
Clarke, Samuel. An Answer to a Seventh Letter.
Arguments for the Divine Existence
———.Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God.
Ar guments lor the Divine Existence
Creation: proposition 10
Clement of Alexandria. Miscellanies.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 5.14
Conybeare, John. The Nature, Possibility, and Certainty of Miracles Set Forth.
Miracles
Cooke, Josiah Parsons. The Credentials of Science.
Creation
———.Religion and Chemistry .
Creation
Cudworth. Ralph. The True Intellectual System of the Universe.

Nature and Definition of God:
1.2;
5.3 (“Corporeal and Unextcnded Substance”)
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God:
4.1-28
Arguments for the Divine Existence:
2.608-25 (“Final Causes”)
Trinity in Unity: 2.31 1-433 (“Pagan Trinity”)
Creation: 3.79-220
Cunningham, William. Historical Theology.
The Divine Decrees: 25
Curtius, Emst. The History of Greece.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God:
1.2
Dabney. Robert L. Systematic Theology.
The Divine Decrees: lectures 20-22
Dana, James. Creation.
Creation
Dawson, J. W. 77ie Origin of the World according to Revelation and Science.
Creation
———. The Story of Earth and Man.
Creation
Descartes, Rene. Discourse on Method.
Arguments for the Divine Existence:
4
———. The Meditations.
Arguments for the Divine Existence:
3,5
———. The Principles of Philosophy.
Translated by John Veitch.
Arguments for the Divine Existence:
1.14-15
Dorner, I. A. History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ.
Trinity in Unity: “Nicene Trinity”
———. A System of Christian Dttctrine.
Arguments for the Divine Existence:
1.212ff.
Trinity in Unity: §§28-32
Miracles: §§53-56
Edwards, Jonathan. The Divine Decrees in General and Election in Particular.
The Divine Decrees

———. Freedom of the Will.
The Divine Decrees: sub fine
———. The Trinity.
Trinity in Unity
Episeopius, Simon. Institutiones theologicae.
The Divine Decrees: 4.4
Fisher, George Park. The Grounds of Theistic and Christian Belief .
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God
Miracles: 4-6
Flint, Robert. Theism.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: "Anlitheistic Theories" Frank, H. R. System of the Christian Certainty.
Trinity in Unity: §§
Fraser, William. Blending Lights.
Creation
Gangauf, Theodor. Metaphysische Psychologie des heiligen Augustinus.
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 82ff.
Creation: 1.1
Gillett, E. H. God in Human Thought.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God
Gladstone, W. E. Homer.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 2.1
Guyot, Arnold. Creation.
Creation
Haeckel, Ernst. The Evolution of Man.
Creation
———. The History of Creation.
Creation
Hallam, Henry. Introduction to the Literature of Europe.
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 2.3
Harris, Samuel. The Philosophical Basis of Theism.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God
Arguments for the Divine Existence
Hasse. Friedrich. The Life of Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury.
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 2.233-86
Trinity in Unity: 2.287

Herschel, John F. W. A Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy.
Creation
Hodge, Charles. Systematic Theology.
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 1.204-37
Divine Attributes: 1.368-439
———.What Is Darwinism?
Creation
Hooker. Richard. Ecclesiastical Polity.
Trinity in Unity: 5.51-56
Horsley, Samuel. Tracts in Controversy with Dr. Priestly, upon the Historical Question, of the Belief of the First Ages, in Our Lord's Divinity.
Trinity in Unity
Howe, John. A Calm and Sober Enquiry concerning the Possibility of a Trinity in the Godhead.
Trinity in Unity
——— The Living Temple.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 1.2
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 1.2
———.Trie Principles of the Oracles of God.
Divine Attributes: lectures 17-25
———.The Trinity of Persons in the Divine Essence.
Trinity in Unity
———.The Whole Works of John Howe.
The Divine Decrees: "On Decrees, Oracles," part 2: "Prescience and Sincerity Reconciled"
Creation: 2.9-11
Hume, David. Of Miracles.
Miracles
Janet, Paul. Final Causes.
Arguments for the Divine Existence
Kant, Immanuel. Critique of Pure Reason. Translated by J. M. D. Meiklejohn.
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 359-70
Kidd, James. An Essay on the Doctrine of the Trinity.

Trinity in Unity
King, Peter King. The Life of John Locke.
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 313
King, William. Predestination and Foreknowledge.
The Divine Decrees
Lange, John Peter, Tayler Lewis, and A. Gosman. Genesis. Lange's Commentary.
Creation: 314
Leibnitz, Gottfried. De la demonstration cartésienne.
Arguments for the Divine Existence
Leighton, Robert. Theological and Expository Lectures.
Trinity in Unity: 7
Lewis, Tayler. The Six Days of Creation.
Creation
Locke, John. An Essay concerning Understanding.
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 4.10
Lowman, Moses. A Rational of the Ritual of the Hebrew Worship.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 1.2
Lyell, Charles. The Geological Evidence of the Antiquity of Man.
Creation
Magee, William. Discourses on the Scriptural Doctrines of Atonement and Sacrifice.
Trinity in Unity
Martensen, H. Christian Dogmatics.
Arguments for the Divine Existence: §§
Trinity in Unity: §§52-58, 181-84
Divine Attributes: §§46-51
Martineau, James. A Study of Religion.
Arguments for the Divine Existence
Maudsley, Henry. The Physiology and Pathology of Mind.
Creation
Maurice, Thomas. A Dissertation on the Oriental Trinities.
Trinity in Unity
Mivart, St. George. Evolution and Its Consequences.

Creation
———.Man and Apes.
Creation
Mommsen, Theodor. The History of Rome.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 1.2, 12
More, Henry. An Antidote against Atheism.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 1.8
———.Immortality of the Soul.
Nature and Definition of God: 1.1-10
Morgan, Caesar. An Investigation of the Trinity of Plato and of Philo Judaeus.
Trinity in Unity
Mozley, J. B. Eight Lectures on Miracles.
Miracles
———.A Treatise on the Augustinian Doctrine of Predestination.
The Divine Decrees
Müller, F. Max. Lectures on the Science of Language.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 2d series: 9-10
Müller, Julius. The Christian Doctrine of Sin. Translated by William Urwick.
Nature and Definition of God: 2.113-39
Trinity in Unity: 2.136
Miracles: 4.3-4
Nägelsbach, Karl Friedrich von. Homerische Theologie.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God
Naville, Ernest. The Heavenly Father: Lectures on Modern Atheism.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God
Neander, August. General History of the Christian Religion and Church.
Trinity in Unity: 2.403-77
———.The Life of Jesus Christ in Its Historical Connexion and Historical Development.
Miracles: book 4
Nitzsch, Carl Immanuel. Lehrhuch der evangelischen Dogmatik.

Miracles: 107
———.System of Christian Doctrine.
Nature and Definition of God: §63
Trinity in Unity: §§81-84
Divine Attributes: §§65-75
Owen, John. A Brief Declaration and Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity.
Trinity in Unity
———.On Communion with God.
Trinity in Unity: "OI Communion with Each Person of the Trinity Distinctly"
———.On the Person of Christ.
Trinity in Unity
———.Vindiciae evangelicae.
Trinity in Unity
Paley, William. Natural Theology.
Arguments for the Divine Existence
Pearson, John. An Exposition of the Creed.
Trinity in Unity: 1-2,7
Creation: article 1
Plato. The Dialogues of Plato.
Nature and Definition of God: Laws 10.894-99; Phaedo
Quatrefages de Breau, Armand de. The Human Species.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 35
Creation
Rawlinson, George. Egypt and Babylon from Sacred and Profane Sources.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 10
Schaff, Philip. History of the Christian Church.
Trinity in Unity: 3.600-689
Schleiermacher, Friedrich. Glauhenslehre.
Divine Attributes: §§50-56, 79-85
Creation: §§40-41
Shedd, William G. T. A History of Christian Doctrine.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 1.57-74, 103-30
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 1.231-38
Trinity in Unity: 1.243-391
Miracles: 1.164

———.“Introduction to Augustine on the Trinity.” In Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers.
Trinitv in Unity
———.Theological Essays.
Creation: “Evolution Defined and Applied” Smeaton. George.The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit.
Trinity in Unity
Smith, John. Select Discourses.
Nature and Definition of God: “Immortality of the Soul” and “Existence and Nature of God”
Arguments for the Divine Existence: “Existence of God”
Smith, John Pye. The Scripture Testimony to the Messiah.
Trinity in Unity
Southall, James C. The Recent Origin of Man.
Creation
Steinmeycr, F. L. The Miracles of Our Lord in Relation to Modern Criticism.
Miracles
Stillingfleet, Edward. The Doctrine of the Trinity and Transubstantiation Compared.
Trinity in Unity
———.Origines sacrae.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 1.1
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 3.1, 14-15
Stirling, James. As Regards Protoplasm, in Relation to Professor Huxley’s Essay on the Physical Basis of Life.
Creation
Strong, Augustus Hopkins. Systematic Theology.
Divine Attributes: 4.1
The Divine Decrees: 4.3
Thirlwall. Connop. A History of Greece. Innate Idea and Knowledge of God: 22
Thomas Aquinas. Summa theologia.
Trinity in Unity: 1.27-43

Thompson. Robert. Christian Theism.
Innate Idea and Knowledge of God
Treffry, Richard. Inquiry into the Doctrine of the Eternal Sonship of Our Lord Jesus Christ.
Trinity in Unity
Trench, Richard. Notes on the Miracles of Our Lord.
Miracles
Turretin, Francis. Institutio theologiae elencticae.
Trinity in Unity: 3.23-31
The Divine Decrees: 4.1-18; 6.5-8
Creation: 5.1-7
Twesten, August. Vorlesungen iiberdie Dogmatik.
Divine Attributes: 2.2
Creation: thesis 2.36
Miracles: §24
Oberweg, Friedrich. History of Philosophy, from Thates to the Present Time.
Arguments for the Divine Existence: 1.383
Ulrici, Hermann. God and Nature.
Nature and Definition of God
Creation
Ursinus, Zacharias. A Catechisme of Christian Religion.
Trinity in Unity: 0. 25
The Divine Decrees: Q. 54
Ussher, James. Immanuel.
Trinity in Unity
Van Oosterzee, J. J. Christian Dogmatics.
Divine Attributes: 1.251-72
Wardlaw, Ralph. Unilarianism Incapable of Vindication.
Trinity in Unity
Waterland, Daniel. The Importance of the Doctrine of the Holy Trinity.
Trinity in Unity
——— . A Vindication of Christ's Divinity and a Second Vindication of Christ's Divinity.
Trinity in Unity
Watson, Richard. Theological Institutes.
The Divine Decrees: 2.25-38

Wilberforce, Robert. The Doctrine of the Incarnation of Our h>rd Jesus Christ.
Trinity in Unity
Wiseman, Nicholas. Twelve Lectures on the Connexion between Science and Revealed Religion.
Creation
Witsius, Herman. The Economy of the Covenants between God and Man.
Trinity in Unity: 1.2.5-7
The Divine Decrees: 2
———.Sacred Dissertations on What Is Commonly Called the Apostles' Creed.
Arguments for the Divine Existence: dissertation 4.5
Trinitv in Unitv: dissertations 6-7, 11,23
Creation: dissertation 8
Zanchius, Jerom. The Doctrine of Absolute Predestination Stated and Asserted. Translated by Augustus Toplady.
The Divine Decrees

Part 4: Anthropology

Anonymous. "On Imputation." In Princeton Essays.
Original Sin
Anselm. De casu diaboli.
Man's Primitive State: 12
Man's Probation and Apostasy: 26
———. De conceptu virginalide de et originali peccato.
Original Sin
——— . De libertate arbitrii.
Human Will
Augustine. Tlie City of God.
Man's Creation: 12
Man's Primitive State: 12.1-9. 23
Human Will: 14.6
Man's Probation and Apostasy: 13
Original Sin: 14.12-13
——— . Contra julianum.
Original Sin

——— . Contra julianum opus imperfectum.
Original Sin
——— . De natura et gratia.
Original Sin
——— . The Nature and Origin of the Soul.
Man's Creation
Baird, Samuel J. The Elohim Revealed in the Creation and Redemption of Man.
Man's Creation: 11
Baur, Ferdinand Christian. DerGegensatz des Katholicismus und Protestantismus.
Human Will: 118-73
Original Sin: "Lehre von der Siinde" Beck, J. T. Outlines of Biblical Psychology.
Human Will
Burgess, Anthony. 77<e Doctrine of Original Sin.
Human Will: 3.4
Original Sin
Butler, Joseph. A Dissertation upon the Nature of Virtue.
Human Will
———Three Sermons on Human Nature.
Original Sin
Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion.
Man's Primitive State: 1.15
Human Will: 2.2.4-12; 2.3.5-11
Man's Probation and Apostasy: 2.1
Original Sin: 2.1-5
Chamock, Stephen. Discourses upon the Existence and Attributes of God.
Original Sin: "Holiness"
——— . The Holiness of God.
Man's Probation and Apostasy: 476-77
Coleridge. Samuel Taylor. Aids to Reflection (Harper ed.).
Human Will: 1.154, 263, 271-74
Davenant, John. A Treatise on Justification.
Original Sin: 14
Delitzsch, Franz. A System of Biblical Psychology.

Man's Creation: 128_44
Human Will: 4.5.12
Descartes, Rene. Trade des passions.
Human Will: part 1, article 17-19
Dorner, I. A. A System of Christian Doctrine.
Man's Creation: §83
Man's Probation and Apostasv: §§74-75
Edwards, Jonathan. Efficacious Grace.
Man's Primitive State: §§42-51
——— . Freedom of the Will.
Human Will: 3.4
——— . Original Sin.
Man's Primitive State: 2.1
Original Sin
——— . Reality and Spiritual Light.
Human Will
——— . Reasons against Dr. Watt's Notion of the Preexistence of Christ's Human Soul.
Man's Creation: Works 3.533
——— . Religious Affections.
Human Will
Episcopius. Simon. Opera theologica.
Original Sin: 2.7 ("Apologia") Evelyn, John. The History of Religion.
Man's Creation: 1.164
Fisher, George Park. Discussions in History and Theology.
Original Sin: "Augustinian and Federal Theories" Gangauf, Theodor. Metaphysische Psychologie des heiligen Auguslinus.
Man's Creation: 3.1-4
Human Will: 6.1-5
Man's Probation and Apostasy: 6.5-6
Original Sin: 6.7-8
Green, Thomas Hill. Prolegomena to Ethics.
Human Will
Hagenbach, K. R. A History of Christian Doctrines.
Man's Creation: §§55, 106, 173, 248
Hamilton, William. Lectures on Metaphysics.
Human Will: "On the Conative Power" Heppe, Heinrich. Die Dogmatik der Evangelisch-Reformirten Kirche.
Original Sin

——— . Dogmatik des deutschen Protestantismus im sechzehnten Jahrhundert.
Original Sin
Hickok, Laurens P. Empirical Psychology.
Human Will: 382-92
Hodge, Charles. Systematic Theology.
Man's Creation: 2.65ff.
Man's Primitive State: 2.92ff.
Hooker, Richard. Ecclesiastical Polity.
Human Will: 1.11
Hopkins, Mark. The Outline Study of Man.
Human Will: 225-57
Hopkins, Samuel. The*Works of Samuel Hopkins.*
Man's Creation: 2.289
Human Will: 1.83
Howe, John. The Living Temple.
Original Sin: 2.8
——— . Man's Creation Is a Holy but Mutable State.
Man's Probation and Apostasy
——— . The Principles of the Oracles of God.
Man's Creation: pan 2. lecture 37
Man's Primitive State: lectures 16-20
Human Will: 1.24; 2.25
Man's Probation and Apostasy: 2.22
Original Sin: 2.23-27
Kant, Immanuel. Critique of Practical Reason. Translated by Thomas Abbott.
Human Will: 94, 197, 205-12, 269-89
King, William. An Essav on the Origin of Evil.
Original Sin
Landis, Robert W. 77ie Doctrine of Original Sin and Gratuitous Imputation.
Man's Creation
Original Sin
Locke, John. An Essay concerning Understanding.
Human Will: 2.21
Lombard, Peter. Sententiartnn.
Original Sin: 2.22.12

MacDonald, Donald. Creation and the Fall.
Man's Probation and Apostasy
Maresius, Samuel. Theologiae elencticae.
Man's Creation: controverisa 10
Marsh, James. The Remains of the Rev. James Marsh.
Human Will: 368-90
Martensen, H. Christian Dogmatics.
Man's Creation: §§74
Muller, Julius. The Christian Doctrine of Sin.
Man's Creation: 4.3.4
Man's Primitive State: 4.4
Human Will: 3.1.1-3
Man's Probation and Apostasy: 4.3.4
Original Sin: 1.1.2; 4.1.2
Nitzsch, Carl Immanuel. System of Christian Doctrine.
Man's Creation: §107
Original Sin: §§107, 111
Odo Tomacensis. De peccato originali. In Bibliotheca maxima palrum 21.229ff.
Man's Creation
Owen, John. A Display of Arminianism.
Original Sin: 7-8
———The Doctrine of the Saints' Perseverance.
Man's Probation and Apostasy: 1
———.On Indwelling Sin in Believers.
Human Will: 3
———.Vindiciae evangelicae.
Original Sin: 6
Philippi, Friedrich. Kirchliche Glaubenslehre.
Man's Creation: 3.96
Placaeus. De imputatione primi peccati adami.
Original Sin
Reid, Thomas. Essays on the Intellectual and Active Powers of Man.
Human Will
Rivetus, Andreas. Testimonia de imputatione.
Original Sin
Schweizer, Alexander. Die Glaubenslehre der Evangelisch-Reformirten Kirche.
Original Sin

Shedd, William G. T. A History of Christian Doctrine.
Man's Creation: 2.10-25, 114-27, 152-63
Man's Primitive State: 2.54-65
Man's Probation and Apostasy: 2.56ff.
Original Sin: 2.50-177
———.Literary Essays.
Human Will: 324-28
———.Theological Essays.
Human Will: 230-43
Original Sin: "Original Sin"
Smith, Henry Boynton. System of Christian Theology.
Man's Creation: 16611.
Man's Primitive State: 252-59
Human Will: 236-52
Strong, Augustus Hopkins. Systematic Theology.
Man's Creation: 328ff.
Man's Primitive State: 262-68
Taylor, J. Efficient Causes of Human Actions.
Human Will
Taylor, Jeremy. Original Sin.
Original Sin
Taylor, John. The Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin.
Original Sin
Thomas Aquinas. Summa theologica.
Man's Creation: 2.118-19, 91-92
Man's Primitive State: 2.93-97
Human Will: 1.105.4
Original Sin: 2.79-87
Thomyvell. James. The Collected Writings of James Henley Thomwell.
Original Sin: 2.109ff.
Turretin, Francis. Instilutio theologiae elencticae.
Man's Creation: 5.13
Man's Primitive State: 5.9-11
Human Will: 6.5
Man's Probation and Apostasv: 9.7-8
Original Sin: 9.8-12
Ulrici. Hermann. Gott und der Mensch, volume 1: Leib und Seele.
Man's Creation

Ursinus, Zacharias. The Summe of Christian Religion.
Man's Primitive State: Q. 6
Man's Probation and Apostasy: Q. 7
Original Sin: QQ. 7-9
Ussher, James. Original Sin.
Original Sin
Watson, Richard. Theological Institutes.
Original Sin: part 2, chapter 18
Wiggers, G. F. An Historical Presentation of Augustinianism and Pelagianism. Translated by Ralph Emerson.
Original Sin
Witsius. Herman. The Economy of the Covenants between God and Man.
Human Will: 3.7.4-5
Man's Probation and Apostasv: 1.2.10

Part 5: Christology

Anselm, Cur deus home.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 2.7-9
Athanasius. Discourses against the Arians.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: discourse 3
Augustine. Letter 137 to Volusianus.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Briggs, Charles Augustus. Messianic Prophecy.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Bruce, Alexander Balmain. The Humiliation of Christ
Christ's Theanthropic Person: "Kenotic Theories" Bunyan, John. Justification by an Imputed Righteousness.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 2.12-14
Delitzsch, Franz. Messianic Prophecies.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Dod, Albert B. Theological Essays

Christ's Theanthropic Person: "On the Incarnation" Dorner, I. A. History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Edwards. Jonathan. Freedom of the Will.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 2.2
Fisher. James. The Westminster Assembly's Shorter Catechism Explained by Way of Question and Answer.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: QQ. 21-22
Gerhard, Johann. Loci theologici.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 4.12
Gess, W. F. The Scripture Doctrine of the Person of Christ.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Hagenbach, K. R. A History of Christian Doctrines
Christ's Theanthropic Person: §§64-67, 98-105, 179, 266-67, 299
Hase, Carl Alfred. Hutterus redivivus.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: §§94-98
Hengstenberg, Ernst Wilhelm. Chrislology of the Old Testament.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Hooker, Richard. Ecclesiastical Polity.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 5.51-52
Hopkins, Samuel. The System of Doctrines Contained in Divine Revelation, Explained and Defended.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 1.283
Leathes, Stanley. 77ie Witness of New Testament to Christ.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
———.The Witness of Old Testament to Christ.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Liddon, Henry. 77ie Divinity of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Martensen, H. Christian Dogmatics.
Christ's Theanthropic Person:

§§125-47
Moor, Bemhard de. Commenlarius.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 19.14
Neander, August. General History of the Christian Religion and Church.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 2.478-616
Owen, John. A Discourse concerning the Holy Spirit.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 2.3-4
———.On the Person of Christ.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 18
———.Vindiciae evangelicae.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 7, 13, 19
Parens, David. Corpus doctrinae christianae.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: Q. 35.
Pearson, John. An Exposition of the Creed.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: article 3
Petavius, Dionysius. De incamatione verbi.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Riehm, Eduard. Messianic Prophecy.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Schaff, Philip. History of the Christian Church.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 3.705-72
Shedd. William G. T. A History of Christian Doctrine.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 1.392-108
Thomas Aquinas. Summa theotogica.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 3.1-35
Turretin, Francis. Institutio theologiae elencticae.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 13.4-14
Ullmann. Carl. The Sinlessness of Jesus.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Ursinus, Zacharias. Christian Religion.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: 0. 35
Ussher, James. Immanuel.
Christ's Theanthropic Person
Van Mastricht, Peter. A Treatise on Regeneration.

Christ's Theanthropic Person: 1.10.5-6

Wilberforce, Robert. The Doctrine of the Incarnation of Our Lord Jesus Christ.
Christ's Theanthropic Person

Witsius, Herman. Sacred Dissertations on What Is Commonly Called the Apostles' Creed.
Christ's Theanthropic Person: dissertation 14

Part 6: Soteriology

Anselm. Cur deus home. Translated in Bibliotheca Sacra (1844–45)
Vicarious Atonement

Augustine. Contra duas epistulas pelagianorum.
Regeneration: book 4

———.De correptione el gratia. Regeneration

———.De gratia et libero arbitrio. Regeneration

———.De predestinatione sanctorum. Regeneration

———.Enarralio in psahnum 50. Justification

Bates, William. The Harmony of the Divine Attributes, in the Contrivance and Accomplishment of Man's Redemption.
Vicarious Atonement

———.Spiritual Perfection. Sanctification

Baur, Ferdinand Christian. Die christliche Lehre von der VersOhnung.
Vicarious Atonement: 142-282

———.Der Gengensatz des Katholicismus und Protestantismus.
Justification: "Lehre von der Rechtfertigung"

———."The Grotian Theory of the Atonement." Translated by Leonard Swain. Bibliotheca Sacra (1852).

Vicarious Atonement
Bellarmine, Robert. Disputationes.
Justification: “De Justificatione”
Blunt, John J. Undesigned Coincidences in the Writings Both of the Old and New Testament.
Vicarious Atonement: 14-22
Buchanan, James. The Doctrine of Justification.
Justification: lectures 8-15
———.The Office and Work of the Holy Spirit.
Sanctification
Bunyan, John. Of Justification by an Imputed Righteousness.
Justification
Bushnell. Horace. 77ie Vicarious Sacrifice.
Vicarious Atonement
Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion.
Christ’s Mediatorial Offices: 2.15
Vicarious Atonement: 2.16-17
Regeneration: 3.1.2
Conversion: 3.3.4
Justification: 3.11-18
Sanctification: 3.6-10; 4.14-17
Campbell, John McLeod. The Nature of the Atonement.
Vicarious Atonement
Candlish, Robert S. The Atonement.
Vicarious Atonement
Cave, Alfred. The Scriptural Doctrine of Sacrifice.
Vicarious Atonement
Charnock, Stephen. Discourses on the Existence and Attributes of God.
Sanctification: “Holiness”
———The Doctrine of Regeneration.
Regeneration
Crawford, Thomas J. The Doctrine of Holy Scripture Respecting the Atonement.
Vicarious Atonement
Dabney, Robert L. Systematic Theology.
Vicarious Atonement: 42-43
Sanctification: 56-57
Davenant, John. A Treatise on Justification.
Justification

Dorner, I. A. History of Protestant Theology.
Vicarious Atonement: §§112-22
———A System of Christian Doctrine.
Justification: §132
Edwards, Jonathan. Justification by Faith Alone.
Justification
———Observations concerning Faith.
Conversion
———On Spiritual Light.
Regeneration
———Religious Affections.
Sanctification
———The Wisdom of God Displayed in the Way of Salvation.
Justification
Erskine, Thomas. An Essay on Faith.
Conversion
Faber, George Stanley. A Practical Treatise on the Ordinary Operations of the Holy Spirit.
Sanctification
———The Primitive Doctrine of Justification.
Justification
———The Primitive Doctrine of Regeneration Sought for in Holy Scripture.
Regeneration
Flavel, John. ,4 Treatise on Keeping the Heart.
Sanctification
Gerhard, Johann. Loci theologici.
Justification: book 4
Grotius, Hugo. Defensio fidei catholicae de satisfactione.
Vicarious Atonement
Halyburton, Thomas. An Essay on the Ground or Formal Reason of Saving Faith.
Conversion
Hare, Julius Charles. The Mission of the Comforter.
Sanctification
Hill. Theology.
Vicarious Atonement: 4 (“Extent of the Atonement”)
Hodge, Charles. Systematic Theology.
Christ’s Mediatorial Offices: 2.455-608

Vicarious Atonement: 2.464-591
Regeneration: 2.639-732; 3.3-40
Conversion: 3.41-111
Justification: 3.114-212
Sanctification: 3.466-709
———Theological Essays.
Justification: "The Doctrine of Imputation"
———The Way of Life.
Conversion: 6
Sanctification: 9
Hooker, Richard. Ecclesiastical Polity.
Justification: 6.5
Sanctification: 5.57-58
———A Learned Discourse of Justification.
Justification
Howe, John. The Living Temple.
Vicarious Atonement: 2.5-11
———On Regeneration.
Regeneration: sermons 38-49
Junkin, George. A Treatise on Sanctification.
Sanctification
Kurtz., J. H. Sacrificial Worship of the Old Testament. Translated by James Martin.
Vicarious Atonement
Leighton, Robert. The Whole Works.
Regeneration: "On Regeneration"
Lowman, Moses. A Rational of the Ritual of the Hebrew Worship.
Vicarious Atonement
Luther, Martin. Commentary on Galatians.
Justification
Magee, William. Discourses on the Scriptural Doctrines of Atonement and Sacrifice.
Vicarious Atonement
Martensen, H. Christian Dogmatics. Christ's Mediatorial Offices: §§148-80
Maurice, Frederick Denison.The Doctrine of Sacrifice Deduced from the Scriptures.
Vicarious Atonement
Mohler, Johann. Symbolik.
Justification

Outram, William. Two Dissertations on Sacrifice.
Vicarious Atonement
Owen, John. A Discourse concerning the Holy Spirit.
Regeneration: 3
Justification: 4
———A Dissertation on Divine Justice.
Vicarious Atonement
———The Doctrine of Justification by Faith through the Imputation of the Righteousness of Christ.
Conversion: 15
Justification
———The Doctrine of the Saints' Perseverance.
Sanctification
———The Mortification of Sin in Believers.
Sanctification
———On Indwelling Sin in Believers.
Sanctification
———Vindiciae evangelicae.
Vicarious Atonement: 20-25
Park, Edwards A. The Atonement.
Vicarious Atonement
Pearson, John. An Exposition of the Creed.
Vicarious Atonement: article 4
Justification: article 10
Ritschl, Albrecht. The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation.
Justification
Romaine, William. Treatises on the Life, Walk, and Triumph of Faith.
Conversion
Saurin, Jacques. Sermon on the Repentance of the Unchaste Woman.
Conversion
Scougal, Henry. The Life of God in the Soul of Man.
Sanctification
Shedd, William G. T. A History of Christian Doctrine.
Vicarious Atonement: 2.201-386
Regeneration: 2.102-10, 186-94 ("Synergism")
Justification: 2.203-375
———Theological Essays.

Vicarious Atonement: “The Atonement: A Satisfaction for tht Ethical Nature of Both God and Man” Smeaton, George. The Doctrine of the Atonement according to the Apostles.
Vicarious Atonement
Smith, Henry Boynton. System of Christian Theology.
Vicarious Atonement: 442-61
Symington, William. On the Atonement and Intercession of Jesus Christ.
Vicarious Atonement
Taylor, Jeremy. Holy Living, Holy Dying.
Sanctification
———Unum necessarium.
Conversion: “The Doctrine and Practice of Repentance”
Thomas a Kempis. The Imitation of Christ.
Sanctification
Thomas Aquinas. Summa theologica.
Vicarious Atonement: 3.46—49
Turretin, Francis. Institutio theologiae elencticae.
Christ’s Mediatorial Offices: 14.1-7, 15-17
Vicarious Atonement: 14.8-14
Regeneration: 15.1-11 (“De Vocatione”)
Conversion: 15.7-17
Justification: 14.10-14
Sanctification: locus 17
———De satisfactione christi disputiones.
Vicarious Atonement
Ursinus, Zacharias. A Calechisme of Christian Religion.
Christ’s Mediatorial Offices: QQ. 29-31
Vicarious Atonement: QQ. 37-43
Regeneration: QQ. 89-90
Conversion: Q. 21
Justification: QQ. 12-14, 21, 59-64
Sanctification: QQ. 89-91
Van Ooslerzee, J. J. Christian Dogmatics.
Christ’s Mediatorial Offices: §§108-13
Vicarious Atonement: 2.594-97

Wardlaw, Ralph. Discourses on the Nature and the Extent of the Atonement of Christ.
Vicarious Atonement
Watson, Richard. Theological Institutes.
Vicarious Atonement: 2.20-22
Sanctification: 2.29
Wesley, John. A Plain Account of Christian Perfection.
Sanctification
Wines, E. C. Commentaries on the Laws of the Ancient Hebrews.
Vicarious Atonement
Witherspoon, John. Practical Treatise on Regeneration.
Regeneration
Witsius, Herman. The Economy of the Covenants between God and Man.
Regeneration: 3.6
.———Sacred Dissertations on What Is Commonly Called the Apostles' Creed.
Christ's Mediatorial Offices: dissertation 10
Vicarious Atonement: dissertations 15, 16, 18

Part 7: Eschatology

Alexander, Archibald. Universalism False and Unscriptnral.
Hell
Alford, Henry. The Greek Testament.
Christ's Second Advent: Revelation 19-20
.———The Slate of the Blessed Dead.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
Athenagoras. The Resurrection of the Dead
Resurrection
Augustine. The City of God.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: 21.25
Christ's Second Advent: 20
Resurrection: 20.20-21
Final Judgment: 20.21-30
Heaven: 11.12
Hell: 21
.———Enarratio in psalmum 6.

Intermediate or Disembodied State: 6

.———Sermon 178.

Intermediate or Disembodied State: 3

Bartlctt, Samuel C. Life and Death Eternal.

Intermediate or Disembodied State

Hell

Bates, William. 77i<“ Four Last Things.

Heaven: “On Heaven”

Hell: “On Hell”

.———Sermons upon Death and Eternal Judgment.

Final Judgment

Baxter, Richard. The Saints’ Everlasting Rest.

Heaven

Browne, Edward Harold. Messiah as Foretold and Expected.

Christ’s Second Advent

Bunyan, John. Sighs from Hell.

Hell

Burnet, Gilbert. An Exposition of the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England.

Intermediate or Disembodied State: article 3

Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion.

Intermediate or Disembodied State: 3.5

Resurrection: 3.25

Final Judgment: 3.35.7

Heaven: 3.25.11

Hell: 3.25.12

Cheever, George Barrell. A Defence of Capital Punishment.

Hell

Cook, F. C. Daniel. Speaker’s Commentary.

Resurrection: Daniel 12 (excursus)

Crosby, Alpheus. The Second Advent.

Christ’s Second Advent

Cudworth, Ralph. 77te True Intellectual System of the Universe.

Intermediate or Disembodied State: 3.320-31

Resurrection: 3.314-19

Cunningham, William. Second Advent of Christ.
Christ's Second Advent
Dabney, Robert L. Systematic Theology.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: 462, 820-29
Dante, Alighieri. Inferno.
Hell
.———Paradise.
Heaven: 30-33
Davidson, Samuel. The Doctrine of Last Things Contained in the New Testament.
Hell
Delitzsch, Franz. A System of Biblical Psychology.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: 6
Dulfield, George. Dissertations on the Prophecies Relative to the Second Coming of Jesus Christ.
Christ's Second Advent
.———Millenarianism Defended.
Christ's Second Advent
Edersheim, Alfred. 77ie Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah.
Hell: volume 2, appendix 19 ("Jewish Views")
Edwards, Jonathan. The Eternity of Hell Torments.
Hell
. ———The Salvation of Alt Men Strictly Examined… against… Chauncy.
Hell
.———"Sermon on 2 Corinthians 5:8."
Intermediate or Disembodied State
.———Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God.
Hell
Farrar, Frederic W. Eternal Hope.
Hell
Fisher, George Park. Discussions in History and Theology.
Hell: "History of the Doctrine of Future Punishment"
FronmUller, G. F. C. / Peter. Lange's Commentary.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: 1 Peter 3:18-22

Goulbum, Edward Meyrick. The Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Body.
Resurrection
.———Everlasting Punishment.
Hell
Herder, J. G. The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
Heylyn, Peter. Aerius redivivus.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: “On Hades”
Hodge, Charles. Systematic Theology.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: 3.724-70
Hopkins, Samuel. An Inquiry concerning the Future Slate of Those Who Die in Their Sins.
Hell
Horsley, Samuel. Nine Sermons on the Nature of the Evidence by Which the Fact of Our Lord’s Resurrection Is Established.
Resurrection
Hovey, Alvah. The State of the Impenitent Dead.
Hell
Howe, John. The Blessedness of the Righteous.
Resurrection: chapter 10
Heaven
.———The Redeemer’s Dominion over the Invisible World.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
.———The Redeemer’s Tears Wept over Lost Souls.
Hell
Hudson, C. F. Debt and Grace.
Hell
Huidekoper, Frederic. The Belief of the First Three Centuries concerning Christ’s Mission to the Underworld.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
Justin Martyr. Treatise on the Resurrection of the Dead.
Resurrection
Kitto, John. “Hell.” In Cyclopaedia of Biblical Literature.
Intermediate or Disembodied State

Konig, Johann Ludwig. Die Lehre von Christi Holenfahrt nach der Heil.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
Landis, Robert W. The Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Body Asserted and Defended.
Resurrection
Lange, John Peter, and E. P. Craven. *Revelation.*Lange's Commentary.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: Revelation 19-20
Christ's Second Advent: Revelation 19-20
Lee, Samuel. Eschatology.
Christ's Second Advent
Lewis, Tayler. An Essay on the Ground and Nature of Punishment.
Hell
Mead, Charles M. The Soul Here and Hereafter.
Hell
Merrill, S. M. The Second Coming of Christ.
Christ's Second Advent
Morris, E. D. Is There Salvation after Death?
Hell
Miiller, Julius. The Christian Doctrine of Sin.
Hell: 2.191.418-31
Newton. The Final State.
Hell
.———Intermediate State.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
.———On the General Judgment.
Final Judgment
Owen, John. On the Person of Christ.
Heaven: 19
Pearson, John. An Exposition of the Creed.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: article 5
Christ's Second Advent: article 7
Resurrection: article 11
Hell: article 7
Perowne, J. J. Stewart. Immortality.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
Plumptree. E. H. The Spirits in Prison.
Intermediate or Disembodied State

Pusey, E. B. What Is of Faith as to Everlasting Punishment?
Hell: "Historical"
Rawlinson, George. Egypt and Babylon from Sacred and Profane Sources.
Resurrection: 10
Reimensnyder, Junius B. Doom Eternal.
Hell
Rice, N. L. Immortality of the Soul and Destiny of the Wicked.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
Hell
Schweizer, Alexander. Hinabgefahren zur Holle als Mythus ohne biblische Begriindung.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
Smith, Henry Boynton. System of Christian Theology.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: 601-7
South, Robert. Sermons Preached upon Several Occasions.
Resurrection: sermon 52
Strong, Augustus Hopkins. Systematic Theology.
Christ's Second Advent: 566-74
Stuart, Moses. Exegelical Essays on Several Words Relating to Future Punishment.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: "Sheol" Hell: "Sheol" and "Aion" Taylor, Isaac. Physical Theory of Another Life.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
Taylor, Jeremy. A Discourse of the Liberty of Prophesying.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: §8
.———The Sermons of the Right Rev. Jeremy Taylor.
Final Judgment: "Christ's Advent to Judgment"
Tertullian. Treatise on the Resurrection. Resurrection
Thomas Aquinas. Summa theologica.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: 3.69-72
Christ's Second Advent: 3.90

Resurrection: 3.75-87
Final Judgment: 3.89-90
Heaven: 3.92-96
Hell: 3.97-99
Turretin, Francis, lnstitutio theologiae, elencticae.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: 13.15
Ursinus, Zacharias. A Catechisme of Christian Religion.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: Q. 57.2
Christ's Second Advent: 0. 52
Resurrection: Q. 57
Final Judgment: Q. 52
Heaven: 0. 58
Ussher, James. An Answer to a Challenge Made by a Jesuile in Ireland.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
Watts, Isaac. World to Come.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
West, Nathaniel. "No Preaching to the Dead." Princeton Review (March 1878).
Intermediate or Disembodied State
.———"The Spirits in Prison." Presbyterian Quarterly and Princeton Review 4 (April 1875).
Intermediate or Disembodied State
Whatley, Richard. A View of the Scripture Revelations concerning a Future State.
Intermediate or Disembodied State
Witsius, Herman. Sacred Dissertations on What Is Commonly Called the Apostles' Creed.
Intermediate or Disembodied State: dissertation 18
Resurrection: dissertation 19
Woolsey, Theodore. Political Science.
Hell: 2.8
Wordsworth, Christopher. The Apocalypse.
Christ's Second Advent: Revelation 19-20

Glossary 1: Technical Terminology by

Alan W. Gomes

ab extra and ab intra “[originating] from the outside” and “[originating] from the inside,” expressions designating the source of influence on an entity, whether arising from external causes (ab extra) or from within (ab intra). For example, when discussing the will, Shedd points out that it is characterized by self-determination from within (ab intra), “not an activity forced ab extra” (p. 504).

absolute power see potentia absoluta and potentia ordinata acceptllatio and acceptatio terms that describe the atonement: acceptatio (acceptation) is a partial payment that is accepted by the creditor as if it were pay-ment in full; acceptilatio (acceptation), on the other hand, is the creditor’s determination to abrogate a debt even though no payment at all has been received. These terms, which occur in discussions on the atonement, are commonly confused; Shedd himself uses the term acceptilation when acceptation is really what is described. Historically, both Duns Scotus and Scholastic Arminian theology viewed Christ’s death as an acceptation. That is, they regarded it as a partial payment (i.e., in terms of its inherent value) that God graciously chose to accept as a full payment for our sins. Shedd, together with the Reformed and Lutheran Scholastic theologians of the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, vehemently opposed such a notion, holding instead to the infinite, inherent efficacy of Christ’s death.

accident philosophically, a nonessential property of a thing (Latin accidens). It is the opposite of a thing’s essence. All characteristics of a thing must be either accidental or essential. Shedd cites the word in the context of the Lutheran Formula of Concord’s discussion on original sin. There, the point (against Matthias Flacius) is that the corruption of original sin is not our essence itself but is rather an accidental corruption of that essence. Although sin inheres in and profoundly vitiates our essence, it nevertheless should be distinguished carefully from it. See also essentia.

active conversion .see conversion active obedience see obedience, active and obedience, passive actus purissimus drawing on the Aristotelian distinction between potency and actuality, a term that describes God as “most pure actuality” or “completely actualized.” See also potentia and actus.

ad extra and ad intra see opera ad extra and opera ad intra analytic and synthetic a way to describe the truth of a statement. An analytic statement is true by definition, that is, based on the meaning of the terms used in the statement. Thus, “a triangle contains three sides” is an analytic statement. Because an analytic statement is true by definition its truth cannot be denied, nor is it necessary to seek evidence to establish its truth. The truth of a synthetic statement is determined empirically and therefore it can be denied without entailing a logical contradiction. Thus, “the sky is blue” is a synthetic statement. In Shedd’s consideration of Anselm’s ontological argument and Kant’s critique of it, he considers the nature of the statements it contains, whether synthetic or analytic. See also ontological argument.

anhypostasis and enhypostasis terms that describe the relationship between the human nature of Christ and the divine second person of the Trinity (i.e., the Logos, as in John 1:1). Specifically, the human nature of Christ has no independent personhood apart from the Logos. Rather, the humanity assumed by the Logos becomes a subsistent, individualized entity by virtue of being assumed and personalized by the Logos. Christ’s humanity is anhypostatic (impersonal) in that there is no man Jesus who does —or even could—subsist independent of the Logos. This is an explicit denial of Nestorianism, which in effect conceived of the union as one of indwelling, namely, the divine Logos person indwelling the human Jesus person. Nestorianism was seen as, in effect, splitting Christ into two persons and was repudiated by the Council of Chalcedon (451). Stating the matter positively, Christ’s humanity is enhypostatic (“inper-sonal”) with respect to the divine Logos, because Christ’s humanity is actualized as an individual in and only in its assumption by the Logos. The Logos is, as it were, the root of Christ’s person onto which the human nature is grafted and personalized. Shedd criticizes Dorner, among others, for denying the enhypostatic character of Christ’s humanity. Shedd cites John of Damascus, Thomas Aquinas, and John Owen at some length and approvingly for their exposition of the doctrine. See also Nestorianism.

annihilationism see conditional immortality

a parte ante and a parte post expressions that describe the different senses of eternity: a parte post means “in the direction of what comes after,” that is, looking forward (in time); a parte ante means “in the direction of what comes before,” that is, looking backward (in time). As Shedd points out, the eternity that creatures experience, in either the state of eter nal bliss or eternal punishment, is a relative eternity: a parte post. That is, creaturely eternity has a beginning in time but will have no ending in it. God, in contrast, has neither a beginning in the past (a parte ante) nor an ending in the future (a parte post). Indeed, because Shedd holds to God’s timelessness, for him the distinction is not merely quantitative but also qualitative: he does not conceive of God’s eternity a parte ante as a succession of moments stretching endlessly into the past. Shedd points out that the Scholastics used the term etemitas to denote God’s absolute eternity and sempitemitas to refer to the relative, temporal eternity of creatures.

apodosis see protasis and apodosis

apokatastasis “restoration.” Most notably connected with Origen of Alexandria (185-254), this Greek word refers to the teaching that all creation—even the devil himself—ultimately will be reconciled to God. See also universalism.

Apollinarianism christological heresy named after Apollinaris (also spelled Apollinarius) (ca. 310-ca. 390), bishop of Laodicea in Syria. Because Apollinaris regarded the human soul or mind as the seat of sin, he denied that the second person of the Trinity assumed a human soul or mind in the incarnation. He did teach that the Logos assumed a human body and possibly (depending upon how Apollinaris is interpreted) a human life principle or “animal soul.” Thus, according to Apollinaris, the mental life of Jesus is simply that of the Logos, operating in and through human flesh. His teaching was repudiated at a number of councils, most notably Constantinople in 381 and Chalcedon in 451.

a posteriori and a priori “from what comes afterward” and “from what comes before.” A concept is said to be a posteriori if it is the result of or comes after some experience that precedes it. A concept is a priori if its basis is apart from and therefore prior to any sort of experience.

arbitrium see will

Arianism heresy named after Arius of Alexandria, a fourth-century presbyter in the church at Alexandria. He is best known for his denial of the deity of Christ. His teaching was rejected at the Council of Nicea (325). Arius taught that God created a rational spirit creature called the “Son-Logos.” At the incarnation the created Son-Logos assumed bodily form. Thus, Arius denied not only Christ’s deity (the subject of the Nicene controversy) but also Christ’s humanity. See also homoiousios.

aseity from the Latin aseitas (through himself) = Latin a and se. When applied to God, aseity means that he has his existence in and through himself {a se), rather than being dependent in any way on another for his existence.

begging the question see petitio principii border of the fathers see limbus patrum boule see will

Calvinistic extra see extra calvinisticum cause Aristotle’s fourfold causal schema as employed by Protestant and Catholic Scholastic theologians: material, efficient, formal, and final cause. Shedd likewise draws on these distinctions at many points. Peter Angeles (Harper Collins Dictionary of Philosophy [2d. ed.; New York: Harper Collins, 1992], 42) summarizes this fourfold causality as follows: “(1) material cause: the substrate or substance out of which a thing comes to be and which persists; that in which a change takes place; (2) formal cause: that shape (pattern, configuration) into which something is changed; the essence (the essential characteristic) being manifested in the process of becoming; (3) efficient cause: that by which some change is brought about; that which initiates activity; and (4) final cause: that for the sake of which an activity takes place; the end (purpose, goal, state of completion) for which the change is produced or for which the change aims (strives, seeks); its telos ovraison d’etre.”

circumincession along with the coordinate Greek term perichdresis, “the coinherence of the persons of the Trinity in the divine essence and in each other, but it can also indicate the coinherence of Christ’s divine and human natures in their communion or personal union” (Richard A. Muller, Dictionary of Greek and Latin Theological Terms [Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985], 67).

communicatio idiomatum “communication of proper qualities” or “communication of attributes,” a term that refers to the relationship between the divine and human natures in the person of Christ. In the Reformed understanding, because the God-man is a single person with two natures, the properties of each nature can be predicated of the theanthropic (i.e., “God-man”) person. Thus, it would be correct to say “Jesus Christ is eternal” as well as “Jesus Christ was born in the fullness of time,” since both divine and human attributes and activities can be predicated of Jesus Christ, the theanthropic person. On the other hand, it would be incorrect to predicate the attributes of one nature to the other nature, as in “Christ’s human nature is omnipresent.” The Lutherans, while agreeing that the attributes of each nature can be predicated of the theanthropic person, also argue that, in view of the hypostatic union, the human nature of Christ is elevated and enriched by attributes of the divine person of the Logos, in whom the human nature became enhvpostatically united. For example, in the Lutheran view Christ’s human nature is exalted with the attribute of omnipresence (also called ubiquity). Indeed, the Lutherans delin-eate three kinds or genera of the communicatio: genus idiomaticum, genus majestaticum, and genus apotelesmaticum. Genus idiomaticum, as already described, refers to the predication of the attributes of either nature to the theanthropic person. Genus majestaticum is, as Shedd tells it, the communication of the properties of one nature to the other. Finally, genus apotelesmaticum refers to the cooperation of each nature in the work of the God-man. For example, in the atonement the human nature experiences suffering and death, while the divine nature upholds the human nature to bear up under the awful weight of sin. Shedd, in agreement with the Reformed tradition, completely rejectsgewt/5 majestaticum, regarding it as a "partial revival" of Eutychianism. Richard A. Muller's excellent discussion {Dictionary of Greek and Latin Theological Terms [Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985], 149-50, 72-74) of communicatio idiomatum presents a view at odds with Shedd's understanding of the Lutheran genus majestaticum. According to Muller, the Lutherans do not teach a flow of attri-butes from one nature to the other nature. Rather, because the human nature is enhypostatically united to a divine person (with, of course, a divine nature), the human nature so united is exalted accordingly. The end result appears to be the same, though Muller's description attends to the nuances of the Lutheran presentation of the doctrine more closely than Shedd's. See also anhypostasis and enhyposta-sis and Eutychianism and monophysitism and thean-thrfjpos and ubiquity.

communication of attributes see communicatio idiomatum

conceptualism see universals

concupiscentia roughly equivalent to the Greek epithymia, which is often translated by the English word lust. Although the English word is frequently associated with inappropriate sexual appetite, concupiscence refers to morally disordered and inordinate desire generally, sensuous or otherwise. In the Protestant understanding, and accordingly in Shedd, concupiscence is itself sin and not merely, as in the Roman Catholic understanding, a disordered inclination that may lead to sin.

concursus God's ongoing providential support of the created order. Shedd worries about this in the context of God's providential support of evil. Shedd is quite clear that God permits evil, and God's concur-sus in this case extends to his maintaining the sinner and the sinner's will as to its existence and ability to function sinfully. On the other hand, Shedd regards the sinful element itself as entirely self-actuated or self-moved and not in any way so moved by God. See also decree, permissive and decree, efficient.

condltlonal immortality the teaching that the human soul is not inherently immortal but is naturally extinguished with the death of the body. Immortality is bestowed conditionally (e.g., through faith in Christ) on the redeemed as a gift. Conditional immortality is closely related in concept to annihi-lationism, which is the teaching that the finally impenitent are not granted immortality and, accordingly, experience the extinction of consciousness. Shedd refutes this in his advocacy of the traditional doctrine of eternal, conscious punishment for the lost.

consubstantial see homoousios

consubstantiation a theory of Christ's presence in the Lord's supper, in which the literal body and literal blood of Christ are locally and physically present in the bread and the wine. This view is wrongly confused with the Lutheran doctrine of real presence, and in fact Shedd himself is guilty of such confusion. As the Lutherans point out, their doctrine of real presence involves an illocal presence of Christ's body and blood. By "illocal" they mean an actual, real presence that nevertheless does not entail the spatial extension proper to a physical object as such. See also real presence.

contingent the opposite of necessary: "The contingent includes all those things that are not necessary and that are not impossible" (Peter Angeles, Harper Collins Dictionary of Philosophy [2d. ed.; New York: Harper Collins, 1992], 56). See also necessity.

conversion Latin conversio, viewed by the older theologians as either passive or active. Passive conversion (conversio passiva) refers to the habit or disposition, implanted by God, to repent and believe in Christ as Savior. Active conversion (conversio activa) is the actual turning of the sinner in repentance and faith in Christ. Passive conversion is also termed "regeneration" because it involves the renewal of the sinner's will. Active conversion, or the actual turning of the sinner to Christ, is often termed simply "conversion" without any additional qualifications. Shedd himself adopts the distinct terms regeneration and conversion in his own discussion of the matter, believing that the separate designations are less prone to confusion.

creationism used in at least two different senses, depending upon whether the discussion concerns cosmology or anthropology. In cosmology, creationism refers to God as the Creator of the universe in general and of humans in particular. In this sense it is set against naturalistic theories of origin, such as evolution. In anthropology, creationism refers to a specific theory of how the soul originates. Shedd uses the term creationism only in this latter context. According to the creationist theory, God specially creates each person's soul ex nihilo and then implants it in the body that is created/propagated by the parents through normal generation. In contrast, in tra-ducianism, the theory vigorously advocated by Shedd, both soul and body are conveyed to the child through normal generation. The Reformed tradition generally espouses the creationist position while Lutherans tend to support traducianism. See also ex nihilo and traducianism.

decree, efficient see decree, permissive and decree, efficient decree, permissive and decree, efficient a distinction of God's decrees discussed by Shedd at some length (p. 318). Simply summarized, "the efficacious decree determines the event," either through God's physical or spiritual agency. The permissive decree, on the other hand, has reference only to God's providential bounding and control of moral evil: "It renders the event infallibly certain, but not by immediately acting upon and in the finite will, as in the case of the efficacious decree" (p. 318). Though there is some dispute as to whether Calvin would grant the doctrine of the permissive decree (e.g., Institutes 1.18), it is affirmed by the Reformed tradition generally, provided that it not be understood as an "idle" or "otiose" permission. The permissive decree is, in fact, a decree in which God providentially governs the free and "sinful self-determination of the finite will" (p. 319). See also concursus and infralapsari-anism, sublapsarianism, and supralapsarianism and preterition and reprobation.

decrees, order of the see infralapsartanism, sublapsarianism, and supralapsarianism

dichometry vs. trichometry different schema for describing the constitution of man. According to dichometry (more commonly known as dichotomy), man is a twofold being, consisting of a material element (a physical body) and an immaterial element (referred to as either soul or spirit). Trichometry (more frequently called trichotomy) is the view that man's constitution is threefold, with soul and spirit referring to two different immaterial entities. Tri-chotomists explain these two immaterial entities variously. For some trichotomists, the soul includes the emotions, intellect, and will, while the spirit refers to that part of man's constitution, made alive at regeneration, that has the capacity to relate to God. Shedd is a dichotomist because he regards man as metaphysically twofold, though the soul has both lower and higher functions. According to Shedd, the "animal soul" denominates the soul's lower opera-tions with respect to the body and includes the body's animating principle and its bodily appetites. The "rational soul" refers to the soul's higher, rational operations. Note that for Shedd these are not two separate souls but a single soul that operates on both levels. This makes Shedd a dichotomist according to the standard usage of these terms. However, Shedd sometimes uses the terms in a nonstandard way. For example, he refers (p. 870)

to the schema presented in 1 Cor. 15:44, 1 Thess. 5:23, and Heb. 4:12 as "trichometry," because these passages distinguish the function of "soul" (i.e., the animal soul) from that of "spirit" (i.e., the rational soul). Yet, in so far as the distinction is not ontological but functional only, the term trichometry (trichotomy) would not properly apply.

distinction see modal distinction vs. real distinction distributive justice see justice economic Trinity the offices or functions performed by each of the three members of the Trinity. The economic Trinity concerns the roles that each member performs in terms of the created order ad extra or outside of himself. See also modalismarai notae internae and notae externae and ontological Trinity.

efficient decree see decree, permissive and decree, efficient election see infralapsarianism, sublapsarianism, and supralapsarianism and preterition and reprobation elenctic "disputational "or "for the purpose of confutation or logical refutation" (Richard A. Muller, Dictionary of Greek and Latin Theological Terms [Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985], 101). As Muller points out, "Whereas polemic indicates simple attack, elenctic implies refutation leading toward positive statement." Among the works of this genre, Shedd very frequently cites Francis Turretin's Institutes of Elenctic Theology.

enhypostasis see anhypostasis and enhypostasis epithymia see concupiscentia essentia from the Latin infinitive esse (to be). With reference to God, his essence is his very being; it is that which makes him what he is. It is sometimes (as in Shedd) used synonymously with substantia (substance) and natura (nature)—hence, "the divine essence," "the divine substance," and "the divine nature" are often used as equivalent in meaning. Strictly speaking, however, "substance" means "that which stands under," that is, in the sense of an underlying substratum that bears attributes. When sub-stance is used in this way it differs from essence in that the latter connotes, as Shedd puts it, "energetic being" (p. 232). In that regard, the term essence is more theologically adequate when used in reference to God; God's attributes are identical with his essence, whereas the word substance may imply a distinction. The Greek ousia, derived from a Greek verb meaning "to be," is also used as equivalent to essentia. See also accident and homoiousios and homoousios and subsistantia. eternal generation "the eternal and changeless activity in the Godhead by which the Father produces the Son without division of essence and by which the second person of the Trinity is identified as an individual subsistence or modus subsistendi (mode of subsistence) of the divine essence. The generatio, moreover, is not voluntary but natural and necessary" (Richard A. Muller, Dictionary of Greek and Latin Theological Terms [Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985], 127). This doctrine was incorporated into the Nicene Creed as enlarged in 381 ("eternally begotten of the Father before all ages"). Though regarded by some trinitarians as overly speculative and going too much beyond scriptural revelation, Shedd defends the doctrine as necessary in light of the biblical terms Father and Son. That is, one cannot understand in what sense the Father is a father to the Son apart from some concept of generation. See also notae intemae and notae externae. eternitas see a parte ante and a parte post eternity see a parte ante and a parte post Eutychianism christological heresy named after Eutyches, a celebrated fifth-century monk from Constantinople. Eutyches argued that Christ was "of two natures" before the incarnation but is "in" only one nature afterward. His doctrine is difficult to decipher and is variously interpreted. According to one interpretation, he taught that Christ's divine and human natures combined so as to become a third nature {ter tium quid). Another interpretation regards Eutyches as teaching that Christ's human nature was absorbed into his deity and was transubstantiated, as it were, into deity. According to this latter interpretation, Eutychianism is a kind of docetism. Eutyches' position was condemned at Chalcedon (451), where the injunctions in this creed against confusing and changing the natures have his doctrine in view. See also communicatio idiomatum and monophysitism. evolution see creationism

ex nihilo "from/out of nothing," an expression most commonly used to describe God's creation of the universe "out of nothing," as opposed to his fashioning it out of preexistent materials. See also creationism and hyle.

ex nihilo nihil fit "nothing comes out of nothing" ex opere operato "from the work worked," that is, "by virtue of the work performed." In the Roman Catholic theology, the sacraments convey grace by virtue of being correctly performed, provided only that the recipient does not place a "barrier" (obex) in the way. The Lutheran and Reformed traditions deny this teaching, arguing that for the sacrament to convey grace the recipient must embrace it in faith. See also opus operatum. expiation something that removes of the barrier of sin. Specifically, expiation "implies the obliteration of sin through Christ's atoning death" (J. M. Gundry-Volf, "Expiation, Propitiation, Mercy Seat," in Dic-tionary of Paul and His Letters [ed. Gerald F. Hawthorne, Ralph P. Martin, and Daniel G. Reid; Downers Grove, III.: InterVarsity, 1993], 279). It can denote the cognate ideas of purgation, cleansing, etc. It is similar to propitiation, though in propitiation the emphasis is on the satisfaction of God's wrath against sin.

external characteristics see notae internae and notae externae

extra calvinisticum "the Calvinistic extra." Based on Institutes 2.15, this is the phrase used (pejoratively) by Lutherans to describe the operations of the Logos that the Reformed claim transcend or lie beyond (extra) the operations of his human nature. Such operations the Lutherans utterly deny, arguing instead that, by virtue of the hypostatic union, Christ's human nature is indissolubly joined to the Logos; everywhere the Logos is, there is Christ's humanity. This is expressed by the Lutheran saying /ogo5 non extra carnem (the Logos is not beyond Christ's flesh, where "flesh" means Christ's entire humanity, not just his body). The Lutheran position is based on their view of the communicatio idiomatum, in particular genus majestaticum. For a more detailed discussion, see Richard A. Muller, Dictionary of Greek and Latin Theological Terms (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985), 111, 180. See also communicatio idiomatum and hypostasis.

filiation see modus subsistendi and notae internae and notae externae tons deitatis and fons trinitatis tountainheadv source of the deity" and "fountainhead/source of the Trinity," terms used by the orthodox in reference to the Father, who, because he communicates the hypostatic character to the Son and the Spirit by generation and spiration respectively, is therefore viewed as the "fountainhead" or "source" in this regard. (According to trinitarianism in the Western model, the Spirit is spirated or proceeds from the Son as well as from the Father.) Shedd favors the expression fons trinitatis as more precise, because the Father is the source of the resulting personal distinctions and not of the divine essence itself. See also notae internae and notae externae.

fountainhead of the deity see fons deitatis and fons trinitatis fountainhead of the Trinity see fons deitatis and fons trinitatis generation see eternal generation genus apotelesmaticum one of three genera of the communication of attributes as propounded in orthodox Lutheran theology. See communicatio idiomatum.

genus idiomaticum one of three genera of the communication of attributes as propounded in orthodox Lutheran theology. See communicatio idiomatum.

genus majestaticum one of three genera of the communication of attributes as propounded in orthodox Lutheran theology. See communicatio idiomatum and extra calvinisticum.

guilt see poena vs. culpa habitus a habit or, more properly, a disposition. As Shedd states, "By the term habit (habitus), the elder divines meant an inward disposition of the heart and will" (p. 338).

heteroousios see homoiousios

homoiousios "of similar substance/essence/being," a vague term used by the so-called Semiarian party in the fourth century to describe the relationship between the Father and the Son. Though often called Semiarians, the less pejorative term middle party is perhaps preferable to describe this group, which certainly was not Arian but neither was it comfortable with the Sabellian-sounding term homoousios favored by Athanasius. To them, the term homoousios seemed to imply no distinction between the Father and the Son and therefore, they reasoned, left the door opened to modalism. The radical Arians, on the other hand, used the word heteroousios (of different substance/essence/being) to describe the relationship between Father and Son. See also Arianism and essen-i ia anil homoousios ami modalism and Sabellianism.

homoousios "of the same substance/essence/being," equivalent in meaning to the word consubstantial, which is derived from the Latin con (same) and substantia (substance). This term was favored by Athanasius in the fourth century to describe the oneness of essence between the Father and the Son. In describing Father and Son as homoousios, Athanasius does not intend a mere generic oneness but a numeric identity or essence. That is, the Father and the Son are the very same God. This wording was adopted by the Nicene Creed (325) and passed into countless other creeds and doctrinal statements of the orthodox ever since. See also essentia and homoiousios.

hyle matter, specifically the unformed, "chaotic" matter in the systems of Plato and Aristotle. That is, it is matter considered apart from its form. As Shedd points out, in Greek philosophy the deity is not strictly a Creator who brings the world into existence ex nihilo, but an artificer, who creates a universe by shaping it out of preexistent hyle. See also ex nihilo.

hypostasis term employed in trinitarian and chris-tological discussions. The Greek hypostasis can have a range of meaning. In keeping with its etymological signification, it means "to stand under," hence its usage as equivalent to the Latin substantia (substance) and essentia (essence), or to the Greek ousia. It appears to mean "substance" or "essence" in its use in Heb. 1:3 (though not all translators agree). Likewise, the Nicene Creed of 325 uses it as synonymous with ousia when it condemns those who say that the Son is a different hypostasis or ousia from the Father. On the other hand, the word can also be used to designate an individual instance of an essence, that is, a person in a trinitarian or christological context. This range of meaning occasioned confusion in the earlier trinitarian debates, exacerbated when translating between Greek and Latin. Thanks in part to the work of the Cappadocian fathers in the fourth century, the term came to be restricted to the personal distinctions in the Godhead, rather than being used to designate the essence itself. Hence, the final Greek form of the trinitarian formula became "one ousia, three hypostases," equivalent to the Latin-based formula "one substance/essence, three persons." The expression hypostatic union is used in christological discussions. See also essentia and hypostatic union and monophysitism and subsistantia.

hypostatic union used in christological discussions to refer to Christ's being one hypostasis or person who subsists in two natures. The two natures in Christ are thus naturally united in his person, somewhat analogous to the union of body and soul in an individual human being. This is contrasted with a conjunction or cooperative union of two persons, such as the indwelling of the Logos in the man Jesus, as in Nestorianism. See also hypostasis and Nestori-anism.

immediate imputation and mediate imputation expressions used in connection with the doctrine of the imputation of Adam's sin. The immediate imputation of Adam's sin refers to the imputation of the guilt of Adam's actual transgression in the garden to his posterity. Mediate imputation, on the other hand, refers to the imputation of guilt by virtue of the hereditary depravity of heart that inheres in all of Adam's descendants, who derive their corrupt natures from Adam. The Reformed tradition, including Shedd, teaches that original sin entails both the guilt of Adam's sin as directly imputed to his posterity as well as an ensuing corruption of heart, which is seen as the blameworthy effect of Adam's first sin. A small minority within the tradition, most notably Placaeus and the school of Saumur, held to mediate imputation only. Their position was rejected officially by the Reformed churches, impeccability from the Latin prefix im (not) and verb peccare (to sin), thus "unable to sin," a term used primarily when addressing the question of whether Christ, as the God-man, could sin. While Christians of all traditions grant the clear scriptural fact that Christ committed no sin, there is disagreement as to whether he could have. The case against impeccability generally argues that in order for a temptation to be real there must be at least the possibility, in theory, of succumbing to it. Therefore, to deny the possibility that Christ could have sinned is to deny the reality of his temptations. Shedd, while granting that Christ's human nature considered in the abstract was peccable, argues at length that the theanthropic person could not have sinned. Among other reasons, Shedd argues that because the Logos is the root of Christ's person onto which the human nature is grafted, any sin committed by the theanthropic person would be chargeable preeminently to the Logos, who would have allowed the sin to occur through the organ of his humanity. This Shedd regards as impossible. See also anhypostasis and enhypostasis and posse peccare et non posse peccare and theanthropos.

impersonal see anhypostasis and enhypostasis imputation see immediate imputation and mediate imputation infralapsarianism, sublapsarianism, and supralapsarianism expressions that describe the logical order of the relationship between the decree to permit the fall of humankind into sin and the decree to elect some to eternal life. Infralapsus and sublapsus are synonyms meaning "below the fall," whereas supralapstts means "above the fall." In the infralap-sarian/sublapsarian model, the decree to predestine some to eternal life is subsequent to or logically "below" (i.e., subordinate to) the decree to permit the fall. From this perspective, when God considers electing some to salvation he has already-fallen humankind in view. Those who are nonelect are simply passed over, that is, left in the sinful state in which they already find themselves. In the supralapsarian model the order is reversed: the decree of predestination comes logically prior to (i.e., "above") the decree to permit the fall of humankind into sin. Thus, the decree to permit the fall serves to make predestination possible, rather than being (as in the infralapsarian/sublapsarian model) a response to a logically prior fall. Shedd, together with the Reformed tradition generally, adopts the infralapsarian/sublapsarian position. Note that a few sys-tematicians (e.g., Chafer, Erickson) misapply the labels, wrongly assuming that infralapsarianism, sublapsarianism, and supralapsarianism refer to three different positions. In fact, the Latin prepositions infra and sub, being purely interchangeable, are used to designate the same view, against the supralapsarian model.

See also decree, permissive and decree, efficient and preterition and reprobation, inpersonal see anhypostasis and enhypostasis internal characteristics .see notae internae and notae externae justice used in at least two ways by Shedd: “Rectoral” justice refers to God’s uprightness as a ruler over his moral universe. It respects God in the administration of his moral law, whether punishing evil or rewarding good. Related to this is “distributive” jus-tice, which is God’s distribution to each according to his or her desserts. Accordingly, Shedd divides distributive justice into two categories: remunerative justice, which has to do with the distribution of rewards for obedience, and retributive justice, which concerns the distribution of punishment for evil. Retributive justice is sometimes called vindicative justice or, in older English writers, vindictive justice.

limbus patrum “fringe/border of the fathers”; in Roman Catholic theology, a term referring to the supposed abode of the Old Testament saints prior to Christ’s liberating them from it through his descent into hell. Also identified with Abraham’s bosom, the limbus patrum was a place distinct both from hell and from purgatory in that it was not a place of punishment, eternal or temporal. On the other hand, those awaiting their full redemption in the limbus patrum did not experience the full presence of God. Shedd, together with the Protestant tradition generally, rejects the limbus patrum, teaching instead that the spirits of all believers, of whatever dispensation, go directly to be with God upon their deaths.

logos non extra carnem see extra calvinisticum

lust see concupiscentia

massa “mass, lump,” a term referring to the undifferentiated human nature as existent in Adam, apart from its propagation and individuation in the form of his offspring. As a result of Adam’s sin, the entire human race fell with him, described accordingly as the massa perditionis (mass of perdition). See also traducianism.

massa perditionis see massa

mediate imputation see immediate imputation and mediate imputation metonymy a figure of speech in which one part of something is put in place of another. For example, soul may be referenced when actually body is in view.

middle party see homoiousios

modal distinction vs. real distinction two ways to refer to difference: real distinctions refer to the differences that exist between different things; modal distinctions refer to the different ways in which a particular thing can exist or subsist. These two kinds of distinctions occur in discussions of the Trinity, because the members of the Trinity are not three different things (i.e., beings), but rather three different ways (modes) in which the one God exists. See also modus subsistendi. modalism sometimes called modalistic monarchi-anism; antitrinitarian heresy that gained some following in the patristic period and still boasts some adherents today. Simply stated, modalism is the teaching that God is but a single person who manifests himself successively as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. These three are not distinct persons in the Godhead but rather are masks or roles in which God reveals himself to his creation. Thus, modalism denies the ontological Trinity, which is the view that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit refer to three actual, internal distinctions within the Godhead itself. For modalists the Trinity is purely an economic Trinity. Modalism is also called Sabellianism after Sabellius, an early proponent of the teaching. It is also sometimes called patripassianism, because by this theory the Father suffered on the cross in his manifestation as the Son. Modalism should not be confused with the orthodox trinitarian concept of modus subsistendi (mode of subsisting). See also economic Trinity and homoiousios and modus subsistendi and ontological Trinity, mode of subsisting see modus subsistendi modus subsistendi the different ways or “modes” in which the divine nature subsists, namely, as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. It is therefore the functional equivalent to the term person, though more philosophically precise, as the unqualified usage of the word person in everyday speech most naturally suggests three separate beings, which in the context of the Godhead would be tritheism. The expression mode of subsisting should not be confused with modalism, because in modalism the one God has only one mode of subsistence, ontologically speaking, but chooses to reveal himself in three different ways. In the trinitarian view, God has within himself a threefold life, eternally subsisting in three modes. See also modal distinction vs. real distinction and modalism and notae internae and notae externae and persona.

monophysitism from monos (one) and physis (nature), the teaching that the incarnate Christ possesses only one nature. Generally, the monophysites held that incarnation resulted in a single divine-human nature in the person of Christ, rather than, as orthodox Christology asserts, two distinct natures (divine and human) joined hypostatically in a single person. Eutychianism, at least according to one interpretation of it, is one well-known form of the mono-physite heresy. Monophysitism was rejected at Chal-cedon in 451. Shedd charges the later Lutheran divines with a monophysite tendency in their christological constructions. See also communicatio idiomatum and Eutychianism and hypostasis.

monothelitism from monos (one) and thelema (will), the teaching that there is but one divine-human will in the incarnate Christ. That is, he does not possess both a divine will and a human will, but a hybrid “divine-human” will. Orthodox Christology rejects monothelitism on the grounds that a complete human will is essential to a human nature. Without a human will Christ’s incarnation would be only partial. Monothelitism was formally rejected at the Council of Constantinople in 680. natura see essentia nature used in two main ways: (1) as synonymous with essence or substance, as in the expression all human nature fell in Adam; and (2) the disposition or inclination to act in a certain manner when not constrained from doing so by forces ab extra, as in it is the nature of a dog to bark. See also ab extra and ab intra and essentia and subsistantia.

necessity what a thing or action is said to be if it cannot be other than it is. However, different kinds of necessity must be distinguished. First is absolute necessity: a necessity that is true by the nature of the case, such as the necessity of fire to burn. Second is hypothetical necessity, also called a “necessity of the consequence”: a necessity that arises from a prior circumstance or set of circumstances that could have been otherwise. For example, if God makes a gracious promise, which he was under no obligation to make in the first place, the fulfillment of that promise becomes “necessary” because of the promise so made. In discussions of the atonement there is some debate as to what sort of necessity applies to Christ’s death. Is Christ’s satisfaction necessary by the nature of the case, or did it become necessary only from the point that God decreed to make salvation contingent upon it? Shedd, in agreement with Anselm and the later Protestant Scholastic tradition, opts for absolute necessity. Furthermore, in some discussions, such as the freedom of the will, it is also important to distinguish necessity from coercion or compulsion. The devil sins necessarily because he is certain to do so. On the other hand, the devil sins freely because there is no coercion or compulsion from without, forcing him to sin against his will. In this view, freedom and necessity are not opposed, though freedom and coercion are. See also contingent.

Nestorianism fifth-century christological heresy named after Nestorius, who became patriarch of Constantinople in 428. According to this model, the two natures of Christ were held so distinct as to be virtually two persons. In Nestorianism, as in Anti-ochene Christology generally, the union of divine and human in the person of Christ is seen as that of indwelling, that is, the man Jesus is the temple in which God dwelt. Nestorianism was condemned at the Council of Ephesus in 431.

nominalism the philosophical position that universal concepts (universals) do not have extramental existence but are mere names (nomina) that describe particular objects having certain features in common. That is, the universal is not a thing in its own right —whether existing prior to particular objects as the template to which the individual object conforms (as in Plato) or existing in particular objects as their form (as in Aristotle). Instead, only particular objects exist, "and the universal is merely a term, or name (nomen), used in the identification and classification of individuals by the mind" (Richard A. Muller, Dictionary of Greek and Latin Theological Terms [Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985], 319). Shedd has an interesting discussion of universals and nominalism on p. 468. See also potentia absoluta and potentia ordinata and universals.

notae internae and notae externae "internal characteristics" and "external characteristics" that designate characteristics of the ontological Trinity and economic Trinity respectively. The notae internae refer to the peculiar properties that distinguish the persons from one another, ontologically speaking. The "internal characteristic" of the Father is pater-nity. This characteristic entails his own unbegotten-ness, as well as his generation of the Son and spira-tion of the Spirit. The Son is characterized by filiation (i.e., that he is begotten of the Father) and spiration of the Spirit. The Spirit is characterized by procession, that is, he proceeds from the Father and the Son. Because these distinctions entail activities within the very nature of the Godhead, they are also called the "internal operations" or opera ad intra. On the other hand, the notae externae refer to the characteristics of the trinitarian persons in their operations outside of the Godhead, that is, with reference to the opera ad extra. The Father is particularly associated with his role as Creator, preserver, and ruler of his creation; the Son is connected most closely with redemption; and the Spirit's work is peculiarly tied to inspiration, regeneration, and sanctification. Thus, the notae externae are those characteristics of the trinitarian persons viewed from the standpoint of the economic Trinity. See also economic Trinity and modalism and ontological Trinity.

noumenon and phenomenon terms particularly associated with the epistemology and ontology of Immanuel Kant. Stated most simply, the noumenon refers to what a thing is in itself, as opposed to the phenomenon, which is how the thing appears to us.

obedience, active and obedience, passive terms that characterize two aspects of Christ's work of atonement. Active obedience refers to Christ's per-fectly keeping the precepts of the law. Passive obedience is his undergoing punishment according to the law's denunciations for disobedience. In both Reformed and Lutheran theology, both the active and passive obedience were performed for our benefit and in our stead. Both aspects are imputed to the believer, with the result that not only does the believer escape God's wrath but also receives the rewards and blessedness that follow the law's perfect fulfillment.

obnoxious in older theological works, a term that follows its original Latin meaning rather than its usage in modern English. The Latin obnoxius means "liable, guilty of, obliged, subject to, exposed to" (D. P. Simpson, Cassell's Latin Dictionary [London: Cas-sell/New York: Macmillan, 1977], 403). omnipresence see ubiquity ontological argument a proof for God's existence developed by St. Anselm in the eleventh century. Briefly stated, the argument is as follows: "God is that than which no greater can be conceived. To exist in the mind alone is not as great as to exist in reality. Therefore, since God is that than which no greater can be conceived, he must exist in reality as well as in the mind." Philosophers and theologians have debated the efficacy of this argument for nearly a thousand years. Shedd's system is noteworthy not merely because he approves of the argument but because of the significant amount of attention he pays to it compared to other lines of proof for the divine existence.

ontological Trinity the internal, intratrinitarian distinctions ad intra or within the Godhead itself. See also economic Trinity and modalism and notae internae and notae externae.

opera ad extra and opera ad intra the internal and external operations within or by the Godhead. See also notae internae and notae externae.

opus operatum "a work worked," used in reference to the Roman Catholic doctrine of the sacraments. See also ex opere operato.

ordained power see potentia absoluta and potentia ordinata order of the decrees see infralapsarianism, sublapsarianism, and supralapsarianism original sin see immediate imputation and mediate imputation and peccatum originans and peccatum originatum and Pelagianism and poena vs. culpa.

ousia see essentia

passive conversion see conversion

passive obedience see obedience, active and obedience, passive patripassianism see modalism

peccatum originans and peccatum originatum terms employed in the doctrine of original sin. Peccatum originans (originating sin) is the originating activity of Adam's will in committing the sin that results in an abidingly sinful disposition, both in his own will and in the will of his posterity. This resultant disposition is designated peccatum originatum (originated sin).

Pelagianism the theological position associated with the fifth-century monk Pelagius. He is best known for his views on the freedom of the will and original sin. Pelagius's teaching is elaborated in great detail in the writings of his nemesis Augustine, who vigorously opposed it. Pelagius affirmed the freedom of the will, which for him meant that a person always has the ability to choose good as well as evil. That is, for Pelagius the power of contrary choice is essential to free moral agency. According to Pelagius, a person is always "able to sin and able not to sin" {posse peccare et posse non peccare). Naturally, such a view of freedom carries implications for the doctrine of original sin. Pelagius denied that human beings derive a corrupt nature from Adam; if they did then they would not be responsible for their sins. Rather, Adam's transgression served merely as a bad example to his descendants. Against the charge that Pelagius's teaching rendered grace to no effect, he countered that he affirmed divine grace in at least two senses. First is a grace of nature, meaning that God graciously constituted humans after such a fashion that they could meet the moral requirements placed on them. Second is special grace, which helps people to do what they could do without it but are more readily able to do with it. In this latter category are Christ's example, the Scriptures, the sacraments of the church, etc. Pelagianism was condemned officially at the Council of Ephesus in 431 and again at Orange in 529. See also posse peccare et non posse peccare and Semipelagianism.

perichdrgsis see circumincession permissive decree see decree, permissive and decree, efficient persona along with the Greek prosopon, a Latin term denoting the distinctions in the Godhead, designated as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. It is more commonly used, though less technically precise, than the Scholastic expression mode of subsisting {modus subsistendi). See also modus subsistendi and pros6pon.

petitio principii "begging the question," referring to a logical fallacy in which one assumes the truth of the very proposition to be proven. That is, the truth of the conclusion is assumed in the premises of the argument.

phenomenon see noumenon and phenomenon poena vs. culpa “penalty, punishment” vs. “guilt” in the juridical sense. The distinction is employed in the context of the Roman Catholic doctrine of penance and also in certain versions of the doctrine of original sin. In terms of the Roman Catholic doctrine of penance, Shedd states that “although the sacrifice of Christ had freed the believer from the culpability of original sin, it had not freed him altogether from its punishment, and therefore he was still bound, more or less, by the reatus poenae (obligation to punish-ment) and must therefore do penance” (p. 459). The Protestant Scholastics denied the validity of this separation, arguing that since Christ removed the entire guilt of sin he also eliminated any basis for us to undergo punishment for it. The distinction between the obligation to punishment (reatus poenae) and liability to guilt (reatus culpae) was taken up by some later Calvinists and Arminians in their construction of the doctrine of original sin. These (unlike the elder Calvinists) asserted that the juridical guilt for Adam’s sin (culpa) applied only to Adam himself, even though his descendants bear the punishment (poena) for it. As Shedd described the position, “They [Adam’s descendants] are compelled to endure penal suffering on Adam’s account, though they are not chargeable with his fault or crime” (p. 457). Shedd, siding with the older Calvinistic divines, denied the validy of this separation, arguing as they did that poena follows from culpa as an effect from its cause. Shedd found the connection of poena and culpa congenial to his vigorous defense of traducianism, according to which the human race, being seminally present in Adam, actually participated in his crime and therefore bears the culpa —not as disinterested third parties, but as actual participants. See also traducianism.

positive used in at least two ways in Shedd (and elsewhere). When speaking of theology as a “positive science,” he means that the theologian can actually make true, affirmative theological assertions about the way an idea or object is, as opposed to being limited to making only negations about them. That is, we are able to say what God is as well as what he is not. The other sense of “positive” refers to laws or decrees that are not required by the nature of the case, but which are freely enacted by the one making the decree. Shedd cites the Sabbath and the levit-ical laws as belonging to this category. See also potentia absoluta and potentia ordinata.

posse peccare et non posse peccare the teaching of the fifth-century monk Pelagius that humans have free will, which means that they are able to sin and able not to sin {posse peccare et posse non peccare). For Pelagius, the power of contrary choice (i.e., between good and evil) is the essence of what it means to be a free moral agent. Augustine challenged Pelagianism, arguing that it did not take adequate account of human depravity and need for divine grace. Accordingly, Augustine argued that some important distinctions needed to be made, depending upon the particular moral agents in view. Adam, before the fall, was created holy but with the ability either to sin or not to sin {posse peccare et posse non peccare). After he transgressed, he moved to the state of being unable not to sin (non posse non peccare). The regenerate (i.e., on earth) are able to sin and able not to sin (posse peccare et posse non peccare); though Christians do not attain sinlessness in this life they are able, by the grace of God, to avoid sin. In the state of glory, Christians will become unable to sin (non posse peccare). Augustine points out that the Pelagian notion of freedom as the power of contrary choice most obviously breaks down when one applies it to God: God is the most free agent but is unable to sin (non posse peccare). See also impeccability and Pelagianism.

potentia absoluta and potentia ordinata “absolute power” and “ordained power,” a distinction found explicitly in Thomas (Summa 1.25.5), but one that plays a central and pivotal role in later medieval theology, as found in Duns Scotus and in later medieval nominalism. God's absolute power refers to what God is able to do absolutely, by virtue of his transcendence and sovereignty. His ordained power, on the other hand, refers to what God commits himself to do in his interactions with the created order. In later medieval theology, this distinction was used as a cudgel against the Thomistic synthesis, which strove to exhibit the inherent logic and reasonableness of God's actions from our perspective. In later medieval nominalism, God's actions have a much more positive character to them. The result is that, while we can know what God ordained to do based on his revelation, we frequently cannot presume to say that God was bound to do so. See also nominalism and positive.

potentia and actus Aristotelian philosophical terms that also see significant usage in Scholastic theology, both Catholic and Protestant: "Actus or actuality designates that which exists or that which is actualized, as distinct from potentia, that which can exist or has potential for existence" (Richard A. Muller, Dictionary of Greek and Latin Theological Terms [Grand Rapids: Baker, 1985], 20-21). Shedd, in keeping with the orthodox doctrine of God, regards God as "fully actualized." See also actus purissimus.

preterition "bypassing," specifically a bypassing of the nonelect for salvation in the infralapsarian/sublap-sarian model of the decrees. Rather than seeing the damnation of the nonelect as a positive, efficient decree, in preterition the nonelect are simply that: not elected to salvation. God allows them to continue in the path of rebellion that they chose and does not undertake to counteract their aversion to him. Shedd, being an infralapsarian/sublapsarian, affirms the preterition of the nonelect. See also decree, permissive and decree, efficient and infralapsarianism, sublapsarianism, and supralapsarianism and reprobation.

procession see notae internae and notae externae propitiation see expiation prosopon used in trinitarian discussions as equivalent to the Latin persona. It is less philosophically precise than the Greek hypostasis or the Latin sub-sistantia. See also hypostasis and persona and sub-sistantia.

protasis and apodosis the two parts of an "if/then" statement. In the sentence if it rains then you will get wet, the protasis is if it rains and the apodosis is then you will get wet.

punishment see poena vs. culpa putative from the Latin ptttare (to reckon, regard, judge, suppose; Charlton T. Lewis and Charles Short, A Latin Dictionary [rev. ed.; Oxford: Clarendon, 1879 (repr. 1984)], 1495). Shedd uses "putative" as equivalent to "fictitious" and as opposite of "real." He employs the term to describe the view of those who deny the genuine participation of the human race in Adam's sin, that is, those who argue that we are reckoned as if we were guilty. This view Shedd regards as entailing a legal fiction.

quid sit? and quod sit? two fundamental queries that medieval theologians ask in the process of analysis: Quod sit? (whether it exists? does it exist?) and Quid sit? (what is it?). The first question concerns the existence of an entity, and the second the nature of that entity.

real distinction see modal distinction vs. real distinction

realism see universals

real presence the proper expression to describe the Lutheran view of the Lord's Supper, which Shedd incorrectly denominates "consubstantiation." In the Lutheran doctrine, the real body and real blood of Christ are received in, with, and under the elements of bread and wine. The body and blood are present not according to a local mode of presence involving extension in space, but according to an illocal mode of presence, which does not entail spatial extension. See also consubstantiation and ubiquity.

reatus see poena vs. culpa

rectoral justice see justice regeneration see conversion

relaxation a term that Shedd discusses, in the phrase relaxation of justice, in the context of atonement theory. Relaxation of justice entails the law receiving something other than strictly what is due for the offense. Some Calvinistic divines referred to the substitutionary aspect of Christ's work as a relaxation. That is, strictly speaking the law requires the punishment of the actual offender, but God relaxes the law insofar as he allows the penalty to be paid by a substitute. Other Reformed orthodox deny the propriety of the term: "There is therefore to be recognized in the transference of punishment to Christ as surety no relaxation of the law, but its execution" (Heidegger). Shedd declares that the relaxation mentioned by some Calvinists is "very different from Sco-tus's and Grotius's 'relaxation.' The latter is a relaxation in respect to the amount of the penalty, as well as the person enduring it" (p. 733). Though Shedd seems to be correct in his characterization of the Sco-tistic theory, a case can be made that Grotius used the term relaxation in much the same way that his Calvinistic counterparts employed the term.

remunerative justice see justice

reprobation the action of God that is the opposite of election. It is conceived differently depending on one's views of the decrees. In the supralapsarian model, the decree to damn particular individuals is coordinate to the decree to save the elect and is made without respect to the creatures as actually created and fallen. In the infralapsarian/sublapsarian model, the decree of reprobation is that of preterition, that is, it is God's decision to leave those who are already created and fallen in Adam in that state of sin and guilt in which they justly find themselves. See also decree, permissive and decree, efficient and infralapsarianism, sublapsarianism, and supralapsarianism and preterition.

restoration see apokatastasis

retributive justice see justice

Sabellianism antitrinitarian heresy named after Sabellius, a third-century proponent of modalism. Consequently, modalism is also called Sabellianism. See also modalism.

Semiarian see homoiousios

Semipelagiantsm so called because it represents a mediating position between Pelagianism and Augustinianism. Unlike Pelagianism, Semipelagianism does not argue that human moral powers remain unaffected by the fall. On the other hand, in contrast to Augustinianisrn, these powers are merely weakened; humans are weak though not dead in sin. Semi-pelagians affirm the need for our moral powers to be excited or stimulated by divine grace, but also stress the need for the human being to cooperate with grace when it is bestowed. Shedd classifies Arminianism and Roman Catholicism as Semipelagian systems. See also Pelagianism and synergism.

sempiternilas see a parte ante and a parte post

source of the deity see fons deitatis and fons trinitatis

source of the Trinity see fons deitatis and fons trinitatis

spiration see notae internae and notae externae sublapsarianism see infralapsarianism, sublapsarianism, and supralapsarianism

subsistantia an individual instance of an essence or substance. When rational substance is in view, a subsistence would be equivalent to a person. In trinitarian discussions subsistantia is equivalent to the Greek hypostasis, at least as this Greek term was used in the final form of the trinitarian formula. See also essentia and hypostasis and nature.

substans and substantia see essentia and homoousios and hypostasis supererogation literally a “superwork,” that is, work that goes above and beyond what is required.

supralapsarianism see infralapsarianism, sublap-sarianism, and supralapsarianism synergism from the Greek syn (together) and ergo (to work), the teaching that the human will cooperates with the grace of God in bringing about salvation. See also Semipelagianism.

theanthropos from the Greek theos (God) and anthropos (man). Jesus Christ is theanthropos (the God-man). The word theanthropos (the adjectival form is theanthropic) refers to the entire, concrete person of Christ—one person in two natures—rather than viewing the matter from one or the other of the natures in the abstract.

thelgma see will traducianism from the Latin ducere (to lead) and trans (across), a term that describes a theory of the soul’s propagation from parent to offspring. In the traducian model, the soul is propagated or communicated (i.e., “led across”) from parent to offspring together with the body in the normal process of procreation. The main alternative to traducianism is called creationism. In this theory, only the body of the offspring is conveyed directly through the parents. The soul is created directly by God and is implanted into the body thus propagated. Generally, the Reformed tradition tends to the creationist theory of the soul’s origin while Lutherans tend toward traducianism. Shedd is a decided traducian, and his position on this issue is at the forefront of his discussion of original sin. According to Shedd, the undifferentiated substance of the human race—both as to body and soul—was resident in Adam and Eve in toto prior to their procreating children. When Adam and Eve fell, the entire substance of humanity, being res-ident in them, fell as well. Following the fall, Adam and Eve propagated this now sinful substance— including both the bodily and psychical element—in the procreation of offspring. See also creationism and massa and poena vs. culpa.

transubstantiation Roman Catholic theory of the Eucharist. According to this doctrine, the bread is changed in its substance (transubstantiated) from being essentially bread to being essentially the body of Christ. Likewise, the substance of the wine changes from wine to the blood of Christ. Though the bread is no longer bread and the wine is no longer wine, the accidents of bread and wine remain. Thus, the taste, texture, smell, etc. of the elements remain unmodified even though the bread is actually (essen-tially) body and the wine actually (essentially) blood. See also accident.

trichometry see dichometry vs. trichometry

Trinity see economic Trinity and ontological Trinity ubiquity “everywhere-ness,” that is, “omnipresence.” The term ubiquity is generally reserved for use in describing the omnipresence of Christ’s human nature, as affirmed in the Lutheran Christology. Ubiquity is not the same as Christ’s presence in the Lord’s Supper in the Lutheran doctrine of real presence. Real presence is a special, sacramental presence of Christ’s body and blood connected only with the celebration of the Eucharist. At the same time, the general ubiquity of Christ’s humanity provides an explanation for the special sacramental presence of Christ’s humanity in the supper, as an argument from the greater to the lesser. That is, if Christ’s humanity is always present everywhere by virtue of the hypostatic union, then there is nothing to prohibit it from being specially present in the Lord’s Supper. See also communicatio idiomatum and real presence.

universalism used in at least two senses: (1) to identify the teaching that everyone ultimately will be saved and (2) in relation to atonement theory, to refer to the teaching that God intends Christ’s atonement to apply to all human beings, its failure to do so being thwarted only by unbelief. In this second sense, the doctrine of universal atonement contrasts with the Reformed (and Shedd's) position of particular redemption, in which God intends to apply the benefits of Christ's atonement only to the elect. See also apokatastasis.

universals "the property predicated of all the individuals of a certain sort or class" (Antony Flew, ed., A Dictionary of Philosophy [2d ed.; New York: St. Martin's, 1984], 360). For example, Fido, Rover, and Lassie are individuals who may all be classified by the universal "dog." The nature of universals is variously understood. According to the realist perspective, universals are real things that have extramental existence apart from the individual objects that exemplify them. In this model, universals exist prior to the individual objects that embody them; that is, they exist ante rem or before the thing. This is the view of Plato. Another view is proposed by Aristotle, who taught that universals are real but exist only in particular objects, that is, in re or in the thing. In this case the universal is the form of the thing. Aristotle's view is also called conceptualism. The third main option is that of nominalism. According to the nominalist, universals have no extramental existence whatever, but are merely names (nomina) applied to objects with common characteristics that are iden-tified by the abstractive powers of the mind. For the nominalist, the universal is not a real entity, either before the thing (ante rem) as in Plato or in the thing (in re) as in Aristotle. Rather, only particular objects have extramental existence, and the universal label is a creation of the mind applied after the fact, that is, post rem or after the thing. See also nominalism.

vindicative justice see justice

volitionary see will voluntary see will

voluntas see will

will used by Shedd of the human will, with some important distinctions, for which particular terms are employed. Shedd distinguishes between the voluntary and the volitionary. The voluntary refers to the inclination of the will in being oriented toward a particular end or goal. The volitionary, on the other hand, refers to the actual choices that are made. Shedd claims that the Latin voluntas and the Greek thelema, though both often translated by the word will, refer to the inclination. He also asserts that the Latin arbitrium, with its Greek counterpart boule, refers to the will in the sense of discreet choices. Shedd's distinction between inclining and choosing, employing the terms as noted, runs as a thread throughout his discussion of anthropology (the doctrine of man) and hamartiology (the doctrine of sin). For example, in Shedd's doctrine of regeneration, he argues that a person cannot change his or her incli-nation away from sin and toward holiness by exercising holy or moral volitions. Only God can set in motion a new fundamental inclination toward holiness, out of which truly holy volitions will flow.

Glossary 2: Biographical Entries

by Alan W. Gomes

Agasslz. Louis, in full Jean Louis Rodolphe (1807-73) nineteenth-century zoologist and geologist. Bom and educated in Switzerland, Agassiz was first professor of natural history in Neuchatel (1832-46) and subsequently professor of zoology at Harvard (1847-73). His published works include studies of fossilized fish and of glaciers. He was influenced by Platonic philosophy, teaching that the various plant and animal species first existed in the mind of God, which he subsequently actualized through special creative acts. His view of special creation was therefore at odds with Darwin's theories, and Shedd cites him often in combating Darwinism.

Baier, John William, also Johann Wilhelm (1647-95) orthodox Lutheran theologian. Baier studied philology and philosophy at Altdorf. He was professor of church history at Jena (1675-91) and later professor and rector at Halle (1692-94), the center of the pietist movement. His major work of theology was Compendium theologiae positivae (Compend of positive theology) (1686). He also wrote polemical works against the doctrine of purgatory, the Roman Catholic doctrine of baptism, and the Quakers.

Baur, Ferdinand Christian (1792-1860) founder of the Tubingen school of New Testament higher criticism. Baur was trained at Blaubeuren and Tubingen. A Lutheran, he was influenced by German idealism, Schleiermacher, and Hegel. He taught classics and theology at Blaubeuren seminary (1817-26) and became professor of New Testament and historical theology at Tubingen from 1826 until his death in 1860. His most well-known works include Paul the Apostle of Jesus Christ (2 vols., 1845) and Church History of the First Three Centuries (1878-79, posthumously published). The former work stresses the antithesis and conflict between the Jewish and Gentile wings of early Christianity, represented by Peter and Paul respectively. In the latter work he explains the first three centuries of the church in terms of political and social causes. He denied the authenticity of the Pauline epistles except for 1 and 2 Corinthians and Romans. Shedd criticizes him for his higher critical views and the naturalistic presuppositions that underlie them.

Bellarmine, Robert (1542-1621) perhaps the most prominent and influential Roman Catholic polemicist of the Counterreformation. Bellarmine studied in Rome, Modovi, and Padua, joining the Jesuits in 1560 and receiving the priesthood in 1570. He held professorships at Louvain (1570) and Rome (1576). He was made cardinal in 1599 and became arch-bishop of Capua in 1602. He was a tireless and consummate polemicist, who read widely the works of his Protestant adversaries. His main polemical work is Disputationes de controversiis christianae fidei adversus hujus temporis haereticos (Disputationsconcerning the controversies of the Christian faith against the heretics of this age) (3 vols., 1586-93). The Reformed and Lutheran Scholastic theologians attack him frequently in their own polemical writings. Bellarmine was also involved in the disputes surrounding the views of Galileo. He was canonized as a Catholic saint in 1930.

Beza, Theodore (1519-1605) Reformed theologian, contemporary of and successor to Calvin at Geneva. Beza studied under Melchior Wolmarat Orleans and then at Bourges. He went on to study law in Orleans (1535-39). He repudiated the Catholic faith and joined Calvin in Geneva in 1548. He was appointed professor of Greek at the Academy of Lausanne (1549-58) and became the first rector and professor at the new Geneva Academy (1559-95). He succeeded Calvin as the head of the Genevan church on the lat-ter's death in 1564. As a Greek scholar his Greek editions and Latin translations were used in the production of the Geneva Bible (1560) and the King James Version (1611). His Confession de la foi chre-tienne (Confession of the Christian faith)(1560) was an exposition of the Calvinistic theology. Some claim that Beza developed Calvin's views into a more rigid predestinarian system and cite his Tabula praedesti-nationis as illustrative. However, Richard Muller and others argue convincingly against this thesis.

Brentz orBrenz, Johann (1499-1570) Lutheran theologian. Brentz studied at Heidelberg under Oeco-lampadiusand then under Luther beginning in 1518. Brentz held the positions of preacher at the church of St. Michael in Schwabisch Hall (1522), provost of the Stiftskirche in Stuttgart (1553), and advisor to Duke Christopher of Wurttemberg (1553). His important works include*Syngramma suevicum* (1525), the Wurttemberg Confession (1552), and the Lutheran catechisms (1527, 1535). Brentz participated in the Colloquy of Marburg (1529). He also defended the doctrine of Christ's ubiquity against Beza and Bullinger.

Bull, George (1634-1710) Anglican theologian and historian. Educated at Exeter College, Oxford, Bull went on to hold the positions of rector of Sudding-ton(1659), archdeacon of Llandaff(1686), and even-tually bishop of St. David's in Wales(1705). One of his most important works is classic Defensio fidei nicaenae (Defense of the Nicene faith) (1685, with later additions), to which Shedd makes numerous references. In it Bull argued against the Jesuit Petavius by affirming the continuity between the ante-Nicene and post-Nicene fathers on the doctrine of the Trinity.

Butler, Joseph (1692-1752) Anglican theologian and philosopher. Butk'i studied at Oriel College. Oxford (1714). After rejecting Presbvterianism in 1714 he became an Anglican. Among other ecclesiastical positions he was bishop of Bristol (1738) and of Durham (1750). He was an important thinker in the development of natural theology and ethics. One of his most well-known works is Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature (1736), which combated the philosophy of Thomas Hobbes. In it he attacked rationalism/deism and affirmed supernatural revelation. Appended to his Analogy of Religion is an important work of ethics, On the Nature of Virtue, which, among other things, refuted hedonism. Shedd cites Butler approvingly at several points.

Calixtus or Calixt, Georg (1586-1656) Lutheran theologian of ecumenical (syncretistic) orientation. Calixtus received his education at Helmstedt. He became professor of theology at Helmstedt in 1614, a post he occupied until his death, and held Melanchthon's theology and irenic approach in high esteem. Calixtus became adept at languages and patristic theology. He traveled to other universities and became increasingly impressed with the great commonalities he perceived between the Calvinists, Lutherans, and Roman Catholics. In his Judicium de controversiis theologicis quae inter Lutheranos et Reformatos agitantur, et de mutua partium fraternitate atque tolerantia propter consensum in fundament is (Judgment concerning the theological controversies about which the Lutheran and Reformed argue, and concerning the mutual fraternity of the parties and tolerance on account of the agreement on the fundamentals) (1650), he argued that highly complex dogmatic systems presented barriers to Christian unity, and he proposed that the ecumenical creeds of the first five centuries could provide a basis for uniting all Christian bodies. Catholic and Protestant. The Apostles' Creed, in particular, contained the fundamentals necessary to salvation; all branches of Christendom could unite on this basis and then agree to disagree about everything else. His position, known as "syncretism," was opposed by Lutherans, Catholics, and Reformed alike. His fellow Lutheran Abraham Calovius opposed his teaching vigorously.

Calovius or Calov, Abraham (1612-86). Lutheran systematic, polemical, and biblical theologian. Calovius received his training at Konigsberg. He was successively appointed professor of theology (1650) and general superintendent (1652) at Wittenberg. He was a staunchly orthodox Lutheran of prodigious literary output. Among his many writings were the twelve-volume Systema locorum theologicorum (System of theological topics) (1655-77), a substantial work of Lutheran orthodox Scholasticism. In Biblia illttstrata he opposed the biblical exegesis of Armin-ian theologian Hugo Grotius. He also wrote thousands of pages against Socinianism, including Socini-anismusprofligatus (Socinianism overthrown) (1652) and Scripta anti-Sociniana (Anti-Socinian writings) (1677-84). He was also one of the main opponents of fellow Lutheran theologian Georg Calixtus, attacking vigorously the latter's program for unity based on a minimalist theology.

Charnock, Stephen (1628-80) Puritan pastor. Charnock was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. He was a pastor in London from 1660 to 1675. He is perhaps best known for his monumental On the Existence and Attributes of God (published posthumously in 1681).

Chemnitz, Martin (1522-86) Lutheran theologian. Chemnitz studied under Melanchthon at Wittenberg. He taught philosophy for a short time in Wittenberg (1553) and became preacher and coadjutor to the Lutheran superintendent of churches at Brunswick (1554-86). He wrote some important works defending Lutheran theology, including a defense of the doctrine of real presence (Repetitio sanae doctrinae de vera praesentia [Repetition of sound doctrine concerning the true presence]; 1561) and a refutation of the Council of Trent (Examen concilii tridentini [Examination of the Council of Trent]; 4 vols., 1565-73). He also wrote a systematic theology (Loci theologici; 1591) and a classic monograph on the two natures in Christ (De duabus naturis in christo [Concerning the two natures in Christ]; 1570). Chemnitz was involved significantly in the clarification of Lutheran doctrine that took place between the death of Luther (1546) and the Formula of Concord (1577).

Clarke, Samuel (1675-1729) Anglican theologian. Clarke received his education at Caius College, Cam-bridge, where he formed a close association with Isaac Newton. He held the positions of chaplain to the bishop of Norwich (1698), chaplain to Queen Anne (1706), rector of St. Benet's (1706), and rector of St. James's (1709). Clarke employed a mathematical approach to demonstrating God's existence and attributes (Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God; 1705) and again in establishing the knowledge of moral principles apart from faith (Discourse concerning the Unchangeable Obligations of Natural Religion; 1706). His Scripture-Doctrine of the Trinity (1712) raised suspicion of Arian and Unitarian leanings.

Cudworth, Ralph (1617-88) English theologian and philosopher. Cudworth was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge (1639). He became professor of Hebrew (1645); rector of North Cadbury, Somerset (1650); and head of Christ's College, Cambridge (1654). One of his most important works is True Intellectual System of the Universe, part 1: Wherein All the Reason and Philosophy of Atheism Is Confuted and Its Impossibility Demonstrated (1678). In this work he argued for the Christian religion as the only real source of knowledge, forthe eternal reality of moral ideas, and forthe reality of moral freedom and responsibility.He was deeply influenced by Platonic philosophy and is one ofthe best known representatives ofthe so-called Cambridge Platonists.He opposed not only the atheism of Thomas Hobbes but also reacted against Puritanism, Calvinism, and religious dogmatism.

de Moor, Bernhard (1710-ca. 1765) Reformed theologian. De Moor studied at Leiden (1726-31) and later served in pastorates at Ingen and Brock. His professorships included Franeker and Leiden. His major work is a six-volume commentary on the theological compendium of Johann van Marck.

Dorner, Isaak August (1809-84) Lutheran theologian and church historian. Dorner studied philosophy and theology at Tubingen (1827-32). He taught theology at Tubingen (1838), Kiel (1839), Konigsberg (1843), Bonn (1847), Gottingen (1853), and Berlin (1862-84). Among his more important works are History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ (5 vols., 1846-50), History of Protestant Theology (2 vols., 1867), and System of Christian Doctrine (4 vols., 1879-81).

Fichte, Johann Gottlieb (1762-1814) German pantheist philosopher. Fitche studied Protestant theology at Jena (1780) and Leipzig (1781 -84). He became professor of philosophy at Jena in 1794, but was dismissed in 1799 on the grounds of holding atheistic beliefs. He then became professor of philosophy at Berlin from 1809 to 1814. A prolific writer, Fitche advanced an idealist philosophy. He was significantly influenced by Kant and saw true religion in terms of “joyously doing right.” He also held that when morality became the norm in society, the church would no longer be necessary.

Gerhard, Johann (1582-1637) Lutheran theologian. Influenced in his youth by Lutheran pastor Johann Amdt, Gerhard studied medicine at Wittenberg and theology at Jena and Marburg. He was the superintendent of churches in Heldburg and Coburg and served as professor of theology at Jena from 1616 to 1637. His Loci theologici (9 vols., 1610-22) was an important work of Lutheran Scholastic theology and became the standard compendium of Lutheran orthodoxy. He also wrote anti-Catholic and devotional literature. He is considered one of the leading Lutheran theologians of all time.

Grotius, Hugo (1583-1645) Dutch jurist, Arminian theologian, statesman, and biblical commentator. Grotius early showed literary promise and was considered by many to be a prodigy. In 1622 he wrote one of the first works of modem “evidentialist” apologetics, De veritate religionis christianae (Concerning the truth of the Christian religion). He also developed the “governmental theory” of the atonement, propounded in Defensio fidei catholicae de satisfactione christi (A defense of the Catholic faith concerning the satisfaction of Christ) (1617), written against an earlier work on the atonement by Faustus Socinus. According to the governmental theory, God uses the deathof Christto serveas a penal example. Grotius also wrote important commentaries on both the Old and New Testament. Known as the father of international law, his most well-known legal writing is De jure belli ac pacis (Concerning the law of war and of peace) (1625).

Haeckel, Ernst Heinrich Philipp August (1834-1919) Darwinian biologist. Haeckel served as the director of the Zoological Institute and associate professor at Jena (1862) and then as professor of biology at Jena (1865-1919). His main contribution was as a popularizer of Darwinian ideas, including the theory that organic life sprang from inorganic materials. In Die Weltrdtsel (Riddle of the universe) (1899) he applied the principles of Darwinian evolution to religious and philosophical issues. Theologically, he denied the doctrines of a personal God, free will, and personal immortality. Though his writings enjoyed some popularity with lay persons, his scientific colleagues were less enthusiastic.

Holla/ or Hollatz or Hollatius, David (1648-1713) Lutheran theologian of the late Protestant Scholastic period. Educated at Erfurt and Wittenberg, Hol-laz held several preaching and pastoral posts in Germany. He was perhaps best known for Examen theologicum acromaticum (An advanced theological examination) (1707). Written in the traditional quaes-tio format, this work is among the last Lutheran Scholastic orthodox systems produced.

Hooker, Richard (1554-1600) Anglican theologian. After graduating from Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1577, Hooker served as a fellow of the same college (1577), master of Temple Church (1585-91), and vicar of Bishopsbourne, near Canterbury (1595). Considered to be one of the most important Anglican theologians, Hooker's eight-volume Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (1593-1662; three volumes posthumously) defended the Anglican state church on the grounds of natural law. From this perspective he criticized both Puritans (who argued their case from Scripture) and Roman Catholics (who argued from tradition). Besides his argument from natural law, he believed that the authority of the Anglican church was supported in the Bible and in tradition as well. Certain of his political theories influenced John Locke.

Hopkins, Samuel (1721-1803) influential Edwards-ean Congregational pastor and theologian. Hopkins studied theology under Jonathan Edwards in Northampton, Massachusetts. Hopkins served as a pastor for Congregational churches in Massachusetts and Rhode Island. His System of Doctrines Contained in Divine Revelation (1793) shows the considerable impact of Edwards's thought.

Howe, John (1630-1705) Puritan theologian. Howe received his education at Oxford. He served various chaplaincies (including that of domestic chaplain for Oliver Cromwell) and also copastoreda Presbyterian congregation in London. Howe strove to achieve unity between Presbyterians and Congregationalists. Shedd makes several references to Howe's Redeemer's Tears Wept over Lost Souls (1684).

Hutteror Hutterus, Leonard (1563-1616) Lutheran Scholastic theologian. Hutter studied at Strassburg, Leipzig, Heidelberg, and Jena, receiving a doctorate in theology from the latter institution in 1594. He became professor of theology at Wittenberg in 1596. His principal work is Compendium locorum tlteo-logicorum ex scriptura sacra et libro concordiae collection (Compendium of theological topics gathered from holy Scripture and from the Book of Concord) (1610), which became the official textbook of theology in Saxony. He enlarged this compendium in 1619 under the title Loci communes theologici (Common topics of theology). He wrote numerous other dogmatic and polemical works, expounding upon and defending the Lutheran symbols, including the Formula of Concord.

John of Damascus (ca. 675-749) Eastern Orthodox theologian. John of Damascus was a monk/priest at Mar Sabas, near Jerusalem. Known as the "Golden Orator," he is perhaps the greatest Eastern Orthodox theologian of all time. His Exposition of the Orthodox Faith remains the classic of Greek theology. Of particular interest to Shedd is his doctrine of the Trinity, including his teaching on circumincession, and his Christology, including the view that Christ's human nature subsists enhypostatically in the divine person of the Logos (see anhypostasis and enhypostasis in glossary 1). In addition, John contended earnestly for the veneration of images in the so-called iconoclastic controversy of the eighth century. Other important themes in his writings include the sacraments, Mariology, and free will.

Junius, Franciscus (1545-1602) Reformed theologian. Junius studied first law and then theology at Geneva. Junius filled two preaching posts before becoming professor at Neustadt in 1582. He went on to become professor at Heidelberg (1584) and Leiden (1592). His Parallela sacra (1588), which studied Old Testament quotations found in the New Testament, became a significant resource for subsequent exegetical work. His polemical works include Ani-madversiones (Observations) (1602), which attacked the Roman Catholic theology as represented by Bellarmine, and Defensio catholicae doctrinae (Defense of catholic doctrine) (1592), which refuted antitrini-tarianism.

Keckermann, Bartholomaeus (1571-1609) Reformed theologian. Keckermann received his education at Wittenberg, Leipzig, and Heidelberg. He was professor of Hebrew at Heidelberg and then served as rector and professor of philosophy at the Reformed Gymnasium in Danzig from 1601 until his death in 1609. His most important theological work is the three-volume Systema sacrosanctae theologiae (System of sacred theology).

Leydecker, Melchior (1642-1721) Reformed theologian. Leydecker served as professor of theology at Utrecht from 1679 until his death in 1721. He is one of the later representatives of Reformed Scholastic orthodoxy. He wrote against Cartesian philosophy and opposed the federal theology of Cocceius. He also wrote a commentary on the Heidelberg Catechism.

Marcion (died ca. 160) wealthy shipowner and heretic. Marcion went to Rome and was excommu-nicated from the church for his heterodox teachings. He formed his own church. His theology is given in Antitheses, which is no longer extant. However, his views can be discerned from Tertullian's five-book refutation of them. Though not technically a Gnostic, Marcion's theology incorporates the gnosticlike idea that attributes the Old Testament law to a demi-urge/Creator God. The demiurge is different from the New Testament God of Jesus Christ, who is a God of love. In keeping with his idea that the God of the Jewish Scriptures is an inferior deity, Marcion accepted only ten letters of Paul and an edited form of the Gospel of Luke. It was in response to challenges such as Marcion's that the church carefully defined the canon of Scripture.

Marck or Marckius, Johann van (1655-1731) Reformed theologian. Educated at Leiden, van Marck served as professor of theology at Franeker (1676), Groningen (1682), and Leiden (1690). He then taught church history at Leiden from 1720 until his death in 1731. His works include an exegetical commentary on the Apocalypse (1689) and an important compend of theology written in 1722 (Compendium theologiae christianae didactico-elencticum [Didactic-elenctic compend of Christian theology]).

Maresius or Desmartes, Samuel (1599-1673) Refoimed theologian. Maresius received his education at the school of Saumur under Gomarus and then at Geneva. After serving various pastoral and professorial posts he became professor at Groningen in 1643, where he established his reputation as a prominent theologian. A prolific writer, he penned more than one hundred books. His Systema theologiae (1645) became a popular textbook. Most of his works are polemical in orientation, opposing especially Roman Catholics, Socinians, Arminians, Amyraldians, and Chiliasts.

Mastricht, Petrus van (1630-1706) Reformed theologian. After studying at Duisburg and Utrecht, van Mastricht became a pastor and then professor of oriental languages and practical theology at Frankfurt-on-Oder. He became professor of theology at Duisburg (1669) and filled the position vacated by Voetius as professor of theology at Utrecht (1677). His most important work is Theoretico-practica theologia (A theoretical-practical theology) (1714).

Muller, Julius (1801 -78) Lutheran theologian. Muller studied law, philosophy, and medicine at Breslau (1819), law at Gottingen (1820), and then theology at Breslau and Berlin. He was professor of dogmatics at Marburg (1835) and professor of theology at Halle (1839). In his well-known Christian Doctrine of Sin (2 vols., 1839^4), Muller postulates the extratem poral fall of each individual prior to their creation. Shedd understandshim to teach“not an antetem-poral but a supratemporalstate, in whichthe soul existedand the originof sin occurred. The fall of man was not in a time before time,but is timeless” (p. 430). In certain respects his theologywas more conservative than many of his contemporaries, as shown by his insistence on the necessity of atonement. Together with Dorner he was considered to be one of the greatest systematic theologians of his day.

Neander, August Wilhelm (1789-1850) Lutheran church historian. Neander studied under Schleiermacher at Halle and then under Gottlieb Planck at Gottingen. He completed his dissertation in church history at Heidelberg in 1811. He taught church history at Hamburg (1809), Heidelberg (1812), and Berlin (1813-50). His General History of the Christian Religion and Church (6 vols., 1825-52) became a standard work. Neander is regarded by many as the father of modern church historiography.

Odo of Tournai or Odo of Cambrai (10501113) Roman Catholic bishop and theologian. Odo was a teacher and director of the school at Tournai (1087), became a Benedictine monk and abbot of Tournai (1095), and eventually was appointed bishop of Cambray (1105). Among his most important works is On Original Sin, which presents a decidedly tra-ducian position and which Shedd cites at considerable length.

Osiander, Andreas (1498-1552) Lutheran theologian. Receiving his education at Leipzig, Altenburg, and Ingolstadt, he was ordained a Roman Catholic priest in 1520 and then became professor of theology at Konigsberg in 1539. He was involved in some important events of the Lutheran Reformation, including the Colloquy of Marburg (1529) and the Augsburg Diet (1530). He was also one of the signatories to the Smalcald Articles (1537). However, in his later work on justification (De justifications, 1550) he opposed Luther’s position, teaching instead that justification occurs in view of the renovation that takes place through the indwelling of Christ in the believer. Regarding an overemphasis on forensic jus-tification to be a teaching “as cold as ice,” he made the inward renewal of the believer the cause and not the effect of justification. The Formula of Concord (1577) explicitly rejected Osiander’s position.

Owen, John (1616-83) Puritan theologian. Educated at Queen’s College, Oxford, Owen held a variety of ecclesiastical posts, depending on the political cir-cumstances at the time. He served as vice chancellor of Oxford (1652-57) and was pastor of a congregational church in London from 1660 to 1680. He accompanied Oliver Cromwell’s army to Scotlandand Ireland and played a key role in English nonconformity under Cromwell’s rule. Arguably one ofthe most brilliant of Puritan theologians, Owen wrote numerous weighty treatisesthat canvass theirsub-jects from every conceivable angle: Display of Armini-anism, Vindicae evangelicae (Vindicationof the gospel [against Socinianism and GrotianismJ), Death of Death in the Death of Christ (one of his main works on the atonement), Divine Original of the Scriptures (an apologetic work for the truth of Christianity), and a monumental commentary on the Book of Hebrews.

Paley, William (1743-1805) Anglican theologian. Paley studied mathematics at Cambridge. He was ordained to the Anglican priesthood in 1767 and held a number of academic and ecclesiastical posts, including rector of Musgrave and archdeacon of Carlisle. He was one of the greatest of English evi-dential apologists. His Horae paulinae (1790) presents arguments for the historicity of the New Testament by comparing Paul’s epistles with the Book of Acts. His View of the Evidences of Christianity (1794) was required reading for entrance into Cambridge until the twentieth century. His well-known Natural Theology; or, Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity (1802) exploits the argument from design, using the analogy of a watch that requires a belief in a watchmaker. In some of his theological opinions he is said to have been sympathetic toward Unitarianism.

Pearson, John (1613-86) Anglican bishop and theologian. Educated at Cambridge, Pearson held, among other posts, master of Trinity College (1662) and became bishop of Chester (1673). His Exposition of the Creed (1659) shows profound acquaintance with the early fathers.

Petau or Petavius, Denis, also Dionysius (15831652) Jesuit theologian and church historian. Petavius studied Greek at Orleans and then at Paris. He taught theology at Paris, where he also served as librarian. His five-volume De theologicis dogmatibus (Concerning theological dogmas) (1644-50) was a significant work in historical theology. Unlike his contemporaries, he paid careful attention to and accepted the notion of the development of doctrine. He is called the father of the history of dogma.

Peter Lombard (1100-1160) Roman Catholic theologian. Peter Lombard studied both under Peter Abelard and Bernard of Clairvaux. He taught theology at the Cathedral School of Notre Dame in Paris (1136-50) and became bishop of Paris in 1159. His Four Books of Sentences (1148-51) became the standard textbook of theology throughout much of the later middle ages.

Piscator, Johannes (1546-1625) Reformed theologian. Trained at Tubingen, Piscator held professorships at Strassburg, Heidelberg, and Neustadt-on-Haardt and became rector at Moers. He converted from Lutheranism to the Reformed faith. He produced a translation of the Bible, wrote commentaries, and composed numerous doctrinal and polemical treatises. He is particularly associated with his controversial denial that Christ's "active obedience" is imputed to believers, arguing instead that Christ's active obedience was required for himself, being a man, and therefore could not be imputed to anyone else. He further contended that if Christ's active obedience could be imputed to us, then this would obvi ate any need for our own obedience, which is clearly false. Piscator eventually embraced Arminian views. His teaching was condemned at the synods of Gap (1603) and Rochelle (1607).

Placaeus or de la Place or Laplace, Josua, also Josue (1596-1665) Reformed theologian. Placaeus studied at Saumur under Cameron. He served as pastor at Nantes (1625) and was professor of theology at Saumur from 1633 until his death. He is especially known for his controversial teaching of a mediate imputation of Adam's sin. According to this theory, Adam's actual sin is not imputed to his posterity. Rather, only the inherent corruption of nature is mediated to his offspring. His view was condemned at the Synod of Charenton (1644), and his doctrine of mediate imputation, together with other tenets of the school of Saumur, was rejected in the Helvetic Consensus Formula (1675).

Polanus von Polansdorf, Amandus (1561-1610) Reformed theologian. After studying at Tubingen, Basel, and Geneva, Polanus became professor of Old Testament at Basel (1596) and later dean of the theological faculty (1598-1609). His important theological works include Partitiones theologicae (Theological divisions) (1590-96) and Syntagma theologiae christianae (Book of Christian theology) (1609).

Quenstedt, Johann Andreas (1617-88) Lutheran theologian. Quenstedt studied at Helmstedt and received his doctorate in theology at Wittenberg in 1650. Among other positions held, he served as rector of Wittenberg for four terms and was senior professor of theology at Wittenberg. His Theologica didactica-polemica (Didactic-polemical theology) (1685) was an important compendium of Scholastic Lutheran dogmatics.

Rivet or Rivet us Andre, also Andreas (1572-1651) Reformed theologian. Among other positions held, Rivetus was professor of theology at Leiden (1620), tutor to William II (son of Frederick Henry) (1632), and curator at Breda (1646-51). He wrote a number of polemical, exegetical, dogmatic, and devotional works. His Synopsis purioris theologiae (Synopsis of a purer theology) was an important work of Reformed theology. He also did considerable work in Old Testament exegesis.

Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von (1775— 1854) German idealist philosopher. Schelling stud-ied theology at Tubingen and also attended lectures at Leipzig. He became professor of philosophy at Jena in 1798, but left in 1803 after a dispute with Johann Fichte. Other posts included professor of philosophy at Wurzburg (1803-6), general secretary of the Academy of Plastic Arts in Munich (1806-41), lecturer at Erlangen (1820-27), and professor of philosophy at Berlin (1841). A colleague of both Hegel and Fichte, he had a falling out with both. Schelling's views were in flux throughout his teaching career. He attempted to synthesize elements of Hegel's and Fichte's idealistic philosophies. Schelling later focused his attention of questions of human freedom. His work received less notice than that of Hegel, whose philosophy Schelling was the first to analyze.

Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst (1768-1834) liberal theologian. Schleiermacher was educated at pietistically oriented institutions, including the Moravian college at Niesky and seminary at Barby (1785-87) and Halle (1787-94). Schleiermacher held various pastoral posts, including pastor of Trinity Church in Berlin (1809). In addition to holding an assistant professorship in theology at Halle, he served as professor of theology at Berlin (1810-34). Included among his more well-known works are On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers (1799) and Christian Faith (1821). According to Schleiermacher, the essence of religion is "feeling," specifically "a sense of the infinite in the finite." It isa feeling of "absolute dependence" or "God-consciousness." He denied the doctrine of original sin and taught that sin is God-forgetfulness. Salvation is found in Christ's example as a source of God-consciousness. Because of his emphasis on God's immanence in human experience as the authoritative source in matters of religion, he is called the father of liberal Protestant theology.

Socinus or Sozzini, Faustus (1539-1604) Unitarian theologian. Socinus was a native Italian, born in Sienna. Strongly influenced by his uncle Laelius (Lelio), he early on rejected the doctrine of the Trinity, the deity of Christ, and the immortality of the soul. Socinus also came to deny God's foreknowledge of the free choices of his moral creatures. In spite of this he continued in outward obedience to Roman Catholicism while he remained in Italy. While serving at the court in Florence he wrote an important work of apologetics entitled De sacrae scripturae auc-toritate (Concerning the authority of holy Scripture) (1570), which argued in favor of the biblical record based on its firm historical foundations. On the death of his Italian patron he traveled to Basel, where he engaged in theological discussions and debates. At the end of this time he wrote what is probably his most well-known work, De Jesu Christo servatore (Concerning Jesus Christ the Savior) (1578). This work denied the doctrine of satisfaction, teaching instead that Christ saves us by providing an example for us to imitate. Shedd cites this treatise several times in his section on the atonement. Socinus eventually traveled to Poland, becoming the main theological leader of the Unitarian party there.

StUlingfleet, Edward (1635-99) Anglican bishop and theologian. Receiving his education at St. John's College, Cambridge, Stillingfleet held a number of ecclesiastical posts, eventually becoming bishop of Worcester in 1689. His Origines sacrae (1662) is an apology for the authority of Scripture.

Strauss, David Friedrich (1808-74) nominal Lutheran/ Hegelian theologian. Strauss studied under F. C. Baur at Blaubeuren and then at Tubingen (1825), where he was influenced by the thought of Schleiermacher and Hegel. He studied briefly at Berlin, where he became thoroughly Hegelian in his thinking. Strauss served as tutor and lecturer at Tubingen and worked as a freelance writer.He is especially known for Life of Jesus Critically Examined (1835-36), which took a mythical approach to the Gospel accounts and denied their historicity. He also wrote Christ of Faith and the Jesus of History (1865), in which he attempted to sever the historical Jesus from the Christ of faith, in opposition to Schleiermacher.

Taylor, Jeremy (1613-67) Anglican bishop. Taylor studied at Cambridge, was ordained in 1633, and made a doctor of divinity by the decree of Charles I in 1643. Taylor held a number of academic and ecclesiastical posts, becoming bishop of Down and Connor and vice chancellor of Dublin in 1660. Taylor was anti-Presbyterian and also anti-Roman Catholic. He produced two classic devotional works: Rule and Exercise of Holy Living (1650) and Rule and Exercise of Holy Dying (1651). In his Unum necessarium (One thing necessary) (1655) he minimized the doctrine of original sin and was for that reason considered by some to be a Pelagian.

Twesten, August Detlev Christian (1789-1876) Lutheran theologian. Twesten was trained at Kiel (1808-10) and Berlin (1810-11), where he was influenced by Schleiermacher. He became associate professor of philosophy and theology at Kiel in 1814 and professor of dogmatics and New Testament at Berlin in 1835. He wrote a textbook on logic and a supplement to Schleiermacher's theology.

Ii sinus Zacharias (1534-83) Reformed theologian. Ursinus studied under Philip Melanchthon at Wittenberg and then under Calvin at Geneva. He served as professor of theology and head of Collegium Sapi-entiae, Heidelberg (1561) and then as professor at Neustadt-on-Hardt (1576-83). He is best known for working on the Heidelberg Catechism (1563) with Caspar Olevianus. He also wrote a systematic theology (Summa theologica) and a critique of the Formula of Concord (Admonitio Christiana).

Ussher, James (1581-1656) Irish Episcopal archbishop and historian. Ussher attended Trinity Col-lege in Dublin and was ordained in 1601. Among the offices he held were professor of divinity at Dublin(1607) and archbishop of Armagh (1625-40). Ussher is best known for his chronology, which dates the creation of the world to 4004B.C However, he also wrote other important historical and exegetical works, including Principles of the Christian Religion (1644) and Body ofDivinitie (1645).

Waterland, Daniel (1683-1740) Anglican theologian. Trained at Magdalene College, Cambridge, Water-land held various ecclesiastical and academic posts, becoming archdeacon of Middlesex in 1730. Water-land was a controversialist and a vigorous opponent ol antitrinitarian opinions. His Vindication of Christ's Divinity (1719) sought to counteract the writings of Samuel Clarke, which showed Arian/Unitarian tendencies. His Eight Sermons in Defence of the Divinity of Our Lord Jesus Christ (1720) was his most popular work. In it, he argued that Christ's divinity did not compromise the unity of God.

Watson, Richard (1781-1833) Wesleyan/Arminian theologian. Watson was a traveling Methodist preacher. His Theological Institutes (1823) argued for the Arminian view of predestination and universal atonement. This work is the first formal theological treatment of Wesley's thought and became a standard textbook in the Methodist church.

Wellhausen, Julius (1844-1918) Lutheran Old Testament scholar. Wellhausen received his training at Gottingen under Old Testament theologian and orientalist H. G. A. Ewald. Among other positions held, he served as professor of Semitics at Marburg (1885-92) and Gottingen (1892-1913). He is especially known for his development of the so-called doc-umentary hypothesis of the Pentateuch. According to this theory, the Pentateuch showed the evolution of the Hebrew religion, as evidenced by four main sources of material found in the text, denominated by the letters J (i.e., Jahwist), E(Elohist), D(Deutero-nomic), and P (Priestly). The documentary hypothesis held sway in Old Testament studies until around the 1930s. Though numerous scholars have shown its deficiencies, it is still held in various forms by some scholars.

Wits or Witsius, Hermann, also Hermannus (16361708) Reformed theologian. Witsius received his training at Utrecht and Groningen. In addition to a preaching ministry, he served as professor at Franeker (1675), Utrecht (1680), and Leiden (1698-1707). His most significant work is Economy of the Covenants between God and Man (1677), an important work of Reformed federalist (covenant) theology. He also wrote an exposition on the Apostles' Creed (1681).

Zanchi or Zanchius, Girolamo (1516-90) Reformed theologian. Zanchi was a Roman Catholic of the Augustinian order who later converted to the Reformed faith. He studied linguistics, philosophy, Scholastic theology, and the church fathers. He was influenced by Peter Martyr and by the writings of Melanchthon and Bullinger. He also visited Calvin in Geneva in 1551. Among the professorships he held as a Protestant were that of Old Testament at Strasbourg, of dogmatics at Heidelberg (where he was Ursinus's successor), and of theology at Neustadt. Among his important works is De religione Christiana fides (1585), a detailed confession of the Christian faith. Shedd cites Zanchi's writing on predestination numerous times.

General Index

a posteriori
a priori ab extra movement
ab intra movement
Abelard ability Abraham's bosom Abrahamic covenant absolute absolute attributes absolute being absolute idea absolute merit acceptance acceptation n. acceptilation accidents active attributes active obedience actual justification actual sin
Adam (and Eve)
    creation disobedience external sin fall finiteness as first priest first sin holines immoratal body internal sin probation adoption adoption controversy
Aepinus n.
Aeschvlus affections afflatus
    Agassiz, Louis

ages agnosticism Aicuin
Alexander the Great Alexander, Archibald
Alexander. J. A.
Alexandrine school
Alford, Henry ambition
Ambrose
Amesius
Ammonius
Amphilochius Anabaptists
analogical reasoning
Anaxagoras
Andover Seminary
angel of the Lord angels election fallen as sexless anger animal soul animal substance animals consciousness
    divine benevolence toward immortality
    and providence suffering of volition of annihilationism anno domini Anointed One Anselm
    on angels
    on atonement on creation
    on creation of soul
    on decrees on freedom on happiness on heaven
    on impeccability of Christ
    on omnipresence on ontological argument
    on power
    on satisfaction on sin

on Trinity on volition
on will antecedent inspiration antecedent necessity antecedents and consequents anthropology anthropomorphism
anthropotheistic person Antilegomena
Antiochian school
Antoninus
Apocrypha
Apollinarianism
Apollinaris apologetics apostasy apostles Apostles'Creed approbation
Aquileian Creed Aquinas
on cosmological argument
on creation of soul
on descent into hell
on eternity
on final judgment
on free will
on incarnation
on partiality on potentiality on reconciliation on resurrection
on sin
on theological method
on Trinity
on will Argyll, George Douglas Campbell
Arianism
see also English Arianism Aristotle
Arius
Arminian Articles
Arminianism
Articles of the Congregational Union of England and Wales Asclepiades
aseity see God: self-existence assent assurance of faith Assyria astronomy

Athanasian Creed
Athanasius atheism Athenaeus Athenagoras atonement
see also personal atonement; sacrifices; vicarious atonement application of and divine justice and divine mercy duty to trust in it efficiency extent of
and faith moral theories of as objective
in Old Testament
and redemption
as subjective as suffering sufficiency universal offer value of Augsburg Confession
Augustine on Adam and Eve
on angels
on antiquity of man
on atonement
on chiliasm on constitution of man
on creation
on decree
on descent into hell
on divine attributes
on divine essence on divine will on effectual calling on election
on endless punishment
on eternity
on fall
on Father
on final judgment

on first sin
on foreknowledge
on freedom
on generation and procession on hades
on heaven and earth
on holiness
on human nature
on immortalitv of the soul on impeccabilitv of Christ on imputation
on incarnation
on inclination on inerrancy on intermediate state on language
on Lord’s Supper
on love of God
on moral necessity on omnipotence
on omnipresence
on ontological argument
on original sin1
on pagan virtue on paradise on personality on power
on preexistence of soul on preterition 359-
psychology
on punishment
on regeneration
on resurrection
on reward
on salvation on sanctification
on sin
on Son
on soul
on traducianism
on Trinity on union with Adam
on will Augustinianism
Aurelius, Marcus authenticity avarice axiomatic truth
Babylon

Babvlonian captivity
Bacon, Francis
Baer.C. E. von Baier. John William baptism
    mode of and regeneration and salvation
baptismal formula baptismal regeneration barbarism
Barnabas
Basil
Basilides
Bates, William
Baumgarten, S. J.
Baumgarten-Crusius, L.
Baur, F. C.
Baxter, Richard
Beccaria, Cesare
Bede
Beecher, Henrv Ward
being being in general Belgic Confession belief Bell, Charles Bellarmine, Robert benedictions benevolence
Bengel, Johann Albert
Bentham, Jeremy
Bentley, Richard
Berkeley, George Bernard best possible universe
Bethlehem
Bey, Brugsch
Bey, Mariette
Beza, Theodore Bible apparent errors authenticity canonicity chronology credibility
    divine authorship endorses ontological argument human element

implies cosmological argument inerrancy infallibility inspiration
interpretative errors
as principium cognoscendi
and sanctification
as self-rectifying on thoughts and language on trinitarian ontology biblical chronology biblical theology
bibliology
Blackstone, William Bleek, Friedrich blessedness of heaven of immortal soul of righteous blessing blindness blood of Christ blood of God
Blumenbach, Johann Friedrich body mortal vs. immortal transformed at resurrection
bodv and soul
Boethius
Bohemian Confession
Bonaventura bondage bondage of the will Bowden, Henry Warner
Boyle, Robert
Brainerd, David
Brick Church (New York City)
Briggs, Charles
Bruno, Giordano
Bucer, Martin
Buchanan, James
Buddhism
Bull, George
Bullinger, Heinrich Bunvan, John burial
Burnet. Gilbert
Butler, Frances Kemble

Butler, Joseph
Byron
Cain and Abel calamity Calixtus. George
Calovius, Abraham
Calvin, John
as sublapsarian on Adam’s probation
on atonement
bibliology
on common and special grace on creationism on culpability
on decree
on descent into hell
on divine attributes
on election
on faith
on Father on forgiveness
on freedom
on God as author of sin on good works on heaven
on hell on image of God
on incarnation
on infant baptism
on knowledge of God
on Lord’s Supper
on love of God
on moral argument
on moral necessity
on original sin
on preterition
on regeneration
on resurrection
on reward
on salvation in Old Testament on sin
on Son on soul-sleep on suffering on temptation
on the church
on theological method
on Trinity

on will Calvinism
Campbell, McLeod
canonicity
Carlyle, Thomas carnal mind Cartesianism catholic sensibility causality cause Celsus certainty
Chalcedon
Chalmers, Thomas chance change
Channing, William Ellery charity
Charles Mattel
Chamock, Stephen on Christ's satisfaction onconcursus
on decree
on election
on eternity on evolution
on fall
on first sin on goodness on holiness
on immutability
on incarnation
on knowledge of God
on prayer
on preterition
on purgatory
on regeneration
on sin
and traducianism
on will on wrath of God chastisement chemistry
Chemnitz, Martin childhood, sinfulness of children of Satan chiliasm choice Christ
Christendom

Christian brotherhood
Christlieb, Theodore Christology
Chrysostom church catholicity and election
and prophethood of Jesus church fathers see patristics church history church membership
Church of England Cicero circumcision civil affections civilization
Clarke, Samuel
Claudienus of Vienne
Clement of Alexandria
Clement of Rome
Clericus Cloppenburg. Johannes coessential cognition cognitive attributes
Coleridge, Samuel Tavlor
Collins, Anthony commercial justice common call common grace communicable attributes communication of essence communication of properties commutative justice compassion completeness compulsion
concomitant inspiration concupiscence concurrence concursus condemnation condescension conditional decrees conditional election conditional immortality conditioned knowledge Confucianism
Congregationalism conscience conviction of and retribution consciousness see also God-consciousness; self-consciousness consequent inspiration conservation of energy Constantinople Creed

consubstantiality consubstantiation contingency contradiction conversion
Conybeare
Copernicus
correction “correlation of forces” corruption cosmological argument Council of Alexandria
Council of Carthage
Council of Ferrara-Florence Council of Florence
Council of Hippo
Council of Nicea
Council of Toledo Council of Trent covenant between Father and Son
and sanctification
covenant of grace covenant of redemption covenant of works
covering over Crawford, Thomas J. creation beginning ex nihilo fiats Genesis account and mercy
as optional secondary sense as self-sustaining and Son
creationism (soul)
credibility
Crellius, John crucifixion
Cudworth, Ralph

culpability
Cumberland Presbyterian Confession
Cunningham, William
Cyprian
Cyril of Alexandria
Cyril of Jerusalem
Dabnev, R. L. damnation
Dana, D. F.
Dante darkness
Darwin, Charles Darwinism
Davidson, Samuel
Davies, John
Davies, Samuel
Dawson, J. W. day of judgment
De Moor, Bemhard dead faith death
    as consequence of sin and disembodiment and fall death to sin debt Decalogue
declarative justification decree and divine desire as eternal as “horrible”
    and human freedom as immutable
    as unconditional
    as universal wisdom deduction deism Delitzsch, F. J. demerit Democritus Demosthenes depravity
derivation of essence Descartes, Rene descent into hell desire despair determinism

DeWitt.John dictation
Didymus of Alexandria diligence
Dillmann, C. F. A.
Diodore of Tarsus
Diogenes Laertius disapprobation discipline discretion, years diseases
disembodied state see also intermediate state disobedience disposition distinction distributive justice
divine attributes classification and person relation to each other divine essence communication of and persons and suffering unity of divine nature
divine plenitude divine substance and divine person divinity
Docetists
Dodderlein, Johann Christoph dogma
Dogmatic Theology (Shedd) historical sensibilities literary quality philosophical framework Scriptural character speculative character theological influences theological shape
Domer, Isaak August double predestination doubt doxologies Drummond, Henry drunkenness dualism Duns Scotus

duration dust duty Dwight, Timothy earth “eating Christ”
Ebionitism
Ebrard, J. H. A. ecclesiology ecumenical sensibility
Eden
Edersheim, Alfred Edwards, Jonathan
    on Adam's sin
    on affections
    on atonement
    on being in general
    on culpability
    on endless punishment
    on eternity
    on freedom
    on holiness
    on human nature
    on impeccability of Christ
    on inability
    on incarnation
    on justification on moral desires on natural ability and inability on ontological argument
    on original sin
    on preterition
    on regeneration
    on sin
    on soul
    on virtue
    on will Edwards, Jonathan, Jr. effectual call efficacious decrees efficient causes egotism Egypt elect, number of election
    and baptism and compassion efficient cause of salvation
    and faith
    and glory of God

as immutable objections to and redemption
and regeneration
and sanctification
teaching and preaching
as unconditional
and universal gospel offer emanation external of Son within Trinity emblems embryo Emmons, Nathanael emotion Empedocles
endless alternation of falls and recoveries (Origen) endless punishmentendlessness energy
English Arianism English Church enmity envy Epictetus
Epicureanism
Epicurus
Epiphanius Episcopal church errors in biblical interpretation of copyists in translation Esau
eschatology
essence see also substance esthetic feeling eternal causation eternal creation eternal death eternal existence eternal generation eternal hope eternal life eternal punishment see endless punishment eternal sonship etemity
as future worlds implies perfection of matter

of Son ethics
Eubulus
Euripides
Eusebius
Eutyches Eutychianism evangelical covenant evangelical righteousness evangelical theology Eve evidence evil evil conscience evil desire evolution
Ewald, Heinrich
ex opere operato exegesis existence
expediency as ground of punishment experience expiation extended substance extension and matter external call extraordinary providence eyewitnesses
Ezra and Old Testament canon
Faber. F. W. faith and atonement
and baptism becomes sight
and election
fiducial nature as intelligent and justification produces works and repentance
and salvation
and sanctification
fall false knowledge family affections
Faraday, Michael Farrar, F. W. fatalism fate

Father deity of as denoting Trinity paternity
providential and universal sense self-existence
self-sacrifice
smote the Son as unbegotten fear federal union feeling
Felix of Urgellis Feltham
fetal state
Fichte. Johann Gottlieb filial subordination filiation filioque
final causes
final judgment
finite finite freedom finite holiness finite spirit
Finney. Charles fire, unquenchable first cause first covenant first death
First Helvetic Confession
first resurrection
first sin*see also* fall as external as internal Fischer, Kuno
Fisher, James flesh flesh and blood flood forbearance forbidden fruit forbidden knowledge force foreknowledge foreordination forever forgiveness
Formula of Concord
Foster, John
Frank, Franz
Frassen, Claude

free agency
Free Church of Geneva
Free Italian Church
free will freedom
freedom of indifference free-will theology
French Confession
Fresnei, Augustin friction
Froude, James Anthony
Fulgentius, F. P.
Fuller. Andrew future future judgment future punishment future redemption fulure suffering
Gale, Theophilus
Galen
Galileo Gallican Confession
Gangauf, Theodore Gaunilo gehenna Geikie, James general justice
general revelation generation
    see also eternal generation Genesis and geology genuineness genus
genus apotelesmaticum genus idiomaticum genus majestaticum geology geometry
Gerhard, Johann
German theologians germination
Gescnius. Wilhelm
Gibbon. Edward gifts of the Spirit Gill. John glorification glory gluttony gnosticism gnostics

God anger attributes being benevolence blessedness compassion consciousness
decrees delight in conversion of sinner doctrine of emotions essence eternity existence faithfulness feelings foreknowledge formlessness freedom
glory good pleasure goodness grieving heavenly Father holiness immanence immensity
immortality
immutability impassability impersonal incomprehensibility incorporeal infinity justice knowledge love mercy omnipotence omnipresence omniscience patience perfect personality personhood persons as plural possesses “body”
providential fatherhood repentance

rest revealer self-communion self-consciousness
self-existence
sell-knowledge self-sacrifice
self-sufficient simplicity and sin as social sovereignty spirit substantiality
and suffering
three hypostatic consciousnesses transcendence trinality truth unity will wisdom
without passions wrath
God-consciousness
God-man*See also incarnation*
theanthropic person Goethe
Gomes, Alan W.
good works goodness
Goodwin, Thomas gospel gospel offer gospels canonicity harmony of origin of government
Grabe, Johann Ernst grace irresistible to unfallen man gratuitous condemnation gratuitous justification gratuitous righteousness grave
Graves, Richard gravity

Gray, Robert
Grecu, Monica
Green, Ashbel
Green, Thomas Hill
Greenough, George Bellas
Gregory of Nazianzus
Gregory of Nvssa
Gregory the Great grieving Grotius, Hugo
Grudem, Wayne guilt of first sin indivisibility of infinite
Guizot, M.
Gulf Stream analogy Guyot, Arnold habit habit of faith habitual conversion habitus hades between heaven and hell pagan teaching on in New Testament
    Satan's kingdom
Haeckel, Ernst
Hagenbach. K. R.
Hagiographa
Hales. William Hallam, Henry
Haller, A.
Ham, descendants happiness hardness of heart
Harris. George
Harris, James
Hartmann, Edward von Harvey, William
Hase, Karl August von hatred heart heat heathen cosmogonies pardoning of heaven
Hebrews, author of Hegel, G.F.W.
Heidegger, J. H.

Heidelberg Catechism hell, see allso endless punishment extent and scope pains of as pit or lake preference of wicked and sin
Helmholtz, Hermann von Helvetic Consensus Formula
Hengstenberg, E. W.
Henry, Matthew
Heppe, Heinrich
Heraclitus
Herbert, George
Herder, J. G. heresy Hermas
Herodotus
Herschel, John Hesiod heterogeneous substance high priest
Hilary Hillel school historical argument historical faith historical truth history biblical of Christian doctrine secular
Hobbes, Thomas
Hodge, Charles
    on covenant
    on immediate imputation on impeccability of Christ
    on infant baptism
    on Lord's Supper
    on representative union on resurrection
    on will Holberg, L. holiness author of as created and happiness and inclination and knowledge more than innocence prior to sin

Hollaz, David
Holy Spirit accompanies faithful preacher and application of atonement and canonicity and conversion
and the church deity of
divine attributes divine name divine works
and efficacy of word extraordinary work gift of and government of God illumination of
and inclination
and inspiration internal operation inward testimony
and Lord's Supper
in Old Testament
and priesthood of Christ procession
and prophethood of Jesus
and regeneration
and sacraments
and sanctification
and saving faith and self-motion temple of and union with Christ Homer homogeneous substance homoiousios homoousios Hooker. Richard eternity
on Father
on incarnation
on Lord's Supper
on sanctification
and traducianism
Hoombeeck, Johannes hope Hopkins, Ezekiel
Hopkins, M.
Hopkins, Samuel
Horace
Howe, John

on concursus
on covenant of works on creation
onfall
on heaven and earth
on incarnation
on moral inability on permissive will on regeneration
on sin
on soul
on will Huet, P. D.
human conscience human consciousness human depravity human freedom human generation human knowledge human nature human person human self-sufficiency human soul human spirit human substance
human will Humboldt, Alexander von Hume, David
on cosmologieal argument on miracles hunger
Hunter, John
Hutter, Leonard
Huxley, T. H. hyper (preposition) hypostasis hypostatic consciousnesses in Trinity hypostatic personality hypostatic union hypothetical universalism idea and existence ideas idolatry Ignatius831
ignorance illumination
Illvricus, Flacius
image of God imagination

immaculate conception
immanence
immanent attributes Immanuel immediate imputation immensity
Immer, A. immersion immortal body immortality 541 immortality of the soul
immutability
immutable perfection impeccability impenitence impenitent destiny of intermediate state imputation of Adam's sin of Christ's righteousness of obligation to punishment of sanctification inability inability proper incarnation
    and divine immutability
    and human nature
    and traducianism
inclinatio originans indinalio originata inclination and first sin
    and option as spontaneous to evil
    vs. volition incommunicable attributes incompleteness incomiption indefectibility in heaven independence indetermination (will) indifference (will) individual election individual preterition individualism individuality induction indulgence indwelling sin

infant baptism infant regeneration infant salvation infants dying in infancy guilt of
    and Lord's Supper
    as moral agents possibility of regeneratio sin of infidelity infinite vs. finite
    vs. the all infinite spirit infinite suffering infinity
infralapsarianism inherent sanctification inheritance innate idea innate knowledge innocence insensibility inspiration distinct from comprehensible truth distinct from omniscience distinct from sanctification and language and revelation instinct instinctive desires intellect intelligent designer intercession
intermediate state
    of impenitent
    as third age intuition invisible church invisibles involuntary will Irenaeus
Irish Articles irresistible grace Irving, Edward Islam jealousy
Jehovah

Jerome
Jesus
active obedience active righteousness ascension authority body character crucifixion deity descent into hell
divine consciousness
divine nature eternal judge exaltation example first advent forsakenness glorification
holiness
human nature humiliation ignorance
immutability
impeccability infancy intercessory work justification of human nature king mediatorial offices messianic consciousness obedience on Old Testament passive obedience
passive righteousness perfection person priest prophet punishment of rational soul reign of resurrection return righteousness sanctification of human nature second coming
self-consciousness

spiritual presence in Lord's Supper suffering sufficiency of death sympathy temptations
"true body"
two distinct natures two wills twofold consciousness unipersonality
Jews, eschatology Job
John (apostle)
John of Damascus
John the Baptist
Johnson, Samuel Josephus joy
Julian
Julius Africanus
Junius, Francis
justice
as dispassionate and unselfish relaxation of justification
actual vs. declarative experience of
as instantaneous and complete
and sanctification
Justin Martyr
Justinian
Kant, Immanuel on causality
on creation
on evolution on obligation
on ontological argument
on punishment
on sin
on will Keckermann Bartholomaeus
kenosis
Kepler Johannes Kidd James
Kimchi David
King William kingdom of Christ

kingdom of God Kirby William
Knapp Georg Christian Knight Richard Payne knowledge and holiness superior at creation unexperimental knowledge of God
knowledge of good and evil knowledge of self knowledge of simple intelligence
Koran Kuenen A.
Kuinoel.C.T.
Kurtz John Henry
La Bruyere Jean de Lactantius
Lamarck Jean-Pierre
Landis Robert W Lange Frederick Albert language dynamic theory and thought Lardner Nathaniel last Adam law law and gospel
Law and the Prophets laws of matter
Lazarus resurrection
Le Jussieu A
Le Verrier. Urbain
Lee. William legal covenant legal righteousness legality legend legislative will Leibnitz G. W. F.
Leighton Robert Lessing G. E. levitical law
Lewis C. S. lex talionis
Leydecker Melchior liberalism light before sun light of nature

"likeness of men"
limbo Limborch Phillip van limited atonement limited knowledge limited redemption Linnaeus
Livingstone David
Liw
Locke Johnn logic logos Logos
    impeccability
    and incarnation
    omnipotence
    union with human nature
Lombard Peter
Lord's Supper
    and infants and sanctification
love
    of approbation of God for God
Lowth Robert Lucian
Lucretius
lust
Luther Martin
    on descent into hell
    on God as author of sin
    on predestination
    and traducianism
Lutherans
    Christology
    on communication of properties
    on holiness
    on Lord’s Supper
    on regeneration
    and traducianism
luxury
Macdonald Duff
McGregor H. C. P.
Mackintosh James Magee William magic Mahaffy.J. P.
Maimonides

malice Malthus man mankind
see also anthropology antiquity of benevolence toward creation of
divine benevolence toward self-consciousness sexuality as species unity of race Manasses
Manetho
Manicheism
Mansel H. L.
Marcellinus
Marcion
Marck Johann van
Marcus Aurelius
Maresius Samuel
Marnixius
Marsh James Mary Mastricht Petrus van material substance materialism mathematics matter eternity of and extension Maudsley Henry
Maurice F. D.
Maximus of Turin
Maxwell J. C. means of grace
mechanical motion mechanical theory of inspiration
mediate imputation mediator medieval eschatology Melanchthon Philip
Melchizedek
Melito memory mental desire mental laws mental substance mercy

and preterition
vs. indulgence merit indivisibility and satisfaction Messiah
method in theological science Michaelis Johann David Michelet C. L.
middle knowledge
middle theory of inspiration see partial inspiration Mill. John Stuart mind mind and matter
ministers of the word
Milton John Minucius Felix
miracles
as effects of higher natural law
of Son
as suspension of law of nature misery modalism mode modern theology progress of Mohammed
Mohler Johann
molecular motion molecules of matter Moll.C. B. monad monergism monophysitism monotheism of Jews natural vs. dualism monothelite moral ability moral argument moral attributes moral consciousness moral desires moral evil moral freedom moral inability moral law

moral necessity moral obligation moral science moral-government theology morality
More Henry Mormonism
Morris Edward Mosaic covenant mosaic physics
Mosheim.J.L. motion motives
Muller. Julius
Muller Max
Muller Richard A.
Munger Bernard
Muratorian canon
Murchison R. I.
Muslims doctrine of God mutable holiness mutable perfection mystery myth mythology mythical theory national election national preterition national testimony natural ability natural affections natural attributes natural desires natural inability natural law natural religion natural revelation see general revelation natural sciences natural selection natural theology natural union naturalists nature design in immutability of and original sin
vs. person and providence
as sinful
Neander August Wilhelm

necessary existence necessity negation negative attributes negative knowledge
Nehemiah Neolithic men neo-Pelagianism Neoplatonists
neo-Socinianism Nestorianism
Nevin John Williamson
new birth new covenant
new creation
New England Theology
New Jerusalem
new obedience
New Testament agreement in doctrine with Old Testament authenticity
    canonicity
    citations from Old Testament credibility
    early versions ethics
    on Trinity
Newton Isaac
Nicene Creed
Nicodemus Nineveh
Nitzsch C. I.
Noah nominalism non posse peccare nonentity notae externae notae intemae nothing.
noumenon obedience n.
    active and passive and justification
obedience of Christ obligation obstinacy
Odo of Toumai
Oken L.

old covenant
Old Latin translation
Old School Presbyterianism Old Testament
    anonymous books authenticity
    canon Christology
    credibility emptied of doctrine ethics
    on heaven
    on immortality of soul quotations in New Testament on resurrection and salvation on sheol
    on Trinity Olshausen Matthew
omnipotence
omnipresence
omniscience
ontological argument open theism opera ad extra opera ad intra optics oral traditions ordinances of Christ ordinary generation ordinary means Origen original autographs original righteousness
original sin
    in infants and moral inability realistic theory representative theory
    as voluntary inclination Osiander Andreas
ousia see also substance
Ovid
Owen John
    on Adam’s sin
    on atonement on common grace on faith
    on Father

on free will on heart
on human nature of Christ
on incarnation
on infant salvation on justice
on knowledge of God
on Lord's Supper
on mediatorial work of Christ on natural and revealed religion
on prayer
on punishment
on regeneration
on sanctification
on sin
on temptation
on the decree on the gospels on Trinity
on will pagans see also heathen ethics
knowledge of God
and salvation sin pain Paleolithic men
Paley William pantheism Papias parable of Dives and Lazarus paradise
Paraeus David pardon
Park E. A. partial ability partial inspiration partiality particular providence particular redemption see limited redemption Pascal Blaise passion passive attributes passive conversion passive obedience
Passover paternity

patriarchs patriotism patristics . .
    on creation
    on disembodied state eschatology
    on hell
    on resurrection
Paul and James on sanctification
peace Pearson John
peccability vs. temptability
Peck. T. E.
Pelagianism
Pelagius penal suffering penalty see also punishment
penitence Pentateuch
Pentecost perdition perfect being perfection
perfectionism perichdresis Peripatetics
permissive decree
Perowne J. J. S. persecution perseverance Persian religion person
    two senses
    vs. nature personal atonement personal punishment personality
personeity
Peshitta Syriac translation
Petavius Denis
Peter Chrysologus phenomenon
Philippi Friedrich
Philo philosophy physical appetites physical death physical laws

physical necessity physical power physical propagation physical substance physics
Piscator Johannes Placaeus Josua
Plato
Platonists plenary ability plenary inspiration plenitude
Plotinus
Plutarch pneuma poetry Polanus Amandus
polemical theology pollution Polycarp polygamy polytheism
Pope Alexander
Porphyry
Porter Noah positive attributes positive knowledge positive laws
posse non peccare possibilitas peccandi post-Reformation
potentia absoluta potentia ordinata “potential idea” potentiality pouring power to the contrary practical atheism practical reason pragmatism prayer
    and divine immutability
    for regeneration for sanctification preaching predestination preexistence of soul premillenarianism preparatives of regeneration Presbyterian Church

preservation preterition and merey and perdition prevenient grace pride Prideaux. H.
primary being Prime Mover
private judgment probability probation procession
Proclus profanity progressive sanctification prolegomena promises absolute and conditional propagation properties prophet propitiation prosperity providence psalms pseudoevolution psychical propagation psychology
Ptolemaic astronomy public judgment public justice public person punishment
    and culpability degrees of delay of human vs. divine and suffering
purgatory
Pythagoras
Quatrefages A. de Quenstedt Johann Andreas n. rabbinism race unity of Ranke Leopold von ransom rational appetite rational soul rationalism

rationalistic criticism rationality Rawlinson George realism reason rebellion reconciliation rectoral justice redemption and atonement
and mercy
and miracle slow progress of Refinus Reformation
Reformed and crealionism eschatology
on Lord's Supper
regenerating grace
regeneration
and baptism
below consciousness
and conversion 762-
and election 779-
and faith
not effected bv means 770-precedes justification preparatives of 773-and sinner's agency 768-69, 773-as spiritual resurrection 864-65.
two senses
and will Reid. Thomas
Reimarus, H. relation relative attributes relative knowledge relative merit relaxation of justice religion Remonstrants remorse remunerative justice renewal repentance
representative imputation representative union reprobation
and glory of God

objections to teaching and preaching of rest restorationism
resurrection
resurrection body resurrection of damnation retribution retributive justice retributive suffering revealed will of God revelation
and inspiration and science revelation proper 90-reverence reward righteousness
"righteousness of God"
Riissen Leonard
Ritschl A.
"Ritual of the Dead"
Rivetus Andreas
Roget Peter Mark
Roman Catholics on ecclesiastical priesthood
on Lord's Supper .
materialism of
on regeneration
Rosenmuller E. F. K.
Rothe Richard
Rousseau Jean-Jacques
Ruftnus Ruth
Sabbath Sabellianism Sabellius
sacramentarianism sacraments sacrifices salvation after death extraordinary manner ordinary method
Samaritan Pentateuch Samaritans
sanctification.
completion at death
and election
as grace and duty as gradual imputed vs. inherent

and justification
and means of grace as progressive Satan and atonement binding of and first sin
and hades impenitence kingdom of temptation of Adam temptations of Christ satisfaction
and atonement infinite and merit Saumur school savages knowledge of God saving faith saving grace
Schelling Friedrich
Schlegel Frederick
Schleiermacher Friedrich Scholastic theology science certainty of harmony with creation account not omniscient progress of Scotch Confession
Scotius
Scripture seal second Adam second cause second covenant second death
Second Helvetic Confession second resurrection secondary being secret will of God seed of Abraham seed of David seed of the woman Selden.John
self-consciousness
and belief in God denial of self-determination

as causative to holiness to sin self-existence
see also God: self-existence selfishness self-motion
self-righteousness self-subsistence Semiarianism
Semipelagianism
Seneca sensation senses sensibility sensual desire sentiency Septuagint
Sermon on the Mount servant
sexual appetite
sexual propagation Shakespeare shame Shammai school
Shedd Eliza Thayer
Shedd Marshall
Shedd W. G. T. life speculative bent writings shedding of blood Shelley P. B.
Shem
sheol
Shiloh
Simon the Just simple intelligence simplicity
Simplicus sin authorship of cause of conviction of decreed by God endlessness of finiteness of against Holy Spirit and hell

and human nature
as idolatry as imperfection as inclination as infinite evil
as "mystery of iniquity" not derivative quality as nothing not infused originates ex nihilo permission of persistence in possibility vs. tendency punishment for and revelation transmission of universality of Sinaitic covenant
Sirmium Council skepticism slavery sleep
Smalcald Articles
Smallev John
Smith Henry B.n.
Smith John
Smith Lawrence
Smith W.
social affections
Socinianism
Socinus. Faustus
Socrates
Sohnius
solar system
Son
deity of
divine attributes divine works divinity of filiation as mediator personality
self-existence
trinitarian position and relations
Son of God
Son of Man sons of God Sophocles sorrow for sin

sorrow of the world solcriology soul birth of and body corporeality creation of immortality of preexistence transmigration of united with body in Christ
"soul of life"
South Robert space special grace
special revelation species specific substance speculation speculative atheism
Spence, William
Spinoza B.
Spinozism spiration spirit spiritual body spiritual death spiritual discernment spiritual good spiritual substance spiritual vitality spontaneity spontaneous generation Spring Gardiner sprinkling state
Stewart Balfour
Stillingfleet Edward Stoicism
stone implements
Strato
Strauss David
Strong Augustus H.
Strout Cushing
Stuart. Moses subject and object subordination subsequent knowledge subsequent necessity subsistence

substance division of
and incarnation organic and inorganic Spinoza on
vs. subsistence substitution see also
vicarious atonement
and equivalency of suffering and Trinity succession suffering atonement as consciousness of degrees of as educational as effect of sin infinite mental ordinary and extraordinary as penal and substitution three kinds suicide sun superstitio supralapsarianism Swift Jonathan. symbol sympathy lor those in hell synergism
Synesius Synod of Dort synonyms systematic theology
Tacitus
Targums
Tatian
Taylor, Jeremy Taylor, John teleological argument teleology temporal generation temptability temptation innocent and sinful psychology of Ten Commandments see Decalogue

tendency toward death tendency toward sin
Tennyson A.
Tertullian
    on final judgment on gehenna
    on hades
    on knowledge of God
    on sin
    on Son
    and traducianism
    on transmission of sin
    on Trinity testimony
textual criticism
Thayer Obadiah
theanthropic nature theanthmpic person
    see also incarnation theism theistic proofs
theodicy of sin
Theodore of Mopsuestia Theodore theological introduction theological method theology definition of dogmatic proper as science theophanies
Theophilusof Antioch Theophylact
theopneustos
"things invisible"
third heaven
Thirlwall
Connop thirst Thirtv-nine Articles this world
Tholuck F A G
Thomasius. C. thought and language throne of judgment
Tillemont L. S.
Tillotson. John time

Titus of Bostra
"today"
Toland John
Toletus Cardinal
Tophet
Topladv. Augustus total depravity total inability tradition traducianism biblical support and incarnation
as mysterious objections against physiological arguments for as reasonable theological arguments for transgressio transmutation of species of substance transubstantiation tree of knowledge triad triangle trinality
Trinity biblical evidence difference from pantheism economic equality within external characteristics immanent
and incarnation internal characteristics mystery of ontology personality
and self-consciousness simplicity subordination within and theological method and vicarious atonement tripersonality tritheism triunity true holiness true knowledge true sorrow truth
Tubingen school

Turretin. Francis on Adam's sin
on atonement
bibliology
on compassion of God on conversion on covenant
on culpability
on decree
on divine attributes
on election
on Father on hate
on human nature of Christ
on imputation
on incarnation
on inspiration on justice
on moral argument on natural and moral inability
on prayer
on satisfaction
on sin
on Son
on speculative atheism on Spirit
on theological method
and traducianism
on Trinity on will of God
Twesten August
Twisse William two ages Tvndall John types Uberweg. Friedrich
ubiquity of Christ's body Ullmann.Carl unbelief unconditional election .
unconscious understanding and first sin
illumination of unevangelized salvation of unextended substance Union Theological Seminary union with Adam union with Christ Unitarianism .

unity
universal atonement universal offer of gospel universal present universal providence universal redemption universalism universals universe University of Vermont unlimited atonement unlimited redemption unrighteousness of God unthankfulness
Urim and Thummim
Ursinus Zacharias
Ussher James
Valentinus
Van Oosterzee J. J. variations in the Bible
Varro Vedas vegetable kingdom verbal inspiration
vicarious atonement
    as evangelical and legal as humbling
    and Lord's Supper
    and Trinity
    vs. personal atonement vicarious confession of sin vicarious sinning vicarious suffering in nature vice Victor Virgil virgin birth virtue virtuous pagans visible church visible substance visible world vocation volition Voltaire
voluntary voluntariness as indifference
    and original sin
    as self-determination
    vs. volitionary

voluntary attributes voluntary union voluntas beneplaciti voluntas signi
Vorstius Vossius wages of sin
Waldensian Confession
Wallace. Alfred
Warfield B. B. watchmaker
Waterland Daniel
Watson Richard
Wegscheider J. A. L.
Weiss Bernhard
Wellhausen Julius Wesley Charles
Wesley John n.
Westminster Confession of Faith revision of Westminster Larger Catechism
Westminster Shorter Catechism
Whaling. Thornton
Whewell William Whitby Daniel
Whitney. W. D. wicked preference for hell wickedness will fall of as fate Kant on mutability of renewal of as voluntary will of complacency will of good pleasure
William of Auxerre
Winckelmann Johann Joachim wisdom
witnesses
Witsius Hermann
Wollebius Johannes Woods Leonard
word of God as means of grace Wordsworth William world

world to come worm undying worship to Holy Spirit to the Son wrath wrath of man
Xenophon
Zahn.JohnA.
Zaleucus
Zanchi. Girolamo
zoologists
Zwingli. Ulrich